On Sixth-day, the thirteenth of First Month, started for Canada early in the morning, accompanied by our friends Jonas Smith and Samuel Childs; rode to the River St. Lawrence, which was very much frozen. No team having passed, after waiting about two hours with some anxiety, there was a boat came from the other side which had been four or five hours cutting out of the ice, which brought my daughter, Mary A. Knowles and her company, a very agreeable meeting. They were glad to find themselves on their native land again, and to see some of their old friends. Our company returned in the boat, and we were glad that we had an opportunity to cross, which seemed like a providential one, for there had no boat crossed before, nor did there afterwards, for the river froze right up again. There was much floating ice in the river, but we got safe over, and to a friend's house that night in Canada, where all six of us strangers lodged and were kindly cared for.

The fourteenth had a sitting in the family, and another in a friend's house not far off, who seemed afflicted—both favored times. Afternoon attended a meeting in a school-house near by, appointed by the strangers; then rode to Leeds at Harvey Derbyshire's.

First-day, the 15th, we all attended their meeting, held in Farmersville, which was a large, crowded meeting. Joseph was very much favored—we had a good meeting; then visited families, accompanied by H. Derbyshire and wife, in which I was engaged about ten days, and found many different states and conditions, and was favored to speak to them. On First-day, 22nd, attended their meeting again, which was a favored time; Truth reigned over all, and almost all were broken into tears; many wept aloud; the floor was wet in many places, and although it was near two o'clock, yet we had hard work to break up the meeting—they seemed both to leave their seats—a meeting long to be remembered by many that were there of different denominations of people; visited some more families, to good satisfaction.

Twenty-fourth, started for Kingston; 25th, arrived at John Fries; visited some families. Twenty-sixth, attended their week-day meeting. Had some close, trying times amongst them.

First-day, 29th, attended their meeting again. Thirtieth, rode toward the half-year meeting to Thomas Robinson's, then to our friend, Samuel Case's, and visited the families in that neighborhood and had a meeting with them, some close labor, and so felt care. Thirty-first, I attended the S. Lect. Meeting; Second Month 1st, attended the half-year's meeting for business; the strangers all attended, likewise Mead Atwater, from Lockport, N. Y. It was a favored one, though some close service was dispensed. Next day was their public meeting, which was large and favored, but I found it my place to sit them mostly through in silence. Then commenced visiting families, accompanied by ——. Had many close, trying opportunities, some that were hard to the natural part. Friends are very worthy in these meetings; some have mixed and mingled with it many ways; to the sorrow of the humble-hearted ones. My mind was dipped into deep travail and exercise with some, and under sorrow and distress for others. I had much and close labor among them, had to place things close home; some said well, some said ill, but it mattered not; the Lord was my guide and support; my only dependence. I attended West Lake and Ennetsburg meetings several times, and found some Friends in them all. I was very closely tried many times, but the Lord was near to preserve and protect; blessed be his name! O, how thankful I feel for his favors. We are poor creatures of the dust. I had sometimes to sound an alarm amongst them, to warn them of a day that was approaching, a storm that was arising that might sweep some of them away; that Satan had desired to have them, that he might sift them like wheat. Oh, how my heart doth tremble for this people, when I consider the situation of our Society—how we are running into the world, the pleasures and customs of it—the many different societies that are forming. We were to be a separate people. "Come ye out from among them, saith the Lord, and I will receive you; touch not the unclean thing." O, what need there is of getting down to the foundation. Where the Lord is to be known and there to dwell; where Christ is only to be found and the leaf is ever green.

From here to Cold Creek; visited the families there; found some sincere hearted ones who were encouraged, and the slothful and unfaithful warned; the Lord's presence being with us. Stayed at Esley Terrell's, who accompanied me, visiting the families up the lake to John Clark's, where is a small meeting in a very low state. Then on to Pickering. Attended their meeting, which was a trying one to me. The people kept coming in till the meeting was hal out, and then there seemed no settlement—hard, trying time. Visited the families much scattered, and very differently situated in every sense of the word, some loved Friends and some hated them. There were some valuable Friends yet some trying things.

Wm. Wright went with me to Mariposa visited fourteen families in the woods; attended their meeting, mostly to good satisfaction; then to Whit-Church to Henry Widowfield's, who accompanied me through that meeting, which was trying in some parts; yet comfortable and satisfactory in the main; then to Stephen Cady's at Young Street, who accompanied me through that meeting, where I had some close service yet found many valuable Friends that appears to be engaged for the cause of Truth, but had hard work to accomplish what they desired. Attended their Monthly Meeting, in which had to labor much for the cause of Truth an righteousness, showing them the inconsistency of mixing with the world and the world's follies; and exhorted them to join in with their rulers and help in the work; it was a favored meeting, and ended well; then to Tecumseh accompanied by Henry Widowfield. Some trying things there also, but I have learned in a things to be content. R. K.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Slavery.

The life of William Taylor, a Methodist Bishop, contains, the following incident, which shows the sentiments of the Methodists in Virginia, in reference to slavery. His home was in that State:

In the examination of character in the Conference, when my name was called, my presiding elder said, "No objections to Brother Taylor." Then, according to custom, it was in order for me to retire till the Conference should hear the report of my presiding elder as to my labors for the preceding year and the report of the chairman of the Committee of Examination on the Course of Study. But instead of promptly retiring, I addressed the chair, and asked an received permission to speak. I said, "Mr. Chairman, since the session of Conference last year the Lord has given me a wife. My wife is a heir to an undivided estate in which there is at about a dozen slaves. She is anxious to manumit her portion of them, but they will not enter into her possession, nor hence be at her disposal in any way, till the youngest heir reaches by majority by age or marriage. As we shall have much to do with the training of her coheirs—her young brothers and two young sisters—a hope, by the will of God and the concurrence of all concerned, to manumit the whole of th-lives together and thus avoid the separation of families. If the Conference desires a pledge or the emancipation of all that may come to my wife, we will give it."

The bishop replied, "If J. A. Harding had made a manly speech of that sort at the Conference of 1844, it might have prevented a split but rent our church in twain. We want no petty pledge, Brother Taylor, than what you have just given."

I thus foreclosed all surmises and discussions about my connection with slavery. The issue a regard to the pardon of the slaves resulted just as I predicted. Within four years from that time the youngest he was married, and on the night of her marriage a deed of manumission was executed, signed by all the claimant heirs, and from my own pocket I gave them one thousand dollars in gold, and my father engaged her passage, and put them aboard a ship bound for Liberia, where they arrived safely a due time.

Glimpses into Persian Life.

The people of Asia live in villages. I have not yet seen in Persia a detached farmer's house standing in the country alone. Such a man would live, if he could live at all, in perpetual fear and peril. Even the outlying houses of a village are often regarded as so dangerous as to be undesirable for any but the bold and unfeared. All the people live in communities, and their activities and enterprises inside are community enterprises.

In the threshing time, accordingly, the level space near each village chosen as the site of the threshing is a scene of color and life in which most of the village takes part. The people adhere with a conservatism that is both Islamic and Oriental to many of the customs of their fathers in the time of the patriarchs. The cut grain is laid on the hard, clean earth of the threshing-floor, and cut up by a roller set with knives or a broad sledge set with scores of flints, driven by oxen, cows, buffaloes. The cut straw will be trampled by oxen or buffaloes, tied six abreast and fastened by a rope to a high pole set in the midst of the floor. The inside ox is joggled so that he can take only halting steps and walk only in a small circle, and the heads of all are tied so close together that all must swing about with the ox.

The oxen are unuzzled as "they trample out the corn." The grain thoroughly cut and broken is tossed in the air and the coarse straw blown out by the wind. What is left comes into the hands of the man with "a ian in his hand," who thoroughly tries the grain from the chaff. The fan is simply a wooden shovel, with which the husbandman tuses the straw into the air. The wheat is then sifted by the women, who take as active part in all the threshing as he men, and is then carefully measured and heaped up, and so marked with indentations as to make any alteration or depletion of the pile evident. The straw is taken off to the village store-houses in great two-wheeled carts, with wheels of enormous weight, whose hubs are of most cumbersome proportions,—two feet wide and a foot or more thick. There is no oil for the axles of these carts. All the oil the people can afford is used for light or food. The wheels are greased by the simple process of stuffing green weeds into the hubs, that their juices may ease the mastoidic wagon.

The gleaners follow the threshers. The earth may seem as clean as a polished floor, but the women go over it with microscopic care, sweeping the ground with their wisp brooms and picking up each stray grain. A Boaz could easily fill the vest of a glancing Ruth who followed his young men.

The country is full of illustrations of scriptural phrases. The fan separates the wheat and the chaff, and as the ungodly man the chaff is blown away. There are no trees save those that grow along the water-courses, and they flourish like the golly man "planted by the rivers of water." This afternoon, as we rode through the village of Hatidewan, where we are resting for Sunday on our way from Orumiah to Tabriz, we passed some shepherds who were separating the sheep from the goats in a large flock. The goats seemed surprised as each was seized and put outside with the other goats, but each one seemed at once to recognize that he was in his proper place and association. Could any figure better describe than this the great separation of those whose tastes eternally conflict, and who will recognize in the hour of judgment the appropriateness and justness of the Divine distinction?

In many villages the house-tops all connect, so that one is often unable to tell whether he is walking on the ground or on the house-top, and is able to tell, if at all, only by the holes which look through into the inner bloom of the dark home life of many of the village people. For these people the words of Christ about the suddenness of his coming, "Let him that is upon the house-top not go down to take out the things that are in his house," have a very real meaning. "Let him that is in the field not return back to take his cloak" has its meaning also. Wherever a man is plowing, his cloak will be seen lying at the end of the furrow. Two women grind at the mill still as they did in Palestine in the time of our Lord. Each village has its place where its people go out to welcome their coming friends and to bid good-speed to those who go. Wherever we have a congregation, and it is known that they are coming, little groups, sometimes large companies, come out to greet the missionaries. "Behold the bridegroom, come ye forth to meet him," sounds a cry which these people know well in its spirit. A hundred Bible passages have a new meaning, and the Saviour's boyhood life in Nazareth stands out with fresh meaning and distinctness. . . .

Miss Holliday of Tabriz suggests that future archeologists, studying the ruins of the homes of the Persians, will conclude from the doors that they were built for a race of dwarfs, and from the stairs that they were adapted for a race of giants. The floors are dirt, covered in the poorer homes with rush mats, and in others with carpets and rugs. The newer rugs are of poor design and color. The incoming of foreign tastes and dyes has unfortunately affected the styles of the new rugs. But often in a poor home one chances upon a beautiful old rug, which cannot be worn out of soft, fine color, and workmanship of almost perfect fidelity. There are no bedsteads in the villages, the people sleep on the floor, and during the day the blankets and rugs, which constitute the beds, are rolled back against the wall. During the summer the people sleep upon the house-tops or in the vineyards. Each vineyard is enclosed and threshing-floor has its booth, or raised sleeping floor, where the people sleep to keep guard over their crops. There are no chairs in the village houses. The floor is the seat of all as well as the bed.

At meals all sit about, Persian fashion, on their knees, the leg from the knee down, bent directly back, and constituting the Persian chair. At the meal there may be large wooden spoons, but there are no forks and knives, save pocket-knives. Rice and masta, a sort of thick soured milk, and native bread made out of the whole wheat, in thin pieces about twelve by eighteen inches in size, are the staple articles of food. The pieces cannot be cut into leaves. They look rather like gigantic pan cakes, though they are, of course, baked hard. The bread for many weeks will be baked at one baking, and softened with water when desired for use. The chief Persian fuel is a mixture of cow-dung, straw and dirt. The women and girls are the scavengers of the village, and make the fuel, working it with their feet and hands, and making it into flat cakes, which are heaped up in conical piles, often decorated at the top with a weed or bunch of flowers. The stoves are underground holes, and there are no chimneys. The children are clad in one or two garments, and often, in these cold autumn mornings, run about the house-tops naked. They sit down with the family to the simple meals, and all partake together, dipping into a common dish. If there is meat, it is broken apart with the fingers, never bitten. It is regarded as impolite to bite meat or bread when they can be torn or broken. The bread is dipped into the different dishes, its flexibility rendering it possible to use it instead of spoons, and the sop is often dipped and given to an honored guest, as it was given to Judas in evidence of our Lord's understanding of his purpose. At this season of the year fruit constitutes a large proportion of the food of the people. The grapes are large, delicious, and abundant. Millions of pounds are yielded by the vineyards; most of these are made into raisins, and sent to Russia. Yesterday and to-day we have passed thousands of camel-bearing the raisins or going toward Orumiah for them. There have been unusual rains the past week, and as the people, with customary Persian torpidity, have nothing with which to cover the raisins exposed to the sun for drying, the rain has caused hundreds of thousands of toman damage. A toman is of the same value as a dollar. The people are very hospitable. There is always a welcome for the visitor, and a place for him about the meal. . . .

Into this simple life the missionaries brought, two generations ago, the message of the pure Gospel, and hundreds of these homes have received it, and been transformed by it. The native Christians are accustomed to speak of "dark" and "light villages," meaning to draw the distinction between those that have received the pure Gospel, and those that are with-it-at. The chance traveler can almost invariably tell the difference, and even the Moslem masters recognize it. It is the rule of the masters to have their own servants supervise the measurement of the wheat and mark it, but in some of the Christian villages the masters refer the whole matter to the villagers, saying that they can trust the Christians; and, in general, a Moslem distrusts a Moslem's word, while he acknowledges the truthfulness and reliability of their Christian subjects, whom a consistent Islamism cannot regard as other than infidels. Very hard, however, even at the best, is the lot of Christian subjects of a Muhammadan government. We must bear this in mind rightly to appreciate the significance of the work done here by Christian missions.—S. S. Trench.

The Peabody and Slater Funds.

The last thirty years have witnessed many princely gifts for education in this country, but none more important than the Peabody and Slater trusts for popular education in the South. Measured by average life nearly a generation has passed away since George Peabody, in 1836, dedicated to this cause $2,500,000, soon after augmented by an additional million. More remarkable even than the fact of the gift was the provision for its administration. One condition laid down by the donor was that Robert C. Winthrop should be the permanent President of the Board of Trustees in control of the fund, a position that he filled for twenty-eight years. The first vice Presidents were Hamilton Fish, of New York and Bishop Melville, of Ohio, and thus were united the Eastern, Central and Western States in the counsels that were to direct the new order of things arising in the South. From first to last the Board of Trustees has included three presidents of the United States, two Chief Justices of the Supreme Court, the most famous military men of both the Union and Confederate armies, distinguished bishops, financiers, like Drexel and Morgan, lawyers, such as Evans and Clifford, and representative citizens of Southern communities. At a later period "the professional educator appeared in the person of President D. C. Gilman, of Johns Hopkins."

By this constitution of the Board the problem of popular education in the South, at a critical moment of our history, was brought into the sphere of national councils. There was something in the prestige and experience of the men united in the cause that operated to break up local apathy and disaffection; so that while adhering strictly to the business of administering their trust the Board became a great agency of national reconciliation and of national unity. Not less remarkable was the choice of men for the immediate work of applying the money to the purpose intended.

Guided by the advice of the President the trustees chose as the first general agent, President Barnas Sears, of Brown University, a man of extraordinary acumen, breadth and force, united with an all-pervading sympathy. To the same presidency was due the choice of his successor, Dr. J. L. M. Curry. The unequalled fitness of this selection was signally recognized by the decision of the Board to carry the whole responsibility themselves until Dr. Curry's two years' service as trustee to the Court of Spain should expire. From the outset it was determined that the fund should not be dissipated upon "foreign shores." The first appropriations were made to select schools and towns and cities, to educational journals and agents, for the purpose of creating a sentiment in favor of free education supported by public taxation. When this sentiment was well developed special efforts were made to induce the State to organize public school systems and make them a part of the organic life of the commonwealth; and when this end had been attained there was a gradual withdrawal of grants for local schools, and a concentration of the income upon schools and institutes for training teachers. At present this is the chief line of effort maintained; and as the time is very near when, in accordance with G. Peabody's original instructions, the bulk of the fund will be appropriated to individual institutions approved by two-thirds of the trustees, it seems highly probable that some of our schools for the professional training of teachers will be the ultimate beneficiary of this liberal endowment. It is confidently expected that the Normal College at Nashville will receive the largest share in the final distribution. It would be difficult to overestimate what has been already accomplished through this central institution to which students from every Southern State have come for training and for ideals that in turn they have widely diffused through the agency of the common schools. The spirit and standards maintained at this institution are sufficiently indicated by the names of the two men whom the Peabody trustees successively called to its direction, Dr. Eben Stearns and Dr. William Payne.

In considering the actual disbursements from G. Peabody's gift, it should be remembered that by the failure of certain Southern securities the original amount was reduced to $2,000,000. Such has been the management that while a sum equal to the principal has been expended, the $2,000,000 is still in the bank.

In 1852 John F. Slater, a successful business man of Norwich, Conn., announced his purpose of devoting a fund of $1,000,000 to the uplifting of the colored population in the South. He was encouraged to this action, as he expressly stated, by the success that had marked the conduct of the earlier gift, and he adopted similar measures for the administration of his own trust. The trustees whom he chose were limited by a single condition, namely, the encouragement of such "as its intentions as are most effectually useful in promoting the training of teachers," and by the expressed wish that the education promoted should be "Christian" in spirit and tendencies. Soon after their organization the trustees expressed the judgment that in order to accomplish the purpose of the gift, they should foster manual training simultaneously with mental and moral instruction. Their decision to confine appropriations to institutions that give instruction in trades and other manual occupations was publicly announced and has since been rigidly maintained.

By this policy they hoped to send out teachers fitted to guide their race in all the industries that are at the basis of our social order. As John F. Slater had himself explained "Christian education" to be simply teaching "learned with a predominant and salutary Christian influence," such as was found "in the common school teaching of Massachusetts and Connecticut," the trustees had large liberty of choice as to the subjects of their bounty. Altogether they have aided about fifty different institutions in sums ranging from $500 to $5,000. Up to the close of 1894 they had distributed $439,981. The annual appropriations, as shown by the report of 1895-'96, amount to nearly $35,000.

Two recent measures fostered by the Board are novel and full of promise. In 1894 they announced the intention of publishing from time to time papers relating to the education of the colored race which should furnish to workers in the cause the ripe experience of the thirty years of effort accomplished. Six of these monographs have already appeared, including a valuable study by Henry Gamett on the "Occupations of the Negroes." The second measure referred to was the appropriation in 1896 of $5,000 for the "employment of pious and intelligent women, white or colored, to travel in the rural districts of Virginia and Alabama to start Mothers' Meetings, where the average ignorant woman, who cannot now hope to receive an education, may at least be taught the way to keep a decent home, and to elevate the moral standard of her humble life."

Sincerity.

The accent of deep conviction is one of the essentials to successful work in the service of the Lord, and no man who misrepresents, exaggerates, or boasts of his abilities or his result can expect to have this accent of conviction or to impress by it the people around him with a sense of his honesty and sincerity. An understatement is much better than an overstatement if any statement is necessary to be made. Christians are servants of One who did not strive, nor cry, nor cause his voice to be heard in the street.

The great work of God is mostly done in quiet and in silence. All over the land or numbered millions of seeds and roots, buried in the ground, swell and burst with life; and by its power they pierce the soil, and throw upwards the sap, and bring to view buds and fruits and flowers and harvests. No mortar can compute the amount of physical force which these restless life energies exert. There is force enough to rend rocks and to lift vaunt weights; and the flood of Niagara is but a tin stream compared with the surging torrents that are flashing upward through field and forest and rolling out through leaf and branch, to fill the world with health and beauty. And yet all this is done without the sounding of trumpets, the waving of banners, the beating of drums or the making of annual reports. So, in the hearts of men, the seed which God has planted is germinating, rooting, swelling, growing and working changes which may not appear for years and years, but which shall yet be constant as the flight of time, lasting as the ages of eternity.

Let us learn the lesson of humility. Let us lay our souls in dust, and remember that our works must be wrought in God if they are to accomplish good, "for it is God which worketh in us" both to will and to do his good pleasure."
H. L. HASTINGS.

FROM "THE UNITED FRIEND," Primitive Meetings.

[The basis upon which the first religious meetings of Friends were gathered, the ground upon which they were conducted, and the essential character of the work performed therein are well set forth in the following account from the pen of one of the most eminent of the Society's founders, who wrote of that which I knew, and in which he had part.]

So we ceased from the teachings of all men and their words, their worship, and their temples, and all their baptisms and churches. We ceased from our own words and professions and practices in religion, in times before zealously performed by us, through divers forms; and we became fools for Christ's sake, that we might become truly wise. By this light of Christ's love we were led out of all false ways, and false preachings and false ministers; and we met together often, and waited upon the Lord in pure silence from our own words, and all men's words, and hearkened to the voice of the Lord and felt his word in our hearts to burn up an heat down all that was contrary to God. We obeyed the light of Christ in us, and followed the notions of the Lord's pure Spirit, and too up the cross to all earthly glories, crowns and ways, and denied ourselves, our relations, and all that stood in the way betwixt us and the Lord. We chose to suffer with and for the name of Christ, rather than enjoy all the pleasures upon earth, or all our former zealous professions and practices in religion without it.

over and Spirit of God, which the world yet ves in.

While waiting upon the Lord in silence, as ten we did for many hours together, with our inds and hearts toward Him, being staid in the light of Christ within us from all thoughts, sly motions and desires, in our diligent aiting and fear of his name, and hearkening his word, we received often the pouring ven of the Spirit upon us, the gift of God's ly eternal Spirit as in the days of old. And ir hearts were made glad, and our tongues sed, and our mouths opened, and we spake ith new tongues, as the Lord gave us utterce and his Spirit led us, which was poured ven upon us, our sons and daughters. To us reby were the deep things of God revealed, d things unutterable were known and made anifest, and the glory of the Father was realed. Then began we to sing praises to the ord God Almighty and to the Lamb forever, ho had redeemed us to God, and brought us ut of the captivity and bondage of the world, d put an end to sin and death; and this was and through and in the light of Christ within s.

Much more might be declared hereof—which d not be believed if it were spoken—of the veral and particular operations and manifestions of the everlasting Spirit that was given us d revealed in us. But this is the sum: Life d immortality were brought to light, power on and high and wisdom were made manifest, e day everlasting appeared unto us, and the yful Sun of righteousness did arise and shine th into us and in us. The babe of glory was rn, and the heir of promise brought forth to ign over the earth and over hell and death; hereby we entered into everlasting union and hloship and covenant with the Lord God, hese mercies are sure and infinite, and hisonise never fails. We were raised from death life, changed from Satan's power to God, and thered off all the barren mountains into the ld of eternal peace and rest. Mighty and wonful things hath the Lord wrought for us and us, by his own outstretched arm.—E. Burugh.

PROFESSOR J. M. SAFFORD describes, in the merican Geologist for Tenth Month, a new occurrence of phosphate rock in central Tennessee, containing from sixty to eighty per cent. calcium phosphate, and hence likely to prove much economic importance. The rock has spongy structure in layers or plates from one six inches in thickness, making up the principal portion of the bulb from three to eight et thick. The age of the deposit is that of the renton, in the Lower Silurian. Several comites are already at work and doing a large isness in the extraction and shipment of the ospate. Such discoveries benefit the genal public by decreasing the cost of artificial ntilizers.

Fern Pickings.—Previous to 1886, says a Massachusetts paper, the gathering of ferns in their ural state was almost unheard of. The ferns put on the market were raised in hot-houses, though a few florists sent their men after ld ferns. It occurred to a person of that ate, about ten years ago, that it would be probable to pick and market the ferns which grew nudantly in his neighborhood. The venture as successful, and the business grew until, in 1894-'95 he disposed of 7,000,000 ferns. Two varieties always find ready sale—the delicate-leaved maidenhair and the coarser "dagger"-fern. The season for gathering is from Tenth to Fifth Months. From sixty to two hundred persons are engaged in fern picking. Good pickers earn from four to six dollars a day, ordinary pickers about two dollars. The ferns are brought in, tied in bundles of twenty-five each, and forty cents a thousand paid for them. These not needed for immediate shipment are packed in low rooms, each holding about 1,000, 000 ferns. There are eight buildings devoted to this purpose. The ferns are placed in beds of 20,000 each, dry moss is placed between the layers, and the whole bed covered with wet moss. The utmost care and watchfulness are required to keep the ferns from getting heated, and thus bleached or covered with white spots. In addition to the fern industry a large business is done in other greens. In a recent season, 13,000 Christmas trees were landed, 20,000 yards of "roping" of ground pine, bushes ions of baled spruce boughs and sphagnum moss.

SIR JOSEPH LISTER gives the following account of the discovery through which ligatures made from some dead animal tissue began to be used for tying blood-vessels. Formerly threads of various kinds were used and had to be left long hanging out of the wounds; and their final removal was painful, and there was serious danger of bleeding. After he had discovered the power of carbolic spray to destroy the microbes that can get into a wound without, and also how they can be kept out by antiseptic dressings, he found that the exudations from the opposing surfaces of wounds not only did not cause irritation, but actually hastened the process of healing, as they afforded pabulum to the growing elements of the neighboring tissues. This suggested the idea of using some substance that could be tied round the lacerated blood-vessel and left in position, the knot holding securely while the ligature becomes gradually absorbed and replaced by a ring of living tissue. These ligatures are called "catgut"; as a matter of fact they are made from the intestine of the sheep, and are a great boon to both patient and surgeon, and they are prepared with every precaution, so as to be perfectly antiseptic.—The Independent.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 2, 1897.

Our Friend, David Heston, makes the following report of the publication of the Tract Repository for 1896.

To the Contributors of The Tract Repository Fund:—As year after year has sped by, the work of printing and circulating The Tract Repository among the colored population of the Southern States has gone on unrenittingly, till now more than twenty years have elapsed since the first issue went forth. What good has been accomplished by it no one can definitely measure. We feel justified in believing, however, that this labor of love for the benefit of a poor, and, by many, despised portion of the community has not, by any means, been in vain, as ample testimony has not been wanting to assure us that The Tract Repository is not only eagerly read month by month, as it appears, by a host of readers, both old and young, but that substantial impressions for good have been made upon many of these, and continue to be made, especially among the young, whose minds are often open to drink in, and be benefited by, the less us of instruction which this unpropitious publication has diligently sought to convey.

As the general depression in business at the beginning of the year was unusually great, it was thought most prudent to materially lessen the edition, which was accordingly done, greatly to the regret of many who had to have their supply cut off. This reduction, it was found later on, was larger than was really necessary, as in closing the account for the year, there was found to be a considerable balance to the credit of the Fund. This has been truly encouraging, and warrants the feeling that the edition for 1897 may be again extended to that of some previous years. Trusting that our friends and contributors will accord with this cheering view, and that their interest in the work, and their desire to promote the circulation of The Tract Repository will remain unabated, we enter upon a new year, looking to Him to prosper and bless the efforts put forth, and trusting that The Tract Repository will continue to shed the same salutary influence in the future that it has done in the past.

The receipts and expenditures for the year ending Twelfth Month 15th, 1896, have been as follows:

The "Christian League," of Philadelphia, is an association of philanthropic men whose object is to improve the moral and physical condition of the city. It was organized in 1895 and incorporated in 1896. Its line of operation has been to co-operate with other societies, and with the city authorities in their efforts to enforce the laws against vice and immorality. When houses are found by its agent to be used for immoral and unlawful purposes, it notifies the owner or agent and tenants and sends them copies of the Act of thirty-first of Third Mo., 1860, which shows that owners or agents who knowingly let their houses for such purposes are liable to fine and imprisonment; if this does not produce the desired result, application is then made to the city authorities. When the houses are vacated, a circular letter is sent to the owners or agents, urging them to be careful that their houses be not again rented for objectionable purposes.

It also sends a circular to the poor inmates of such houses, offering its help in their effort to reform, and to earn an honest livelihood.

It promotes the efforts to purchase the miserable, decayed buildings found in some of the older parts of the city, and to build neat and attractive dwellings in their place, fitted for respectable working people.

One of its objects is to protect the children from depraving influences, and provide good homes for them in the country.

It is reasonable to expect that the support

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1867.—Second Month 10th.—Eli Jones was at our meeting on Third-day, and very instructive in testimony. Among other good matter, he said, "There was such a thing as silence without life, as well as a ministry without life." I felt it, for it seemed to me as though my silence was sometimes without any life at all, just dead. To-day, I tried very much to be lively in spirit, but was so overcome with drowsiness this afternoon, that it was impossible to be still a minute, without nodding. Perhaps it was walking in the wind and then being warm. I never suffered so before, and must now feel very much for those who are tempted.

Dear J. S. said, "If we would reign with Christ, we must suffer with Him." The seed was very low, and we must be willing to go to the bottom of Jordan to bring up stones of memorial to our God. Oh, my Lord, thou hast been very good to me, indeed, this week—braises, high praises to thee.

Third Month 11th.—I am trying to be more and more resigned in everything. To-day it seemed as if a pure flame of love arose from my heart to my God and Saviour. I never felt the same before. I want so much to know how to give pure worship, as the angels do. Teach me thy way, oh, Lord.

31st.—The Lord is very good to me, indeed. Two weeks ago I had such conflict, and He brought me through all, and I could praise Him for his marvellous mercies. To-day He helped me again. Oh, that I may never go without his pure life. Heard that dear L. H. Brown was sick. If thou shouldst remove her, Oh, Lord, gather her to thy eternal rest.

Fourth Mo. 14th.—I thank thee, O, Father, for sending messengers. We had some living words to-day. This afternoon, D. B. spoke from the text, "I was with you in weakness and fear and much trembling." Oh, is it not so with me? I am so weak, Lord, dear Lord; send down now thy Holy Ghost upon me, and in my words, if thou callest me to speak for thee. Nothing but thy own blessed power can save me people and draw them unto thee. I am itching, and must be an empty tube. Dearest Lord, give me, I humbly pray thee, more of the love of God and his blessed will in my soul, that I may rejoice more and not feel my peculiar trials so much of a cross and heaviness of soul. When I try to fix my whole love on Him and his will, it seems to raise me over all in holy trust and repose. Thou it is, oh, Lord, that showest wonders in the deeps. Praised and magnified be thy holy name.

20th.—Yesterday was my birthday. I want so fully to dedicate myself to the Lord. O, be pleased in thy infinite mercy to blot out all my transgressions and wanderings from thee in thought and deed, and let me commence anew with pure and fervent desire to walk in holiness through attention to thy blessed inspeaking voice. I do indeed "rend my heart," and come unto thee as the prophet Hosea counselled me, in brother's reading yesterday morning, sixth chapter, first verse: "Thou hast laid a cross upon me, indeed, but thou art merciful and just, holy and true, blessed forever.

Fifth Month 12th.—Dear S. F. B. very excellent on "Buy the Truth and sell it not." He thought there were some in the present day, who, if required to choose the Lord or worldly things, would choose Him above all. I had been thinking of the same thing, that I would choose the Lord if I could not have something else, though I desired the Lord, too. Oh, strengthen me, dear Lord and Master. Thou knowest the struggles of my soul to keep it fixed on thee.

I heard that dear William Evans died yesterday afternoon. Oh, Father, raise up more like him in thy mercy to the children of men.

21st.—O, my soul! how very low before Him, who searcheth the heart, and has sent messengers lately to our meeting, that have spoken of the things nearest my soul, viz: that of walking in the right time and only way in the ministry, if thou, Oh, Father, doth indeed call me, no unworthy one, into it. Oh, that I may be more humble: be only a little branch from thee, oh, my Lord, the true vine, bearing what fruit thou sendest sap for, pruned and trained by the Father, and moved yet more. I humbly pray thee, until I am acceptable unto thee; remove everything comparable to the canker worm, palmer worm and caterpillar, that would eat out thy precious life from my soul. Oh, Father, my Heavenly Father, I feel so vile in thy holy sight, because there is pride and hardness of heart in me, thou knowest me afar off. Oh, I beseech of thee, humble me and give me contrition of heart and soul. Oh, Lord, thou only canst do it, save me, for thy mercies' sake.

Eighth Month 11th.—Returned on Fifth-day from Providence, Rhode Island, where I have been staying with my brother, his daughter having been sick five months. We are thankful unto thee, oh, Heavenly Father, for her recovery. Attended to my me, but I was not obedient at the last. When shall I be entirely obedient unto thee, and say, without shrinking so much, "Here and I first prepare and then send me." "Here and I first prepare and then send me."

27th.—The poor leper cried out formerly, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean."

Having this morning felt thy cleansing power, I am ready to cry out, "Lord, if thou wilt thou canst keep me clean," and very humble.

Tenth Month 19th.—Heard to-day of the death of my dear aunt Avis Ken, aged eighty-six years. She was sensible to the last, and spoke very sweetly to those who surrounded her. She died last First-day morning, the thirtieth instant, the funeral to take place on Seventh-day at two o'clock, at Lynn, Mass. "Like as a shock of corn, fully ripe, gathered in its season," is that dear aunt, I believe! A minister many years; preserved by our blessed Lord through many trials. O, such my soul, may the mantle somewhere fall, and may my poor soul follow thee faithfully and in the end be gathered into thy rest.

1868.—First Month 5th.—The first First-day in the new year. "He re-erecth my soul: He leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his own name's sake," came to me so sweetly this afternoon after a season of deep humiliation for sinfulness lurking in my soul. O, Lord, I want to be more pure. Thou only canst make and keep me so. I want to love and serve thee with such fervency. Oh, be pleased to have mercy upon me continually, that my love may be fixed on thee, who art the ever worthy One. Eternally blessed and praised be thy holy name, for thou forgiveest the humble suppliant. The conclusion of the Select Quarterly Meeting, Eleventh Month 2nd, '87, and the reading of the minutes on Eleventh Month 26th, in our Monthly Meeting, have caused deep baptisms of soul. Thy poor child is nothing, oh, Lord, to walk in all that high and holy path, and would faint by the way if thou didst not support! Oh, for preservation! Oh, for preservation! Let no words come into thy poor servant but what are from thy pure Spirit. Pour out, dear Father, more of thy Holy Ghost and power upon me. I humbly supplicate thee, therefore, and for wisdom, heavenly wisdom and understanding.

Second Month 2nd.—Yesterday attended for the first time the Select Quarterly Meeting. A solemn season, and I feel a little strengthened to hold on my way, end-avoring to walk in humble trust before the Lord, believing such will not be confounded. O, Lord, help me to cast all my care upon thee, for thou carest for me. Help me to set my whole thoughts and affections on thee; take away all that is contrary to thy holy will in me. Wilt thou not instruct and teach me in the way I should go, and guide me with thine eye.

Yesterday dear Thomas Evans was at meeting, looking very poorly, as though only a few more days here were to be his portion. He spoke of the great religious activity among some, and that others who did not always join with them might be censured as idlers; but encouraged and warned us to join with nothing, except as the Lord led immediately into it, quoting the passage, "Without me ye can do nothing." He said, such as these would in the end be found to be standing in their allotments and their reward would be sure. I was so thankful for the words.

Third Month 1st.—My God! O, my God! in the name and power of thy dear Son, I humbly ask, thou wilt not cease until thy pure work is thoroughly wrought out in my soul. Let the fire of the Holy Ghost consume and destroy all my dross and tin, that I may indeed be a tree of righteousness, through planting of the Lord, that thy name only may be glorified!

Fourth Mo. 5th.—To-morrow our dear aged friend Hannah Gibbons will be carried to her long resting place. O, that the Lord would let her mantle fall on some one else. O, that He would raise up more standard bearers to his holy cause and Truth—in the ninety-eighth year of her pilgrimage—so humbly spent by his glory. O, my soul! be encouraged to more faithfulness in serving and trusting Him, who has so preserved his aged disciple.

Fifth Month 17th.—My soul adores thee this night, oh, my God, for a little renewed evidence, granted this day, that thou upholds me.

Shortly after being seated in meeting this morning, "Be still and know that I am God," quieted my mind and drew me very near unto Him in spirit, where I hoped to rest quietly all the meeting, but supplication for others soon filled my soul with the assurance, "It is I, be not afraid," twice repeated to my halting mind. Oh, Lord, thou thyself helped me through, blessed be thy holy name. My prayer is again and again unto thee, that thy words only may proceed from my mouth. I plead with thee, that it may be with me as with Mary of old, that the "Holy Ghost may come upon me, and that the power of the Most High may overshadow me," at such seasons that the holy words born in my soul may be only of thee, O, Lord, for assured I am thy own works can alone praise thee. Here am I, as clay under thy Almighty hand, do with me what thou wilt.

Seventh Month 2nd.—Much, very much, has my soul to be grateful for the past month. Again and again He has helped me through when I was all weakness in myself. The first week of vacation was spent at Anna Cook's, she kindly inviting me to a visit to the seashore. Oh, that my whole conduct might be such as to bring glory to my Redeemer.

Yesterday, Isaac Morgan, Jr., was recommended in our Select Meeting, also Phoebe Ann Mendenhall. Lord, thou knowest how to preserve us all in thy pure fear, knowledge and counsel. I humbly entreat thee to do it for us.

Ninth Month 13th.—Surely the Lord is faithful, and great and marvellous are his works unto them that seek to serve Him with the obedience of a child. He did indeed help me through marvellously at the Quarterly Meetings held at Germantown and Woodbury, and my soul was covered over with thankfulness on returning from the latter one, especially. Almost all of last month was spent at cousin Mary's (Stokes'), keeping house for her, while she went East. Help was vouchsafed to perform many new duties, but greater faithfulness would have yielded more peace. Thou art good to me, oh, Lord, and I praise thy Name.

DR. DALES says: "We shall never make men Christians by suppressing and throwing into the shade those parts of the Christian revelation which especially provoke their hostility. The truth which men regard as incredible is precisely the truth which men most need to hear, and which is likely to produce the deepest moral impression."—Late Paper.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The London Plague in 1665.

Those who are familiar with the early literature of the Society of Friends can remember that it contained frequent references to that remarkable event—the Plague of 1665. It was a time in which Friends were suffering much persecution; and in the vain endeavors of the Government to suppress them, a law had been enacted for their banishment to the West Indies. The efforts to put this in execution were largely frustrated by a series of providential occurrences. Of the first two who were actually transported, one was Edward Brush, of London. Soon after this occurrence, the pestilence broke out in a house next door to that in which Edward had lived. Edward prospered in Jamaica, and ultimately returned to England.

It was difficult to find vessels which would carry away these innocent victims of a cruel persecution; but at length a man was found who agreed to carry between fifty and sixty Quakers to the West Indies. The pestilence increased until more than eight thousand persons died of it in a week. In the meantime the ship with the imprisoned Quakers remained in the river, the master being imprisoned for debt.

George Bishop had previously written an epistle to encourage Friends, telling them that if they should be banished God would not forsake them, and that the Lord would visit their enemies with the sword and pestilence.

George Fox, the younger, a few years before (in 1661) wrote a warning in which he predicted that the Lord would bring a terrible judgment upon the land.

Isaac Pennington also wrote to the King and Parliament to dissuade them from going on in persecution, telling them that "Ye will find it the bitterest work that ever ye went about, and in the end will wish that the Lord had never given you this day of prosperity, than that He should suffer you thus to make use of it."

He adds, "The Lord hath hitherto preserved the Quakers against great oppositions, and is still able to preserve them. Every power hitherto hath made nothing of overrunning them, yet they have hitherto stood, by the care and tender mercy of the Lord; and the several powers which have persecuted them, have fallen one after another."

With a soul-sustaining faith, he says: "I have no doubt in my heart that the Lord will deliver us." "It is the delight of the Lord and his glory to deliver his people, when to the eye of sense it seemeth impossible."

Of the plague itself, the following narrative may interest our readers:—

"Ever and anon came tidings to the north of the fearful progress of the plague. That God was pouring forth the vials of his wrath, because of the wickedness of the great Babel was the general feeling among the religious people of the day. Fear and trembling fell on the thoughtless votary of pleasure when the pestilence that walketh by noonday, and respecteth neither rank nor beauty, had penetrated from the prison to the palace. The King and Court fled to Oxford, and the city generally became deserted by those who had the means of escape.

"A witness of the sad scene says: 'What eye would not weep to see so many habitations uninhabited, the poor and sick unvisited, the hungry not fed, the grave not satisfied! Death stares us in the face from every coffin which is hourly carried along the street. The custom was in the beginning to bury the dead in the night only; but now both night and day will hardly give time enough to do it.'

"How sunk the inmost hearts of all,

As rolled the dead cart slowly by,
With wailing woe and harsh howl fall!
The dying turned him to the wall,
To hear it and to die.'

"Amid these scenes of dismay and death, instead of opening the doors of the pestilential prisons, to allow unafflicted persons therein confined, who were not criminals, to seek a pure atmosphere, those whose intolerance had pen them up merely ordered fifty-five Friends to be taken out of Newgate and placed on board ship in the Thames called the Black Eagle, in order for banishment.

"They were very much crowded on board and the plague soon breaking out there also out of these fifty-five victims twenty-seven died. 'I visited the Friends in the ship,' says George Whitehead, 'and had a meeting with them on board, and the Lord my God preserved me both from the distemper and from banishment wherein I do humbly confess his power to his own praise and glory.'

"The Black Eagle, after considerable detention, sailed away at last from the Thames, but she was taken in the Channel by a Dutch privateer, and passing round by the north of Ireland and Scotland to avoid recapture, the two vessels at length reached Holland. Only one-half of the Friends were alive, the other half having died as above stated, but the residue were liberated by the Dutch, and afterwards all but one of them returned to England.

"George Whitehead was one of the few who remained in London throughout the terrible plague without taking it. Thus he speaks 'That which added to our Friends' affliction was the hardness of our persecutors' hearts their cruelty and barbarity in imprisoning and detaining so many of them in Newgate, and in the White Lion prison in Southwark, after the plague had broken forth, and many people swept away. I had not freedom nor peace to leave the city or the Friends in and about London during that great calamity, even when the mortality was at its height. I was given up to stay among them, to attend Friends' meetings to visit the Friends in prison and at their own homes. In all that time the Lord preserved me from the infectious distemper, which mercy I hope ever thankfully to remember.

"On First-days I took my night-cap in my pocket when I went to meetings, not knowing but I might be apprehended and committed to prison. However, the Lord gave me faith to be resigned to his will either to live or to die for his Truth's sake.'

"George Whitehead was witness to many a death-bed scene in the terrible Newgate, and in other prisons where, notwithstanding the dreadful surroundings, peace and comfort from the Lord often reigned triumphant, 'though sorrow and sadness,' he says, 'seized on his own spirit in view of these harmless lambs stretched on such beds in noisome holes and prisons, but, he adds, 'on the other hand, my spirit was often refreshed and revived, seeing that Christ their salvation and redemption, was manifested to and in them, and that the Lord had thus appointed the final deliverance of many through death, from the cruelty of their oppressors.'

"Ellis Hooks, writing from London to his friend in Lancaster prison, on the seventh day of Ninth Month, when the disease began to subside, says, 'I have been preserved well, but as a brand is plucked out of the fire, so has the Lord delivered me. I have often laid down my bed in sorrow, and rose as I went to bed, not having slept a wink for the groans of those that are dying. Each morning I counted it a mercy that the Lord had given me another day. But," he adds, "our meetings now are quiet, and Friends are generally well, both in prison in the ship and at Newgate; and there is not above one a day buried in the Friends' burial-ground."

A Temperance Sermon.

FROM THE LIFE OF WILLIAM FAYLOR.

On the twenty-sixth of May, 1853, I attended the funeral of W—, of Pennsylvania, who had the previous night committed suicide by use of laudanum. He lay in a small, four-room building, attended by ten of his bar-room companions.

I proposed to them the following question: How did this man come to his death?

"Hard drink," said one. "I've known him here for three years. Hard drink was the thing, fir."

"No," said another, "Bill was one of the best boys in the city. He had his falling, and would drink, as we all do, but he was a first-rate fellow."

Another said, "It was a punishment: He could not help it." (He meant it was decreed.) "Well," said yet another, "I think it was his misfortune. He was driving a dray in the city and had bad luck, and got discouraged and put an end to himself."

I then said: "It is a solemn thing to die. To lie in our sins is dreadful, but for a man to rush, by the violence of his own hands, unbidden to the presence of a sin-avenging God, is too terrible to be described. What could lead this man to such a dreadful end? I then quoted their testimony on the subject, and continued: If he had been diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, would he probably have had such hard luck? If so, would this have led him to destroy himself? Now, the facts in the case are these: The hard luck, the discouragement and depression of spirits were all results of his drunkenness. And hard drink, as this man has truly said, was the sole cause of his death. Now, how did he become so hard a drinker? By tipping. When he used to drink, as you all do, he did not dream of such an end. Thus the fatal habit grew on him. Do you not know that the chains of habit are stronger than chains of steel? You are every day forging chains which bind you down more and more tightly to an infamous destiny. Your only hope of a better end than the case of this poor man is to taste not, touch not, handle not be unclean thing. Begin now to pray, and cry to God in the name of Jesus for mercy to forgive the past, and for grace to cure this vicious habit and to preserve you in the future."

IMPORTANT INCIDENT.—In a letter received lately from one of our correspondents we find the following: "A little incident happened here. An English mastiff had a cataract growing over one eye and was taken to an oculist who removed it. Some months later it was noticed that it was growing again and ought to be attended to. Some days after, the dog came home with his head bandaged, and to the astonishment of the family, who inquired of the doctor who treated him before, it was found that the dog came to his office and that the doctor finding another operation necessary, performed it without the least resistance from the dog."—Our Dumb Animals.

Minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting.

We have five in copy of the printed Minutes of Iowa Yearly Meeting of Friends (Conservative), held at Erianna, Madison County, Iowa, from the fourteenth to the twentieth of the Tenth Month, 1896; from this the following are extracted:—

Seventh minute.

"Epistles have been read at this time from the several Yearly Meetings with which we correspond to our comfort, and we trust, to our profit. We desire that these fraternal greetings may ever continue to be prized by us, because of their emanation from that Divine Life which is the light of men."

Summary answers to the Queries.

"First Answer.—All our meetings for worship and discipline have been attended, except one on account of a funeral, and one omitted on account of a mistake in the date. Some exception in regard to the avoidance of unbecoming conduct. The hour of meeting nearly observed by most Friends.

"Second Answer.—Friends generally maintain love towards each other as becomes our Christian profession; one report mentions a lack in that respect on the part of some of its members.

Tale bearing and detracting are discouraged, but not altogether avoided. Some exception noted in one report in regard to care being taken to end differences when they appear.

"Third Answer.—Most Friends endeavor by example and precept to educate their children and those under their care in plainness of speech, deportment and apparel; but more care in these respects is desirable, and they endeavor to guard them against pernicious reading and from corrupt conversation, and they are encouraged to read the Holy Scriptures and other religious books.

"Fourth Answer.—Some care is taken to deal with offenders impartially, but perhaps in some cases not as seasonably as might be best.

"Fifth Answer.—Friends appear to maintain a faithful testimony against a hireling ministry, slavery, oaths, military services, clandestine trade, prize goods and lotteries, except that all are not clear of attending where a hireling industry is supported.

"Sixth Answer.—We believe Friends endeavor to live within the bounds of their circumstances, but there appears to be a lack in a few of being sufficiently careful to avoid involving themselves in business beyond their ability to manage, and in being punctual in complying with their contracts and engagements, and in paying their debts seasonably, in which deficiencies some care is reported.

"Seventh Answer.—As far as appears, Friends are clear of importing, vending, distilling, and the unnecessary use of all intoxicating liquors. A little exception in regard to attending places of diversion. Moderation and temperance appear to be observed.

"Eighth Answer.—The necessities of those requiring aid have been inspected and relieved.

"Ninth Answer.—Schools are encouraged for the education of our youth, under the tuition of teachers in membership with us.

"Tenth Answer.—No new meetings settled. Salem meeting for worship has been discontinued.

"Eleventh Answer.—No ministers recorded. Lydia H. Moorman and Ellen L. Rockwell recorded Elders. William H. Oliphant, an Elder, was set Fifth Month 8th, 1896, aged eighty years and four days. Huldah C. Hoag, a minister, was set Seventh Month 10th, 1896, aged seventy-seven years and five months. There are nine ministers and thirty-seven Elders within our limits.

"Twelfth Answer.—There are one hundred and five families and one hundred and two by parts of families, and each family is furnished with a copy of the Holy Scriptures, as far as we know.

"Thirteenth Answer.—The Queries addressed to the several meetings are read and answered as directed."

Eighteenth minute.

"The apparent omission of some of our subordinate meetings, as brought to our attention by implication, from a minute sent to this meeting from one of our Quarters and through some deficiencies in the Answers to the Queries, has at this time claimed our serious, earnest and prayerful consideration, during which a deep travail of soul was manifest for the restoration and strengthening of the Divine Life and Love amongst us, and that everything may be eradicated from our midst that has a tendency to mar the love and unity that should prevail among us, and earn-to-be the breathing of many hearts, we believe, to the God and Father of all our sore mercies that He would, in his great loving kindness and tender mercy, say to these threatening walls that seem ready to overwhelm, 'Peace be still.'"

Report of Book and Tract Committee.

"There are six libraries within our limits which contain about five hundred and fifty-eight volumes, from which forty-seven loans are reported. One meeting states there has been some books loaned, but the number is not definitely known. There has been two volumes added the past year.

"Number pages of tracts on hand at last report in the several Monthly Meetings, ninety-four thousand three hundred and fourteen, of which forty-seven thousand two hundred and seventy-eight are in Norwegian. Number of pages received from the Tract Association of Friends the past year, twenty-two thousand and eighteen. One report mentions a number of juvenile books being distributed. In addition to this a number of the Yearly Meeting remotely situated, report as having distributed fourteen thousand and five hundred pages of tracts which were also procured from the same source."

Two hundred dollars were directed to be raised for the use of the meeting.

Minute of the Exercises.

"In the review of the providence of our Heavenly Father in again bringing us together in the capacity of a Yearly Meeting and in relation to our part in the life of the Universal Church, the congregation was evidently made sensible of a measure of thankfulness to our great Head, and with the feeling of wonder and awe the privilege and corresponding responsibilities resting upon us. Doubtless the craving of many hearts was in line with the exercise and that in the Divine fear we might be enabled to attend to the duties laid to our hand.

"We were renewedly impressed with the solemn charge entrusted to us in the testimonies of our Holy religion in some degree possessed by others bearing the name Christian, but more emphatically ours in the banner given us to display because of the Truth.

"The universality of Divine grace, the com-minion of Saints, the presence and headship of Christ in his Church, the freedom of the Gospel ministry in its qualification and call and exercise, independent of human organization and control, or professional authority or worldly interest, were forcibly brought before us, with the need for abstaining from the ritual and formality, so much practised around us, and so enervating and delusive in their nature.

But above all, the concern of the Meeting was in regard to the primary and indispensable experience in the virtues of all religious life—the new birth—becoming new creatures in Christ Jesus—in which alone similarity to God and communion with Him can be known, not only as a preparation for the glory of the future, but for equipment and qualification for performance of all the duties of the life that now is, as the evidence and guarantee for participating in the ultimate rest that remains to the people of God."

"A letter from our dear aged friend, Phoebe R. Gilford has been read on this occasion to our satisfaction. The Clerk is directed to acknowledge its reception and our appreciation of it."

To Iowa Yearly Meeting of Friends:

"DEAR FRIENDS—In that love that neither time nor distance can efface I feel drawn to address you with a few lines expressive of affectionate sympathy, desiring that the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, the great Shepherd of the sheep, may abound among you. How soul-enlivening is the thought of his love when felt to circulate in the heart with power to cleanse and purify the affections and set them on Christ alone as the Shepherd and Bi-hop of our souls. He said, "I am the good Shepherd and know my sheep, and am known of mine." It is the little ones who are addressed with the encouraging language, "Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom." By Faith the kingdom is received into the heart. By patience in tribulation the peace of God, which passeth understanding is known to abound to the glory of God.

"Dear Friends, keep in mind that it is written that the "just walk by faith" and by it the worthies of past generations wrought righteousness; out of weakness were made strong, and much more, as by the inspired record we are informed. It is by patience and comfort of the Holy Scriptures that the disciples of our blessed Lord gain hope. In that love which changes not, your sympathizing friend,

How to Read.

To read much is one thing; to read wisely is another, and a far better thing. The following advice on the subject may be of great service to those who follow it:

"After reading a book or an article or any item of information from any reliable source, before turning your attention to other things, give two or three minutes of quiet thought to the subject that has just been presented to your mind; see how much you can remember concerning it; and if there were any new ideas, instructive facts or points of especial interest that impressed you as you read, force yourself to recall it. It may be a little troublesome at first, until your mind gets under control and learns to obey your will, but the very effort to think it all out will engrave the facts deeply upon the memory—so deeply that they will not be effaced by the rushing in of a new and different set of ideas, who read, if the matter be given no further consideration at all, the impressions you have received will fade away so entirely that within a few weeks you will be totally unable to remember more than a dim outline of them.

"Form the good habit, then, of always reviewing what has just been read. It exercises and disciplines the mental faculties, strengthens the memory, and teaches concentration of thought. You will soon learn in this way to think and reason intelligently, to separate and classify different kinds of information, and in time, the mind, instead of being a lumber room, in which the various contents are thrown together in careless confusion and disorder, will become a storehouse where each special class or item of knowledge, neatly labeled, has its own particular place, and is ready for use the moment there is need of it."

MIDNIGHT MUSINGS.

ELIZABETH HATFIELD.

Silence reigns! the world is slumbering;

I, the weaver's vigile share;

Far behind is laid the number

Of earth's brightest joy or care.

Jesus, thou art watching with me,

And I cannot feel asleep;

Not as thou, once, all forsaken,

Even by those thou call'st thine own!

Soft my pillow—thou hast crossed me

With thy mercies numberless—

Everlasting arms are round me,

And eternal their cares!

Ne'er to be withdrawn, their shelter,

I, till to Abram's bosom borne,

Shall wake in his arms undying

On some bright and happy morn.

What, if, ere this sun arises,

Thou should'st call, and call for me,

Leaving all this fond heart prizes,

Gladly would I come to thee!

Yet, for those I love behind me,

Ere I rest beneath the sod,

To thy care I would commit them;

Take and keep, my Saviour, God!

Feeble is my arm to guard them,

Though my love is deep and strong;

Weak my heart and prone to error,

Even its love might lead them wrong.

Take them, oh, Almighty Father,

Ever in thy grace to share!

With a mother's faith, I give them

To thy tender love and care;

Knowing, I again shall find them;

For thy words of promise true

Are not only for our comfort,

But include our children, too,

And, for other ones scattered

Over earth's surface, wide apart,

Yet, together fondly cherished

In one weak but loving heart,

I would ask thy richest blessing;

And whatever of sin in me

May have marred our Christian union,

Cancelled now, oh, let it be!

Thou, in peace with all around me;

Peace within, which few can tell;

Broken every tie that bound me,

Come, I bid the world farewell!

True, the valley and the river

Lie between me and my rest;

Nature shrinks, the foot may quiver

When its first cold wave is pressed:

But, I know, that He whose mandate

Said "Thou far, no farther go"—

He, who to the brink hath led me,

Will not let its waves overflow;

And, to Him my end committing,

May I calmly yield my breath,

Easy, or pain, as is most fitting,

Clothing naught, for life or death.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Bilboes, Stocks, Pillory, etc.

In Alice Morse Earle's book, entitled, "Curious Punishments of Bygone Days," attention is called to the sensitiveness to derision and mockery that existed among our forefathers, and to the use of this feeling in various kinds of punishment, by exposing the offender to degrading and helpless exposure. Among these engines of punishment were the bilboes, in which the feet of the offender were securely fastened to a heavy bar of iron; preventing locomotion. The earliest mention of their use in Boston was in 1632, and the offence was "being drunk."

The Ducking Stool was brought over from England to this country. There is preserved a letter describing its use in Virginia in 1634. The victim was one Betsey Tucker, who by the violence of her tongue, had made the neighborhood uncomfortable. The machine consists of a "platform with small rollers on wheels, and two upright posts, between which works a lever by a rope fastened to its shorter or heavier end. At the end of the longer arm is fixed a stool, upon which the said Betsey was fastened by cords, her gown fast tied around her feet. The machine was then moved up to the edge of the pond, the rope was slackened by the officer, and the woman was allowed to go down under the water for the space of half a minute. Betsey had a stout stomach, and would not yield until she had allowed herself to be ducked five several times. At length she said piteously, "Let me go, let me go; by God's help I'll sin no more." Then they drew back the machine, untied the ropes, and let her walk home in her wetted clothes, a hopefully penitent woman."

In New England the Stocks were soon substituted for the Bilboes. These consisted essentially of two planks set on edge, one above the other, with semicircular holes on each, so that when a person was seated behind it, his legs placed in the depressions cut out, and the upper plank let down, he was effectually imprisoned. The carpenter who built the first one used a Boston was condemned to sit in it for one hour because his bill was considered extortionate. The records of our religious Society show that they were sometimes used as instruments of persecution.

In the pillory, the culprit was placed in a standing position, with the head fastened between two planks, as the feet were in the stocks. It gradually went out of use in England, but was not formally abandoned until 1837.

The abolition of these punishments which involved personal exposure and its degrading effects, must be regarded as an evidence of the advance of civilization, and a more just appreciation of the proper objects of criminal punishment.

The angels announced that the coming of Christ's kingdom and the universality of his reign would bring "peace on earth, good will toward men." The ages which have followed Christ's wonderful prophecy have been ages of war and bloodshed. Kingdom has risen against kingdom, and nation against nation. A very large proportion of the wealth of the world has been spent in war; and death has destroyed more millions on sea and land in this way than by pestilence, famine, fire, and flood. But the day of universal peace is coming, the sun-streak of its dawn are upon the eastern sky. The great plan of arbitration between this country and England is the first sign of its approach. When this is "une affaire accompli" the naions of the earth will regard it as, perhaps, the most wonderful event of the ages, and as supremely worthy of their imitation and adoption. Thus Christ, by drawing all the nations together in the bonds of a universal brotherhood, is drawing all nations nearer to himself.

It will follow that the long-since-uttered promise, that "the nations shall learn war no more," hastens rapidly on. The first fact that strikes our attention is the formidable character of the weapons of warfare at the present time. When guns from the ships of war can pierce through plated iron vessels at five miles, and can throw and explode their bombs at fifteen miles; when guns used by infantry can fire from fifty to sixty bullets in a minute; when Gatling and other guns can spread desolation and death over a whole army in a few hours, it is well for nations to pause before loosening "the dogs of war." Now, it has occurred to me, as well as to many others, that God is making use of these means to bring all wars to an end.

It looks to me as very probable that there will be no more fierce, bloody war among the nations, when blood will flow so wide and so high that it will reach unto "the bristles of the horses" in that day; but I very much doubt if, after that, any other great battle will be fought in this world.

Now then, waiving all other considerations, if wars come to an end, if there is no longer need of standing armies and navies, what an immense revenue will come into the kingdom of Christ! And when, added to this, there shall be the complete abolition of the liquor traffic, that countless millions more will be rendered up for Christ and humanity! How taxations will tumble; how wages will increase; how missions will spread; how humanity will be lifted up; and how the whole earth will be filled with Christ's glory and praise! Christ will reign over all the earth, and peace will unfold her banner over all the nations. This glorious era hastens on. "Come, Lord Jesus; come quickly."—Christian Advocate.

The Famine in India.

There is no power in speech or pen to describe the desolation produced in India by the famine now prevailing. One may look over the map if the world in vain to find a picture which equals it in sorrow and distress. The population is immense—three hundred millions—and the productive power of even that rich soil is fully taxed when in the best condition to feed the vast population. The periodicity of the seasons is such that in many parts of the country three harvests can be reaped in the year, while in others only two can be expected. But to support a population of five times the number of that of the United States the yield must be full. When there is the scantiness of an inch of rainfall in the year, the meaning is, not simply deficiency of food, but the death of hundreds of thousands, and even of millions. Here, in this country, where nature seldom withholds her bounty, we cannot understand the deep significance of only a partial Indian famine.

Rice and wheat are important grains, but the great staple of India, as a whole, is millet. This is an autumn harvest, and the failure of the southwestern monsoon in the fall of 1896 is what is popularly believed to have produced the present great calamity. If there should come a little rainfall still, such as an inch and a half, the extent of the famine will still be great. But it is too late now to hope for any escape from the poverty and death sure to follow in the wake of the dearth of the harvest. Should there be no more rain this season, the famine must take its place among the larger ones of the century, and the wail of sorrow and starvation will be heard over immense stretches of the Indian Empire.

The American missionaries report a scene all most incredible when they say that not less than forty millions of people are on the verge of starvation. In some places there are parents who, to save the family from death, are selling their children at ten cents apiece. It is declared that the minimum of people who have died, or must die, is one million.

While India is an English possession, the authorities cannot meet the strong demand for immediate help. The British Indian government has already appropriated one hundred and twenty-five million dollars to furnish employment for the people. But many of the unemployed are so weak that they cannot work. Then there is added the rapacity of the speculators in grain, who buy up and hoard, for later profits, great supplies of the cereals. One missionary writes: "The grain merchants seem like perfect fiends, bent on nothing but the gratification of their greed. In their cellars lies grain enough for a year. They compel the people to starve by the enormously exorbitant prices they ask."

But there is another, and quite overlooked, factor toward this wretchedness. How does famine come to India? How is it that there are immense regions of India which do not yield a single cereal? We answer that they are the very lands in which no cereals are sown, for they are appropriated to the culture of opium. The charts issued by the government show that the famine regions are identical with those of the production of the poppy. It is more advantageous, at first sight, to raise opium than millet, rice, or wheat. The opium territory is fixed out to the people, and the government gives a fixed price for the product, and exports it to China and the rest of the world. The alternative is either opium, which is slow death, or starvation, which is immediate death. Let the culture of opium stop from Lahore down to Cape Comorin, and the occasion for famine will stop in a single year. Nature, if she be permitted to have her own way, would take care of all the people of India.

If this now devastating famine will only reach England that the time has at last come when the culture of the poppy must give way to the cereals, and that, in the end, there is more real gain to the people and the national treasury by stopping the trade in opium, it will be a moral triumph beyond all calculation. At first the national income would be less, but finally it would be found that the continuation of the responsibility for opium is a source of less both moral and material to every interest of the people.

When will the English government stop the crime of opium? May we not hope that, if no other voice reaches the ear of the English Parliament, the wail of one million dying sufferers in India will arouse the English conscience to say of the trade in opium: "Thus far, and no farther?"

"Well to suffer is Divine;
Fas the watch-word 'E' down the line,
Pass the co-emergence: 'EMERGENCY'!"

"Not to him who rattle dears,
Nor to him who only bears,
Is the victor's garland sown." —Whittier.

Why Farm Values are Depressed.

By far the most important division of the annual report of the Secretary of Agriculture is contained in the following paragraphs, in which we will give a sentence that cannot be too strongly emphasized:

The attention of those who complain of the condition of the American farmer and the hardships which, by stress of the competition of all the farmers of the world, he is compelled at times to endure, is called to the fact that nearly two millions of farms of eighty acres each, in the United States, have been given away by the Government under the homestead act of 1862, during the last thirty years. These farms contain many millions of acres of arable land.

The giving of something for nothing has resulted in an abnormally rapid increase in the acreage under tillage in the United States during the last thirty years. This also has caused a decline in farm land values in the eastern and older States. Under the timber and fire law the amount donated is equivalent to over five hundred and fifty thousand more farms of the same size. This takes no account of the desert land laws, under which numberless choice locations were given away, or of the large body of land patented to states and corporations, and sold at merely nominal prices to build up the country. Lands long tilled and rendered partially infertile, could not, of course, enhance in value and sell in competition with virgin soil which was being donated by the general government. Lines of rail transportation have either pioneered homestead lands or quickly followed their settlement. Reduction in the cost of carriage has made the long haul of products from those far away—given away—farms but a trifle more than the freight upon products grown in the eastern and middle states, going to the same domestic markets or to those of Europe.

No legislation relative to the patented section here has as directly injured to the farmer who had bought and paid for the lands upon which they lived and labored.

Until the homestead law came into vogue in 1862, the farmers of the United States competed with each other upon land representing accumulated capital and fixed investments, but after the homestead law lands began to produce and slip into market crops from the vast area of fertility which they represent, eastern and middle States land values declined. It was impossible for them to enhance in competition with fresher and more productive land obtained as gratuities by other farmers. It was equally impossible—land remaining stationary and supply suddenly increasing—for farmers in the older States to profitably sell their product in competition with those of the newer States grown upon lands which cost their owners nothing.—S. Lord.

Is 1748 Mary Palsley, of Ireland, went over to England on a religious visit. When traveling in Yorkshire she made the following record in her Journal:—

"Having been under deep baptisms and poverty of spirit, as I quietly rode along, the Lord was pleased in mercy to break in upon my mind by his life-giving presence and power; and it became the language of my soul, 'Ye are Lord, and thy servant will bear.' After which many things were divinely opened to me, wherein I greatly rejoiced, and was thankful to the Lord my God. Then I found a sudden out-come rebuke, and heard as it were a voice, that said in the secret of my soul. These dispensations thou most delightest in are least pleasing to me, and not so beneficial to thy soul, as that pure poverty of spirit, brokenness and contrition of heart, which bring into humility of mind; and the reason why this is so little desired, and so unpleasant to the creature is, because it can have no part therein, but is wholly and entirely excluded and set at naught—can discover no beauty or excellency in it; and this is the reason I love the offering of a broken heart and contrite spirit, as it is most pure, and without any mixture of the creature. For whether there be prophecies, Divine openings, revelations, consolations, joyings or rejoicings in the Holy Spirit, gifts of healing, or tongues of utterance, in all these self can rejoice and have a share, being obvious to it, and bringing it honor." Then said I, "Lord, dispense to me what is most pleasing to thee, and I best for my soul, as long as my weak faith and patience can endure it."

Recent Researches in Babylonia.

In the library building of the University of Pennsylvania, in this city, is a large collection of Babylonian and Assyrian antiquities, which have lately been acquired by the Babylonian expeditions of the University of Pennsylvania, first sent out in 1888, at the expense of a few individuals who had organized for the purpose of effecting a systematic exploration of ancient Babylonia. This collection has been gradually increased until it now contains many objects of various kinds illustrating the life and history of the ancient people who once inhabited the now silent and almost deserted wildernesses on the banks of the Euphrates, and which have been obtained mostly under great difficulties, arising from the unhealthy character of that district, the great labor involved in exploring the mounds which cover the site of its former great cities, and especially from the warfare and treacherous disposition of the Arabs who roam over that region, and look with suspicion upon all intruders.

Hermann V. Hilprecht, one of the professors to whom the work of exploration had been intrusted, has lately prepared a work of a popular character, in which he gives an account of the labors in which he and others have been engaged in this interesting field, and also of similar efforts in Palestine, Egypt and Arabia, under the title of "Reisen Resarches in Bible Lands," from which the following has been mostly taken. In this work there are chapters by other explorers and Oriental scholars, giving the results of the examination of different parts of the extensive area in which explorations have been carried on, and of some of the conclusions in regard to historical events which have been deduced from these discoveries.

That these relics of antiquity could have been preserved in these localities, in their present almost unaltered condition, appears to have been largely due to two causes—first, the remarkable dryness of the climate, and secondly, to the nature of the material—hard bricks, of which most of the walls of the houses and of the ancient cities were constructed, and which when falling into ruins, covered up and preserved from the action of the air all that might have been contained in these ancient abodes.

One of the writers in this book, Fredrick Jones Bliss, remarks in reference to these mounds in Palestine: "Every buried city is, in a certain sense, a mound. An ancient Jerusalem is one vast mound, upon which modern Jerusalem is built."

They are called by the Arabic name of tell. "The Syrian tells are not large, varying from twenty to a hundred feet in height, and from fifty to fifteen hundred feet in diameter. But the general appearance is the same in all, a fairly flat summit, sometimes rounding off near the sides, but more usually with a distinct edge. The sides are steep. Some of them have more than one summit. Tell es-Sultan, near Elisha's Fountain, at Jericho, is really a large platform about fifty feet high, with three distinct summits rising for fifty feet more near the edges. Some of the tells are used as modern cemeteries; others are under cultivation; others are covered by Arab villages. They are usually found near springs or wells, and occupy some natural swelling of the ground. The reason is obvious. The first settlers desired two things, water, and a position suitable for defense. Their descendants, or their conquerors, continued from age to age to occupy the same favorable position, and so the tells grew."

"But how did they attain to such a height, and how did they finally approximate to the appearance of an ordinary hill? The answer is short, and brief. Mud brick is at once the most destructible and the most indestructible of building materials. Mud brick is the great preserver. Mud brick requires no foundation but itself, so mud brick town rises upon the foundation of mud brick town until the site is finally abandoned, when the last settlement, crumbles away, is washed by a storm, is smoothed down by a plough, and hence the tell, really a pile of historical volumes, arranged in chronological order, becomes a green hill, on first view an ordinary natural feature of the landscape."

"This regular stratification is a tell's unique importance. Stone built cities form much debris from generation to generation, but it is largely a debris of chaos. Stone buildings require solid foundations, often rock foundations, hence the intervening debris is disturbed over and over again. Chronological order becomes confused. It is preserved of course in special cases."

"The only way to study a mound thoroughly is to cut it down in horizontal slices, leaving the buildings which have been exhumed in each layer standing until they have been mapped and planned, cut these away, and proceed to examine the layer below in the same way."

In undertaking the exploration of the ancient city of Nuffar, the spot selected by Prof. Hilprecht and his companions in beginning their labors in Babylonia, a similar systematic plan of operations was undertaken, which he thus describes: "With a handful of trained Arabs from the neighborhood of Babylon, the excavators made a beginning. The entire hill and its surroundings, with the visible remains of the city walls, Inazar-Marduk and Nimiti-Marduk, were trigonometrically surveyed, trenches and experimental ditches were determined on scientific principles, and driven into the hill; a systematic plan of operations was outlined and discussed, by moonlight or daylight, in all its details. With tact and skill the excited minds of the neighboring tribes were quieted, by enlisting in the service of the expedition members of the most influential branches of the Atele, who numbered about four thousand warriors; and thus new resources were opened to the population of the land. In this way the number of Arabs we had at work gradually increased until it reached four hundred. While some labored in cutting the experimental trenches, and others in collecting the literary documents recovered from the old archives, the work of thoroughly examining the heap of the vast ruins of the temple was pushed on with special vigor. The result was satisfactory in every way, and more than two thousand precious cuneiform documents were secured in the space of a few months."

"In the following year the work was resumed and "Hundreds of graves, clay coffins and urns were opened; and the ruins of demolished habitations and storehouses, together with the contents of their chambers were explored. In this way thousands of documents, inscribed bricks, vases, and votive tablets, were collected. The active life and motion which once pulsated in the streets of the city, and in the fore courts of its temple, on the palm-and-corn-laden banks of the great canal, were unfolded before the eyes of the restless explorers."

"In removing the rubbish around one of the great temples, a platform was reached, upon which the first King of Ur is stated to have built about the year 2800 B. C., and upon going deeper, the foundations of a still older edifice was discovered, and "numerous bricks bearing the name of the great Sargon, who 2300 B. C., had extended his powerful empire to the shores of the Mediterranean, came forth to the light of day under pick-axe and shovel."

"Under the buildings of Sargon and Naram-Sin, one of the largest and most important finds rewarded the labor that had been expended. An arch of brick, in splendid preservation, and of nearly the same form as is found in the later monuments of the Neo-Assyrian empire, was laid bare, and most carefully photographed. By this the question long discussed by the historians of architecture, as to the antiquity of the arch, entered upon a new stage and its existence in Babylonia about the end of the fifth and the beginning of the fourth millennium before Christ was proved."

"But although the excavations have gone all ready thirty-five feet below the platform of King Ur-Gur of Ur (about 2800 B. C.), not yet have they reached the deepest foundations of this venerable sanctuary, whose influence for over four thousand years had been felt by all classes of the Babylonian people. But in the presence of this fact we begin to have some notion why Nippur is spoken of as the oldest city of the earth in the old Sumerian legends of the Creation."

The most noteworthy results of the expedition, it is expected will be described in a series of volumes now in course of preparation. They are thus summarized: "Over thirty-two thousand cuneiform tablets form the bulk of what has been recovered. Many of these are of the time of the dynasty of King Ur-Gur (about 2800 B. C.), and of the period of the Cassite Kings (about 1725 to 1140 B. C.), which hitherto were not represented by dated documents. Of the manifold character of these documents—syllabaries, letters, chronological lists, historical fragments, astronomical and religious texts, inscriptions referring to buildings, votive tablets, dedications, inventories, contracts, etc., nothing less than an exhaustive examination can give a clear idea. Most of the early rulers of Babylonia, who were known to us only by name, an fourteen of whose very names had been lost have been restored to history by this expedition. Through the abundance of the recovered text of the earliest Sumeric rulers, Alusharshid, Sargon I, and Naram-Sin, comprising hundreds of inscribed bricks, door sockets, marble vases, an clay stamps for bricks, our conception of the lower and extent of the Semitic race of about 3800 B. C., had to undergo a radical transformation."

"Of especial value are the hundred and fifty fragments of inscribed sacrificial vessels and other objects belonging to three kings of the oldest dynasties of Ur and Erech hitherto unknown, which promise to cast entirely new light upon the chronology of a difficult period."

"Nine clay sarcophagi have already been excavated at Nuffar, and conveyed in good condition to the Imperial Museum at Constantinople, and twenty-five more stand packed, ready to leave the fields of ruins. Among the great number of seals and seal-cylinders such as the Babylonians employed in business transactions, there are some of every period of their history, and several belonged to kings and governors. Two hundred clay bowls, closely inscribed in Aramaic, Hebrew, and Mandean, allow us a welcome glimpse into the wizardry of Babylonia, which exerted considerable influence on the religious teachings of the later, post-biblical literature of the Jews. Thousands of enamelled and plain vases of clay of all sorts, playthings, weapons, weights, gold and silver ornaments, objects in stone, bronze and iron, several very ancient statuettes and bas-reliefs, together with a collection of human skulls, which offer us help in the study of the physical ethnological relations of Babylonia, complete the rich collection of antiquities obtained from the ruins of Nuffar."

"In contemplating the results of these and other explorations of the last half century in Babylonia and Assyria, J. F. McCurdy writes: 'We can bring before our mind's eye the powerful and populous cities, of which Babylon, though not the oldest, became the greatest. The imperial city itself, with all its suggestiveness of culture and power and pride and luxury, is unveiled to us; and now we can appreciate the numerous biblical references, direct and figurative, to Babylon the great.' We have learned the actual foundation of the traditional glory of Babylonia and Assyria, with their temples and palaces, their commercial and legal institutions, their observatories, colleges and factories."

"In considering the evidences of thought and careful workmanship connected with these remains of a remote age, we cannot repress the belief that in many respects the powers of mind possessed by this ancient people were not inferior to those of the present inhabitants of the earth. A similar conclusion has been reached by those investigators who have examined the monuments of Egypt, some of which date back more than ten thousand years before the time of Abraham. Prof. A. H. Sayce writes: 'Now, this is a fact which is very remarkable. The oldest monuments testify to a civilization already long established and highly advanced; and yet Upper Egypt is a country where, as has been said, nothing perishes except by the hand of man. How is it, then, that no traces have been discovered of the steps which led up to the marvellous civilization of the Old Empire? How is it that we nowhere find any evidences even of the primitive structures out of which the elaborate hieroglyphic system of writing may have grown? Now and then, it is true, objects have been met with which indicate a certain degree of barbarism, as they belong to periods subsequent to that of the Old Empire.'

"We cannot emphasize the fact too strongly that Egyptian civilization is at the very outset all grown. So far as the monumental testimony is concerned, it has neither childhood nor youth. Every fresh discovery brings out the fact into clearer relief."

"The monumental history of Egypt gives no countenance to the fashionable theories of today, which derive civilized men, by a slow process of evolution, out of a brute-like ancestor. On the contrary, its testimony points in an opposite direction: the history of Egypt, so far as excavation has made it known to us, is a history, not of evolution and progress, but of retrogression and decay." ### Natural History, Science, etc.

A Christian Native of South Africa.—The lions in the Orange River country, when they get old and too stiff or too lazy to follow their trade of catching bucks and other active animals, sometimes crouch about the kraals and pounce upon a man; and when they begin that kind of work they soon acquire such cannibal propensities as to become very troublesome customers.

An old lion had been making some such unwelcome visits to the kraal to which this Christian native belonged, and one day he and two others took each a gun and went out in search of him, hoping to make a final settlement with him. A few miles distant from the kraal, passing over the brow of a ridge into a little vale, they suddenly surprised a large lion feeding on the remains of an animal carcass. The lion, so glad to see them, and without ceremony advanced to give them a greeting. The men, in their sudden fright, declined the interview and ran for life. The Christian man quite outran his two heathen compatriots; but as he was making away with himself as fast as he could, the thought came to him, "One of these men will be killed; neither is prepared to die! I am prepared, thank God! I had better die and give them time for repentance!" He instantly stopped and faced about; the two men passed him, and before he could transfer his thoughts from his heroic consent to die for his heathen neighbors to a purpose of self-defense with the gun the lion was upon him. With the force of a mighty bound the lion struck him on the breast with his paw. He got the stock of the gun between his teeth and ground it to splinters. Meantime, the others, seeing their friend down, returned near enough for a sure shot; both fired, and the lion dropped dead beside his bleeding victim.

Brother Reed examined the deep scars left by the paws of the lion, which the noble fellow would carry to his grave. "Surely for a righteous man will one die; yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die. But God commendeth his love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us." And here was one of Africa's sable sons so imbued with the self-sacrificing spirit of Jesus, that even for a heathen man he was willing to die.—Life of William Tuckey.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH, 1897.

OF FAVORITE.

In the year 1812 there was published in THE FRIEND an account prepared by the late Thomas Evans of the conversion and of some of the religious exercises of John Davis, an English Friend, who died in 1714, aged seventy-six years. In early life he was in the company of a man who kept a list of him a large family of some 120 persons. At this period he wandered far from the path of rectitude, but being divinely visited and made to submit to the Lord's requirements, he was dismissed from his employment and went to London to join his wife, which had become a Friend. He says: "I felt constrained to appear in my clothing more like one of that people. I resolved, however, to imitate only the smartest I had noticed amongst them. I parted with my long wig and bought a short one; bought cloth for a dress and carried it to a Friend to make up, who wished me to give directions how the suit was to be made. It did him I had not tried on, but, he being an honest Friend, would leave it with him. He made the clothes so plain, I was ashamed to put them on. But the Lord determined to bring down that strong will in me which would have its own way. So after many days of sore conflict respecting them I was made to submit."

"The first day I put on my clothes, I walked out of town three or four miles, the Lord raising a cry in my heart, that, as I had taken the mark of a holy profession, I might not by my life and conversation bring dishonor thereupon. The Lord showed me I was wanting in many things, concerning plainness of speech, which is the language of Truth; the keeping on of my hat, and refusing the customary salutations. These crosses to my natural inclinations brought me under much exercise many days and nights before I could submit. But I knew the Lord to be a swift witness against the evil nature that was in me; and many times, when my hat was on my hat to pull it off, I felt in myself condemned, so that I durst not do it; so likewise in speech, and such things as are used by many little matters."

This was a part of the discipline to which the Lord subjected his servant and prepared him for usefulness in the church; and unless he had been so humbled enough to submit to these requirements, there is no reason to suppose that he would ever have become joined to Him in a covenant of life and peace. He would, such some may be disposed to ridicule these things as matters of no importance, yet if they do, they feel for their younger Friends must impel the fathers and mothers in the church to earnestly desire that the young may bow their necks to the cross of Christ, and through filial submission to what He manifests to be his will, become prepared for adoption into his family. Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth—we all need this holy discipline, which as surely yieldeth the peaceable fruits of righteousness, when that are exercised thereby. Therefore, dear young Friends, reject the counsel of the devil, who would fain persuade you to follow your own inclinations, and "Be ye followers of God as dear children."

A stated meeting of the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia, was held on the eighteenth of Twelfth Month, 1896. It was felt to be an interesting and profitable occasion.

Among other matters that came before it was a memorial forwarded by Concord Quarterly Meeting for our late beloved friend, Clarkson Sheppard. In his younger years he indulged in gay company, and in reading works of fiction, his tastes being then strongly literary. But about the twenty-sixth year of his age, he was favored with numerous and powerful visitations of that Divine Grace which bringeth salvation, and which teacheth to live "soberly, righteously, and godly." He was enabled to endure the conflict with self, and to submit himself without reserve to the will of his Heavenly Father; and under the impression of duty he committed to the flames all of his books, whose tendency was objectionable. About the same time he adopted more fully than before the plain dress and language of consistent Friends. However much such sacrifices may be despised by the worldly-wise, yet we doubt not they yielded peace to his earnest mind; for it is an indubitable truth that without filial submission to the will of God, there is no preparation experienced for the joys of heaven, for it is as true now as in the days of Samuel the prophet, that "Rebellion is as the sin of witherfall," a mortal sin. And the proverb of the wise king is still applicable, "He that being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed and that without remedy."

From the time of this memorable change our dear Friend seemed to live a life of much devotion to the cause of Christ, and was indeed a laborious worker for the spread of religion among his friends and in the world at large, both by pen and tongue. His bringing forth of much fruit was an evidence that he continued to "abide in the vine." Desires were felt that we, his surviving friends, might, in this respect follow him.

The Committee on the distribution of the "Appeal to our Fellow Christians on the Subject of War," gave some interesting details of the prosecution of their work. They had received numerous satisfactory responses from those to whom it had been sent; and in several cases requests for further information respecting the doctrines and practices of Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES—It is stated that President Cleveland has been repeatedly assured by Spanish officials that he will be recognized in Cuba when the Province of Pinar del Rio has been pacified. The time has now arrived, it is believed, when the home rule reforms will be instituted there and also in the Provinces of Matanzas and Havana, where the insurgents have never secured a foothold. The Spanish Ministry are now understood to be engaged in drafting the proposed reforms. It is believed they will be completed within a fortnight.

FINANCE—The Treasury debt statement shows a net decrease in the public debt, less cash in the treasury, during Twelfth Month, of $2,838,577. Total cash on hand, $57,467,247.

CONGRESS—A session in Washington on the 1st inst. of the 54th Congress. Minister with respect to Cuba had a long session of the House, and the Finance bill was passed. In San Francisco, at the building by each of the 14 companies named an increased number of 1800 new employees, each vessel to be capable of carrying 2000 tons of oil or 4000 tons of coal. The cost of the new vessels is about one and a half of million dollars, and will be paid by the Government.

THE CANAL IN THE UNITED STATES—An account appears in San Francisco of the proposed canal to be cut through the Isthmus of Panama. It will be the original location of the hydrographic and heights at the entrance and the outlet.

The effect of this decision will be to stop practically all dredging on the Chicago lake front and in New York, Los Angeles and Philadelphia harbors and other points. Millions of dollars are involved.

The public land still vacant in this country amount to over 600,000,000 acres not including Alaska, with its 290,000,000 acres.

Massachusetts annually imports from beyond her border eggs to the value of $3,000,000.

THE WORTH JOURNAL says: "Some time ago the Journal referred to the liberality of the Southern States in the matter of negro education, showing that they had appropriated nearly $30,000,000 to negro schools since emancipation, and that more than $100,000,000 had been paid by the whites. We stated in that article that the South is inevitably committed to two propositions: First, the support of the negro schools by general taxation; second, the separation of the schools for whites and negroes. Under this policy 90 per cent. of the literacy among negroes has disappeared; over 27,000 negro teachers have found places in Southern schools, and their number, as well as the number of negro pupils, is steadily increasing. We also called attention to the fact that there are in the South, besides the common schools for negroes, which every Southern State maintains with increasing liberality, 152 institutions of higher and higher education of negroes, including thirty-two colleges."

The clerks of the Detective Department in this city, having in charge the record of missing people, estimate that during the past year 1200 persons had been reported among the "disappearances." Many of these were reported from other cities, but the majority were Philadelphia men. Exactly what proportion of these remained "missing" the clerks have no means of ascertaining, because, as they say, a great many who are reported simply go away for a day or two on little "sprees" and go back home and the folks do not care to be troubled by informing the police that they have returned. However, the word "recovered" is impressed with a rubber stamp across the entry of the name and residence. The records are being improved year by year.

DEATHS in this city last week numbered 502, which is 107 more than the previous week, and 50 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 256 were males and 246 females; 92 died of pneumonia; 41 of consumption; 49 of heart disease; 21 of diphtheria; 19 of bronchitis; 19 of apoplexy; 19 of convulsions; 15 of old age; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 15 of nephritis; 15 of Bright's disease; 12 of inanition; 12 of typhoid fever; 11 of inflammation of the brain, and 10 from various causes.

MARKETS, Dec. 8—U. S. 2's, 95 1/4; 4's, 98, 100 1/4; 110's, coupon, 111 1/4; 112's, new 8's, 120, 120; 5's, 114 1/4; currency 6's, 100 a 105.

COTTON was quiet and nominally quoted at 7 1/2 c. per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR—Spot here ranged from $10.00 to $10.75 per ton for winter wheat, and $11.00 for spring in sacks.

FLOUR—Winter super, $2.80 a $3.10; do., extras, $3.25 a $3.50; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $1.25 a $1.40; do., do., straight, $1.45 a $1.65; Western winter, clear, $1.25 a $1.50; do., do., straight, $1.40 a $1.75; do., do., straight, $1.80 a $2.00; spring, clear, $1.75 a $1.90; do., straight, $1.95 a $2.10; do., do., straight, $2.10 a $2.25; do., favorite brands, higher. "It will sell, extra, $1.25 a $1.65; do., clear, $1.25 a $1.50; do., straight, $1.40 a $1.75; do., patent, $1.90 a $2.10. RYE FLOUR—$2.75 per bushel for choice Pennsylvania. BUCKWHEAT FLOUR—$1.25 a $1.40 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN—No. 2 red wheat, 35 a 35 1/2 c.

No. 2 white oats, 23 1/2 c.

BEEF CATTLE—Extra, 4 1/2 a 5 1/2; good, 4 1/4 a 4 3/4; medium, 3 1/4 a 4 1/4; common, 4 a 4 1/4.

SHEEP AND LAMBS—Extra, 4 a 4 1/4; good, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4; medium, 3 a 3 1/2; common, 2 1/2 a 3 1/2; lambs, 4 a 5 c.

HOGS—Western, 7 a 7 1/2; State, 6 1/2 a 7.

FOREIGN—Letters of exchange on France held on the 3rd instant show that 6 Republics, 13 Radicals, 3 Socialists and 12 Reactionists were elected to the Senate.

A cablegram from Rome says it is rumored that the Powers generally will give a thumbs-up to the arbitration treaty concluded between the United States and Great Britain.

A special despatch from St. Petersburg to the Commonwealth says it is the intention of the Czar to create a Supreme Court, with the object of relieving himself of much of the work which devolves on the Emperor. The new court will settle all the matters to be decided by the Czar, except those of the highest importance, which will, as heretofore, be referred to the Emperor himself. The Grand Duke Constantine Constantinovitch, uncle of the Czar, will be appointed President of the court.

Spain has granted reforms for Porto Rico, which are to go into effect immediately, without waiting for the approval of the Cortes.

Spanish planters and merchants in Cuba have sent a representative to Madrid to ask Weyler's recall, or request the Spanish Government to order him to allow gridding. Weyler's unpopularity among the Spaniards is increasing.

Ex-Premier Sagasta, leader of the Spanish Liberals, says General Weyler is an obstacle to the pacification of Cuba, being incapable of coping with the rebellion. Senor Sagasta advocates concurrent military and diplomatic action on the part of Spain and the immediate granting of constitutional and tariff reforms in Cuba.

Prime Minister Canovas declares that the Spanish Government will not accept any intervention on the part of the United States in Cuba.

Referring to the new law prohibiting the sale of liquor to natives in the Transvaal, The South African Financial Record states that out of the 24,618 natives entitled to the 14 mining concessions, 12,338 of them were constantly drunk. With this fact before them, the Record says that "arguing from the standpoint of pure expediency, it would have been advantageous to this (mining) industry to have paid the government a sum equivalent to the entire revenue derived from the canteen licenses for the privilege of closing them."

It anticipated that in five years' time Japan is likely to possess the most perfect telephonic system in the world. There is already a considerable nucleus in existence, but the decision of the Japanese Government to appropriate a sum of $64,000,000 in the expansion of the service, spread over a period of seven years, will make itself evident. The work of construction is being rapidly carried out at various important places, the intention being to complete by March, 1898, the expansion of the service relating to Tokio, Osaka, Yokohama, as well as the new constructive work in Nagoya, Nagasaki and Shimono-seki, and to establish a telephonic connection between Tokio and Yokohama.

Lieutenant de Gerlach, the leader of the projected Belgian Antarctic expedition, says that it will start from Antwerp about Seventh Mo. 15th. The steamer Belgica will carry a three years' supply of provisions and will probably be absent about two years. During the first year the expedition will go to the east of Graham Land, in George IV. Sea, and then winter in Australia. The second year they will probably go in the direction of Victoria Land. "We intend," the Lieutenant says, "more especially to devote ourselves to geological and zoological research, taking for this purpose specimens from the various sea depths and the submarine deposits. We shall also estimate the amount of ice, the thickness of the ice, and then winter at another Antarctic expedition to those of the C. De Long and other Antarctic explorers."

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1868.—Tenth Month 19th.—Set a watch, oh, Lord, round about me, around about my heart, that it may be kept close to thee, even "The sixty armed warriors, with swords girded upon their thighs," that I wander not so much from thee in my thoughts. Oh, keep my mind inward and my eye single unto thee, my blessed Lord, thou ever adorable Holy One of Israel! Oh, that my soul might worship thee continually.

Eleventh Month 15th.—Oh, Lord, thy poor child looketh unto thee. I do want to be rightly directed. O, make way for me and give me pure vision from thee, for my poor soul feareth greatly. O, it is a great work, and nothing but thy pure word can profit the people. Oh, Father, give me plain direction, that I may not think too much, nor move too soon. . . . I desire to dwell in all humility of soul before thee, with my mouth as in the dust, looking up to thy hand. Wilt thou not bless me, in this state? Thankfulness covers my soul, and living praises arise to thee, for thy supporting power granted unto me in this time of deep trial and conflict. I thank thee, too, oh, Father, for the prosperity of my school and for the assistance with us, dear Father, and season our spirits with thy grace, that they may have a savory influence upon the little ones, and lead them to seek thee for themselves. Oh, Father, give me more strength to fast and pray, and to be wholly subjected unto thy will.

One of her little pupils having been removed by death, she thus writes to the parents:

"Twelfth Month 25th, 1868.

"Dear Friends:—My thoughts seem to dwell so much with you, knowing you must feel your bereavement. Yesterday as my thoughts were dwelling upon my little flock, desiring that no one of my dear little lambs might be taken away, the feeling came so forcibly, 'she is an angel now,' and then I remembered how very loving and affectionate she had been, throwing her little arms around me, many times in a day, and sometimes a kiss only would unlock them, 'then, if He has gathered her to his blessed old, we have no cause to mourn.' Some writers said, 'The less of this cold earth, the more of heaven.' So she will have more heaven than we. May this affliction be blessed to you and do not reflect upon yourselves. I think it will be the will of our Father. Yours, in tender sympathy,

DEBORAH BROOKS."

The next entry in her diary appears to be: 1869.—Fifth Month 12th.—Sad, weak and sorrowful, desiring a united heart, whereby to serve the Lord. Oh, that I might wash my hands in innocency, so that I might compass this altar, oh Lord.

In allusion to her first journey with a minute from her Monthly Meeting for religious service, she writes: During the Seventh and Eighth Months, I was engaged in a visit to Concord and Western Quarterly Meetings. My blessed Master had made it plain to me, and answered all my objections, all my doubts in regard to the requiring. My kind friends, R. W. Kite and Charles Williams went with me, and I felt blessed in my companions. I went forth feeling very poor and weak, but at seasons was wonderfully helped over every fear, and the Lord gave me words, when I knew nothing of myself. Thanks-giving and praise were the covering of my spirit in returning. He doth still put forth, and go before his trembling, timid sheep.

Of this journey she has left the following: "Notes of my first visit on Truth's account." On the twenty-third of Sixth Month, 1869, a minute was granted me, by Northern District Monthly Meeting, for visiting Concord and Western Quarterly Meetings and the meetings constituting them.

Accompanied by my dear friends C. W. and R. W. K., I left home for Wilmington seventh day of Seventh Month. We remained all night at our kind friends' Samuel Hillies, who, with his wife, Margaret, was very attentive. During the evening, after reading a psalm, there was a little season of silence, and a few words arose lovingly in connection with the expression, "So He bringeth them to their desired haven." I was thankful for the feeling of quiet afterwards. Next morning we attended the Monthly Meeting, which was pretty large, and a lively meeting. My blessed Master seemed to help me through, giving me, "That they that be planted in the house of the Lord shall flourish in the courts of our God," etc., with desires also that He would turn the water of affliction into the wine of consolation for some in that assembly. After dining with our kind host, we hastened to the one o'clock train for Chester, intending to stop to see Thomas McCollin's wife Sarah, who was very low, having consumption of the throat. We found her a very patient sufferer, and quite resigned to leave her husband and two little children. "Fear not, for I know that ye seek Jesus that was crucified," seemed given me for her, with desires that she might patiently wait until every stitch in the wedding garment was completed. "The King's daughter is all glories within, her clothing is of wrought gold." She shall be brought unto the King in raiment of needle work." We returned home on the five o'clock train, feeling in my heart a degree of quiet thankfulness and adoration for all the mercies vouchsafed.

Seventh Month 24th.—We again set forward, going in the afternoon to Joseph Evans' and were hospitably entertained. In the evening and morning had some profitable conversation, Dr. Charles Evans and wife being there, besides the family. "Behold an 18-a-lite indeed, in whom there is no guile," seems applicable to Joseph's redeemed spirit.

At Springfield Meeting on First day morning, not very large, but pretty solid. "The trees of the Lord are full of sap, the cedars of Lebanon which He hath planted," etc. Dined at the widow Lydia Allen's, whose were Richard and Mary Allen with their children, beside an invalid daughter, with a sweet, chastened spirit. We lodged at Joseph Rhoads, son of that mother in Israel, Hannah Rhoads. This was an interesting family. They took us on this morning to Middletown to Monthly Meeting—a lively body of Friends. My soul was clothed with desire that some might see of the travail of their soul and be satisfied, and that those who were coming forward might indeed have on the whole armor, be strengthened with might and be able to stand. Afterward had to revive the saying, "We reflect the color of the rock we rest upon," and to show how needful it is for us to be found building upon the sure foundation, Christ Jesus, against which storms cannot prevail.

Dined with our friends Thomas and Philena Smedley, where was a large family, and my soul seemed to feel the wrestling of their spirits to be led aright in the faithful discharge of their duty. We went with Thomas and his wife to take tea with Thomas Yarnall, a minister very much concerned for the spiritual welfare of the Society. It was pleasant to be with them. They live in the house formerly occupied by our friends James and Sarah Emken, where they had a school. This made it doubly interesting to me, and they related an anecdote of Sarah Emken, which might act as a warning to some of us to be very faithful to the secret nothings of the voice within.

R. and myself remained here at Thomas Smedley's, all night. Dined the next day at James and Hannah Smedley's—kind Friends, with two little children. They sent us to the car in the afternoon, and we proceeded to West Chester. W. P. T. met us and took us to his house. He, with his wife, did indeed endeavor to give "the cup of cold water." Monthly Meeting in the morning.—"Yea, they may forget; yet will I not forget thee, and that which would be me weary must be wearied out until we wait in humble patience at the Master's feet. Again arising with the words, "In the year King Uziah died the prophet saw the Lord sitting upon the throne, high and lifted up, etc. If we would experience this in ourselves, all the kindly nature must die within us." Morris Cope there too, and appeared in testimony searchingly, but with encouragement. Dined with dear Jane Gibbons, who was confined at home. We were invited to Elizabeth Scattergood's to tea, and kindly entertained. Some Friends came in and we had a pleasant evening. A few words of encouragement given me by a young Friend, and I laid down my head in quiet fear, feeling the prayer of Mildred Ketchell, "Lord, be always near thy feeble worm." In the morning, W. P. and A. M. T. kindly took us to Goshen Monthly Meeting. I felt very poor, but thought there was encouragement for some in the revival of the language. Thy God hath commanded thy strength, referring to the disciples in the ship when the winds were boisterous, "Why are ye so fearful, oh, ye of little faith." Oh, that some of the younger portion of that meeting may be faithful to the pointings of their God. Dear Phebe Roberts appeared afterward in a lively testimony, and in the Quarterly Meeting I had unexpectedly to ask that He would strengthen the things that remain and are ready to die. Finned with many Friends at Joseph Passmore's, then proceeded on to B. W. Passmore's at Concord. Here our kind Friends left us and returned to West Chester.

Next morning, Seventh Month 20th, we attended Concord Monthly Meeting, small, but having some living members in it. Rachel Benington appeared in a lively supplication, that He would pardon our offences and pass by our transgressions. The Lord's house is to be builded of lively stones. "Seeketh thou great things for thyself, seek them not," was for my second rising. After the Monthly Meeting an adjourned Select Preparative Meeting was held, where was salked Larkin, over ninety years old. I felt that a ripening influence was with them that day and hoped some of them would in the end be gathered as "a shock of corn, fully ripe, cometh in his season."

Our kind friends B. W. and R. G. Passmore entertained R. and myself all night and in the morning took us to Isaac Hall's. Charles met us again in the afternoon, and on First day we attended Whiteland Meeting, stopping on the way to see Susan Malin, a dear, innocent and spirited aged Friend. The meeting very small. I sat in doubt and conflict. At last entered into a quiet feeling, and had to petition that none might be like one formerly, saying, "I cannot dig, to beg I am ashamed."

Dear Abby Hall followed in a lively communication, and I was thankful. Joseph Roberts took us to the home of his parents, Jacob and Phebe W. Roberts, to dine. Here was an interesting family, and it was so pleasant to be with them. We proceeded homeward that afternoon, and Second-day being our own Quarterly Meeting we attended it.

THE CUP AND THE FOUNTAIN.—A certain man placed a fountain by the wayside and he hung a cup near to it by a little chain. He was told some time after that a great art critic had found much fault with its design. "But," said he, "Do many thirty persons drink at it?" Then they told him that thousands of poor men, women, and children slaked their thirst at this fountain; and he smiled and said that he was little troubled by the critic's observations, only he hoped that on some sultry summer's day the critic himself might lift the cup, and be refreshed, and praise the name of the Lord. He is my fountain, and here is my cup; find fault if you please; but do drink of the water of life. I only care for this, I had rather bless the soul of the poorest crossing-sweeper or rag gatherer, than please a prince of the blood, and fail to convert him to God.—C. H. Spurgeon.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Notes of a Trip in the North Carolina Mountains.

[A botanical friend has kindly placed at our disposal his notes of a trip made last summer to Roan Mountain, in North Carolina. Although the main object of his excursion was botanical, yet we hope that even those who are not especially interested in Botany will find matter of interest and information in the descriptions of the scenery and of the character and habits of the inhabitants of those mountain regions.—Ed.]

Having an opportunity for a couple of weeks vacation this summer, I decided to visit the mountains of North Carolina, my main objective point being Roan Mountain. This mountain is one of the great Smoky Range, with an altitude of about six thousand four hundred feet above the sea level, and is partly in North Carolina and partly in Tennessee. It has long been favorably known to botanists, not only I think, on account of its interesting flora, but perhaps also from its having on its summit a hotel—an accommodation in which it is probably unique among Southern mountains. The most direct method of reaching it is by means of the East-Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad, which lands passengers within twelve miles of the summit. Another method, however, is to go to some point on the Southern Railway, and then, about on horseback, do the rest over the mountains. I decided upon the latter, as likely to introduce me better to the mountaineer life.

Leaving Philadelphia on the evening of Seventh Month, 18th, the next morning the train was in Southern Virginia, and the view from the car windows included many sights peculiarly Southern. Tobacco and cotton in the fields; chinquapins and sour-wood in the woods; and among the few flowers which I could recognize, because of the swift movement of the train, the passion flower (Passiflora incarnata) and a large blue pea-blossom, which I fancy was the Spurred Butterfly-plant (Centrosema virginiana) were prominent. Changing cars at Salisbury, N. C., there was an hour or two at my disposal which I occupied with a short walk in the neighborhood of the station. A species of Bindweed (Convolvulus arvensis) and Silphium asteriscus (the latter a showy composite and near relative to the rosin-weed or compass-plant of the West) were noticed, as well as the beautiful orange-red bells of the Virginia creeper hanging from tree tops.

A few hours later the train deposited me at Marion, N. C., a little town with some pretensions to being a summer-resort, at the foot of the Blue Ridge. This is a point of departure for mountain parties bound for Mt. Mitchell or the Roan. The country roundabout is somewhat of the nature of Oak barrens, and its flora comprised many plants familiar to me near Philadelphia. A plant which I took to be Palgotta Nuttallii, grew in abundance in the dry woods; and I was interested in noticing the delightful odor of wintergreen exhaled by the roots when fresh plucked. The perfume, however, was evanescent, not lasting over a few moments. The sweet-scented golden-rod (Solidago odora) was also noticed; and a handful of the leaves put in my pocket retained their pleasant perfume for many days.

A prominent feature of the Southern woods I found to be the sour-wood (Oxydendrum arboreum) which at the time of my visit was in bloom, or in early fruit. The flowers are borne in long slender one-sided racemes, drooping and curving upward at the end; and at a distance the trees present somewhat the appearance of little chestnut trees, because of the character of the inflorescence.

My route from Marion was due north. The flora for a half a day was very similar to that of the Jersey pine-barrens. Golden Aster (Chrysopsis Mariana), Wild Flax (Linum Virginianum), the Flowering Spurge (Euphorbia corollata), St. Andrew's Cross (Ascyrum cruz-Andree), Goat's Rue (Tephrosia Virginiana), Wild Indigo (Baptisia tinctoria) and the smaller Sumac (Rhus copallina), with the Tick-trefoil (Desmodium nudiflorum) were noted, either in flower or fruit. On the edge of the wood Schrankia angustata was found in bloom,—a curious plant, procumbent on the ground, thorny, and with little balls of delicate pink flowers. Its close relationship to the Mimosa is betrayed by the speed with which its leaves close when the plant is touched, as well as the peculiar character of its blooms.

Among the plants not common around Philadelphia, the chinquapin, the Virginia Catchfly (Silene Virginica) and the purple Houstonia (H. purpurea) were frequently seen. The Virginia Catch fly was particularly noticeable along wooded roadsides, by reason of its brilliant red, star-like flowers.

Travellers in the North Carolina Mountains need expect no hotel accommodations away from the railroads. The custom is to stop at private houses and take such fare as may be offered them. My first stop was at the hospitable residence of the postmaster of North Cove. The North Carolina mountaineers appear to be of two well-marked classes,—those termed the "well-doing people," who, while poor, are thrifty and cleanly, and another class whose characteristics are quite the reverse of this. The cabins of the latter sort are not very inviting, and, if possible, would be passed by by travellers on account of the dirt. Everywhere in the mountains I found milk and honey and corn-bread to be the staple fare, with sometimes a bit of bacon and a few vegetables, such as green beans, or squash, added. Buttermilk is always found in the mountain cabins, and is nearly always good, probably from the fact that churning takes place every day.

My postmaster friend was a man of decidedly the better sort—intelligent and sociable. I passed a comfortable night under his roof, and left in the morning refreshed by the quiet night's rest and the simple wholesome fare. My bill for two meals and lodging was thirty cents. This place was in what is called the North Cove—a valley between the Blue Ridge and the long line of the Linville Mountain. My road next day ran close to the noisy mountain stream which is the North Fork of the Catawba River and in one of whose shady pools I took a refreshing dip towards noon. A species of Alum Root (Irishneria rilliana) was abundant on the rocks; the Angelica-tree (Aralia spinosa) I saw for the first time—a very attractive shrub or small tree, easily recognized by its immense divided leaves and prickly branches, and its yellowish-green flowers borne at the top of the tree in a large compound panicle. On a rather unkempt and unattractive looking hillside came upon a little colony of Pogonia pendula a very attractive orchid which I had never seen before. It was especially interesting to find it in the tangle of coarser plants, amid rock and thorns. It seemed to speak of the Divin impartiality, so much beauty set down in the sketch of so much neglect.

Travelling northward in the North Cove is a good deal like travelling downwards in the letter V,—the line of the Blue Ridge on the one side and of the Linville Mountain on the other being as the two sides of the letter, which converge at a point known locally as the Winding Stairs, an extremely steep hillside, which is climbed by means of a zigzag path.

In the upper part of this cove Melanthium parviflorum, a characteristic Southern plant, somewhat like our green Hellbore, but with smaller flowers, was growing; also, on limestone rocks a little patch of the Wall Rue Spikenwort (Asplenium Ruta-muraria). At the top of the Winding Stairs, probably the most inconspicuous of our native orchids, with certainly the most unglainy name (Microstylis ophioglossoides) was in bloom. New Jersey tea, both in flower and fruit, was abundant on this hillside (Ceanothus Americanus).

It coming on to rain, I stopped for the evening at about four o'clock (Seventh Month 22nd) at Franklin's, a house in the woods on top of the Blue Ridge. This is a place of more than ordinary pretensions, as mountain houses go. I had a wood fire and a bed in the parlor, and my bill for supper, lodging and breakfast amounted to sixty cents, which was twice the ordinary charge. Franklin's is the usual stopping-place for people who visit the Fall of the Linville River, which are about half a mile distant, and form one of the attractions to visitors. The road the next morning took me down the Blue Ridge and west over the Toe River, whose rapidly flowing waters I crossed on foot logs. It rained most of the morning and made botanizing a rather discouraging pastime. I was gratified, however, to find Celtica acuminata, a small tree bearing spikes of white flowers, with a faint perfume. It is a cousin of the sweet-pepper bush, which is common in the Jersey barrens. The streams which I crossed to day were all bound for the Gulf of Mexico; yesterday they ran easterly toward the Atlantic. Cane Creek Mountain was crossed in the afternoon, but everything being wet (including myself), the country passed through did not receive the attention it deserved. Nevertheless, in a brush pile the brilliant orange spike of the yellow-fringed orchis (Habenaria eliotii) was noticed and went into the portfolio; also at the top of the mountain, Geocodia hawrightii displayed its yellow trumpets. The interesting feature of Cane Creek Mountain was a small mica mine which I passed. The workers of it were a young man and a young woman, of the more shiftless mountaineer class. The man, with whom I had some conversation, did not know what became of the mica after it reached a point about five miles from the mine. He got five dollars a ton for it, and his interest seemed to cease with that.

I went dinerless that day, save for a pint of outermilk obtained through dint of perseverance from the denizens of a wretched cabin.

This evening (Seventh Month 23rd) was spent at a point three miles from Bakersville, and about eight or nine miles from the summit of the Roan, in a long dilapidated house inhabited by a blacksmith and his family. I was accommodated here with a small piece of hair-broom, the first I had seen since leaving Marion. My host dissuaded me from going through Bakersville, as I had intended, in order to reach the Roan, and put me on what he called a shorter route. The morning was fortunately sunny, and becoming became possible again. One of the most conspicuous plants along the road was the American Bittersweet (Celastrus occidentalis), its tall, graceful spikes of blue blossoms making a very cheerful ornament in the fence-rows. Another plant which had hitherto been a stranger to me, though it is uncommon further north, was Aethiomeris squarrosa, a tall, slender composite, with winged stems and yellow ray flowers, which hung downward almost perpendicularly. By a shady stream a curious plant, with lower leaves fully two feet across, and heads of blue berries, borne on bright red pedicels, attracted my attention, and proved to be the umbrella leaf (Diphyletia rugosa), a characteristic Southerner. A farmer on horse back, travelling up the mountain to get his cattle, which a neighbor had borrowed and failed to return, bore me company for a couple of miles, and hospitably insisted on my riding his horse, he dismounting and walking till his destination was reached. By three o'clock I was fairly on the side of the Roan. I was interested to find the Shad-bush, as we call it in the North, here growing to the height of a good sized tree. Its berries were ripe and were quite refreshing after the hard climb through an almost perpendicular mountain meadow. The man who accompanied me spoke of the berry as "sarvis"—"corruption of 'service berry," by which name the tree sometimes goes. Further up the mountain Cuscuta reniformis, a Epipactis with drooping corymbs of white flowers, which I took to be E. acuminata, the red Turtle-head (Chelone obliqua) were found. By a mountain brook a meadow rose (Thalictrum clavatum) grew. This is one of the most attractive of the meadow-rues, and differs from our Northern varieties in having perfect flowers. The little cross-shaped seed-vessels are quite attractive.

The Exercise of a Past Generation.

"At a Yearly Meeting held in Philadelphia . . . E. E. said in substance, she has felt a concern on her mind during the sittings of both to-day and yesterday, and she feared to leave the meeting without expressing it. She had remembered the words of the prophet, 'Lo, I will command, and I will sift the house of Israel among all nations, like as corn is sifted in a sieve, yet shall not the least grain fall upon the earth.' It is a time of commotion, of shaking among all religious denominations; not one was exempted from it in some shape or other, as far as she knew. The Israel of God, of which our Society forms a part, is undergoing a sifting, and the language of many hearts had been, 'Let not thy hand stop for our crying, till all impurities are taken away.' Many of us had sorrowfully felt, and her heart had been made sick with the want of unity of feelings, the unsettlement there was among some, and the dissatisfaction of others."

There had been a bustling up, a covering up, a putting the evil day afar off, but the time was drawing near when it would have to be shown what and where we were. Though we had to appearance been getting along smoothly from year to year, yet hundreds had felt that there was an undercurrent of dissimulation and insincerity, of putting on two faces, using two languages, according to the company one were in. She had remembered the disciples were commanded not to take two coats. Many had been made to drink of the wine of abstention. If any were disposed to think hostilely of her, or to say hard things of her, she desired to be able to bear it. The Lord would have a people without spot or blemish, or even a bad thing. The shafts had been aimed from the east that she was conducted by true testimony, that not one grain of the evil substance which she should fall to the ground, nothing but the shaft should fall to the ground, nothing but the shaft should fly. He will sit again and again. The language of her heart had been, grief as it might be to endure, "Oh, Lord, if by a will extend thy arm around us and encircle us, and hold us up, then carry on thy beloved work to purity us."

The dear young people, she said, had claimed her most tender sympathy. She believed many of them were deepening in the faith, notwithstanding they had been surely puzzled at the difference of opinion, and also to account for many things that had passed and were passing. Some were ready to seek in other Societies for the rest they found not in their own. But it would not do to look outward. The watchword was, "Abide in the patience a little longer, and your deliverance, our deliverance, will be wrought." Though we might seem to be in a narrow place, as with the Red Sea before and the hands of the Philistines behind, the Lord will make a way for us when we can see no way, and will again enable our Society to enjoy her salvation, as in former times. The Lord is on his way to open the prison doors, where those who, like Joseph, are found in prison, who have been let down into the pit where there is no water, who have been hated and sold of their brethren, shall be set free. The Lord will sift again and again, and the chaff will fly, but hundreds will be planted like Joseph, as a fruitful vine by the side of the well, whose branches run over the wall. The workers have sorely grieved him and shot at him and hated him, but his bow abide in strength and the arm of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob."

HAZEN S. PINZEE, Mayor of Detroit and Governor-elect of Michigan, began his career cutting leather soles ten hours a day at the rate of four dollars a week. Though now a middle-aged man, he was entirely unknown till about eight years ago, when he was proposed to run for the Mayorship of Detroit by the Republicans, who were then in a small minority. This nomination, given as an empty compliment, not to say jest, was taken by Mr. Pinzree in earnest; and after a remarkable canvass, in which he preached reform night and day, he found himself elected. His first reform was to reduce fares on the street cars to three cents. The corporations ridiculed this idea; but the Mayor loaded a car, offered three cents to the conductor, was put off, brought suit against the company, and a two years' litigation in the district court was accomplished. His next moves were to gain for the city control over its public lighting, to secure cheaper gas for consumers, and to have the streets paved directly by the Board of Public Works. These acts have made him both the enemy of the corporations and the idol of the people. The "potato patch" movement, however, was the thing that turned all eyes on the "Hon. Potatoe" as The Star calls him. He had proved financially successful, as it has supported thousands of persons in whatever city they have been tried, and I like wise socially; for the police records show a remarkable diminution in crime in those localities from which the laborers were drawn, and which had been previously the worst in Detroit.

THE FRIEND.
The Story of My Life.

BY WILLIAM TAYLOR.

The author of this book was born in 1821, in Virginia. He was descended from Scotch-Irish ancestors. The family were members among the Presbyterians. But being seriously impressed by the labors of some Methodists, he joined in membership with that body. He was full of zeal, and became so burdened on account of the peril of unsaved souls that he became very unhappy, until he was relieved by a dream, in which the Spirit said to him, "My child, you are needlessly disturbing your mind abt at the work God has for you to do. You must tarry at Jerusalem till endowed with power from on high. Then God will call you as He did Jonah, when He said distinctly, 'Arise, go to Nineveh, that great city.'" The prophetic mention of Jonah, by anticipation, so filled me, that I sprang up, and the peace of God pervaded my spirit, so that I gave myself no further trouble on the subject of preaching, but left it all to God."

In 1842, William Taylor was appointed a junior preacher, to assist in one of the Virginia circuits. He thought it his duty to witness for Jesus to every one with whom he was brought into contact. In regard to these opportunities, he says, "The Lord often helped me, but sometimes I missed it nearly as far as the pious barber who felt it his duty to talk to every man about his soul who came to be shaved. In many cases it worked very well, but one day, when a very highly cultured gentleman came in to be shaved, the barber's courage failed him. He spent a long time in applying the lather to the gentleman's face, and then strapped his razor to sharpen his courage, till the lather on the man's face was nearly dry; then turning suddenly towards the gentleman, razor in hand, the barber said, 'Are you prepared to die, sir?' The man sprang to his feet and ran away in great alarm, thinking the barber had gone crazy and was going to cut his throat."

As an illustration of his earnestness, when the bishop was making the appointment for service, and William was asked where he would like to be sent to, he replied, "Not to a fat, flourishing circuit, but to one where there are plenty of sinners."

In the fall of 1848, in Baltimore, Bishop Waugh asked Taylor if he would be willing to go to California as one of two missionaries, who were to be sent to that field. Taylor replied that he had always been ready to accept any appointment under the appointing authority of his church. The bishop told him to consult his wife.

"So I went to our parsonage. Anna met me at the door, and I said, 'Bishop Waugh wants to send us as missionaries to California; what do you think of that?' She was soon prepared to consent. After much delay, owing to the difficulty of finding passage, tickets were purchased on a clipper ship of Baltimore for San Francisco, and that port was reached in the Ninth Month of 1849."

The day after casting anchor, Taylor went ashore to see the situation. There was not a brick house in the town and but few of wood, and they were constructed mainly of lumber from dry-goods boxes. There were three or four adobe houses, but a vast encampment in tents of about twenty thousand men and ten women. After diligent enquiry he found a few Methodists and a place of worship.

The following week was spent in learning California prices and modes of life, and in trying to secure a house in which to live. Potatoes were fifty cents per pound, South American apples fifty cents a piece, fresh beef fifty cents a pound, flour fifty dollars a barrel, and so on. Rents were high, five hundred dollars a month for a plain house a story and a-half high, with five rooms. It was decided to build a house, and Taylor went to the woods with axe and wedges to split out timber. The scantlings which he bought in the rough, split out like large fence rails, he hewed to the square with a broad axe. He made three thousand shingles, and exchanged them for twenty-four joists, each seventeen feet long. For weather boarding he bought rough clap boards, six feet long, and shaved them smooth with a drawing-knife. He used similar boards for the roof. Hauling his stuff from the Red woods to the San Antonio landing cost twenty-five dollars per thousand feet; the regular price from thence to San Francisco was forty dollars per thousand, but by hiring a boat and working with his own hands, he got the work done for less than half that amount.

Having made arrangements for a temporary absence from home, Taylor visited San José and Santa Clara. His experience at the latter place furnishes an illustration of his zeal.

"One of the old adobe houses of the deserted mission was at the time of my untimely visit bearing the name of Reynolds's Hotel. After seeing that my horse was well fed, I was conducted into the bar-room, where a jolly lot of gamblers were employed in card-playing. By the time I got thawed out and refreshed by a good supper they got through with their game and gathered around the fire, which was kept blazing in an old time chimney place. I took a seat in their midst and led in a conversation about the varieties of life in San Francisco, which led on to the description of the sick men in the hospitals there, and of their varied experiences, living and dying.

"None of my bar-room associates knew me, but listened with close attention to my facts illustrative of the real life of California adventurers. Finally, one said, 'Come, boys, let us go to bed.' Another replied, 'Yes, but we must have another nip before we turn in.'

"I said, gentlemen, if you have no objections, I propose we have a word of prayer together before we retire.

"They looked at me and at each other in manifest surprise, and I looked at the bar-keeper, who was standing ready to sell a 'nip' of brandy to each one, at twenty-five cents apiece. After a little pause, the barkeeper replied, 'I suppose there is no objection, sir.'

"Thank you, sir. Come, boys, let us all kneel down as we used to do with the old folks at home, and ask the God of our fathers and mothers to have mercy on us.

"They all knelted down as humbly, and I prayed for them, and for their kindred and loved ones at home, but now so far away, with dreaded possibilities, of never meeting again in the flesh. I prayed earnestly that these adventurous young men, and their fathers, mothers, sisters and brothers far away, might all surrender wholly to God, and receive Jesus Christ and be saved, and be prepared for happy reunions on earth or in Heaven.

"They took no more 'nips' that night, but slipped off to bed without a word. I said nothing to them directly about their gambling and drinking, but took the inside track of them. I met one of them next day in San José, and he seemed as glad to see me as if I had been his old Kinsman."

One First-day morning William Taylor announced that he would preach at three P. M., on the plaza in the open, and to the gamblers and all outdoor people who might wish to hear.

"It was a startling announcement, causing fear and anxiety to most of my people. Most of the gamblers were located on the north and east side of the plaza, or public square. They occupied the largest and best tents, followed by the best houses in the city. Every saloon had its bar and band of music, and they were in full blast every day and night of every week, and Sunday was the greatest of the seven. Their tables were loaded with piles of gold dust and coin, surrounded by crowds of gamblers and sight-seers.

"The gamblers were so numerous, and commanded so much money and influence they were above all law, except the law of sin and death.

"It was no new thing for a man to be shot, but no arrests followed. There was not a jail in California then, nor for two years after, and no administration of government at all adequate to the demands of justice, or the protection of life.

"The country had just been bought from Mexico, and was still under the forms of Mexican law, with an alcalde to preside over the city of San Francisco. So when I announced that I would preach on the plaza it was feared that the gamblers would take it as an insult and shoot me. There was no legal protection or redress. It would only be said next day, 'The gamblers killed a Methodist preacher yesterday. He very impudently went down to preach on the plaza, and before he got fairly at it they shot him.'

"At the time appointed, in company with my heroic young wife, I walked down to the plaza, and a few of my people followed. Seating my wife on a chair, I mounted a carpenter's work-bench, which stood in front of the largest saloon. My wife had a voice of peculiar melting melody, and of marvelous compass, and my own voice could be heard a long distance, so as soon as I mounted the workbench, I opened up on the Royal Proclamation:

Hear the royal proclamation,
The glad tidings of salvation,
Publishing to every creature,
To the ruined sons of nature—
Jesus reigns. He reigns victorious,
Over heaven and earth most glorious,
Jesus reigns!

"Restless hundreds of excitable men came running from every direction to see what new wonder under the sun had appeared. The gambling houses were nearly vacated. The crowd surrounded me nearly a hundred deep on all sides. I was in for it. I had crossed the rubicon; the tug of war was imminent.

"I said, Gentlemen, if our friends in the Eastern States had heard there was to be preaching this afternoon on Portsmouth Square, in San Francisco, they would have predicted disorder, confusion and riot; but we who are here have no thought of any such thing. There is no true American who may not be depended on to of serve order under the preaching of God's word anywhere, and maintain it if need be. We shall have order!

"Your favorite rule in arithmetic is the rule of loss and gain. In your tedious voyage around Cape Horn, or your wearisome journey across the plains, or hurried and perilous passage across the Isthmus of Panama, and during your fe-months of sojourn in California, you have been figuring under the rule of loss and gain.

"Now I wish most respectfully to submit you a question under your favorite rule and have you work it out." The question I submit may be found in the twenty-sixth verse of the sixteenth chapter of the Gospel of our Lord by Matthew. Shall I announce it? 'What is a man profited, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?'

"Perfect order was observed and profound attention given to every sentence of the sermon but followed.

The progress of the reform of the Civil Service in the last fifteen years is full of encouragement to those engaged in purifying municipal administration, in which the gains are sometimes almost balanced by the losses. Everybody knows that the attempt to put our national service on a non-partisan, business basis has been a long continuous fight against the friends of the spoils system. The first application of the system was on a very moderate scale, and could only be extended gradually. It encountered open foes in Congress, who endeavored to break it down by proposing to withhold the appropriations necessary to carry it out, and by their methods. Its advocates were unspareingly denounced as visionaries, and ridiculed as "suivel" service reformers. But the reform was rounded in common sense and on sound business principles, and could not be overturned. President Arthur had the honor of making the first classification, which included fifteen thousand positions. President Cleveland, in his first term, enlarged the list, and so did President Harrison. President Cleveland has again evinced his friendship for the system in his second term, and we have now ninety thousand positions removed from the scramble of office hunters and free from partisan influences. The postmasters, numbering seventy thousand or more, are still outside the classified list, but only a small fraction of the executive service. The result is extremely gratifying. We owe to the members of the National Civil Service Reform League a national debt of gratitude for its patriotic and unpaid service to this cause. At its recent meeting in Philadelphia, President Proctor, of the National Civil Service Commission, gave valuable testimony to the results of the classified service in increased efficiency and economy. He said in many cases one clerk is doing satisfactorily the work that used to be divided among a dozen or more, when men in positions on other grounds than competency, and when the force was sometimes increased, were "to eat up the appropriation." C. Schultz, President of the League, deserves great honor for his persistent and able advocacy of its principles of the merit system.—Independent.

The Pittsburgh Post of Twelfth Month first contains the following: "Frank A. Preble appeared as complainant in the Middlesex court a suit against the Waltham Orangemen's lodge and told of the rough treatment which he received while being initiated by the officers. He told him he must take off his outer clothing, he told him he had, and he entered the main hall clad in a shirt, white overalls and shoes. He was made to kneel down and repeat something, and while doing so the men took off his shoes. Then his clothing was rolled up by his knees and he is marched about the hall while some one hipped his legs with rattan whips. He testified that a bag of iron weighing forty pounds was then put on his shoulder, and that he was pulled to the floor, while some one sat on him and jabbed him with pins or an ice pick. It was then made to go up a step-ladder, and from this he fell into a blanket and was tossed. The two men held him and a red-hot iron was brought up against his breast. He struggled to get away, but the two men held him while he was branded. Then some one said: 'Hold up your hands and see if you can find a serpent,' and the initiation was over. He said that he was severely burned and injured."—Christian Queens.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Address to the Young.

A Friend has kindly placed in our hands an address to the members of a reading circle, which was organized a few years ago, and was designed to increase the acquaintance and the attachment of its members to the principles of the Society of Friends.

Believing that it may be useful to others than those to whom it was primarily addressed, some passages have been extracted from it. It is mainly occupied with a consideration of the Queries read in our meetings for discipline, in respect to which we all ought to examine ourselves, and see how far we are living in accordance therewith.

"The first great commandment under the law and which is also recognized under the Gospel is this, thou shalt Love—thou shalt Love with all thy heart and with all thy soul and with all thy strength and with all thy mind." Now, if we possessed this love, would we not seek to worship this object of our affections, would it not be our greatest delight to be near Him, would we not rejoice to meet with those who also love Him? and if He gave any one of his children a word of encouragement, comfort or warning for us, would we not thankfully receive it? Then surely our religious meetings would be diligently attended when we had ability to do so, we would desire to be there in good season, and our conduct there in will manifest that we came to worship in spirit and in Truth.

"Our dear Saviour said, 'And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.' The man who inquired, 'Who is my neighbor' was answered by the parable of one, who fell among thieves, that he, to whom we show kindness is our neighbor, and this may include the whole human family. We are asked in the second Query to love those of the same household of faith, those professing to believe the same truths that we believe. Surely this should not be hard to do if we love above all earthly considerations that precious Saviour, who suffered so much for us, who died that we might live. The Apostle John says, 'Who loveth God, loveth his brother also.' If we have this love in our hearts, there will be no danger of giving way to hate-bearing and detraction, for we would not be willing to injure any one by word or deed. We would recommend to you the careful perusal of the thirteenth chapter of I Corinthians as a guiding rule for our lives.

"Drummond may well call this Divine Love 'The greatest thing in the world' for one imbued with its spirit would be kind, loving, courteous and it has been called the 'best' rule, even for that execrable kindness, which the world calls politeness." We hope we all frequently read the Holy Scriptures and love the sacred truths contained therein, and we trust are unceasingly careful to exemplify and obey, professedly, for the best, we read have a great influence upon our minds, as well as our tempers, we read and both could be acted from that love which is pure and elevating, both to our mind and spirit, and to our life. We believe we are called to plainness and simplicity in dress, language, and manners, not only as Friends but as Christians. The Apostle Peter writes in his first general epistle, which means that it was addressed to all, 'Whosoever will, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel, but let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not avariciously even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.' Paul says in his first epistle to Timothy, 'and chapter, ninth verse.' In like manner, all that women adorn themselves in, modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety; not with braided hair, or gold, or pearls, or costly array, but, which becometh women professing godliness, with good works.

"That the Members High did not consider the adorning of the body as 'beauty' in the face, we find by the third chapter of Isaiah, sixteenth verse, where the fashions of that day are enumerated and condemned, and though it seems strange to us of this day that such things should ever have been a temptation, will not many of our present fashions seem just as strange in years to come? We acknowledge that a plain outward appearance will not save us, and sorrowfully that too many live inconsistently with the profession they are making, for those who wear that distinctive dress do profess allegiance to their dear Redeemer. Yet it is a haze about us that wards off many temptations, and with the yearning love which our discipline evinces for the members in every way, may thought it right to bring the subject before us every year.

"We see to the care of the Church, and its members in the Query, whether all inviting liquors are avoided, all frequenting of taverns, when not positively necessary, that we may be kept out of the way of temptation, also from all places of diversion, which includes much that is evil, even when those of the best refined sort are avoided. It would never go into anything where we could not ask his presence to go with us, and his blessing to rest upon it, we would avoid much that is evil.

"Friends believe that when the dear Saviour said, 'Swear not at all.' He meant all kinds of oaths, and the Society had perhaps more to suffer for this testimony in its early days than for any other. The world at large, as well as our own people, are much indebted to the faithful taking of an oath, and to the preservation of it, of which many are all the wiser in his day.

"In regard to letters and private goods the thirteenth part of the community have views very much at variance, showing that if we would be truly faithful to our principles, we might differ in our views, and thus aid in the redemption of the people of that 'Flood' which shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea."

"But individual righteousness is what is needed. This would take us by a public ministry and one exists at all such times, without waiting for the Great Head of the Church to put them forth. An Elder's matter should be the status of the people, and He alone, an individual, should care for each one of us. Our views will never be built up by departing from this vital principle.

'Freely ye have received, freely give,' is as incumbent upon us as it was on the disciples formerly.

What justice is manifested in the requiring to live within the bounds of our circumstances, to keep to moderation in our business, to be punctual to our promises and just in the payment of our debts! Did it ever occur to you from what trouble and perplexity, a faithful maintenance of this Query would preserve us. If all lived so carefully that they never spent more than their circumstances would allow, if they kept their business in such moderation, that they could always feel safe if they made no promises that they could not reasonably expect to perform, and contracted no debts that they had not the means to pay, the fearful failures and still worse unfaithfulness to trusts, leading to actual robbery, which have, alas, become so common of late, would never have taken place.

"We ask," "Lead us not into temptation," but we must be careful not to place ourselves in the way of it. We need Divine help to do any good thing, but we must do our part, must walk in the vineyard of our own hearts and diligently too. For the enemy sows tares among the good wheat while we sleep or are at ease unsuspecting. Then how lovingly if any of the members are overtaken in a fault does the Church recommend, as the Apostle Paul did in Galatians, chapter vi; that such an one 'be restored in the spirit of meekness, considering himself, lest thou also be tempted.'"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Writing to a Friend in connection with his views of Gospel ministry, James Bickhouse remarks: "It was many years from the time of my beginning to speak in meetings, before my Friends saw their way to regard me as a minister; but I believe I was more alive to the causes of hindrance in myself than they were, and this kept me quiet and humbled under these circumstances. I have long endeavored to be very sharp sighted to my own failings, and ready to make all the allowance for those of others which I could; and ready to hope, when they were painfully conspicuous, that they troubled themselves more than they troubled me. Whether I was in a state or not, I think this is a tendency to open the door for me to plea with them, and as I have kept that mercy in view which has passed over my own transgressions for Jesus' sake, I have been enabled to commend them to the same mercy, and to extol the marvellous loving kindness of the Lord in providing such a way of return to Him of repining sinners, as well as his great goodness in granting the help of his good Spirit to all who truly seek it, to enable them to walk in holiness. There is no doubt in my mind that our testimony, under a right exercise of mind, will find its way in the minds of others, much in proportion to the degree in which we ourselves walk in the Spirit, and consider ourselves, lest we also be tempted."

"We may point out the sinfulness of sin, and the danger of an unrepentant state, and excite opposition in the minds of others; but if we ambassadors for Christ, we also bear it them in his stead to be reconciled to God, I believe much of this opposition will not only give way, but will be succeeded by a harkening to the message."

"O'er worthy forefeller, George Fox, though he so fully recognized the necessity of the purifying path of the Spirit in regard to ministry, of an excellent counsel, to those who had received a testimony in the Lord, as to the exercise of their gifts, showing how conscious he was of the importance of the understanding being enlightened respecting the things needful to be preached. And in this way I believe we may be still helpful one to another, without improperly interfering with the gifts and exercises one of another, or of attempting to limit their diversity.

"I have apprehended that some who have begun well as ministers have mistaken an extension of expression for a growth in their gifts. We were reminded in one of the Yearly Meetings of Ministers and Elders that there were little gifts in many words, and great gifts in few words.' A long communication, to be what it ought to be, requires much matter and a proportionate amount of the baptizing power of the Holy Spirit accompanying the exercise, and the expression. Right exercise of mind, if expressed in simple terms, will, I believe, tend to edification, but if it be made more of than it is, or be belted through unduly mystical expressions, the edification will be diminished and the church may be burdened.

"While not doubting that matter for expression is often brought before the mind of the party whose duty it is to utter it in the words in which it is to be communicated, nor by any means wishing to interfere with right exercises of any kind, yet I believe that generally much of proper delivery depends upon the parties engaged in the service. When I have anything to say, under an apprehension of duty, either in meetings for worship or discipline, it is my practice to consider how far it is applicable to myself, and in so doing I have often derived advantage.

"While we recognize with George Fox the infallibility of the teaching of the Holy Spirit, it is important that with him we also recognize the fallibility of those who have to be taught, that 'we have our treasure in earthen vessels,' and that a careful degree of care is required to be exercised, lest the sound of these earthen vessels should be confuted with that which is given to be communicated. Some of us have had many humbling lessons to learn on these subjects; but where there is a teachable, meek and humble spirit this ought not to discourage us. The calmness in which the voice is preserved in a natural tone, is valuable also in helping to keep the mind to the anointing, under which ability is received to clothe the exercise in words according to the diversity of gifts, so that the expression may be with the spirit and with the understanding also.

"While Gospel ministry does not indeed consist in attention to the voice and manner, but in a right exercise of the gifts of the Spirit, under its renewed anointing; voice and manner do require such a measure of attention as may prevent their diverting the minds of the hearers from what is spoken."

The accidental arrival in New Zealand of two poisonous snakes among ballast from Queensland and South America alarmed the colonists, for the islands contain no native venomous reptiles, though the climate is, in places, well fitted for them. The result of the alarm was that Parliament passed an act subjecting to heavy penalties any one importing dangerous serpents. —Lab. Paper.

CRIME, PAUPERISM AND INSANITY.—The Massachusetts Legislature of 1894 ordered the Bureau of Statistics of Labor to make a thorough personal investigation of the relation of the liquor traffic to pauperism, crime and insanity. The collection of information occupied the year closing Eighth Month, 1895. Horace G. Wadlin, chief of the Bureau, has just published the results, summarized as follows:

1st. Of all convictions for crime, eighty-two cases out of every one hundred were induced by intemperate habits; sixty-six out of every one hundred convictions were for drunkenness. Of all adults convicted of crime, ninety-six out of every one hundred were "addicted to the use of liquor."

2nd. Fifty-three towns and cities licensed the sale of liquor, and showed 36.24 arrests for drunkenness for every one thousand of population two hundred and sixty towns and cities refused to license, and showed only 9.94 such arrests per one thousand population. For offences other than drunkenness in the license cities and towns there were 22.34 of every one thousand of population, while in no-license cities and towns there were 10.26 of every one thousand.

3rd. Where the same towns and cities change from licensed to no-license or vice versa, a corresponding change in the number of arrests resulted. Thus, in Haverhill, Lynn, Medford, Pittsfield and Salem, under license, the monthly arrests averaged 81.63 in each one thousand of population; under no license, 26.50; in Lynn under license, three hundred and fifteen; under no license, 117.63; in Medford under license 20.12; under no license, 13.25; in Pittsfield under license, 95.25; under no license, 36.75; in Salem under license, 140.50; under no license, 29.63.

PERSONAL SARCASM GENERALLY DON'T PAY.

—There is great temptation to people somewhat gifted in that direction to indulge in sarcasm and it sometimes requires considerable determination to resist doing it, but as a general rule it don't pay.

When we first entered good old Dartmouth college we were appointed to represent our class in a debate with a member of each of the other classes, and the Junior, opposing disputant thought he would (and did) make considerable laughter at our expense, by quoting Milton's "Paradise Lost." He finally closed by saying that "for an angel, we had accomplished it very little in the way of argument."

We brought down the house with cheers simply replying that "we believed we had accomplished one thing that had never been accomplished but once before in the history of the world, and that was when an angel opened the mouth of Balaam's ass."

During the rest of his college course it was not uncommon to hear him called out to on a foot-ball ground, "Go it, Balaam!" But he never spoke to us again from that day, and probably remembered it against us; the rest of his life.

It would have been better not to have said Sarcasm, generally don't pay, unless it be the pleasant kind used by an Irishman to his employer—a coal dealer—who proposed to discharge him because "He couldn't learn his anything."

"Well, I've learned one thing since I've been with you," said Pat, "What's that?" "Th' eighteen hundred make a ton."

Pat was retained.—George T. Angell, in C. Dumb Animals.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Westtown Old Scholars' Association.

On the evening of Twelfth Month 15th, 1896, a meeting was held in the Select School Building, Philadelphia, to organize an association to be composed of the old scholars, teachers, committee, Friends and others who have been connected with Westtown Boarding School. About three hundred and fifty persons were present. All ages were represented, from those who attended school many years ago, to young men and women who were recently educated in that institution. It was decided to call the new organization the Westtown Old Scholars' Association. Interesting addresses were made by well known Friends, who recalled their early days, and who spoke in terms of deep affection of their youthful experiences, and of the present usefulness of Westtown.

The belief was expressed by those present that many advantages may flow from such an association as is projected. It is intended to keep its operations within a scope that will be satisfactory to Friends. The contemplated biennial reunions are pleasantly anticipated, affording as they will, opportunities of reviving old friendships, and the creating of renewed concern for the school, from revisiting it. There be many of our members who are little acquainted with the new Westtown, and who after personal inspection of it, will be surprised and delighted to observe its present efficiency.

It is hoped that the producing of a new interest in Westtown, will result in some Friends being to a larger extent than heretofore, their responsibility in connection with the School. It is felt that when personal interest has been kindled, and the Institution is thereby more fully appreciated, some will in the future, be more likely to send their children there, than in the past. The result should be an enlarged list of scholars. Nor should the financial possibilities be lost sight of. The new association will be backed by men and women of more or less wealth, and it is hoped that it will be in a position to co-operate with the committee and faculty in helping to supply the pecuniary demands made on a never over-full treasury. The association was urged to aid in continuing to maintain Westtown as a place where Quaker principles shall be inculcated and be a means of upholding a high moral and religious standard in the surrounding community.

A constitution and by-laws were adopted at a meeting, and the necessary officers elected for the ensuing year. A large number, two hundred and thirty-four, of those present, joined an association. The constitution provides for annual meetings to be held alternately in Philadelphia and at Westtown in the summer.

The membership fee consists of One Dollar and annuum. It is hoped that old Westtownians will join, however much they may be scattered, and thus again get into touch with the venerable school to which many of them are so largely indebted. Annual fees, or donations of large or small sums, will be applied to the uses of the school or association, when sent to the Treasurer, Walter J. Buzby, Twelfth and Chestnut Streets, Phila.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Forestry.

A friend has kindly placed in our hands the Report for 1895 of the Pennsylvania Department of Agriculture, on the subject of Forestry. It states that the most important water-sheds of the State are those of the Delaware, Susquehanna and Ohio Rivers. The areas of those within the boundaries of Pennsylvania are, of the Delaware River, 6,345 square miles; of the Susquehanna, 21,006 square miles; and that of the Ohio, 14,747 square miles.

It appears to be well established that the presence of forests tends to lessen disastrous floods. Their offset leaves and twigs and their dead trunks decay quicker in the moist air of the forest than on the open field, forming a loose, fibrous mold. Their damp shade favors the growth of moss, another strong water drinker. The matted floor keeps the soil tender and open in texture, thereby promoting absorption; whereas likewise the deep-going tree roots give furtherance, by making channels downward into the under earth. Side roots and the tangled surface cumber and retard the flow of water after heavy rains, and these all work together in holding back waters which would else make flood.

Pennsylvania was originally one of the best wooded States in the Eastern half of the Union. For years she stood first as a lumber producing State. On the lower grounds bordering the rivers in the southeastern part of the State, the most valuable timber was White Oak or White Pine in the northeastern portion.

Professor Rothrock states that official returns estimate the amount of cleared land as about 16,000,000 acres and of woodland about 9,000,000. But much of this woodland is destitute of any timber of commercial value. In portions of Luzerne, Lackawanna and adjacent counties there exists an area of about 970 square miles, or an aggregate of 620,800 acres, which may be regarded more as a menace to the prosperity of the commonwealth, than as an element of strength to it. Most of this region was once covered with a dense and valuable forest; now it is fast becoming depopulated, for the soil is poor and better adapted to forest growth than to the ordinary crops of the farmer. It is almost a barren, and over it the fires sweep nearly every year, destroying the young trees and rendering the soil more and more barren.

As some indication of the extent to which this impoverishment of the land has gone, the amount of land advertised to be sold for unpaid taxes in 1894 was over 1,500,000 acres. There is a large area of land that has been cleared and farmed, which has become unproductive, because it is so steep and rocky that the fertility has been washed out of it. The only profitable use to which such lands can be appropriated is the growth of timber, and as this is necessarily slow, the State ought to encourage the owners by exemption from taxation in whole or in part of lands which are set apart for such growth.

The investigation of the Forestry Commission showed that the State of Pennsylvania owned no large bodies of land, and it recommends that it acquire by purchase several large areas at present unsettled, which might serve as collecting grounds for the wood required for future cities. It suggests reservations, aggregating at 1,400 square miles, principally in the northeastern part of the State, which it would be wise for the State to secure.

One of the great difficulties in replacing the forests that have been cut down, is the difficulty of preserving them from fire. The fires originate principally from two sources:—the carelessness in burning of their sods, they are careless about preventing the fires to escape into the timber; and the smaller farmers, in burning brush and logs do not take sufficient pains to prevent the fire from spreading. In proportion as the real loss occasioned by their destructive agencies comes to be appreciated by the people generally, we may expect increased care to guard against its ravages. In the meantime, it seems right and reasonable, that the Legislature should adopt measures to protect its timber growths from this source of loss.

The latter part of the report contains a detailed list of the native trees, which have commercial value, with remarks on their characteristic qualities.

The value of the timber crops in Pennsylvania exceeds that of the cereals; and as the timber lands are being rapidly deprived of the timber, the Commonwealth will in a few years greatly feel the impoverishment. In addition to the saw lumber, produced in enormous amounts, the quantity of firewood used to supply the tannery with bark, the railroad ties, the props used in the coal mines, and the wood converted into pulp for paper making, all show the importance of protecting the efforts of nature to replace the trees cut down by others.

ON HUMILITY.—After all, pride is a form of ignorance. Could we but for one moment understand the true relations of things—could we grasp in all their fulness, but for one fleeting instant those ideas which we so vaguely and imperfectly apprehend—could we see, in short, as we hope one day may, see face to face, and know, even as we are known—the surely pride would be an impossibility. What we might discover to be man's place in infinitude—or our own place in the human family—we cannot even guess; but the chasm that separates the fallible from the Infallible would dwarf all minor distinctions, while the sudden revelation of perfection in all its unapproachable majesty, would inspire us forever with a feeling of awe-struck and adoring humility.—Universal Magazine of Second Mo., 1879.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 16, 1897.

We have received a letter from a Friend in Indiana, a member of one of the Progressive Yearly Meetings which shows that there are still left some under our name in those parts who retain an attachment to the original principles of Friends, and mourn over the departure of others from it.

We subjoin some extracts from the letter. In reference to the suggestion, that good might result from visits among them paid by ministers who hold to our doctrines, we believe it is a safe ground to place our dependence upon the work of Christ on the hearts of his people, and to seek to be so imbued with his spirit as to bear a faithful testimony by word and deed to our convictions, which conflict with our original principles. If Friends are faithful in doing this, the Head of the Church may open the way for their relief and bless their efforts, not only to their own preservation, but also to the help of others. This may tend to open the way for the visits of those from other parts, who would prove fellow laborers in the cause of Christ.

I am glad that our Friends who have not yet had a share of the old landmarks and who adhere to the grand old principles of George Fox. What our branch of the Friends' church, Progressive and other evangelical churches are standing in need of most and the outside world is hungering for, is a simple-minded, holy, consecrated people, who have separated themselves from the world and therefore are not like the world, and the world can see and feel when they come in contact with them that there is something about them that they have not got, and the lives of such people create a hungering and a longing desire in the hearts of those who have not got such an experience that they, too, might be so changed and brought into the same experience also, there will be by such a holy, consecrated people (Friends), a holy dependence upon God. The Holy Spirit to lead us in our devotion to Him. When we meet to publicly worship Him there will be no program, no one man to control the worship and say how or when we shall pray and how long, and have the singing arranged to come in at stated times during worship, and not unfrequently accompanied by the organ or other music. We, the progressive Friends, have practically laid aside one of the fundamental principles, viz, doctrines of the Society of Friends, that is, in the insuring to of the same dispensation, we are all made kings, priests, unto God, and the veil is drawn away so that we individually may come into the holy of holies, and there worship Him in Spirit and in Truth, without any man to teach us, for He the Holy Spirit has been given to teach us. But how little we depend upon the Spirit in our meetings for worship now! The teaching and preaching in our branch of the church is almost all of it to draw us away from a silent waiting upon Him, indeed, we do not have any silent times any more, and when there should be any silence, we get very restless and begin to look about to see who will occupy the time; if nothing else we will have singing to fill up the time.

Oh, how true some of us are of this mechanical way of worship; how do we long for something that will lead the soul; it often comes to me, why is it that there are no ministers of your Yearly Meeting that feel drawn to visit our meetings? They are appointed or invited to do so, I believe there is an opening of the way, for such ministers to do a great deal of good. I am well aware there are a great many with us who are not satisfied with a hired pastor and other things equally as bad. Our last Yearly Meeting entertained a proposition from Kansas Yearly Meeting and appointed an committee to cooperate with other Yearly Meetings that may appoint such committee to consider the subject of the compilation of a hymn book suitable for use among Friends.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

USERS SERVICES. The Annual Annual general arbitration was signed at the State Department and returned to the Secretary of State Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador. Two copies were sent. One was sent to the Senate for ratification, and the other to London directly by special messenger, who will sail for England.

A dispatch of the 17th inst. from Washington stating that the United States Government will send agents to Washington within a week to consult the Republic's leaders on the subject of neutrality. They will come on the 17th inst. from London and will be directed to make a complete and unreservedly honest statement of the circumstances with regard to the case, and to be in a position to give a full and frank statement of the facts. It is very probable that the British Government will send a similar party to be prepared to treat with Canada and on what terms.

SHORTER DAYS. Shorter days with a short H. Walker, I do not see a political party in the movement. The fact is very certain that a limited amount of this movement will be of great benefit to the country. The number of men in the United States is about 100,000,000. The only way to see the interest in the movement is to see the fact that the movement is not a political party. The fact of the matter is that the Government and maintained at the price standard.

The absolute security of these notes was never called in question after the resumption of specie payments in 1879, and in the reserve was fringed upon by what delinquencies in that respect, brought about by the issue of the Wild-on Tariff law of 1894.

On the 10th instant the Pacific Railroad Refunding bill was defeated in the House by a majority of sixty-six votes. The general opinion is that the action of the House will result in a resort to foreclosure proceedings by the Government, which will be followed by the sale of the debt for 70 cents to the highest bidder.

There are about 4,500 women physicians in the United States.

During 1895 there were received at the lead office at Washington, 6,235,505 pieces of mail matter, $3,890 being enclosed. Nearly 87 per cent. of this was restored.

The results of a series of experiments made for a number of years at Cornell University were made public last summer. These showed that the application of electricity to the seeds and soil, and the use of arc-lights, at night so stimulated the growth of plants that they matured in one-half the time ordinarily required. Applying this discovery, a fancy truck farmer in Iowa has tried similar methods, and finds that the gain from one crop of lettuce is sufficient to pay the expense of operating the electric apparatus during a whole season.

A novel course of college instruction is offered by the Louisiana University, which is its "Aud-on-Square" system. It makes students practical and scientific tuition in a year's education. The course extends over four years, and has become popular with students from Cuba.

It is estimated that at present there are 4,000,000 bicycle riders in the United States, over 200,000 of these in New York City alone.

Statistics just made public show that in Massachusetts, in spite of the trolley car and the popularity of the bicycle, the number of horses is greater by 3,055 than in the year preceding.

Last year 1,891,176 bushels of wheat were exported from Philadelphia, an increase over 1895 of 375,743 bushels. Exports of corn, which in 1895 aggregated 8,900,000 bushels, came up to 9,379,280 in 1895.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 513, which is 11 more than the previous week, and 24 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 270 were males and 243 females; 87 died of pneumonia; 64 of consumption; 37 of heart disease; 24 of diptheria; 25 of cholera; 15 of typhoid fever; 16 of influenza; 16 of old age; 15 of convulsions; 14 of Bright's disease; 12 of cancer; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 10 of nephritis.

The introduction of the potato into Ireland three centuries ago by Sir Walter Raleigh was celebrated by a procession and show in the County of Dublin, 174 miles long, on the 21st inst. The London Evening Standard writes in the London Evening Standard: "A larger and more important collection of the different varieties of the succulent tuber, 'Ireland's staple food,' from almost every part of the kingdom was never before witnessed either in Dublin or out of it.

The London Mail is authority for the statement that the Queen of England has become a teetotaler. Up to three years ago, the Queen partook of wines in spring quantities, but began abating as an experiment. This was so satisfactory to her that she has discontinued the habit. In other ways, the Queen has given evidence of her interest in movements against the liquor traffic.

1869.—Seventh Month 20th.—In the afternoon we again set forward toward Parkerville. Ym. House met us at the station and took us to his home. They were very kind indeed. In the morning was Kenneth Monthly Meeting. Sarah Harry said a little encouragingly, then Comfort ye, comfort ye my people," seemed given me. "Morris Coe there, and spoke, commencing with, "Whosoever things were written forthin were written for our learning, that ye through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope," not salvation—and enlarged somewhat, referring also to being builded upon the foundation against which the storm eat in vain.

We dined at Hannah Savery's, and were kindly entertained there until morning, when Thomas Savery very kindly took us to New Garden Monthly Meeting. Here was deep feeling and wading with discouraged, doubting tates, "What, could ye not watch with me one our? Couldst thou not wait in humble patience until the Lord light thy candle?" There was encouragement and I had to ask help for them. Dined at Charles Cooper's, with many friends. He took us on that night to Joshua Pusey's, and the morning they took us to their Monthly meeting at London Grove. I felt poor and very fearful, but our merciful Lord opened the way.—The kingdom of heaven is not meat and drink, but righteousness, peace and joy in the Holy Ghost. I felt that there were some of the oek of the earth there, and had to encourage them to seek righteousness, and if so be, ye may be hid in the day of the Lord's anger. Here gain my soul seemed unexpectedly filled with applications for them, and that He would there sanctify the meek with salvation. We dined at George Sharpless', and in the afternoon he kindly took us to his brother Charles'—an interesting family, but I desired they might be more given up to be cross-bearing disciples of the Lord. Our first appointed meeting was held at London Britain the next day. I went, feeling very low; the meeting was small, but here were exercised ones there.—"My covenant was with Him of life and of peace, and I gave them to Him for the fear, wherewith he feared me and was afraid before my name," referring to the upright pillars which were capable of bearing great weight, if they were continued upright. Felt much for the children and the parents. "I sleep, but my heart waketh," came to mind and caused me to rise again.

When dear E. Allen was there a few weeks before, during her family visit, she used the language in their meeting that "she felt much sympathy for them in their stripped condition, stripped by the hand of death, and by the transformation of the enemy." Two valuable elders had been lately removed, and some separated from them to sit by themselves and so have cut themselves off from being useful to society. We dined at Owen Evans', Beulah Thompson's home, and were much interested in this family—three dear little children. Charles Williams left us here and returned to the city, and Abel Hopkins came and took us to his home. Beulah accompanied us. She is a sweet-spirited Friend, and deeply feels the loss of her husband, Daniel Thompson, who deceased a short time since. Again our feelings were drawn out towards Abel and his large and interesting family. He feels his situation in that meeting, being the only one on the men's side, who sits facing the assembly. Oh, that more of them would be willing to wear and bear the cross, as our Saviour bore it.

Abel took us in the morning to Susan Chambers', where we were to dine. Beulah joined us, and we had a pleasant visit. The two aged friends could sympathize together, and we with them, Susan having lost a valuable son a few months before. Owen Evans came for us in the afternoon to help us on our journey to West Grove. While on our way the great total eclipse commenced, and we arrived at Thomas Conrad's just in time to go up on the roof to see it, but a small cloud hid the sun near the most interesting time. Thomas and his wife were very attentive to our wants, and we walked to meeting with them in the morning. Here C. W. met us again; it seemed to be a good meeting. My desire for them was that He who was the Fountain of life in whose light only we could see light, who had caused them to know the way in which they should walk; those who lifted up their souls unto Him; caused them to hear "his loving kindness in the morning, even those who put their trust in Him," that He would create such a hunger and thirst in the dear young people as only himself could satisfy, etc. Horatio Cooper took us home with him to dinner, and my spirit seemed closely drawn to his deeply exercised, travelling soul. May the Lord direct him aright.

One Samuel Morris of that neighborhood came to be with us. He had passed through much inward conflict, and turned from an infidel to be a believer in our Lord, but deeper crucifixion yet seemed needed. We took tea and spent the night at Thomas Harvey's. They are at present taking care of the experimental farm, and it was quite interesting to see and hear of the great varieties of plants. In the morning we took the cars for Concord again and met the Select Quarterly Meeting. This was a good, encouraging time, though I felt such a little cold, and so many worthies. Dear Phoebe W. Roberts and Abigail Hall spoke. "The angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear Him, and delivereth them." A very low remark seemed with me in the revival of the language, "Hath God cast away his people? I tell you nay;" believing there was a living remnant in these two Quarters which we might desire the Great Master of the vineyard to bless and water and give the increase. Again we put up at our very hospitable friends B. W. and E. G. Passmore. They generally have many lodgers at Quarterly Meeting time, sometimes fifteen or twenty, besides thirty or forty to dine.

The Quarterly Meeting convened on the tenth of Eighth Month, a large and interesting meeting. Henry Wood of Trent in there and had a lively testimony. There seemed something required of me to say, "He is my God, and I will prepare Him an habitation, my Father's God and I will exalt Him." Desiring that all might prepare Him an habitation in their hearts, and that none should be like Peter, unwilling to be washed, lest our Lord should say, Ye are clean, but not all. Again continuing with, "O, that all might see the love of money and the love of the world to be the bitter root they really are."

Samuel Emien immediately rose, continuing and enlarging upon the same subject so very feelingly and encouragingly to those who were desirous of following our Lord in the regeneration. The second meeting was lively, too. Abigail Hall, Rachel Bennington and E. R. Evans in testimony, and my soul bowed in solemn supplication, that He, who had promised to be as the dew unto Israel would continue to be with them, and that all might be concerned to descend into the low valley where the dew lies long, and rise not, except as He leads them to ascend the hills of Zion to offer their praises and thanksgiving to his Holy Name.

After meeting one dear Friend repeated to me the words, "My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest," which was very encouraging, being much bowed under the weight of future service. Stephen Trimble kindly offered to attend us to several meetings. He took us to his mother's to dine, then on to John Sharpless, Jr.'s, to spend the night. Here was a dear aged Friend, Ruth Sharpless, and here, too, we met with Patience M. Callister, a widow who has passed through much suffering from her relations because of her joining our Society. Hers was a very interesting case. At Chester was our second appointed meeting, and there seemed Divine life in our midst, even his Heavenly presence, so that it was good to be there. Afterwards Stephen took us to Mary Maris', to dine and tea. Here we had a visit, pleasant to remember, and I felt very much for her widowed daughter Hannah Stokes.

Lodged at Stephen Trimble's. He has a large and interesting family. An appointed meeting at Chichester next morning. I felt very poor, but ministered as the Father helped me: "Thy mercy reacheth unto the clouds, and thy faithfulness." "Hold thou not my peace at my tears," and they shall see his face and his name shall be on their foreheads. R. Benington there, and appeared in a short, lively testimony, and very unexpectedly my prayer was unto the Lord for them. We dined at Salkeld Larkin's and were kindly entertained. About three o'clock, Stephen took us to the boat at Chester, and here we parted from him, feeling grateful for his continued attentions.

Eighth Month 14th.—Seventh-day afternoon we proceeded to Birmingham. John Forsythe met us and we remained there all night. He and his wife Rebecca were very kind, and we were interested in the four little children. At meeting in the morning I had to remember that obedience was the only safe way, so not to deliver the impression faithfully. "Not slothful in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord." More deep wrestling of spirit for the Divine life to arise and continue among them, was felt to be needed. "Be not slothful, but followers of them, who through faith and patience inherit the promises." Edward Smedley came prepared to take us home with them to dinner; we passed a pleasant noon, then hastened on towards Westown Boarding School, E.—taking us in his carriage. Some of the committee were attending there at the time; it was pleasant to meet them. It was interesting to see so many children, all behaving so properly. "The cup which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it?" was the resigned language of our Saviour, and shall be ours under every circumstance and in every condition, was the language dwelling in my heart, and given with the fear that all were not willing to follow Him. Disobedience makes a long wilderness journey, obedience cuts it short, and we are brought into the promised land of rest and peace to our souls. Deborah Rhoads followed in testimony, "Behold! I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people," referring to the birth of our Saviour and the message of the angelic hosts, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace, good will toward men." Again unexpectedly my soul was bowled for them, that He, who knew the broken resolutions of many a little one, would strengthen those who were desirous to serve Him. We mingled pleasantly together until "reflection," then we went on the girls' side. "The eyes of the Lord run unto and fro throughout the whole earth," to show himself strong on behalf of those whose hearts are perfect before Him." Deborah Rhoads appeared in supplication, then the children retired. In the morning we returned home. Third-day morning the 17th was an appointed meeting at Darby. Thomas Scattergood met us and conveyed us to meeting. It felt lively. The apostle had arrived at a very great attainment when he could say, "For me to live is Christ, to die is gain," but it is possible for every one of us to arrive at the same state, to "a life hid with Christ in God," desiring we might strive to dwell in the deep inwardness of Divine life, continue in the deep water, then all the storms and trials of this life will pass over us upon the surface, but our souls will dwell with Him in quiet, experiencing indeed that our life is hid with Him. We are assured that it is a faithful saying, "That if we be dead with Him" we shall also live with Him; if we suffer, we shall also reign with Him; but if any deny Him, He will deny them. We had a pleasant noon with Abbie Garrett, where we met Stephen Trimble and John Sharpless again; the meeting being small, one of them was appointed to sit with Friends there occasionally. Returned home in the afternoon feeling thankful.

Fourth-day afternoon proceeded to Morris Cope's (London Grove), where we, with many other Friends, were kindly entertained.

Fifth-day was their Select Quarterly Meeting. I did so wish to be silent, to abide in the vine and so bringing forth fruit. "Herein is my Father glorified, that ye bring forth much fruit." She was encouraging. I soon found my will must be given up, and I also had to encourage the little company to endure at seeing Him who is invisible, and then interceded for them, that some who felt the weight of the "ark of the testimony gradually setting down upon them from the shoulders of those who had long borne the burden in the heat of the day might indeed be strengthened with might by his spirit in the inner man, by Him who knows our weakness. We passed a pleasant evening. Samuel Cope and wife, Edward and Sarah Richie, and A. and E. Hutchinson were there. I was glad to see the gentleness of Samuel's spirit, more child-like than I had expected to see; how needful this is for those who profess to be followers of Him who was weak and lowly.

Some Extracts from the Epistles of London Yearly Meeting.

From epistle of 1732—"As it is evident that the simplicity and distinguishing plainness of our holy profession is too much lost among us, respecting language, apparel, and behavior; all Friends are exhorted to keep under the power of the cross of Christ, which will bring up to the world and the vanities of it, and crucify in a true life of self-denial, agreeable to the Gospel and examples of our elders."

Epistle of 1736—"It is with much grief and concern that we may observe in some a declension from plainness of habit, and simplicity of speech and behavior, which were so conspicuous in our early Friends. This declension arises from a disregard to the Divine Light and Truth as the regulator of their words and actions."

Epistle of 1746.—"The matter of grief to observe a visible declension, in many, from the fervor, love and zeal our ancient Friends were endowed with for the honor of God and the promotion of his Truth; too many are departed from the plain and self-denying life of Jesus. Alas! how is that pious devotion and reverence of soul abated; and how careless and indifferent in that important concern of worshipping the Lord in an awful silence. O! that all might be stured up to follow the steps of our worthy elders in an holy contempt of this world and in that Christian courage and patience which supported them. O! that we might walk after their example, preferring the love of Truth to the love of earthly things, and the honor of God to the honor of men."

Epistle of 1747.—"Alas! how are many degenerated by a mean compliance with the customs and fashions of this present evil world, under this mistaken notion of rendering themselves agreeable to others, and indeed become contemptible to those they seek to please; it being a just remark that a revolting from the form of godliness is often attended with the loss of the power of it."

Epistle of 1753.—"It is matter of exceeding grief and concern to observe how far the exemplary plainness of habit, speech and deportment which distinguished our forefathers, and for which they patiently underwent the reproach and contradiction of sinners, are now departed from by many under our name, . . . a declension attended with pernicious consequences, in opening the way of some, the more easily and unobserved to attend the places of public resort, for the exercise of sport, plays, and other hurtful and destructive diversions of the age, from which Truth ought our faithful elders, and which Truth taught us wholly to refrain."

Epistle of 1760.—"As in these times many hearts are measurably awakened to religious inquiry, being dissatisfied with the empty form in which they have had their education, and are looking about for help, and remarking the conduct of the various religious societies, with this inquiry in their minds, 'who shall shew us any good?' We beseech you, shake yourselves from the dust of the earth, and put on those beautiful garments of purity and heavenly-mindedness wherein our ancestors were clothed and made instrumental to turn many to God. If the ever-glorious Truth, which wrought mightily in them and rendered them as lights in the world, be by us properly attended to, the same blessed effect will accompany us, and many humble seeking souls will, by our faithfulness be induced to glorify the Father which is in heaven. Let us remember the end of our high and holy call, and keep it steadily in view; so shall we be truly enabled to direct those seeking souls in the way to peace. But on the contrary if such looking towards us, on account of our high profession, find us in a want of the substance they are earnestly seeking after, 'how lamentable' will our 'position be' if we thereby give occasion of 'offence to those little ones!' This, being a truth, how all important that while claiming the name of Friends or taking it upon us by a right of membership, be found in that befitting form of behavior, attire, etc. to which an abiding in the Truth (its life and power) would bring us as it did our worthy forefathers; that we too in inward life, and outwardly in all things, may 'adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour,' being redeemed from 'un godliness' and (as surely from) worldly lusts. Titus ii: 12."

WHO IS RESPONSIBLE?—No one who read the daily papers can escape the conviction that the responsibility for the awful crimes which are such a blemish on our boasted high civilization is not entirely due to "heredity" and "environment." The Pittsburgh Christian Advocate says: "Those secular newspapers which from time to time bewail the low moral tone of the public mind, as evidenced in crimes of monstrous nature, should take time to ask in whose degree they have contributed to debase our people by the columns of criminal news which they so prominently place before their readers. They press can do much to elevate men. Is it doing it?"

HAND-MADE OPPORTUNITIES.—Man is his own opportunity. Mere outer occasion or circumstance never yield a profit to him who finds no opportunity within himself. Nothing "turns up" to the man who because of his own inaction originates nothing. The external work operates nothing for him who is not original. To him who has only longing and wishing the world is a blank wall, to echo back his insane mood. A worldly-wise paragrapher says, "Some of the very best opportunities are hand-made."—S. S. Times.

FROM "THE UNITED FRIENDS."

The Convincement of Edward Burrough.

To one of strong intellectual powers the lesson often comes very slowly that these powers are utterly inadequate to the comprehension of spiritual things. Nevertheless the most learned of men, alike with the most illiterate, is subject to that universal law expressed in the words of Paul:

"We speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom, which God ordained before the world unto our glory; which none of the princes of this world knew; for had they known it, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory. But as it is written, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man, the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him. But God hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit; for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God. For what man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man which is in him? even so the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. ii: 7-11). Not only is this the testimony of Holy Scripture, but experience confirms it in every age; and none, perhaps, have borne more emphatic witness to it than did the first Friends. The life of Edward Burrough furnishes a case in point. This Friend died in prison in London at the age of twenty-eight, having been a minister of the Gospel for about ten years, a minister, too, of truly apostolic fervor. His parents had brought him up in the faith of the Church of England, and he himself tells us that from a child, even a few years old, he "set his face to seek and find a Saviour;" so that his intercourse as a boy was with those of mature years whose interest was in religious things. His secular education was also well cared for; and to the utmost that his native country afforded; and to quote the language of the historian S. Wel, "his knowledge and understanding soon passed his years; for being but a boy he had the spirit of a man, and in his youth was endued with wisdom above his equals in years."

He took great delight in reading the Scriptures, in which he became well versed. It was characteristic of him that whatever he undertook he did with his might. So strong were his convictions in religious matters while still a child, that at the age of twelve he braved the ridicule of his acquaintances by quitting the Established Church, and joining with the Presbyterians, whose doctrines seemed to him nearer the truth than those in which he had been reared. "By laboring here," he says, "I gathered knowledge of things without, but yet was ignorant of the living truth." The lad's interest in spiritual things and his attainments so far in advance of his years made him in great favor with the leaders of his newly adopted people, and it is not surprising to learn that though sober in deportment, pride grew up in him.

But though the boy was like one mired in a dark road, the Father whom he sought was not unmindful of his child. When about seventeen years old, "it pleased God," he writes, "to show himself a little to me, and something struck me with terror. When I had been praying, I heard the voice often, 'Thou art ignorant of God—thou knowest not where He is; to what purpose is thy prayer?' So, much fear came upon me, and broke me off from praying many times. Trouble came thick into my mind, and fearfulness fell upon me. I was struck off from my delights which I formerly loved; and what I had gathered in as of God, died." Now he was brought under great exercise. For a time he left off reading the Scriptures—doubtless under a sense of limitation, for something, he says, "showed me I was very ignorant, and knew not the true God; and the beauty of all things vanished." He went to some whose judgment he respected and put the question, what that God was which was professed—but there was none could give him a satisfactory answer.

In his distress of mind, he now began to be stricter in his outward life—striving not only himself to refrain from all vain conduct, but also to reprove others for wrong-doing, which made him the subject of derision from many. Yet there was integrity of purpose in what he did, and "it pleased the Lord," he tells us, "to show himself in love to me, and I had sweet refreshment coming in from Him to my soul, and had joy and peace in abundance; and openings of the living truth in me, which the world knew not of. The mystery of the Scripture was something opened, which before I knew nothing of; and I saw many glorious things in it, which he hid under the letter. I was in much rejoicing many times, and sang praises, for I was brought out of the land of darkness, and could say, I was in the Light."

The young man now fell into a very natural error. Having been favored with these heavenly openings, he thought he held in his own hand and will the key to the mysteries of God. "Having a light shining in me," he writes, "I grew up into notions, to talk of high things, for it was my delight to comprehend in my busy mind. Thus, being ignorant of the cross, to keep low in it, I ran before my guide up into comprehension; and then was I above many of the priests and professors, and followed only to hear the highest notions, that preached high things. But the fleshy man was at liberty, and so I became one of them in their discourses, and was looked upon by them to know much. The former terror was gone, and I had got up from under the judgment;—pride grew more than ever, self-conceit, presumption, and fleshy liberty to the carnal mind. My delight was much in dis-coursing; where I gave holy things into dozes, and cast pearls before swine. Wisdom was hid from me; I lived pleasantly, for I had the true God, and the true Truth in my comprehension, . . . and I had the world in my heart. Pride, covet-ousness, and the earthly spirit ruled, and my delight was grown up to that which once I had no delight in, and the beauty of things grew, which seemed to have been vanished. Here I was run from my husband after other lovers, and had left the Lord my maker who had so graciously made himself manifest unto me. I became darkened, lost that which I once had, and had in memory that which before I had enjoyed. I could tell of experiences, but they were dead to me; and something within began to question how it was with me? for I saw myself to be ignorant more than formerly, and I saw that I knew nothing."

Dark as this condition was, there was hope for him in the fact that he realized that with all his profession, he had been falling away from that former estate in which he had known the refreshment of the Lord's presence in his soul. He saw and he was blessed in that he saw, "that was dead and ruled in [him] which God never loved." In this restless state he found no comfort in the public sermons which he heard, for he felt that the priests did not themselves possess what they attempted to expound; and he seemed almost at a loss which way to follow. It was then, however, that he was graciously passed for the servant of the living God by the Fox, who held a meeting at Underbarrow, which Burrough attended. The doctrine that Fox preached, "the light of Christ Jesus made manifest in the heart, re-proving for evil, giving a right understanding of the Holy Scriptures, and leading the humble and obedient ones to the saving knowledge of Him who died for them"—was not received by Burrough without opposition, and he had reasoning with Fox about it. But it pleased the Lord, Burrough tells us, to open his understanding, and show him his pre-legal state—that he was "above the cross of Christ, and not in the pure fear of the Lord." It was a humiliating time for this strong-minded young man who had stood as a peer among the highest professors of his acquaintance, but there was that in his heart that answered to the truth of Fox's doctrine, and he saw that it was true and Scriptural. It was more than head convincing; the heart was touched. His pride was broken, and he let himself "no more worthy to be called a son." His intense nature was not one that was given to half-way measures. "A day of weeping, mourning and misery," he writes, "and a day of vengeance and recompense came upon me, such as I had never known. One vial of wrath after another was poured out, and then I separated from all the glory of the world, from all my acquaintance, and kindred, and betook myself to the company of a poor, despised and condemned people, called Quakers."

Thus not by gloss, or commentary, or knowledge of dead notions, but by the powerful operation of God's Holy Spirit both inwardly in his own heart and through the instrumentality of a chosen servant, was Edward Burrough brought to the more perfect knowledge of the way of the Lord. And as Apostles of old "mightily convince the Jews, and that publicly, showing by the Scriptures, that Jesus was Christ," so in due time did Edward Burrough come to be a living minister of the Gospel of the grace of God, for whose sake he literally left father and mother, and in the end laid down his life "for the testimony of Jesus."

"THAT CATTLE TRAINS"—Our Manchester Repository paper of August 1st gives an account of a great smash-up of a cattle train near Concord, where "The Reformatory" is located, where the animals that were not killed were turned into a hot pasture with no water.

We were by the following:

"But two or three things came out very prettily during the day. Of course a crowd from the village soon gathered around the scene, and in this village 'Bands of Mercy' were formed long ago, and a generation of young people have grown up here under their influence. And when the young people saw the distress of those thirsty animals, for there was no water, the girls even went away and got their pails and began to bring water, and so all day long they continued carrying it, slaking the thirst of those who probably suffered as much as we might do. It was a pretty sight, and at night we were told, as the cattle men began to move away with their charge, one little calf that seemed to have a visible hurt, was given to one of these girls, who took it home."

His parents were so distressed with him for a long while, Friends that loved him well, and who were present at his death, and those who were with him, saw that he was a true and a true

There may be rougher roads than that which leads from the east up the Roan, but if so, I think I never encountered one so persistently stony as that. As the summit was approached a noticeable feature was the stunted character of the trees, very many of which were beeches. Not only were they stunted, but their trunks and branches were covered with lichens, and the general effect was that of a superannuated apple orchard. On some rocks in Carver's Gap, a depression between the peak of the Roan and the Little Roan, where my road brought me out, it was a great pleasure to find the rare sedge, Carex aestivalis. This plant possesses the graceful characteristics of its near relatives, Carex vivescens and birsuta. From the fact of its maturing at a period when most other sedges have shed their seeds, it has doubtless received its specific name of aestivalis, or the summer sedge. The ground hereabouts was literally covered with the leaves of the wood betony (Pediicularia canadensis) looking not unlike a coarse fern. On these rocks Carex Pennsylvanica was quite abundant, as well as the variety alpicola of Carex canescens. This latter sedge is a genuine mountaineer and loves the high altitudes.

Carver's Gap I found to be a most interesting place. The surface here is covered with a short grass which makes excellent pasture for cattle and sheep, large numbers of which, the afternoon of my arrival, were feeding there. The climb was not ended here, however; three more miles were needed to bring me out upon the real summit of the mountain. Along the way many of the characteristic plants of the high mountains were noticed, among them a pretty saxifrage (Saxifraga brunnithalicta) a low, much-branched plant, with leaves often reddish, and bearing a profusion of small white flowers, each with a pair of yellow spots on three of the petals; and Gemma radiatum, which bears a yellow flower not unlike a buttercup. This latter is quite rare, but occurs in profusion on the high summit of the Roan, where I arrived as the sun was nearing the horizon, on Seventh Month 23rd.

The summit of the mountain is an open, heath-like expanse of short herbage, bare of trees, from which fact it is locally known as "the bald." No pen can adequately describe the view from this elevated point, which is higher than Mount Washington. In every direction the eye rests upon forest-clad mountain peaks, extending to the horizon, like billows of some terrestrial ocean. Off to the westward stretched the dim outline of the Cumberlands, in the confines of Kentucky; far to the north is White Top, in Virginia, and closer to hand on the east, the triple peaks of the Grandfather, the highest of the Blue Ridge. Almost south lie the cones of the Black Mountains, the loftiest of all the Appalachian chain—among them Clingman's Dome and Mt. Mitchell. Upon the very summit of the latter, buried amid the rocks, lie the mortal remains of Eli-ha Mitchell, whose name the mountain bears, and who lost his life upon its slopes. Probably no other man in all the world has such a monument.

Impressive as this sight is by day, the view from the Roan summit by moonlight is perhaps more wonderful. During our stay, there was but one such night—that on which I arrived. The valleys were filled with mist, only the peaks of the mountains being visible, like islands on a moonlit sea. We seemed as though afloat in the clouds, which lay below us on all sides, bathed in the silvery light.

The next morning, Seventh Month 24th, I awoke to a world of fog. My plan had been to pay a visit to Lion's Bluff, a mile or so from the hotel. If I had not seen the peak that goes by this name the day before, when there was light, I should have had no means of knowing how to get there this morning, as nothing but fog was visible a hundred feet away from the hotel. The wind was blowing half a gale, and the prospect was exceedingly wild; but I started out after breakfast, and by sticking close to my path, I eventually reached the bluff. The path led across the bald summit of the mountain, and several interesting plants were noticed by the way,—most abundant, perhaps, being the little Thyme-leaved Bluets (Houstonia scryphifolia), whose blossom is almost identical with our "Quaker Lady," but the plant, instead of being upright and blossoming in companies, creeps along the ground and blooms only at intervals. Large masses, or cushions, of Leopodium bulbiflorum grew everywhere. This plant is locally called heather, but this name is quite a misnomer, as it is only a prostrate form of the sand-myrtle, which is so common in the New Jersey barrens. The plants were now in fruit, with occasionally a bud or belated blossom to be found. Alnus viridis, the mountain Alder, frequent in the far North, grew on the summit in profusion, its round leaves and larger fat cones of green fruit distinguishing it from the older which is so common along our Northern lowland streams. Amid the grass the white star-like blossoms of a cinquefoil Potentilla tridentata were cheerful reminders of the far North, where this plant is common. Most interesting of all, however, was the Mountain Sandwort, (Arenaria Groenlandica), a sub-arctic plant, which would certainly be very uncomfortable in the South anywhere except in the cool temperature of these very high mountains. Lion's Bluff was rich in the beautiful red Snake-head, which seemed to find a particularly congenial habitation here. The front of this bluff, which is quite precipitous, was gay with a profusion of the yellow flowers of the Gemma radiatum, and of a dwarfed Golden-rod (Solidago spithamea), a characteristic plant of the high mountains of Carolina. The rare Stonecrop, known as Rose-root in Europe (Sedum Rhodioides), grew on the face of the cliff.

The characteristic tree of the Roan is perhaps the Fraser balsam (Abies Fraseri). In the sunlight it presents a beautiful silvery appearance, due to the white under surfaces of the leaves. It was interesting to notice the cones which, wherever I saw them, were clustered on the upright branches of the trees. They sit there upright. Their color is yellowish, with brown tips, and the cones usually exude drops of transparent balsam. Another common tree is the mountain ash, which seemed to thrive here wonderfully, but I noticed no fruit on any of those I saw. Under the small rocks, almost everywhere, little clusters of a rare club moss (Lycopodium selago) grew. They stood out from the rocks occasionally, somewhat in the fashion of sand-labra from the wall. On the Tennessee side of the mountain the hobble-bush (Fibrium lantanoides) made quite a show in the woods, with its red berries and rusty crimson leaves.

From the Roan, my route was southward some seventy-five miles along valley and mountain, to Asheville, whence the train was to bear me home. Little of especial botanical interest came under my notice on this trip, but I found much to engage my attention among the people whose dwellings I passed as I travelled. The poorer class of the mountain whites (I saw practically no colored people in the mountains) may well make one's heart ache—not merely because of their poverty, but because they themselves seem so shiftless, apathetic, and without aspiration or hope in the world. The dwellings of this class often consist of a one-storied log cabin. Sometimes with one room, sometimes with two with a huge, blackened fire-place, where a few embers smoulder in readiness to start a large fire when occasion requires. If the family is large there may be two or three beds in each room, and possibly a bed made up on the floor. A table and a few home-made chairs complete the furniture. Often an old muzzle-loading gun and powder-horn hung on the wall, and occasionally a large spinning-wheel would be standing in the corner, for converting wool into homespun. The chickens usually had the run of the house, and furnished pretty constant employment to some member of the family to "shoo" them out. The women generally chewed tobacco or "dipped" snuff (the sign of the latter, I am inclined to think, being a stick in the mouth like a big to-tpick). Dirty and unkempt, they seemed even inferior to the indolent men, whom I saw in the freshness of the day, sitting on chairs tilted back against the shady side of the house, or idling about the road. One place I passed, a sort of cross-roads store, was locally known as "loafers' glory," because of an especial abundance of that sort of humanity in the neighborhood. I think it was near there that I met a forlorn-looking man in front of a miserable cabin, who, after inquiring my name and where I came from, said with real interest, "Now, maybe you can tell me something I want to know. How will the election go?" I told him he knew as much about that as I did, for nobody knew. "Well, then," he continued, "maybe you can tell me how it will go in the State of Philadelphia."

Many of the mountain people I met had never seen a railroad, and had no conception of a city or large town. So limited, indeed, was their experience that their stock of questions was easily exhausted, and they soon relaxed into silence and staring. Yet poor and wretched as they were, they possessed a virtue that is too often lacking among the wealthy and cultured, and that is hospitality. Such as they had, their buttermilk, and beans, and soiden bread, and little, low chairs, was always cheerfully offered, and apparently without thought of pay.

All the mountaineers, however, are not of this type. There are many who are intelligent, industrious and desirous of getting ahead. Sometimes they have travelled a little, and have seen how people live beyond the mountains. Two such overtook me one evening as they rode their mules home from a piece of hired land they had been working, several miles from their own farm. One of these told me there was not enough tillable land cleared in the mountains to support the population properly, and they were forced to rent additional patches, and often at great distances from home, in order to eke out a living.

"BELIEF is the seed, received into the will, of which understanding or knowledge is the flower, and the thing believed is the fruit."—Cloveridge's "Aids to Reflection."

"MY LORD AND MY GOD."

MARGARET E. SANGSER.

'Twas evening and the doors were shut,
No bar was that to Him
Who came in kingly silence through
The twilight glowing dim.
In tones as tender as the dew,
He blessed them: "Peace be unto you."

It was the Master's loving word,
The Master's form they knew;
And nearer to the risen Lord
The glad disciples drew.
What glory was in their hearts that hour!
What glory in his wondrous power!

His eyes in matchless pity dwell
On one reluctant face,
On one who knew not all the bliss
Of full-believing grace.
That soul still fettered still with doubt,
The love of Jesus singled out.

"Behold," said Christ, "these wondrous of mine; Feel where the nails were driven."
Ah, swift he knew the voice Divine!
His heart with love was riven;
And leaped like flame his answering word:
"I know thee now," "my God, my Lord."

Then soft from Jesus' lips there fell
A thought exceeding sweet;
Let age to age his message tell,
His tenderness repeat.
"Thou hast believed, for thou hast seen,
Blessed are they who have not seen,

And yet have trusted. We rejoice
Dear Lord, and bless thy name;
How sacred was that time when first Thy face that light came,
And we beheld thee, crucified—
Thy pierced hands, thy riven side.

Yet, seeing not the cross alone,
Our eyes were lifted high;
We knew thee sitting on the throne,
We felt thee drawing nigh;
And all our doubts were lushed to peace,
And from their chains we had release.

THE GRUMBLER.

DORA READ GOODALE.

HIS YOUTH.

His cap was too thick and his coat was too thin;
He could not be quiet, he hated a din;
He hated to write and he hated to read;
He was certainly very much injured, indeed!
He must study and toil over him he detested;
His parents were strict, and he never was rested;
He knew he was wretched as wretched could be!

HIS MATURITY.

His farm was too small and his taxes too big;
He was selfish and lazy and cross as a pig;
His wife was too silly, his children too rude,
And just because he was unaccountably good!
He hadn't got money enough and to spare;
He had nothing at all he did not or wear;
He knew he was wretched as wretched could be;
There was no one so wretchedly wretched as he!

HIS OLD AGE.

He finds he has grown poorer and deeper than his fears;
He grumbles to think he has grumbled for years;
He grumbles to think he has grumbled away
His home and his children, his life's little gay;
But alas! 'tis too late! it is no use to say
That his eyes are too dim and his hair is too gray;
He knows he is wretched as wretched can be;
There is no one so wretchedly wretched as he!

John Leitchworth and His Wife.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

John Leitchworth was a minister in the Society of Friends, who resided during part of his time in Fallowfield Township, in Chester Co., Pennsylvania. In the latter part of his life, he removed to Philadelphia, and became a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

The late Dr. John L. Kite, who knew him well, wrote out a sheet of reminiscences, which he sent to a cousin, that she might know more about her worthy grandfather. From it the following is taken.

"John Leitchworth was fond of children, and he used to say, 'I know the way to every little child's heart.' And when he found one rather shy, he would thrust his hand into one of his capacious waistcoat pockets, and draw forth some mint drops, or other good things, which would soon bring the prattler to his knees, making the train very good indeed. He knew the way to the hearts of older children also, for he was never without a store of pleasant little anecdotes, which would serve, instead of sweetmeats, to bring about him children of a larger growth. He knew the way to the hearts of young men and maidens, being equally well provided with conversational powers, and suitable incidents, to reach the hearts of those who were preparing to take their places in the busy walks of life. He also knew the way to the hearts of strong men, and lovely women, too; for he always had in his well stored mind, much to engage their attention, and to kindle a warm interest in their bosoms towards their kind companion and pleasing instructor. Neither did he lose his hold upon the affections of the aged, who loved him for his own sake, and for his work's sake, and by his Master's sake; for whom he always had some good word to speak, with loving arguments, addressed more to the hearts than to the heads of his deeply interested hearers. And all this would be done without any affectation of superior attainments, either in literature or religion; but would seem to flow spontaneously from a heart replete with affection and interest in the welfare of all he was conversing with.

I have already said: Neither did he lose his hold upon the affections of the aged. Indeed I might almost say, He never lost a friend. True, some have been offended by his plain dealing, when his Master required it, turning their backs upon him because of his faithfulness to apprehended duty, but such were never his real friends. They visited him; they loved to consort with him, because to be a companion of John Leitchworth, was a real passport into good society, acknowledged by all his fellow-menbers.

As it was the chief business of John Leitchworth's life to draw the affections of all into whose hearts he could obtain entrance, towards his own good Lord and Master, for no sinister purpose of his own, but for the present and everlasting welfare of all whom he admitted to share his company. The true import of the language of his conduct and conversation amongst his companions was this, 'Love me, love my Master also.'

John Leitchworth was not an eloquent orator, he was something better; he was an earnest advocate of his Master's cause; going directly to the point, and by the path that the Spirit led him, using as few words as might clearly express his meaning while addressing the heart, rather than the head of a solemnly attentive audience, with as choice language as ever I have heard from a Friend's gallery.

The construction of John Leitchworth's sentences, when thus pleading his Master's cause was so simple, and the words were put together so neatly and compactly, that it would take a very skilled master of the English language to have added a single word, or to have taken ought away, without injuring both the sense and the rhythm of his utterance.

There was no need, there was no room for rhetorical flourishes; words from the Living Spring flowed through a prepared conduit into such hearts as were then and there thirsting for the waters of Life. And we wonder at the solemn ordering of good which generally attended his ministry? Such preaching I have considered the modus operandi of Gospel ministry, as viewed from Friends' standpoint. And this I write, not to the praise of the creature, but to the glory of that Power which made out of a poor, frail man, a living minister of the Gospel of Christ; and fitted him for that noblest work and labor of love, to which man has ever been called.

Such are some of my recollections of my honored uncle, and such are the impressions left upon my mind, after many years of solid consideration of the man, of the member of our religious Society, and above all, of the minister of the Gospel of life and salvation.

I have no desire to lengthen out this sketch, but scarcely refrain from the expression of a wish that the Lord would raise up many like him to stand and to plead for his great Name and cause in the earth."

He married Elizabeth Kite, who proved a worthy helpmate, and of whom he left the following testimony.

'Thou wast a flower in fruit, and in season,
And wastest thy sweetness in the desert air.'

hence this short testimony.

"This may truly be said of my beloved wife, Elizabeth Leitchworth, she was circum-spect in her own walking and careful to bring up her children in plainness of dress and simplicity of manners, becoming our religious profession, in frequently reading the Holy Scriptures, and to restrain them from reading pernicious books, and from the corrupt conversation of the world, and was a good example therein herself; her heart and house were always open to accommodate Friends who were traveling in the work of the ministry, and I can truly say she was a nursing mother to me, ever making way for me on such occasions. However trying our circumstances were, she may truly be said to be one who washed the disciples' feet.

A diligent attender of meetings, and when in declining health and confined to the house, her usual care was continued in making way for the family to attend. Towards the latter part of her time, when well enough, it was her constant practice daily to read a portion of the Holy Scriptures; and towards the close, when it was thought a few days would finish her existence here she remarked, 'I feel nothing in my way,' and a few days after she breathed her last, without sigh or groan, and is I trust, entered into the rest prepared for the righteous from the foundation of the world.

The Story of My Life.

In the fall of 1849, as he passed by the City Hospital in San Francisco, William Taylor felt an impression of duty to visit its inmates. His account of this service shows his perseverance in making his way against difficulties. He says:—

"I went immediately to the said hospital, and inquired for the physician who had it in charge, introduced myself to him, and told him the object of my call; to which he replied, 'I can readily appreciate your motives, but then you must know, sir, that we have very sick men in every room who could not bear any noise. Anything like singing or praying might greatly excite them and make them worse. I prefer you would not visit the wards, unless some particular man wishes to see you.'

"Well, doctor," I replied, "I certainly would not wish to do anything that would be injurious to any patient, but I have been accustomed to visit the sick, and think I so understand my business as to talk and sing and pray or do whatever may seem appropriate, not only without injury to any one, but in a manner that will even contribute to the improvement of their physical condition. By diverting their minds from the dark realities of their own condition and unhappy surroundings, and by interesting them in some new associations and themes of thought, I may impart to their minds vigor and hope, which unite with gathering strength and make successful resistance against disease. Those who are hopelessly diseased cannot receive much injury from my visits, while I may be instrumental in benefiting their departing souls. If you please, doctor," I continued, "you can go with me, or send a man to point out the men to whom you do not wish me to speak, and to see that I do no injury to any one."

"Said the doctor, 'I have no time to go with you, and nobody to send.'

"Another doctor present then added, 'It is not proper that he should go through the hospital.'

"At that moment an old man, who had been sitting in the office, listening to our conversation, said, 'Doctor, there are many sick men in the hospital who, I know, would be very glad to receive a visit from this gentleman, and, if you will allow me, sir, I will conduct him through the rooms.'

"The doctor replied, 'Very well. Take him up stairs first, and then down to the lower wards.'

"Aye, ay, sir," said the old tar, as he beckoned me to follow him up stairs. He introduced me to every patient in the house, and made a greater ado over my arrival at the hospital than if the alcade had visited them. I was first conducted through the pay rooms, the department of those who, in whole or in part, paid for their keeping. Many small rooms had but two to four men in them. Others, larger, had as many as twelve. I spoke to each patient, inquiring after their condition in health and the state of their souls. I then addressed a few words of sympathy and religious instruction to all in the room collectively, sang a few verses in a soft strain, and prayed in an audible but subdued tone, adapting the petition, as nearly as possible, to the wants of their individual cases as I had learned them, and so passed on, performing similar services in each room.

"My usual mode of visitation was to speak personally to as many as possible, inquire into their conditions and wants, bodily, spiritual and otherwise, act as amanuensis for the sick and dying, recording last messages to friends at home, get letters out of the post-office and convey them to the sick, carry messages to friends in the city, and, in very early days, when waiters were scarce, I often ministered to the bodily wants of the sick, dressed blisters, turned or raised patients, fixed their beds, gave them drink, and sometimes comforted the convalescing with a little of my wife's good home-made bread, and gave them such advice as I thought might be useful to them."

In his descriptions of his meetings, William Taylor relates many interesting incidents. On one occasion a large part of his congregation were Chinamen. A tall, intelligent-looking fellow called "Chippie" took out his pencil and noted down such thoughts as he understood. The next morning a clerk asked him to translate his notes into English. Said Chippie:—

"What call you him talk last night?"

"That was Mr. Taylor, of San Francisco."

He noted the name in his book, and looking and pointing upward, said, "What you call Him—the big Father, up there—what you call Him?"

"We call Him God," said the clerk.

He put that also in his journal. He then gave a translation of his notes. "Tell all men no gamble; tell all men no steal 'em gold; tell all men no steal 'em cargo; tell all men no talk 'em lies; tell all men to be good men."

That was the first sermon Chippie ever heard, and these were the ideas he gathered.

One morning, as he was going to an appointment for the street preaching, he saw a poor inebriate lying on his face in the sand. The plaza was a place notorious for rum-holes. When the crowd had gathered around him, he said to them, "You may find my text recorded on a sand bank in front of the General Jackson House on First Street." I had a good time, but worked up a great excitement among the rum-sellers.

At one time the text selected was "The fool hath said in his heart, 'There is no God.'" Of the sermon which followed he gives the following outline:

"Here is a watch my father gave me when I was a boy, holding it in my hand. 'He bought it from an old man by the name of Walkup, who, of course, recommended it to be a first-rate watch. I am not acquainted with its early history, but if I were to tell you that this watch had no maker, that some happy chance formed the different parts of its ingenious machinery, and that another chance put them together with the very useful design of a time-piece, you would call me a fool."

"To adopt such a conclusion, there is surely no such fool in this intelligent audience. But, remember, David's fool was not such. He was probably like some who drew nigh to God with their lips and honored Him with their mouths, but hid in their hearts, 'There is no God.'"

"The Holy Spirit is looking at each one of you now and listening to every pulsation of your heart, and were He now to reveal what has there passed this day, what shocking revelations He would make! It is not by the profession of the mouth, but by the conduct of men, that we are to learn the orthodoxy of their hearts. A nice gambler said to me but a short time since, 'When I came to California I had but twenty-five cents, but I had good luck playing cards, and by and by set up a monte-table, and I have been very successful.'" He said he was a member of a church, and professed to be very devout.

"A wretched rum-seller over here on Jackson Street emptied the pockets of a poor man wrecked his constitution, blighted all his hope for time and eternity, unstrung his nervous system, and when his poor victim was dying the tender-hearted rum-seller, full of sympathy for the suffering, sent in haste for me to come and pray for the poor man.

"These gamblers around the plaza here, when ever they shoot a man, go right off for a preacher to pray over their dead. One came for me to preach at the funeral of C. B., who had been shot the night before just there in that large saloon. He said, 'We thought it would be folly to bury the man without some religious ceremonies. It will be a comfort to his friend too, to know that he had a decent Christian burial.'

"I have buried three such within as man months. They profess a belief in God, but their conduct gives the lie to their profession."

At the conclusion of the services a strange proposal that they should take up a collection for the benefit of the preacher, but the proposal was negatived by Taylor, who said, "I cannot have my street preaching trampled by street collections."

After laboring for seven years in California William Taylor lost much of his means through a fire, and believed it best to return to the East and replenish his funds by the sale of books which he wrote. This was in 1856. Some of his books were very popular, the sales amounting to twenty-five thousand and thirty-thousand copies.

For several years he continued preaching in the States and in Canada. At a camp-meeting where many of the congregation had gone to sleep under the effects of a "lean" and length sermon, Taylor was called upon to exhort the audience, which he did as follows:

"Friends, these hard seats without backs are very uncomfortable places for sleeping, and yet you are in great need of sleep. After the exhausting services of the Sabbath and your short hours last night, you are sadly in need of sleep and in need of better sleeping accommodation than you can get on these hard benches, so advise you to repair to your tents at once, and in your comfortable home quarters take a good refreshing nap."

After laboring in the Eastern States and Canada for several years, William Taylor believed that it was the Lord's will that he should go and preach the Gospel tidings in Australia, and on the first of Fifth Month, 1862, sailed for England. His family returned to their old home in California.

After spending some months in Great Britain and visiting Palestine on his way, he reached Australia in 1863, and at once entered upon his evangelistic labors. These continued for six or seven years, and were attended with a large accession of members. About the time his labors in Australia and New Zealand were drawing to a close, his family came from California. He had intended going to India, but his oldest son was taken sick and, by the advice of the physician, he sailed for Cape Town in South Africa where he arrived early in 1866.

In South Africa, William Taylor labored industriously for about two years, visiting at preaching among the English settlers and different tribes of the nations, and with remarkable success. Thousands were added to the church membership. He was greatly assist-y Charles Pamela, a converted Kaffir, who acted as his interpreter, and also preached directly to the people.

Taylor returned to England in the latter part of 1866, and promptly entered upon his work of preaching. In the fall of 1867 his wife returned to California with the three younger children, that she might care for their education, and Taylor himself took passage for the West Indies, intending to spend a year there and then go on to Australia.

He labored among the different islands and Guiana. He found that the missionaries had considered the people to be so excitable that they were afraid of scenes of disorderly confusion. But by judicious management these were avoided. He records that on the island of Gevis, on the first night of his preaching there, a man came up with hideous groanings, and nelt by the altar, and got hold of the altar vils. "He was in for a big fuss. I went to him as first one. Said I, 'Brother, what is the matter? Have you got St. Vitus' dance?'"

"He said, 'No; no.'"
 "You want to come to Jesus, do you?"
 "Yes; yes."
 "You have to be saved by faith—faith cometh by hearing. Now, you listen and I will show you the way." He toned down."

From the West Indies Taylor went to Australia, where he spent about fourteen months, and in the latter part of 1870 went to Ceylon. L Lucknow he entered upon his East Indian work. As there were many converts at Bombay, he organized there a Methodist Church in 1872. One of the principles involved in it was that it was to be self-supporting, and not to depend for the payment of its expenses on any foreign association. Such congregations were formed in various parts of India, and the number of their members has since much increased.

In the fall of 1877, William Taylor and a rother went to South America. Here it seemed best to enter upon the work by establishing schools of a high grade, under the care of religious men and women, and the money received for the education of the children was expected to support the teachers. He adopted the plan of selecting suitable centres for educational work and obtaining pledges from the people for the assage-money of the teachers to South America and for their maintenance for a given time, until they became self-supporting. About a dozen schools were thus opened. The teachers are selected by Taylor.

The evangelizing movements of William Taylor were somewhat out of the usual course of procedure, and he was met with objections as to their irregularity. But at the Conference held in Philadelphia in 1884, he was very unexpectedly elected as a Missionary Bishop for Africa, with large powers as to freedom of action. Before the end of the year he had selected about thirty elders to join him in the mission and some twelve children. The party proceeded to St. Paul de Loando, on the coast, and established preaching stations at intervals in the interior, to the distance of one thousand miles. This winds up the narrative written in 1885. At the Conference of the present year, Taylor, on account of his age, was released from the appointment and another person put in his place, but we believe he is still working in Africa.

SCHOOLED IN SORROW.—Bearing a burden carefully is no sign that the burden is unfelt. It rather signifies that the bearer has been schooled by experience to his task. The first biting sorrow that comes to the Christian brings with it a train of trials which intensify his suffering. The world forgets him, he finds no real sympathy where he hopes to get it, he is chained by the loneliness. But in time he comes to learn that this is to be expected, with the world as it is. His next sorrow finds him none the less truly grief-stricken, but he has learned that there is an art of bearing up and being brave. He knows already that he must not expect to roll his burden off on a world absorbed in its own self. His burden rests more graciously on him. He shows the result of a hard course of training. But now the world owes him a new duty. It is to refrain from charging him with insensibility and an easy escape from grief. He who smiles through his tears has learned what true joy is, and he who steps lightly under a heavy burden has performed the duty of acquiring a new and Christ-like strength.—S. S. Tract.

FOR THE FRIENDS' Effects of Cold.

In 1892, Warborton Pike made a journey of exploration through a remote portion of the territory of the Hudson Bay Company, striking the waters of the Yukon River, which he followed down to a point near its entrance into the Pacific Ocean.

One morning in the middle of winter, in company with one of his party, he left the camp before daylight to hunt moose, leaving orders with the half-breeds to haul the loads to a place selected for a camp. The hunters separated, and Pike says: "I and two fresh moose tracks, but could not get a shot; and it was long after dark when I reached the island again, fully expecting to find the cargo all up, and the camp made. But there were no signs of anybody, excepting that the rifle which Seatz [his fellow-hunter], had been using, was stuck up in the snow, where the road left the ice and turned up the bank. With the aid of a hatch I examined the road, and saw that no sleigh had passed, and Seatz's snow-shoe tracks were leading down stream."

"It was only then that I realized how beautifully cold it was. I had eaten nothing since early morning, and had been sweating while running after the moose, always a bad thing to do in cold weather, as you are sure to get chilled as soon as you stop for a minute. I expected to find the camp close, so would not wait to light a fire, but left my rifle and started down stream at a run. I could never get warm again, although I had still ten miles to go; and my nose and cheeks were rather badly frozen before I saw the glare of the camp-fire through the trees. I found the half-breeds having a good time, sitting round the fire, rolled up in the blankets, drinking tea. They had got a moose camp about a mile, as they began to freeze, and could not get the dogs along quickly enough to keep themselves warm; so they had put a horse and made a fire as soon as they saw dry wood enough to camp with.

"In this extreme cold, it is never safe to let a man go into the woods alone, as he gets with an accident severe enough to cripple him, or gets wet by breaking through a weak spot in the ice, he is almost surely certain to freeze to death, unless he is very quick in getting a fire. In any case, he should always carry an axe in his belt, and plenty of matches, so that he may still have a chance if his wood fire is at hand. One of the greatest dangers lies in the fact that your fingers are likely to freeze, or at least become useless for lighting a match, as soon as you grasp the handle of an axe, and impede the free circulation of the blood, as a layer of ice is sure to have formed between the moose-skin and the inside lining of your mittens.

"At night we were comfortable enough, as we kept a big fire going. A cup of tea in the small hours of these glowering evenings, with the return of warmth and the prospect of a few more hours sleep, is one of the most pleasant recollections of northern travels."

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 23, 1897.

Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, have within a few months past been called upon to enter into serious feelings over the removal from their number of several of those whose labors and example have tended to confirm their fellow citizens in an appreciation of the precious truth held by the Society of Friends, and in conviction that true religion is a heart-changing work of the Spirit of Truth wrought out by submission to the operation of Divine Grace.

While partaking with his fellow-members in a sense of the loss which the militant Church has sustained in these removals, the Editor has felt the importance of those who have left behind giving heed to the conviction that an increased responsibility rests upon us to live in communion with God, as to bear his yoke, and be prepared to die with him, so that the work of the Church may still be carried on, and the gracious designs of the Almighty may not be frustrated through our neglect or inactivity. It is as we abide in Christ, the living vine, that we receive of the sap which it is from Him, and grow in grace and in power, as well as the mission with which we are severally intrusted.

May those who have mourned over the removal of valiant sons from this society of preparation, be refreshed and stimulated to increased watchfulness and faithfulness, so that the name of Christ may prosper in the earth, through their labors; and when the time of the resurrection shall arrive, they may feel that, through the mercy of God, they shall be received into one of those numbers, which our Saviour told his disciples He would prepare for them in Heaven.

The expressions of that Methodist Bishop, William Taylor, have proved so interesting to the Editor, that he was encouraged to append a brief notice of them to the minds of his readers. We believe that he was sincere in his desire to promote the spiritual welfare of the world, and that a blessing rested on his labors, in proportion to the fervency of his spirit. Yet we are not prepared in all respects to endorse his methods, and we would regard it as a great mistake for members of our Society to desert their own principles, and mode of action, in imitation of him. The Lord makes use of divers instruments in carrying on his work in the world, and we shall be most effective as we adhere to the Divine leadings. At the same time let us cherish that feeling of Christian charity, which can rejoice in the good effects, by whose wise ways are not as our ways.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Supreme Court has decided that the Dispensary law of South Carolina, at least so far as it entitles to prevent a citizen of the State from importing into the Commonwealth liquors for his own use, was in violation of the Interstate Commerce clause of the Federal Constitution, and therefore null and void.

UNITED STATES.—The Bureau of Statistics reports that the total value of the exports of merchandise from the United States during the Twelfth Month, 1890, was $117,227,102, as against $92,529,117 in Twelfth Mo., 1889, and, during the year 1890, $1,005,975,447, as against $821,960,136 in 1889.

George Wilson, Secretary of the New York Chamber of Commerce, in his annual report that during the fiscal year ending Sixth Month 26th, 1890, the total foreign commerce of the port of New York reached the enormous total of $1,033,074,216, an increase over the preceding year of $105,072,902. The total foreign commerce of the United States in this period was $1,897,858,490, an increase of $187,747,674. The bulk of the increase, therefore, was in New York. Only twice before has the foreign commerce of the port exceeded a billion dollars. Only once has the total for the last fiscal year been exceeded, and that was in the phenomenal year of 1892. In this year the foreign commerce of the whole country exceeded the amount of one billion dollars.

New York's relative share of the foreign commerce was greater in 1890 than in 1892.

The annual consumption of alcohol in this country amounts to $1,200,000,000; of cigars and tobacco, $600,000,000; a total of $1,800,000,000. The wage-workers spend about $600,000,000 a year on intoxicating liquors and narcotics. This does not include earnings, says the Chicago Tribune, is only a part of the harm done. Of 23,353 criminals in Massachusetts in 1890, 13,250 committed the criminal act under the influence of liquor.

New Year's statistic tables of the Beverly Journal show that the consumption of beer in High-land States during the past year has increased 23,629 barrels, while in Prohibition States it decreased 268 barrels over 1890. Prohibition Kansas sold but 6,039 barrels, while High-land Nebraska, with nearly 400,000 less population, sold 161,317 barrels—more than twice as fast as much.

The value of the mineral output for Montana for 1890 is as follows: Copper, $22,000,000; silver, $10,725,000; gold, $1,000,000; lead, $675,000; total, $35,300,000.

From the salt wells at Hamilton, Kas., 1,000,000 barrels of salt were obtained last year.

Haverhill, Mass., shipped 367,000 cases of shoes in 1890, the highest number on record.

It is long since the first snow-storm in Great Britain throughout Southern California for the past twenty-four hours. The snow on dry and hot hills are covered with snow and the streams are overflowing.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 540, which is less than the previous week, and 273 is less than the corresponding week of 1890. Of the 540, 237 were males and 299 females. 89 died of pneumonia.

64 of consumption; 40 of heart disease; 28 of diphtheria; 16 of convulsions; 15 of apoplexy; 13 of old age; 13 of inimitation; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of bronchitis; 12 of Bright's disease; 12 of cancer; 11 of typhoid fever, and 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

Consumption, 28, 95, 47, 48, reg, 110; a 113; coupon, 111; a 112; new 48, reg, 119; a 120; coupon, 120; a 121; 85, reg, 112; a 113; coupon, 114 a 114; currency 68, 100 a 105.

COTTON.—Middling uplands quoted at 71c, per lb. FEED.—Spot hams ranged from $11.00 to $11.50 per ton for export. Winter suet, $2.80 a $3.10; do, extra, $3.25 a $3.50; Pennsylvania roaster, clear, $4.25 a $4.40; do, do, straight, $4.50 a $4.65; Western winter, clear, $4.25 a $4.40; do, do, straight, $4.50 a $4.65; do, patent, $4.70 a $4.90; spring, clear, $3.75 a $4.20; do, straight, $4.25 a $4.50; do, patent, $4.55 a $4.75; do, favored, straight, high, 43c, 44c, extra, $4.25 a $4.50; do, clear, $4.25 a $4.50; do, straight, $4.60 a $4.75; do, patent, $4.85 a $5.00.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 92 a 92½c. No. 2 mixed corn, 26½ a 27c. No. 2 white oats, 23 a 23½c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 a 4½c; good, 3½ a 4c; medium, 3 a 3½c; common, 2½ a 3c; lambs, 4 a 5c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5½ a 5¾c; common, 5c; State, 4½c.

FOREIGN.—A correspondent writes to the London Times that the proverbial longevity of members of the British royal family is being maintained. The "Annual Monitor" just issued, gives the following return for the last three years: Average age at death, including all members who died in Great Britain and Ireland, from one year old to 101, 1893-4, 61 years, 5 months and 22 days; 1894-5, 57 years, 11 months and 18 days; 1895-6, 60 years, 6 months and 19 days.

The reports of the massacre of the British expedition in the territory of the King of Benin, in the Niger coast protectorate. All the whites but two and 243 native carriers were killed.

A British syndicate has received a concession of a million acres of gold lands in Dutch Guiana.

FRANCE.—The census in 1890 included 41,000,000 in 1872; to 58,000,000 in 1890, while during the same period Germany shows an increase from 41,000,000 to 52,000,000. During the past five years the population of the German Empire has increased 2,817,000, and France has gained but 153,000. The figures bear out Jules Simon's ominous statement that "the world is increasing in numbers, but not in soldiers into the field. But how will it be in twenty years? We are losing a battle every year."

A despatch of the 17th instant from St. Petersburg says: Yesterday a summons was sent to Berlin for Professor Bergmann, the distinguished German surgeon, to come to this city to perform an operation on the Czar to prevent the extension of an use of excessiveness which has appeared in the region of the cranium. This trouble is due to the blow inflicted by a Cautel Japanese up on the Czar, then the Czar-witch, when he was travelling in Japan in 1891.

The antiquity of legal methods is curiously illustrated in the official report on the history of the India famine district includes a population of 81,000,000, and that the number of manes employed on relief works will soon exceed 3,000,000. The prices of imported food in Bengal are high, traders taking advantage of the chance to make private fortunes. To the famine is added the black plague, which has spread from Bombay to Poona and Kurrachee and many smaller places, and thrown the native population into a frenzy of panic. It is estimated that nearly two-thirds of the population of Bombay has fled to country towns. A feature of the disease that was noted in Hong Kong and Southern China, while it is not so fatal as noticed in India, Swine, poultry and rodents appear to be very susceptible to the plague, and great numbers of them have died.

The coldest region on earth is the country around Verkhajank, in Siberia, says Panorama, where the thermometer sometimes falls 80 degrees Centigrade below zero (degrees Fahrenheit) below zero. The average temperature of First Month is 49 degrees Fahrenheit below zero. Notwithstanding this rough climate, more than 10,000 people inhabit that region as the air is generally calm and dry in winter, the cold is not felt very much. The variations of the temperature within twenty-four hours are very great in summer. In Fifth Month, for instance, the thermometer will sometimes rise to 85 degrees Fahrenheit during the day, and fall to freezing point a night.

Among the botanical specimens collected by the Cornell scientific party in Greenland, were some full grown forest trees less than three inches in height. The Chronicle has a despatch from Mendoza, Argentine Republic, stating that Zarbrigen, the Swiss mountain guide, who is accompanying the Fitzgerak expedition, which went to South America for the purpose of ascending Mount Aconcagua, in the Andes reached the summit of that mountain on the 14th instant. This is a feat never before accomplished. The height of the mountain is stated in the despatch to be 24,000 feet above the level of the sea, but according to Professor Guyot its altitude is 22,422 feet Aconcagua, is, however, the highest mountain in the Western hemisphere, and there are only eight other mountains in the world that exceed it in altitude.

DIED, at Coral, Michigan, Twelfth Month 28th, 1890 SARAH LEAVENS, of congestion of the lungs, in her second year, and being closely confined, and her home in the first of her lameness, she was the comfort and solace of her aged grandparents for several years before their death; and assisted also in later years in caring for her father and mother in their last illness. She was beloved by all her relatives and friends, and has left a brother and sister to mourn their loss. Her funeral services were held on the 29th inst., accompanied with much suffering when congestion set in. She bore it all with Christian patience and resignation to the Divine will. Near the close she earnestly desired to be released and he at rest, which was mercifully granted, and we humbly trust what is our loss is his eternal gain. A minister who visited her during her illness, says: "Her preparation for entrance to the heavenly mansion was undoubted, and she now rest from her labors, and her works do follow her."

1869.—Eighth Mo. 19th.—Morris and Ann Cope kindly made a way for us all to get to the Quarterly Meeting next morning. The natural mind did indeed shrink from this meeting, but there was no other way but to cry for help and press forward. Mary Ann Lloyd was quite lengthy in communication, then S. Cope arose with an earnest call to repentance and living into the Lord. Soon it seemed right for me to say, "What meaneth this lowing of the cattle and his bleating of the sheep I hear," believing some were holding back part of that which should be wholly given up, reaching toward heaven with one hand, and holding upon the world's cares and pleasures with the other, etc., with earnest desires that the Great Shepherd would gather the sheep, scattered upon the many mountains of Israel, and bring them into the narrow valley where each would esteem others better than themselves; seeking to be made of a reputation, like our Lord.

The Quarterly Meeting was good. M. A. L., V. Hutchinson and S. Harry appeared in testimony, and I had to refer to Nehemiah repairing the walls, being engaged in doing a great work. "Why should the work cease, while I save it and come down to you?" Working out our soul's salvation is indeed a great work, and to have a wall to build day by day round about our own habitation against the inroads of the enemy. We dined at Morris Cope's, and in the evening bid farewell to our kind hosts and rode to Benj. Manley's. I felt deeply interested in this large family. One son and five daughters at one, all grown up, and possessing religious possibilities. The language was, "Gather my aunts together, those who have made covenant with me, by sacrifice." It is those who enter into covenant with Him by sacrifice that are to be gathered unto Him at last, to be with his aunts.

Seventh-day went to dine with our aged friend, Joseph Chambers. He seemed very gentle, and his daughters weighty in spirit. One of them is George Sharpless's wife, and he kindly took us back to B. Maule's.

Next morning B. — went with us to Fallowfield Meeting. Words of encouragement flowed toward the little company, who assembled under many trials. We were kindly entertained till morning at Worthy Gibbons' at Coatesville, son of that worthy Friend, Hannah Gibbons. The family of many children interested our feelings, but I feared so much of the Spirit of the Lord was pressed down in their souls, though believed they were subjects of his continued visitations. Oh, that there were more cross-bearing Friends in that meeting! With a feeling of great thankfulness we rode homeward next morning, having laid the burden down and realizing indeed that hitherto the Lord had helped us.

Third-day being our Monthly Meeting, our minutes were returned with a reverent acknowledgment of this. Adoration, praise and thanksgiving be given unto Him, who did go with and before us, and accepted our feeble efforts to serve Him.

After her return from this visit, she thus wrote to a friend:

"PHILADELPHIA, Ninth Month 2nd, 1869.
"Again and again my mind has turned to thee so lovingly, for you were so kind to one just starting out on what seemed a long, heavy journey. Well, my dear, thou wilt be glad to hear the blessed Master did go with us, and accepted the feeble efforts of his handmaid to serve Him. Now, He gives such quiet, humble peace. "Hitherto the Lord has helped us," had to be my returning language, with some consideration also, as to the circumstances under which it was used formerly. I did not want to say it all in both meetings, but there seemed to be a 'must,' so I gave up and tried to have no will. You can find it in first Samuel, seventh chapter, and draw the comparison with the present times. Do we not desire that this people should offer the whole burnt offering? That the Lord would arise and 'thunder with a great thunder,' even by his Almighty power against the spiritual enemies of our Israel, that the pure Truth may prevail. Oh, that our cry may be yet more for this.

"Yes, my dear friend, the Lord has been so gentle with me. He did not show me more work beyond, but when one service was finished, led me, so unexpectedly, into another. Feeling that a visit could not well be denied to a Friend in Burlington, I went to spend First-day, when the Quarterly Meeting opened before me, and to remain seemed imperative. He gently showed me, 'Releaving the time because the days are evil,' and awakened me Second-day morning with the confirming language, Ephesians fifth chapter, first and second verses. We had a good Quarterly Meeting. Samuel Cope, in testimony, also John Stokes, and then William C. Ditzler, Henry Wood in prayer. My soul did magnify the Lord, on returning, for all his mercies. 'Great and marvellous have been his works,' indeed, and I felt last night just bowed at his feet, wanting to anoint them with love and thanksgiving.

"I thought I would like to share the spoil with thee, my dear, but perhaps I have written too freely. Now, if thy poor friend can only walk faithfully under the cross all day long in future, watching and waiting until his body will! You did indeed give the cup of cold water to one, who feel 'the least of these,' and may He give you the cup of salvation.

"Though I have written thus to magnify the Father's power, yet as dear I. Penington says, 'I feel daily weaker in myself.' Shall I quote his words, they are instructive to me often-times: 'I am a worm, I am poor, I am nothing, less than nothing as in myself, weaker than I can express or thou imagine; yet in the midst of all this, the life, power, righteousness and presence of Christ is my refreshment, peace, joy and crown.'

"Do we not want this to be our experience, my dear A.—, thus dwelling in the inward life? I feel that you know what it is, and may He preserve us all in the hollow of his Almighty hand. My love gratefully and kindly to you both. Thine affectionately,

"DEBORAH BROOKS."

In her diary she says: During the Tenth and Eleventh months of this year, our dear Friend E. A. visited the families of our North Meeting, and way seemed to open before me to accompany her, after many shrinkings and trials of faith. The language seemed to be, "What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder." We felt yoked together, and it was a privilege to be with her. Her ministry seemed like two arms of love, that reached around the individuals, and drew out all the good feelings in their hearts, so that we were often warmed and comforted together. Together, too, we descended into baptisms at times. Oh, it is weighty work to dare to speak to particular states. Our Lord helped and I had to feel thankful again and again to Him, who owned our feeble efforts to serve Him. After returning home, dear E.'s cup overflowed at times, and I had solid peace.

The following extracts are from a letter under date of Twelfth Month 22nd, 1869. Alluding to the visit to the families of North Meeting, she says, "Thou wilt be glad to hear we both feel peaceful. The 'penny of peace' is indeed a rich legacy when earned through so much humiliation. The dear Master did seem to go with and before us. . . . The visit has been a good say-er. We both partake of the feeling of being left out or unprofitable servants though—there is so much now, to excite our young Friends, and perhaps lead them on too rapidly to make 'confession with the mouth,' or as one dear Friend said, 'causing a desire in some unskillful ones to be doing something, rather than to be something.' Many feel it to be a serious time, and are bowed down in spirit, but I try to rest it with the Lord, feeling if it is of Him it will prosper, and if not, it will come to naught. The young plants need a loving, training hand, rather than entire coldness. S. L. was at our meeting yesterday, and spoke, commencing with, 'Praise waiteth for thee in Zion, O God of our salvation,' referring again and again to the words, 'and God saw that it was good,' saying that though we may have had bitter disappointments, yet they were for our spiritual progress, and in the end we would have to say, "His work in our souls was good." He called upon the elder Friends to draw the younger members nearer to them. This spoke my feelings so much. I think they are left too much to pass along without being able to realize that any one cares for them. O, to know myself how to do right! for more pure wisdom.—Wise as serpents and harmless as doves.

"I want thee to have a few crumbs from dear E's ministry—they may strengthen thee, my dear, sometimes. Once, after speaking of Mary's mourning the absence of her Lord, as she thought, but finding Him close to her, she went on to say that it was the children of the bride chamber that mourned for Him, not the children of the world; by that they might be encouraged to believe they did belong to Him, were his children, and He would manifest himself unto these in his own good time. At another time, in speaking of attending meetings, she spoke of the manna gathered day by day for the children of Israel, that whether they gathered much they had nothing over, or gathered little there was no lack—so it is with our Heavenly Father, whether He gives us much of his blessed presence in our souls when we meet before Him, or but little, still it will be just sufficient if we have only been faithful in gathering because He gives it, and all He gives is right. Holy and reverend be his ever blessed Name, saith my soul."

A WAY FOR MEN TO GET THEIR RIGHTS.—There are many people who are very anxious about their rights, but are not greatly concerned about their duties. But if every man does his duty every man is likely to get his rights. No people have had more trouble about getting their rights than the colored people of the South. But so long as they remain in ignorance and indulge in illness, whiskey drinking, and all sorts of sin and foolishness, they will find it difficult to get their rights or to get anything else; but when they attend to their duties their rights will be likely to be much more easily obtained.

Booker T. Washington, one of their representative men, speaking of the Industrial College over which he presides, says: "In proportion as we go on with this industrial teaching, you will find better relations coming about between the black people and the white people. The black man who has a mortgage on a dozen white men's houses will have no trouble in voting. The black man that has five thousand dollars to lend will not want for friends or borrowers among his white neighbors. The black man who spends five thousand dollars a year in freight charges on a Southern railroad will not be made to ride in a 'Jim Crow' car. Rather than put that black man in a 'Jim Crow' car and run the risk of losing his five thousand dollars in freight charges, a Pullman palace-car will be put on for him. It is a slower process than some would have it; but it is along these lines that we must look for the permanent solution of this problem."

And there are white men who are forever complaining about their lot and gambling about gold and silver, and capital and wages, who will never get any right, till they drop whiskey and tobacco, and betake themselves to the soil where God originally set man to work, and there in diligence, piety, and economy find the independence and comfort which they vainly seek through combination, strikes, and all the contrivances of an artificial and unhealthy life.—Late Paper.

From Slave to Bishop.

Abraham Grant, one of the bishops of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, was once a slave, part of the property of Franklin Raulerson, a Florida planter. Bishop Grant says: "When my master returned from the battlefield, he told my brother and myself that we were going to be free, and asked us to go to Columbus, Ga., with his brother-in-law to be sold, as it would help him out." The two men did not meet again until a few weeks ago, when the Bishop was presiding at a Conference in Tampa. F. Raulerson, anxious to see his old slave, but not having money enough to pay his railroad fare to Tampa, hitched up his horse and drove fifty miles to that city. The following report of the meeting of these two men in such altered circumstances of life is given by The Florida Citizen:

"The many memories which the meeting revived awoke tender feelings. Thoughts of the old days, when Grant was an unlearned slave and the master a prosperous planter, arose, and the present circumstances marked a strange contrast. The hand of time had fallen heavily upon F. Raulerson, and financial reverses had reduced him to poverty. Bent with age and clothed in humble garments, he sat in the presence of Bishop Grant, who had risen above his race and stood as an honored man in the ministry, with the comforts of life attending his high position.

"During their conversation Bishop Grant asked his old master if he could do anything for him. He told him that if he would leave Florida and go to his (the bishop's) home in Texas, he should be provided for during the remainder of his life; but this F. Raulerson declined, as he had a little home here and felt that he had but a short time longer to live. Before leaving the room he said to the bishop:

"Bishop, I have but a short time on this earth, and I want you to do something for me, if you can, when I die. I want you to perform the last ceremonies over me. Do you think that you can come and bury me?"

"Bishop Grant assured him that his wish would be granted, and that he would surely come. After the talk F. Raulerson was taken over to the church where the Conference was in session, and as the two men walked up the aisle together, arm in arm, a hush of expectation fell upon the congregation. As they reached the chancel rail they turned, and Bishop Grant introduced F. Raulerson as his former master. With tears coursing down his cheeks he spoke kind words of him, and called upon his brethren to look upon them at that moment as an example of the feeling that should exist between the races, for said he, 'We are all of one Creator and all of one image; we were raised together and should be brothers.'—Selected.

I CAN in truth say, that I never spent any money in my life more freely, or with more delight and satisfaction, than when I did to secure Truth and the necessities of the Lord's people; and this is the duty of all those upon whom is bestowed this world's substance; and when I have at any time observed men of ability in this respect, narrow-spirited and loath to part with their money upon such occasions, it has grieved me to the heart.—Joseph Pike.

The Story of My Life.

The following miscellaneous incidents will serve to further illustrate the character of some of the early Methodist preachers:—

William Taylor was requested to perform funeral services over the body of a Colonel Woodlief, who had been killed in a duel. I refer to it, he remarks, "It is not an easy task for a minister, in the presence of such an auditory and a weeping widow, to do justice to the cause of Truth and the feelings of his hearers. I once heard a minister preach at the funeral of an alderman in San Francisco, and though the man was known to be a notorious drunkard, and it was believed he had killed himself by hard drinking, he was held up by the minister in the presence of the mayor, court clerk, and a vast assemblage of citizens, as a paragon of moral excellence. The impression was conveyed that he had without doubt been admitted to glory because he was an honorable alderman of the city of San Francisco. My moral sensibilities were shocked. I would no unnecessarily hurt the feelings of bereaved friends, but thus to obliterate moral distinction in character and indorse such men, without repentance, as suitable subjects for the kingdom of Heaven, gives the lie to God's holy word and encourages sin. My fears for the effect of that sermon on the community were such that I was led, on the following Sabbath to preach to a large audience on the Plaza from this text: 'In hell he lifted up his eyes, being in torment

"On the occasion of Colonel Woodlief's funeral I said, My dear friends, you are doubtless all acquainted with the person and character of Colonel Woodlief, and the melancholy circumstances of his death. He was, by birth, a fellow-Virginian with myself, and was always I believe, regarded by those who knew him, as a high minded, honorable gentleman, and exceedingly regret that I cannot add, a Christian. He was one of my regular hearers on the Plaza, and was often deeply affected by the word of Truth. Some months ago, just after sermon there one Sunday afternoon, I said to him, 'Colonel, allow me to introduce you to Captain McDonald.' Taking him by the hand the Colonel said, 'I know the Captain very well, we fought side by side on the fields of Mexico.' 'Ah, indeed! and did you know,' replied, 'that the Captain has embraced religion since he came to California?' 'O, yes,' said he, 'I know that, too; he told me all about it.' 'Well,' said I, 'do you see what a great change it has wrought in him?' 'Yes,' said he, 'I see it.' His eyes filled with tears and his utterances were choked by strong emotion. When he could speak, he said, 'Don't talk to me on that subject, I cannot stand it.'

"That was a gracious moment for Colonel Woodlief. The Holy Spirit was touching the tender chords of his soul, and wooing him to ward the cross of Jesus. O, how sorry I at to-day that he did not yield to its blessed influence and become a Christian! Religion would have made him a happy and useful man and we would have been spared the mournful duty we are called upon to perform to-day. For had he possessed the love of God in his heart the probability is he would not have been challenged; and had he been, he would have acted under a higher code than that adopted by chivalrous though erring men. He would have exhibited a moral heroism, in standing for duty to God, himself, his wife and to society; at would have put to shame the moral coward that would engage him in mortal combat. O, at he had obeyed the calls of God's Holy Spirit! Then, had he died in the order of providence, we would stand around his body with very different feelings. We could then, indeed, mix a sweet solace into the bitter cup of the weeping widow. Beware, my friends, of jeering the Holy Spirit! Sack, while you say, God's pardoning mercy. Place yourself under His parental protection, as obedient children, that you may be saved from, or prepared for, the dangers and death incident to mortal life. Jesus Christ, your best friend, is waiting at the door of your hearts for an answer.

"On my first visit to Red Holes as Reid's successor, I rode up to the country chapel, latched my horse, and walked in, and there sat to old ladies. I introduced myself, and they said, 'No one expects the new preacher so soon; living to make two hundred miles from Constance on horseback, they can't be here for a fortnight yet.'

"Well, sisters, I am one of them, and I am free. Where are all your people?"

"All our men are engaged at a log-rolling quarter of a mile west of here. Some of the women are helping to prepare the supper for to log-rollers and the rest are at home."

"Well, sisters, I can't come all the way here to Red Holes for nothing, so I'll tell you what I will do; you go round and tell all the women in this neighborhood that the young preacher of the circuit, sent by the bishop, will preach here to-night at early candle-lighting, and let everybody come and hear his message. Meanwhile I will go to the log-rolling and tell all the men, and we'll have a crowd here to-night and good time. The dear old sisters walked up to subject and spread the news waded up."

"A log-rolling is a free thing, requiring length of muscle, but no ceremony of etiquette. I that country timber had no marketable value. When a farmer slew a forest the great trees were cut into logs about fifteen feet long, and when the chopping was all done and all the barked piles in heaps and burned, then the men felled many miles came by invitation and rolled to logs into great heaps so that they could be dried. So I rode up to the edge of the clearing, hitched my horse, and climbed the high "aked and ridered fence," and as I advanced the front I picked up a handspike and went to work, and exhibited my strength and superior skill in putting the big logs where they were wanted. I saw the mountaineers eyeing me, and talking in undertones, expressing great wonder who the stranger might be. I let them guess and wonder while I worked away till the day's job was nearly completed, and the men began to draw together within the range of my voice. Then I announced, The young preacher sits to your circuit by the bishop will preach here to-night. Get through with your supper as quickly as you can, and all come and hear the young preacher. He is two weeks in advance of time, but he is one of that sort, always trying to take time by the forelock."

"Are you sure the preacher has come?"

"O, yes, indeed; there is no doubt on that subject."

"Wonder if a great log-roller like you can b the preacher?"

"Come and see."

"Then they began a pretty free expression of their opinions, such as 'He's a tremendous fow to roll logs.' 'If he is as good in the u of the Bible as he is of the handspike he'll do.' 'He's the boy for the mountaineers.' 'Conson boys will hear the new preacher to-night.' In that afternoon I got a grip on that people more than equivalent to six months' hard preaching and pastoral work. We had a crowded house then and every time I presented at Red Holes."

Isaac Owen, a fellow-missionary of William Taylor, was stationed at Sacramento. Of him the following circumstances are related: A certain doctor, in those early days of California history, was collecting auto-biographical sketches, and, asking Owen to write, he penned the following: "Isaac Owen was born in Vermont, raised in Coarsage, on White River, in the wilderness of Indiana. Costumed in buckskin, fed on pounded cake; educated in a log school-house—the principal study in the course was Webster's spelling-book; converted to God in the woods; licensed to preach on a log; first circuit, then called Otter Creek Mission, embracing a part of five counties. Last heard of, a missionary to California, and on a review of his life, has no apologies to offer for having been born."

He did not study in collegiate halls, but had a thorough, practical education in real life, and his Greek Testament was his constant companion.

The Lord gave him extraordinary will-power from early boyhood, preparatory to his great work in California. I once heard Bishop Morris say of him, "Owen never gives up; he always does what he undertakes; if he can't do it one way he will attempt it."

When a little boy he was sent to hunt lost cows, and got lost himself away in the wild woods, in which wolves, wildcats and panthers roamed at large. Night was spreading its dark mantle over the scene, and the poor boy knew not which way to go. True to his character, as touched off by Bishop Morris in later years, instead of yielding to the excitement of fear, he stopped and set his genius to work to find his way out, which he did in a few moments. He cut a good hickory wither and caught hold of his dog and gave him a good flogging, and shouted as he let him go, "B— off home, you lazy dog; what are you doing here?" The dog cut for home as fast as his legs could carry him, and young Owen after him at the top of his speed. He thus got his bearings, and safely reached his home a little after dark.

In the course of Brother Owen's ministry in Indiana, he was stationed at Bloomington. Finding in his new and important station a rickety old frame house bearing the honorable name of the Methodist Church, Owen announced that the first work before them was to build a spacious, substantial brick church.

The people with united voice replied, "The thing, however desirable, is utterly impossible. The people have no money, and owing to the terrible draught of last year they have nothing to sell."

"Never mind," replied Owen, we are rich in men—men who are rich in mind and muscle. Don't oppose me, and inside of a fortnight we shall have the brick all provided for and the bricklayers to lay up the walls of the new brick Methodist Church of the city of Bloomington." He did it. A Christian man of Indiana, told me how Owen got the lumber for his new church in about the following words:

"My father owned a saw-mill ten miles distant from Bloomington. Being a good man and a liberal elder in the Presbyterian Church, he made a standing offer of a wagon load of lumber as a gift to any new church within ten or fifty miles from his mill near Lees Ferry, or doing as much as $80. Mr. Owen, a good Society father's Sunday school was about $100. He was invited to lay the stone of a newly prepared estimate of the amount of lumber which was necessary, and agreed to furnish the lumber and have my father saw the lumber on shares, and then to proceed to haul to give him the lumber of a man when making distance who had good timber and good teams."

"Father replied, 'The man must able to help his near neighbor, B—', but he is the bitterest enemy of the Methodists in all the country."

"Owen replied, 'I'll put B— at the head of my list. If he will give me a good description of logs delivered, all the rest will give in without a shot.' So they proceeded and made a complete list. Then Owen said, 'Now, elder, I want you to mount your horse and I go with me and introduce me to all these people.'"

"Indeed, Mr. Owen, I can't today, it is getting late and it can't be done to-day. You must come again, and I will see what I can do for you."

"Owen replied, 'My dear sir, I have only this afternoon to devote to this whole business.'"

"Just then I entered, and father said, 'Here's my son; he'll go with you!'"

"The thing was explained to me, and my horse being hitched to a limb, I said, 'Come on,' and we mounted our horses."

"Owen said, 'Take me straight to B's house. I'll get him to haul my list.'"

"So we rode to B's gate and called, and were told that the gentleman was not at home."

"Owen said, 'I am very sorry to miss him. I hope we'll meet him by the way.'"

"We had not proceeded far till I saw him on horseback, we ting us."

"Owen said, 'Don't introduce me, just let me manage him.'"

"As we got near, Owen jumped off his horse, and ran up shouting, 'How are you, Brother B?' My name is Isaac Owen, the Methodist preacher who is building a new brick church in Bloomington. The people have no money, so we can't willing hands to do all the work. The bricks and brick-work are all provided for, and I have just arranged with the elder, your good neighbor, to saw all our lumber, and I'm just on my way to get the men around here, who have good timber and good teams to put down all the logs needed at the saw-mill. I learn that you have the best timber and the best teams in all this region, so I have come to you to head my subscription and set an example for your neighbors. Some of them, you know, are as close as the bark of their trees, and would keep me talking for an hour, at when they see your name at the head of my list, they will all give in at once."

"Bob did not hesitate a moment after Owen was through, but signed for the delivery of the biggest bit of logs of any man in the country, and was the first to cut, haul and deliver, as per agreement."

"Just as Owen had said, every man he called on signed for the logs asked for without a word of discussion."

"Owen got all his lumber haul'd to Bloomington in the same way. When his saw for his free load of lumber my father said to all church build'rs in that region, he brought the biggest six-horse team and waded in the country, and nearly cleared the land-eyars! My father said, 'Owen is the man to rely on.' The Baptists would have come with a two-horse wagon and put on half a load for fear of over-taxing my generosity; but Owen has faith in me, and hence is not afraid of exceeding my liberality."

A NEW YEARS HYMN.

For bud and for bloom and for balmy-laden breeze,
For the singing of birds from the hills to the seas,
For the beauty of dawn and the brightness of noon,
For the light in the night of the stars and the moon,
We praise thee, gracious God.

For the sun-ripened fruit and the billowy grain,
For the orange and apple, the corn and the cane,
For the bountiful harvests now gathered and stored,
That by thee in the lap of the mother are poured,
We praise thee, gracious God.

For the blessing of friends, for the old and the new,
For the hearts that are trusted and trusting and true,
For the ones that we love, for the light of the eye,
That warms with welcome and gleams with good-ye,
We praise thee, gracious God.

That the desolate poor may find shelter and bread,
That the sick may be comforted, nourished and fed,
That the sorrow-worn ease of the sighing and sad,
That the spirit-lit hearted soul may be lifted and glad,
We pray thee, merciful Lord.

That brother the hand of his brother may clasp,
From ocean to ocean in friendliest grasp,
That for north and for south and for east and for west,
The horror of war be forever at rest,
We pray thee, merciful Lord.

For the blessings of earth and of air and of sky,
That fall on us all from the Father on high,
For the crown of all blessings since blessings began,
For the gift, the "unspeakable gift" of thy Son,
We praise thee, gracious God.

PER PACEM AD LUCEM.

I do not ask, O Lord, that life may be
A pleasant road;
I do not ask that Thou wouldst take from me
Aught of its load;

I do not ask that flowers should always spring
Beneath my feet;
I know too well the poison and the sting
Of things too sweet.

For one thing only, Lord, dear Lord, I plead:
Lead me upright—
Though strength should falter and though heart should bleed—
Through Peace to Light.

I do not ask, O Lord, that Thou shouldst shed
Full radiance here;
Give but a ray of peace that I may tread
Without a tear.

I do not ask my cross to understand,
My way to see;
Better in darkness 'tis to feel Thy hand,
And follow Thee.

Joy is like restless day; but peace divine
Like quiet night;
Lead me, O Lord, 'till I no longer shall shrink—
Through Peace to Light.

—Holy Family.

"He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might He increaseth strength. Even the youths shall faint and be weary, and the young men shall utterly fall; but they that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength; they shall mount up with wings as eagles; they shall run, and not be weary; and they shall walk, and not faint"—(Isaiah li: 29-31).

"First ye in the Lord ever; for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength"—(Isaiah xxvi: 4).

"PENS, like Plato and Fenebon, maintained the doctrine so terrible to despots, that God is to be loved for his own sake, and virtue to be practised for its own inherent loveliness."—Bancroft.

Notes of a Trip in the North Carolina Mountains.

I was much interested always in noting peculiarities of speech. For instance, people seeing I was a stranger, were generally curious to know my name. Sometimes they would put the question point blank; sometimes a little feeling of delicacy, probably, would make one say, "Think you're a stranger to me; what might your name be?" And at times this curious circumlocution would be employed, "Hit appears to me I've seed you before; what might your name be?" In reply to some statement causing surprise, a woman said, "Now you tell me!" A lunch was called a "snack." At bed time, the regulation expression was, "If you want to lay down, the bed is ready." At meals the milk pitcher was invariably tendered with the set invitation, "Pour for yourself." The word it was generally strongly aspirated at the beginning of a sentence; that is, pronounced hit. On the Tennessee border, the usual salutation was, "Howdy?" or doubled, as I once heard it, "Howdy-howdy?" Places of worship I often heard called Church-houses,—marking a distinction between the church and the building in which the church meets, quite gratifying to the Friendly mind. Probably the most characteristic word of the mountains was plum, which appeared to find a place in almost every sentence. It seemed to have at least two significations: one being straight, as "plum through to Asheville;" the other entire, as "I travelled the plum mountain." Every collection of human habitations was called a settlement or settlement, with the accent strongly on the last syllable.

One day the customary solitariness of my journeying was pleasantly varied by coming unexpectedly upon a concourse of several hundred people, gathered and gathering upon the banks of the Caneey River, to witness a "baptizin'" as they called it. It was a broad, shallow river, flowing swiftly between low banks, to which the bare, open hills on each side dipped gently. Along the great road that wound over the hills and crossed the stream by a ford, the people were coming in wagons, a-foot and on horse-back, (one woman, I noticed, on a pillion behind a man), men, women and children, all dressed in their best. It was a striking scene—the rippling waters sparkling in the sunshine of the beautiful summer day; the green, sloping hillsides; the great throng of moving people on the shore; the horses and vehicles lined up along the banks. I did not wait to see the ceremony performed, but was told about twenty, boys, girls and young people, were to undergo the rite, and be dipped in the river.

Asheville is beautifully situated near the confluence of the Swannanda and French Broad rivers, in a great basin, whose rim is a circle of high mountains, from which, in summer, a cool air usually blows, tempering the heat. The place is quite a summer resort for people from the low country of the South; while in winter its mild, dry atmosphere attracts many from the North, who wish to escape the severity of our rigorous climate at that season. Indeed the place might not be inaptly called a city of hotels and bathing-houses. Some of the former being palatial in size and appointments. One of the regulation sights for visitors is Biltmore, situated about a mile out of the city—an estate of almost baronial proportions, with a magnificent mansion; the property of one of the Vanderbilt family. More interesting to me, however, was Court-house Square, in the older part of the town. Here on a slight elevation stands a picturesque, cupolaed court-house, (Asheville is the County-seat of Buncombe County). Its walls decorated with an accumulation of notices and posters, in many sizes, colors and shapes. Around this square the native life of Asheville ebbs, flows and stagnates. Here are groups of listless idlers, of whom a large proportion are colored; team of various and curious sorts congregate about the little grass plot, or more slowly by; vendors of quack articles ply their noisy trade among groups of interested but rather penniless auditors; and here the auctioneer's bell calls to sales. Just round the corner are the markets where there is much to be seen new to Northern eyes. Indeed Asheville is in one respect some thing of an education. In its streets, the Old South and the New meet, and the contrast serves to emphasize the advance in an outward way that is going on there. Side by side in the same thoroughfare we may see the trolley-car and the mountaineer's canvas-covered wagon, drawn by oxen, or perhaps by an ox and a mule. In the great hotels, the telegraphic records of the markets of the world are on file daily for the benefit of the guests; at the curlstone, the mountain squatter with his wide-brimmed hat flapped up in front, stands by his rickety team patiently awaiting customers for his bushel or two of peaches, or it may be a load of wood. To these poor people, rather than to the prosperous, one's thoughts return again and again. To the pleasure-seeking visitor, taking his daily drive to the mountains or the river, they are interesting in a picturesque sort of way, an Asheville would lose something of its attractive ness if they were gone; but there is a world of pathos in their homely faces, and scanty, dilapidated belongings—the more so, because they bespeak not merely poverty, but a pitiful incapacity. In the midst of the growing, modern city, they remain like relics of an age that is past—driftwood left high and dry upon the bank by the remorseless stream of material progress. S.

PHILADELPHIA, Twelfth Mo. 24th, 1896.

In polite society it used to be customary to deny one's self, and "not at home" was a fashionable mode of lying. This habit has, we trust come to an end, but many of the compliments still exacted by etiquette may come under the same censure. Men who hate each other as full of "My dear sir," and call themselves "obedient servants" of persons whom they regard with supreme contempt. These are mere straws, but they show how the wind blows.

However much falsehood may be tolerated by society, it is none the less loathsome to ever pure-minded man; but it is not one whit less abominable in the sight of God because men combine to keep it in countenance. It's most horrible form is seen when professing Christians become double-tongued and have one voice in religion and another voice in common conversation. Who is not disgusted with lips candied with affected love, and yet bitten with malicious hate? It is dreadful to speak like a saint at one time and like a devil another. We have known persons who have talked so unctuously of Divine things in religious meetings that they have won a high reput for godliness out of doors, while at home under the little provocations of common life, they have habitually raved and stormed, and let her children and servants a sorry life. This thing deserves no quarter. Occasionally we read of fictitious experiences, and listen to wonderful narratives of events which never occurred, this also is execrable.

Actions have as plain a voice as words, and here is a duplicity of life which is quite as evil as verbal falsehood. Many characters are double tongued. Spence said of Lady Mary Wortley Montague, that she was a shining character, but like a camel she is all irregularity, and always wandering." He calls her "the most rise, most imprudent, loveliest, most disagreeable, best natured, cruelest woman in the world." These forms of practical contradiction are common; some are intolerably liberal, others are grogious advocates of peace, or intemperate upon intemperance. We have known persons who were rashly slow, and imprudently wise, hot and cold in five minutes. You would think he man to be two persons till you revised your opinion and reckoned him to be nobody at all because one side of his character neutralized the other. Nothing is more sad than to see hat things do not tally in a man's character. We have known great pleaders for generosity who were themselves miserably stingy. We are heard of persons who have been wonderful ticklers for "the truth," meaning thereby a certain form of doctrine, and yet they have not regarded the truth in matters of buying and elling, and with regard to the reputations of her neighbors, or the incidents of domestic life. "These things ought not to be." If by peaking the truth we shame the devil, we must be consistent in it as long as we live, or surely he devil will shame us.—Chas. Spurgeon.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

At the Spring.

"The nearer the spring the clearer the stream." How true these words have seemed to me. Where is Christianity purer, simpler and truer, than at the spring, or beginning of Christianity, when our dear Lord, Jesus Christ was upon earth, and taught men to be Christians? No one else has ever lived his perfect, Christian life. He was the spring or beginning of Christianity. And his followers seemed to increase and flow on, as the river widens from the spring, widening and widening until it runs into the great ocean. As it leaves the spring it is pure and sparkling, but as it advances it is corrupted, until it is muddy and no more a clear, beautiful stream; and as it empties into the ocean it has gathered all the waste and corruption it found in its way, and gives them to the ocean, which receives all the waters of the rivers when they are corrupted and through their course. So it is with the ocean of life; it receives all the rivers and corruption of life; all the joy, sorrow, crime and corruption of generations. But the spring is the beginning, when all is pure and innocent, ere life has been contaminated by sins of the world.

But we are glad there are many souls who are always seeking the pure water at the spring and not seeking new things in the river of corruption. Many will always keep out of a corrupted current and seek a life higher than drifting with the current and seeking luxury. 'Tis dangerous to drift, unless God's arm upholds us; but we must swim and escape the dangers of life. It has always been when luxury and dissipation rule a country it must fall.

If we would have the pure water, we must go back to the spring, where it has not been corrupted by earthly matter. And is it not so with religion? If we want the very purest and truest must we not go back to Jesus Christ, the teacher and living example of God's religion? Can anyone say that there has ever been a better teacher, or one more inspired than Jesus? And as his teachings were spread through the world, have we not seen them being made less pure and simple, the farther they got from the time of Christ? And so the river of religious thought would run on until it became corrupted and a reform must come, and the world must go back to the spring again for pure water, and a new river would be started, always purer and clearer at the beginning; but again, as it flowed along, it would gather the corruption from the world and become more worldly until again reformers would arise and go back to the spring, and leave the corrupted waters. Thus it is history repeats itself.

Every reform aims for a more Christ-like life; but it is the worldliness that, in time, fills the new river with corruption. And as the fabled Phoenix arises from its ashes and soars upward, so must the religions of the world. For some who do not arise, drift, on into atheism. So let us keep near the spring, the source of living water.

Do we not see it the same in politics, the longer one party is in power the more corrupted it becomes, until a reform comes about, and the old party must die to make room for the new.

A new spring will bubble forth, where all will be purer and truer, with nobler aims for God and humanity. It is always the noblest motives that start a reform. But as it, like a river, flows on, it is corrupted in time by the self-interest and worldliness of the world, until it becomes so corrupt that another reform is necessary to take politics back to a Christian stand-point, to go back to the spring, where the water is clean and pure.

Man may advance intellectually, but let us remember that spiritually we can never advance beyond or know a religion better than that of our Saviour Jesus Christ. He always has been, and always will be, our greatest human teacher.

MARTHA SHEPARD LIPPINCOTT,
MOORESTOWN, Burlington Co., N. J.

If it may be permitted to one not in membership with any religious organization thus to speak through the columns of THE FRIEND, I wish to say that on reading a recent article in that journal, by which I understand that the students, or some of them, have asked permission of the officials of the Westtown Boarding School to allow them to play a game in competition with other students, I feel that I only speak the truth when I say that all within me capable of feeling, was filled with desires that those officials may be firm, immovable, and allow no such thing to take place. And to the dear young people I would say, though one thousand miles separate you and me, my hope is that you may come to see the impropriety of such a course. For it seems clear, no doubt, to your superiors, as it does to your absent and unknown friend, that when an amusement, though in itself innocent, becomes so applauded by the fashionable, if not to say the ungodly and irreverent, that seek only the glory of this world, that it is made an evil of the first magnitude. It is better that it be at once buried in the gulf of oblivion, and remembered no more forever.

From the pen of one that feels that he does love the principles of the Society of Friends.

The True Inwardness of the Canvas.

[N]ot that the election is over, and it is possible to refer to the principles that have been at stake, without being suspected of having any electioneering purpose, we propose to place before our readers occasional articles which may tend to remove the mist which have clouded the intellectual atmosphere. The following article, by Henry Charles Lea, appeared in The Independent, and appears to be worthy of serious thought. The Editor does not hold himself responsible for all the statements it contains. [Ed.]

"It has appeared to me that in the present canvass attention has been strangely diverted from the real significance of the movement of which Mr. Bryan is the personification. The issues which are prominent on the surface have been discussed with unsurpassed ability, and if this campaign of education, which has been so active in the press and on the stump, does not succeed in winning, it will be because of a deep-flowing current of prejudice and passion which has been unobediently allowed to gather strength. Yet to the thoughtful observer the tendencies which have resulted in this unexampled struggle have been growing for years, and were bound to seek expression in action as soon as a favorable opportunity should present itself.

"The chronic unrest and revolt against existing social conditions so prevalent in Europe, which have given rise there to so much anxiety and so much energetic repression, have been gradually but surely spreading among our people. To one who can read the signs of the times, there have been ample indications of this, although with the happy optimism which is one of our national characteristics, they have been carelessly overlooked. The Wheel and the Grange in the West and South developed inevitably into the Populism. In the North and East the theories of Henry George commanded for him some eighty thousand votes when he ran for the majority of New York.

"The phenomenal circulation of Edward Bellamy's wild romance, 'Looking Backward,' and the attempted formation of associations to promulgate its visionary schemes, were an evidence of the prevalence, even among the reading classes, of the vague yearning for impossible social conditions. Learned professors and clergymen have aided the movement, keenly alive, as they are, to the defects of existing conditions from both a sociological and a Christian point of view, and too impatient to recognize, in the gradual rise of wages, the shortening of the hours of labor, the fall in the rate of interest and the cheapening of products, that labor is slowly but surely winning in the struggle with capital, and that the future is full of hope, that natural causes, if left to themselves, will diminish social inequalities and raise the standard of living throughout the whole population so that all shall share in the benefits derived from man's increasing control over the physical forces. The organizations known as trusts and syndicates, inseparable from the immense expansion of modern industry, have served as the target of virulent denunciation, and have lent added stimulus to discontent, though it would be difficult to point out in what they have heightened the burdens of the poor by raising the cost of the necessaries of life. They have afforded, however, a convenient text for the declamation of demagogues against plutocrats, and their methods in connection with legislation have given grounds for animosity, though it is observable that the most obnoxious of all syndicates of plutocrats, the silver mine owners, whose control of the Senate has brought untold miseries on the whole land, has escaped attack by craftily utilizing the socialistic tendencies as its instruments for the enhancement of its profits.

"Anarchism and socialism are antagonistic; but as both aim at the subversion of the existing order they can join hands for that purpose, content to struggle subsequently for supremacy. The lawless spirit which is the essence of anarchism, has been spreading among our people, and there is ample evidence that its growth has become one of the dangers to be reckoned with. The increase of lynch law is a significant symptom; the vast development of the tramp nuisance, unknown until within the last few years, with its constantly multiplying cases of violence and disorder, is a still more portentous manifestation; and its organization into Coxeyite bands showed how large are the numbers of those eager on any pretext to lead a life of idleness by preying on the industrious. Mob-rule as exhibited in the Homestead disturbances and the Chicago riots has become so dignified as an expression of the so-called rights of labor, that its justification thinly veiled, finds a place among the principles promulgated by one of the great political parties, and its suppression is denounced as a crime to be prevented by violating or amending the Constitution.

It is easy to trace the steps by which these disorganizing elements have been able to assume their present threatening position. In the canvass of 1892 the skillful managers of the Democratic Party obtained success by amalgamating in support of Mr. Cleveland all the dangerous classes of the land; Mr. Cleveland cemented this unholy alliance by his disgraceful letter of sympathy with the Homestead mob. In his inaugural address he lifted his voice in denunciation of plutocrats, and in his first message he pandered to socialism by recommending an income tax to be levied on certain special aggregations of capital. Too many contradictory pledges, however, had been accepted by him for all to be kept; he suppressed the Chicago riots and was firm on the silver question. The Democracy was thus split into two factions; its socialistic and anarchistic elements had achieved national standing by their recognition in the canvass; denied a portion of the promised reward they set to work vigorously, but secretly, to capture the organization of the party. In this they were assisted by the money and brains of the silver-mine owners, but still more by the distress which has overspread the land through the destruction of confidence following the election of 1892, aggravated by the impending menace of silver monometalism, and through the famous and cruel revenue legislation of the successful party. Empty stomachs and cheerless fire-sides furnish a fruitful field for the agitator and the demagogue; when millions in enforced idleness feel the pressure of want they listen eagerly to the promises of the political mountebanks and charlatans, and are recklessly ready for a change, no matter of what kind; for they argue that the future cannot be worse than the present. It is this class, combined with the fallow ones of Debs and Sovereign, chafing under its defeat at Chicago, that forms the unknown quantity in the existing political equation. On this the hopes of the pseudo-Democracy are based, as may clearly be recognized in the multitudinous speeches of Mr. Bryan. The question of protection he ignores; silver occupies a constantly diminishing space in his rhetoric; his efforts are more and more directed to stimulating class hatred, to exciting the poor against the rich and to undermining respect for the wholesome restraints of law.—

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Penn Parchment.

At a council held in the office of the agent of the Kiowa and Comanches the thirty-first of First Month, 1874, at which I was present, Captain Black Beaver, a Delaware Indian, in addressing the Kiowa and Comanche chiefs, said: "The Quakers are your friends; their Father made a treaty with the Indians more than two hundred years ago, in which both parties had bound themselves, and their children after them, to be friends to each other forever. His words were, 'While sun and moon shall endure, grass grow, and water run.'

"This treaty has never been broken; the Indians have never taken any Quaker's blood, and the Quakers have always been true friends to the Indians. I am not telling you this from heresy; though this treaty was made so long ago, a copy of it has been kept by my people—my own eyes have seen it and my own hands have held it. Our grandfather at Washington knew about this treaty, and for this reason has sent the Quakers among us. He knew they would do right by his red grandchildren."

Afterwards, in conversation with Captain Black Beaver, at his own home on the Washita River, where he had a large farm, I inquired particularly about the copy of the treaty Wm. Penn gave the Indians. As he had seen it, and held it in his hands, I would like to see it and hold it in my hands. In answer to my inquiry he gave me the following account. He said: "When Wm. Penn gave it to them, he told them to keep it for their children, who should live after them. They accordingly placed it in the hands of their principal chief, for its preservation. Other treaties as they were made were deposited with him, but this he kept separate and distinct from the others. When this chief died these documents were taken care of by his successor. Afterwards, when other treaties were made, as this treaty of Peace and Friendship made with Wm. Penn concerned several tribes, they, in a general council selected a person to have especial care of this first, or as they called it, 'Great Treaty.'"

On his death another was chosen, and so it continued to be preserved for many years by persons selected in a general council. Eventually, as the different tribes became scattered, the Delawares retained possession of it, and it was preserved by them as it had been before, the tribes in council making choice of a reliable person to take care of it. As time passed on and the tribe was removed westward, this copy fell into his hands, and he had it in his possession until the breaking out of the Civil War. He was then living on the north side of the Washita River, where the Wichita Agency was afterward located.

While on his visit to a sister in the Chickasaw Nation, he learned that an officer whom he had known during the Mexican War was in command of a neighboring fort (I think either Fort Arbuckle or Fort Washita), and went to make him a visit. Here he first learned of the accession of the Southern States.

As the Chickasaws and Choctaws, by whom the Fort was surrounded, were slave owners, the commander of this garrison found himself completely hemmed in by Southern sympathizers, if not actual abettors, so that he saw no way to escape with his force from his embarrassed condition. He laid his situation before Captain Black Beaver, who knew the whole country well, calling upon him to help him out of his difficulty. The Captain at first objected on account of the exposed condition his own property, principally cattle and ponies, would be in, and the loss he might be liable to sustain if he did not remove it to a place of safety.

On being assured by the commanding officer, (whose name I do not recollect), that Government would fully reimburse any loss he might sustain while endeavoring to rescue Government troops and property from evident destruction, he finally agreed to make the effort to conduct them to a place of safety. This, from his intimate knowledge of the country and acquaintance with the wild tribes at the westward and northward, he was enabled to successfully accomplish, although it necessitated an absence of several weeks from his home.

Soon after setting out, on his return he met with his neighbors, the Wichitas, Caddoes, and a few families of Delawares fleeing from their homes in consternation.

The Chickasaws and other slave-holding Indians having invaded their country, had burned his buildings, laid waste his farm, and taken his stock. Thus rendered destitute and homeless, not daring to return, he remained with these friends on the Arkansas River, in Kansas, until the war closed, at the place where Wichita City now stands, which received its name from these Indians, being so long encamped there.

After the war was over he returned with these Indians to their old homes on the Washita River. Finding his old home entirely desolated and overgrown with brush, Capt. Black Beaver made a new farm on the south side of the river, about three-fourths of a mile from his former residence, where he was living when I knew him.

In the destruction of his old home, the Penn Parchment, so long and so carefully preserved by the Delawares, was burned. Captain Black Beaver instituted a claim on the Government to indemnify him for his loss. This was supported by the testimony of the officers of the rescued garrison, and after several years' delay, he was officially informed that Congress had appropriated twenty thousand dollars to cover his claim; but what became of it he never knew, as not one dollar of it ever came to him.

A daughter and a nephew of Captain Black Beaver attended the school at the Wichita Agency during the eight months I was engaged in it. The daughter, Lucy, afterward married a white man by the name of Osborn, who was killed in his cornfield during the battle of the Washita River in 1874. The nephew (soldier), perished in the flames when the first school-house erected at the Wichita agency was burned.

THOMAS C. BATTERY.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Third Annual Report of the Barclay Home Association.

The Managers of the Barclay Home present to the Corporation the following report of the third year of the Institution, knowing it to be brief and incomplete, as we cannot give a detailed account of the obstacles that have been encountered, and of the help that has been received.

The family has varied much in size during the year—one Friend has been added to the list of permanent boarders, and a large number of transients have been accommodated, some for meal only, while others have remained for months. In the summer the house was full for several weeks. At present there are six regular boarders, and two persons have engaged board or the winter.

It is with feelings of sadness that we have to record the removal by death of two members of our family, both of whom had become endeared to those having intercourse with them during our stay at the Barclay. Matilda Shourds, ofaddonfield Monthly Meeting, N. J., died after a protracted illness, on the sixteenth of Second month, 1896. Several months previous to her death, she informed a friend she felt "it was rough the hand of the Great Master that she was open to come here."

Anne B. Pitfield, formerly of Philadelphia, died third of Fourth month, 1896. This dear friend was suddenly summoned to her heavenly home, only living one week after having been stricken with paralysis, but we reverently believe she was found with her lamp trimmed and burning.

We continue to rent and occupy the commodious house, No. 326 North Walnut St., West Chester, Penna., and while it has many advantages, especially for the summer, it has some disadvantages which were explained last year as follows:

"Its wide halls, high ceilings and large rooms, overawing inviting to visitors and pleasant to the occupants, make the heating an expensive item, and in various ways it is not so well adapted to the needs of a boarding home as one planned and built for that purpose might be. Therefore we wish most earnestly to impress on the Corporation, and through it, on the rest of our friends in the Yearly Meeting, the desirability of raising a building fund sufficient to warrant the erection of a permanent home."

Donations of money, provisions, etc., have been regularly reported to the Executive Committee by the Treasurer and the Matron as received, including the amount collected for the purpose of paying the rent of a telephone for the year ending Seventh month last, 1897; sheets, jewels, etc., from the Needlework Guild; carpet, triniture, newspapers, poultry, vegetables, fresh and canned fruits have been received. The provisions have added very acceptably to the variety of the food, and all these valuable donations of articles enable us to use these of cash wherever they are most required.

In times of sickness we find our expenses much increased, and feel that so far we have applied the needs of our invalids; but that our ability to do so has been largely through the generosity of Friends interested in individual cases or in the general welfare of the Home.

We regret that it is impossible for us to express our gratitude to each person who has in any way increased the comfort of the Barclay, and we ask our annual contributors who so substantially help us, to endeavor to get others to join with them in the good work of assuring the fanagers a definite sum each year. We heartily appreciate the donations and kindly interest of those who may feel they have little to spare, and desire them to remember that the least offering may be the one needed at the time, and as acceptable in the sight of our Heavenly Father, as the greater ones.

The Treasurer's report shows the financial condition of the Home to be as follows:

Balance in the Treas'y, Twelfth Mo. last, '95, $573.30
 Annual Subscriptions, $ 250.00
 Contributions for general purposes, $ 62.00

Receipts from boarders, etc., for 1896,	$ 1,075.75
Entrance fee,	100.00
Interest on investments of $1000,	100.00
Total receipts for 1896,	$ 1,275.75
House rent, for 1896,	$ 250.00
Room rent,	2.00
Household exps., including salaries,	1,000.00
Total outlay,	$ 1,252.00

Balance on hand Twelfth Mo. last, 95, $ 23.75

We have examined the account of Mary E. Eldridge, Treasurer of the Barclay Home, compared her payments with the vouchers and found them correct, there being a balance, Twelfth Month last, 1896, of three hundred and fifty-five dollars and thirty-two cents ($355.32, in her hands, due the Barclay Home.

THE FRIEND.

FIRST MONTH 30, 1897.

In common, we suppose, with the great bulk of the well-disposed and thoughtful people of the United States and Great Britain, we have been interested in the negotiation of a treaty between these two countries, providing for the settlement by arbitration of disputes which may arise, instead of referring them to the horrible alternative of war.

In the glow of satisfaction which arises from the successful completion of negotiations which had been in progress for nearly two years, it is wise to remember the Scripture testimony that wars and fightings arise from the lusts that war in our members, and to realize that, next to the immediate interposition of Divine mercy, the surest safeguard against the evils of war, is the maintenance of that Christ-like spirit which breathes peace on earth and good will to man. Indeed, the truest lover of his country is the man who by example and precept labors to bring all under the Government of the Prince of Peace.

Although we rejoice with a degree of trembling; yet we cannot but consider this treaty as a forward step in the intercourse of nations, and one which it may reasonably be hoped will tend to the increase of that righteousness which exalteth nations.

The negotiations for the treaty began about two years ago, but were interrupted by the death of Secretary Gresham, and remained in abeyance until in the Third Month of last year, Lord Salisbury instructed the English Ambassador to renew the subject, suggesting five heads of a proposed treaty. Secretary Olney was satisfied with some of these, but proposed substitutes to others. The negotiations were not finally completed until the eleventh of the present First Month, when Sir Julian Pauncefote received a final cablegram from England, authorizing him to sign it. About noon he called on Secretary Olney. The two plenipotentiaries presented their credentials to each other. The process of signing is thus described in the Ledger of Philadelphia:

Sir Julian was given an extra broad-pointed steel pen, in a plain gutta percha holder, and promptly wrote "Julian Pauncefote" on the British copy. The Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, then signed the treaty, and the two plenipotentiaries then exchanged ratifications. The ratifications were signed by the First party on the 11th of the present month, and by the English Ambassador, for whom the English plenipotentiary acted, on the 12th.

A Smith's Bulletin article, dated the 12th of the present month, contains the following account of the ratification of the treaty: "The ratification of the treaty was signed by the Secretary of State, Mr. Olney, on the 11th of the present month, while Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British plenipotentiary, signed the treaty on the 12th of the present month. The ratifications having been signed by the Secretary and Sir Julian Pauncefote, respectively, on the 11th and 12th of the present month, the ratifications were transmitted to the Embassy, taken in charge by the British plenipotentiary. The American plenipotentiary then sent over to the Executive Mansion the ratification to the President, who, at the latter part of the Twelfth month, with a message asking for its ratification. The British copy, which was signed by Sir Julian Pauncefote and subsequently by Secretary Olney, and the United States copy, signed by Secretary Olney and then by Sir Julian Pauncefote, are known as the original copies of the Government, permanent ratifications. After the Senate shall have given its assent, ratifications to the ratification of the treaty, it will be necessary to make an exact copy of our treaty as signed and append thereto the President's ratification. This is known as the exchange copy, and was delivered to the British Government for its ratification received from it. The British ratification was signed by Sir Julian Pauncefote on the 12th of the present month.

After this has been done the ratification of the President will be written in the original copy of the treaty which was before the Senate, and the treaty becomes effective.

There have been intimations in the public papers that some opposition will be made in the Senate to the ratification of the treaty, partly owing to the unpopularity of Secretary Olney. It would be a sad instance of littleness of mind and lack of statesmanship for any man to oppose a beneficent treaty on such unworthy grounds. In reference to this, the N. Y. Herald says:

"The petty spirit of opposition to the ratification of a treaty which seems to be dominating in the Senate is well calculated to try the patriotism of the country—and all the more so since the spirit is evidently prompted by jealousy, personalship and personal considerations, none of which should have any force or influence in the matter."

This treaty, the most important of the century, embodies the understanding of the American and English people in favor of peace and amity. It is a step forward in the progress of civilization which has been halted with a calamitous halt in the United States. It is a guarantee of peace directly to the two great Anglo-Saxon nations and indirectly to all the Powers of the world.

The Senate of the United States cannot be either to defeat or delay the ratification of this grand International and peace treaty. The Senate and the people have no right to be divided. The Senate and the people must give it their united and substantial sanction. The power of the people and the true interests of the country demand the early ratification of the treaty.

The treaty was transmitted to the Senate accompanied with the following message:

To the Senate.—I have the honor to acknowledge the ratification of the treaty of commerce, navigation and consular rights between the United States and Great Britain.

The provisions of the treaty are of a peaceful and patriotic character, and it is respectfully requested that you will give your ratification to the treaty as soon as possible.

Though it is not a treaty of commerce, navigation and consular rights, it is a treaty of peace and friendship, and it is respectfully requested that you will give your ratification to the treaty as soon as possible. It is a treaty of peace and friendship, and it is respectfully requested that you will give your ratification to the treaty as soon as possible. It is a treaty of peace and friendship, and it is respectfully requested that you will give your ratification to the treaty as soon as possible.

In the initiation of such an important movement it must be expected that some of its features will assume a tentative character looking to a further advance, and yet it is apparent that the treaty which has been formulated not only makes war between the parties to it a remote possibility, but precludes those fears and rumors of war which of themselves too often assume the proportions of a national disaster.

It is eminently fitting, as well as fortunate, that the attempt to accomplish results so beneficial should be initiated by kindred peoples, speaking the same tongue and joined together by all the ties of common traditions, common institutions and common aspirations. The experiment of substituting civilized methods for brute force as the means of settling international questions of right will thus be tried under the happiest auspices. Its success ought not to be doubtful, and the fact that its ultimate ensuing benefits are not likely to be limited to the two countries immediately concerned should cause it to be promoted all the more eagerly. The example set and the lesson furnished by the successful operation of this treaty are sure to be felt and taken to heart sooner or later by other nations, and will thus mark the beginning of a new epoch in human history.

Profoundly impressed as I am, therefore, by the promise of transcendent good which this treaty affords, I do not hesitate to accompany its transmission with an expression of my earnest hope that it may commend itself to the favorable consideration of the Senate.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

Executive Mansion, Jan. 11, 1897.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Attorney General of the United States has completed negotiations, by the direction of and with the approval of the President, which will result in immediate steps for the foreclosure of the Government lien on the Union Pacific Railway. The Reorganization Commission has guaranteed that the United States shall receive from the sale of the Union Pacific stock a fund not less than $17,754,000 in cash. This is equivalent to the principal of the subsidy bond, with interest. The sum of $4,500,000 each was on the 21st instant deposited with a New York trust company as security for the performance of the agreement. The legal documents were signed at St. Louis, Mo., by the President and the Governor of St. Louis, who has jurisdiction in the case.

The taxable wealth of the colored population of the United States is over $200,000,000.

The following Republican U. S. Senators were elected last week: Jacob H. Gallinger, New Hampshire; Thomas C. Platt, N. York; James Penrose, Pa.; George H. Plant, N. Carolina; Wm. H. C. Rife, N. Carolina; Charles W. Fairbanks, Indiana; William E. Mason, Illinois; H. C. Hensburgh, N. Dakota; and Henry M. Teller, Colorado. Pritchard, Hansbrough and Teller are Silver R. politicians. The Democrats elected were George G. Vest, Missouri; James K. Jones, Arkansas; John A. Kendrick, Delaware. The result of the election will be noted.

The Anglo-Venezuelan Arbitration treaty has been practically concluded, and awaits the signatures of the British Ambassador and the Venezuelan Minister at Washington, as is the ratification of the U. S. Senate.

North Carolina is a State into which there has, perhaps, been less foreign immigration than in any other. According to the census of 1890, she had 1,600,000 inhabitants who were born in this country, and but 2,700 who came into the world outside its limits.

A good wave of moral severity has swept over our country this week. In Missouri a railroad pool overruled, people here less foreign than in any other State suffer, and the natural gas supply has failed in some places. The people of Fremont, Ohio, were obliged to go to bed to keep warm, and in many places much suffering has resulted for want of fuel, food and clothing.

Statistics of life insurance show that in the last twelve years the average woman's life has increased from about 12 years to nearly 46, or more than 3 per cent. In the same period man's life average has increased from nearly 32 years to about 41, or 5 per cent.

According to the Kansas City Star, in the Colorado Desert, they have been raising worms which not only do not die from the cold, but the rate of increase has been falling from the clouds high above the desert.

but when the water reaches the strata of hot, dry air beneath the clouds it is entirely absorbed before falling half the distance to the ground. It is a singular sight to witness a heavy downpour of rain, not a drop of which touches the ground. These strange rain-storms occur in regions where the shallow temperature often rises to about 128 degrees, and is never above 70.

What promises to be the greatest commercial discovery of the decade has just been made at Muncie, Ind., according to newspaper reports. Two men named Whiteley, who have been working on a method of cast steel for two years past, now announce that they have met with complete success. The steel is made by a secret process in which a number of metals are fused together. The Whitesleys already have orders for over 100,000 sets of bicycle fittings of the new metal.

The Callowhill Street cars, the last drawn by horses in this city, have stopped running.

In 1896, the city and week numbered 448, which is 62 less than the previous year, and 76 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 235 were males and 213 females; 85 died of pneumonia; 42 of consumption; 35 of heart disease; 32 of diphtheria; 19 of old age; 16 of apoplexy; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of nephritis; 13 of cancer; 12 of meningitis; 11 of bronchitis; 11 of marasmus; and 11 from cerebral disease.

GRAIN.—No. 2 mixed corn, 29 1/2 a 29 1/2.

No. 2 white oats, 23 a 23 1/2.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 43 a 50; good, 41 a 45 1/2; medium, 41 a 42; common, 4 a 4 1/2.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 41 a 42; good, 37 a 40; medium, 35 a 38; common, 27 a 32; lambs, 4 a 5 1/2; Hogs.—Best Western, 51 a 52 1/2; com., 5 a 5 1/2; State, 4 a 5.

FOREIGN.—Lord Salisbury has consented that the Venezuelan Government shall nominate one of the members of the Board of Arbitration. This removes the last obstacle to the signing of the treaty.

It is with much interest and surprise that the ratification of the arbitration treaty would be the means of saving Great Britain a large sum of money, which that Government is now obliged to expend for the extension and maintenance of fortifications and naval fleets in American waters. At Halifax and other points on the North Atlantic, the Bermudas and other localities in the Caribbean Sea, and points on the Pacific Ocean in the vicinity of Vancouver, the British Government expends annually large sums in the maintenance of fortifications and in keeping war vessels in commission. It is estimated that ratification of the treaty would result in a saving of at least $3,000,000 annually to Great Britain in the direction stated. It would also materially lessen the supposed necessity on the part of the United States for pushing large expenditures for the erection of works of defense on our coast. These are among the minor benefits that would result from the ratification of the pending treaty of arbitration.

There are to be ten Scottish-fakes, five marquis, twenty earls and five lords-in-all, who have a direct financial interest in the continuation of the drink traffic. In England and Wales the names of no fewer than 172 members of the Upper House appear as owners of one or more licensed places.

Spain has a population of 17,500,000, of which number 11,000,000 cannot read or write.

The Madrid Chamber of Commerce and other bodies have cabled to Captain General Weyler protesting against his order for the destruction within a drop of days of all the plantations and the buildings in the Province of Havana that would be likely to prove an obstacle to the rebels.

Ulysses' Isle of the Cyclops, lying close to the Sicilian coast near Acasteosto, has been presented to the University of Catania by the Marchese Gravina, its owner. The island is a basalt rock rising 300 feet above the sea, and will be used as a biological station, the university establishing extensive laboratories upon it.

Severe shocks of earthquake have been experienced in the province of Delvino Epirus, Greece. A number of villages have been destroyed, and it is feared that many of the inhabitants of the province have been killed or injured.

By an earthquake on the Island of Kishim, in the Persian Gulf, on the 15th inst., thousands of houses were destroyed and 2500 persons killed; 1400 bodies have been recovered. Kishim Island is about fifty miles from the entrance to the Persian Gulf. It is seventy miles long, and its average breadth is twelve miles. The population is estimated at 5000, most of them being Arabs. The island belongs to the Imam of Muscat.

Advices received San Francisco by the steamer Gaelic on the 23rd inst., of a terrible panic in a temple at Kwong Tow, China, in which 300 men, women and children perished.

Li Hong Chang's visit to the United States and the fact that he is free to return to his native country which the Washington Star tells is true. The Chinese Government, it seems, is going to Anglicize, gradually, the Chinese people, as far as their language is concerned. The Peking Government has recently issued instructions to the various Viceroy and Government of provinces "for the Empire to establish schools for the study of the English language in all the principal cities of the country. According to the wording of one clause in the general instructions the reason for this is that China, in order to keep herself on terms of equality and in touch with the great powers of Europe, "must educate the masses and encourage inventive genius and foreign learning among her people, to take the best care of their soil and home and that devoted patriotism so conspicuously ingrained in the hearts of those who have studied such languages and sciences."

The Bishop of Bombay, speaking of the bubonic plague, says: "At first the plague was confined to one ward of the city, but it has spread from place to place, and has now become free to all the city. So far, all classes, including Europeans, have suffered from it. The published reports greatly underestimate the number of deaths, which is probably not less than 200 to 300 a day. The native Christians have been marvellously protected. Not one, so far as I know, has suffered from the plague. A day has been appointed for special prayer to be observed by all the Church of England congregations, and has invited all other Christians to join with them. This has been done none too soon. Hindus, Mohammedan and Parsees have in their own ways shown that they recognize the hand of God in the infliction, and know that deliverance must come from a higher than human power."

The official returns of the output of the gold mine of British Guiana for the year 1896 show that it was in excess of $2,500,000.

1870.—Third Month 1st.—I love to waken with a passage of Scripture in my mind and almost in my mouth. "God is not in all his thoughts," seemed to arouse me a few mornings ago, and naturally the query arose, "Am I lapsed with the wicked, of whom it is said, God is not in all his thoughts," and it caused me desire to arise to be more conformed to the command, "Whether therefore ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God." This is my desire. Next, He gave me on First-day morning (proving), what is that good and acceptable and perfect will of God, "Wait before Him, O, my soul, that thou mayest prove it will concerning thee."

To a friend who had met with a serious accident, she wrote Third Month 6th, 1870: "We read of the sad accident, and of thy subsequent offering, but my heart does not feel satisfied. I want to hear of thy getting well and about gain, and being such a comfort to W.—I feel much sympathy for you both; but you know here to retire to fulfil the Almighty Arm of power to lean upon. 'I worship thee, sweet will of God,' is a state of resignation attainable even by poor, frail, mortal man. May his blessed grace be in your hearts. I have thought so much of this heavenly peace of late. He says, 'My peace I give unto you.' It is not ours, 'peace obtained from nature, nothing outward, but 'My peace,' a pure heavenly stream, an unerring; all the waves and the billows, all the pains, trials, sufferings and sorrows, may rest upon the surface, and we through his mercy be hidden as in the hollow of his holy hand. My soul has desired this again and again for thee, my precious friend, particularly through this season of suffering. Farewell, dear, in Him who can comfort and support thee."

20th.—First day. "As I live, saith the Lord, my knee shall bow, and every tongue confess to thee," etc. A day of searching from the Lord, and our meetings not very lively. Oh, that we were more of a cross-bearing people, and then we would feel more of the heavenly power in our midst.

One week ago, Richard Esterbrook, in the morning meeting, was very lively in supplication and testimony. His prayer for Divine strength and guidance is just what we need now in these perplexing times, when new ways and paths seem opening before many, and others are perhaps opposing them with too much of the creaturely activity. Thy pure Truth, O Lord, we humbly implore. We love the old ways, but want thy Truth to lead us.

27th.—First-day. Silent meeting to-day. Last Third-day evening, the twenty-second, our beloved friend E. A. held an appointed meeting for the young Friends of this city, and was remarkably helped to declare the Truth, standing fifty minutes. To-morrow evening she is to hold another for Friends generally. Oh, that I-rud's Shepherd may be near us. After this meeting she, D. B., records:

Thanks be unto thy holy Name, O Lord, that thou didst help thy handmaidens.

Fourth Month 10th.—Sick at home. True it is that man proposes but God disposes. Having had a heavy cold, it has confined me at home two First days. Last Fourth-day, some hemorrhages from the lungs caused anxiety, but as they do not seem really diseased, I hope, by being more careful, and doing less, to avoid consumption. But the will of my Heavenly Father be done in all things. I am trying to be like Catherine Evans and Sarah Cleevers, as recorded in Sewall's History—have no will, but be like a little babe in Christ.

17th.—Our Yearly Meeting time. Some strangers here that we feel unity with, and with some we have to wait in patience. My heart was ready to exclaim, O, that those coming from a distance would only sit in silence with us until they feel the states, and then minister, under the weight and solemnity of the occasion, with the true-reaching unction, and not come as with the rattle of words, and leave no room for our own ministrations to say anything.

Oh, Lord, thou knowest all hearts, instruct them more perfectly, I beseech Thee, rebuke all forward spirits and give unto us a good, solemn Yearly Meeting, that we may bless thy Holy Name.

19th.—My birth-day. Oh, that I might be more and more filled with Heavenly wisdom and the Holy Spirit; filled with humility; filled with holy watchfulness. Desiring this only will not bring it—I must stand and watch and pray.

Fifth Month 8th.—Yearly Meeting all over, and Friends gone home. We had an exercising time, because of some who had zeal beyond their growth, but Truth came over all, and I hope no tender plant is hurt in the pure life. Oh, that all within our borders would unite in carrying back the ark of God, the ark of our testimonies into its former place, and see if He then will not bless us. To-day our city was visited with a severe hail-storm from the west and northwest. Many have had ten, twenty, or forty squares of glass broken. We had over twenty, and my school room facing the west had eleven. How the warring of the elements laughed at the puny powers of man, and many were left at the mercy of the floods of water pouring in, Cape May, Eighth Month 1st.—Our friend Anna Cook has a house here, and having extended an invitation to me to visit her for a short time, I have accepted it and am enjoying my quiet room to-day, being slightly indisposed. I hope this season will be a time of renewing of strength for what is before me. The impression given before Yearly Meeting that it was time for me to prove what is his good and perfect will concerning me, as resulted in the belief that it was his will I should order a visit to Exeter and Muncy Monthly Meetings, and the families composing them, in the pure love of souls with the desire to gather them nearer to Christ. Our last Monthly Meeting granted me a minute for that purpose, and my dear friends Edward and Sarah A. Kiehn offered to accompany me. Oh, my dear Heavenly Father, be pleased to guide me and supply me, all this journey through, for do I not desire to serve thee and to glorify thy holy Name, with thy dear Son, my Saviour and Redeemer. Support my dear companions and give them to feel that thy mercy is great toward them.

After enumerating the families visited at Greenwood Meeting, she says: "The country around is quite mountainous, and the scenery beautiful. I enjoyed it some, but my heart was so much exercised before the Master, desiring that He would condescend to help, that a moment's enjoyment was all that I could allow for the enjoyment of such scenes."

Seventh Month 27th.—How we were liberated by Exeter Monthly Meeting to visit the families composing it, and were kindly waited upon by Thomas E. Lee. She writes:

"While riding to Olney he showed us several large and fine farms which were formerly owned by Friends. They became unsettled and moved westward, but it was remarkable that these families did not prosper afterwards. How much it behooves us to endeavor to keep in a contented spirit and never move, without the pure constraining of his Holy Spirit. After visiting the few families at Maiden Creek, we took the cars for Muncy. Jesse Haines met us, and we went with him to his home, feeling weary. Visited several families the next day, and took tea at Sarah and Rebecca Haines, where were many Friends, but the Master helped me through, and I blessed his Name. Jesse Haines and family kindly entertained us until First-day, when we went to Henry Enoyd's, who, with his wife, were very attentive. The next day visited several families," and the following in writing she says: "Henry Enoyd took us to Muncy Station again, and we rode in the cars to Canton, away up among the mountains. Procured an open carriage, and rode from about eleven to near three o'clock, over rough mountain roads, and at last reached Reuben Battin's home. They were very kind, refreshing us with a good dinner and a good bed. Sat with them in the evening. In the morning rode with them to their meeting—roads very rough, but the scenery so beautiful over mountain tops where we could look off upon others covered with timber, and at times the mountain mists creeping upward and forming clouds. The deepening service engrossed my mind much, but my eye caught the beauties formed by our Father's hand.

"An honest hearted company of Friends met us, some who seemed as the salt of the earth. Much shut out from the follies of the vain world, they retain the simplicity of their forefathers. Ellen McCarty was the mother of many of the present company. She was a lively minister, and often walked great distances to meeting, carrying her babe, or riding in an ox-cart. One Friend told me that some of the most lively sermons he ever heard were from Ellen McCarty, standing in bare feet.

"The soil in these parts does not yield very plentifully, and they struggle along under difficulties. Joseph McCarty took us home with him to dine, went in the afternoon to his brother Silas, and spent the night at another brother's. In the evening a company of young people were present at the sitting. One young man in the neighborhood had been struck by lightning not long before, and killed, which caused much solemnity. In the morning Jesse McCarty was visited, with his family. Some were present who had separated from Friends. This dividing spirit seemed not to be of the Lord.

"We next had a long mountain ride and dined with some young people, for whom we felt a concern. Rode afterwards to Sarah Schill's, a daughter of Ellen McCarty. Here was close exercise of spirit for me, for I felt that her Master was requiring her to speak in the assemblies of the people, and she was unwilling and doubtful. It seemed to me her salvation depended upon her faithfulness and obedience in this matter, and I had to tell her so. I felt very solemn and under the weight of it afterward, until I heard that she had been accustomed to say a few words in meeting some time previously, but now she never appeared in that way. I felt then that the Lord had cared for me indeed, that He alone had led me, and praised filled my soul for this seal to my visit." One more family, and the work was done.

"Light is sown for the righteous and gladness for the upright in heart."

Having arrived at a time in life when, as a pilgrim seeking a better country, it may be that some of the many Friends with whom I have accompanied and who may be my survivors, would like to know what is the prospect ahead; in tenderness of spirit I have this testimony—that through great mercy and by the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, I have not followed cunningly devised fables, but have found religion to be a substantial reality, and now, as the setting sun gilds the clouds which gather above the horizon, causing light at evening time, so "faith looks to her home on high."

"Hope casts around a cheerful eye,
Love puts all the terrors by,
With gladdening power."

Having this experience, it is a comfort to be able to say in sacred Scripture language—"Though I walk through the valley and shadow of death, I will fear no evil, for thou (O Lord), art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me," for beyond my deservings—"The Lord will give grace and glory, and no good thing doth He withhold from those who walk uprightly."

The New York Cathedral.

"Referring to your editorial of December 17th, encouraging the project for the erection of an Episcopal Cathedral, will you permit me a question or two? I trust to your hospitality to all honest opinion.

"First.—Were the author of Christianity to visit New York to-day, and find the sum at his disposal which this cathedral will cost, would He use it for that purpose, or for building decent and habitable houses for the poor, and which would redound most to the 'glory to God,' the promotion of true Christianity and the uplifting of men, which the Church professes as its great purposes?

"Second.—Could not in reality all the work you speak of for 'the moral betterment of New York' be just as efficiently conducted—nay, more so—from a simple and commodious headquarters nearer the centre of the field of effort? Will the cathedral, as such, really advance it any, and are not those who think that it will, perhaps unconsciously, influenced by a desire to glorify and perpetuate ecclesiasticism, lay the corner-stone for a great hierarchical establishment out of harmony with our institutions, and build up and intrench denominational superiority? The English periodicals have long been discussing how their cathedrals can be made of any real use to the people. This is not the age of cathedral building, and ought not to be. If the many millions required for this New York Cathedral can be raised, would it not be better applied in the solution of problems of want and crime that are pressing upon us? Beautiful and inspiring as are these great structures, it will hardly be claimed that the average religious advancement and condition of morals are higher, say in Spain or Italy, where the peoples almost live in cathedrals, than here. If they really are an influence for moral and religious improvement, it ought to have been shown in those countries.

"Third.—You say, as an inducement to all denominations to contribute, that it is to be 'the religious home of all who profess and call themselves Christians,' prefacing this, however, with the qualification, 'so far as the canons of the Episcopal Church will permit.' What does that mean? All of those outside, thus called on to contribute, ought to be told plainly.

Does it not mean simply that they will have the privilege of attending worship after the Episcopal form there, and that no clergyman not Episcopally ordained, that is to say, not ordained at all 'according to the canons of the Episcopal Church,' can ever take part in any service there except as a layman?

If it meant that henceforth the Episcopal Church would truly represent Protestantism, sloughing off the imitation Romanism that has so long put it in a false position and carried so many converts to Rome; if it meant that, its own orders having been decided invalid by what the world at large recognizes as the highest ecclesiastical authority, and its own greatest scholars having declared Apostolic Succession a historical myth, it would realize the infinite littleness and unimportance of the question, and, admitting other clergymen as equals, join with the other sects as they now join with each other in Christian work and activity, its leadership would be recognized and the cathedral built with enthusiasm, strong as are the objections to it.

"Does the more exalted piety and consecration of the Episcopal Church, its disregard of wealth, fashion and worldliness, and its exceptionally conspicuous success above all churches indicate as ought to be the case were it true that its ministrations alone are 'valid' and accepted of God?

"Will its present attitude of aloofness, refusing recognition to other clergy and organizing always special instrumentalities for its own activities, tend to give it the leadership in Protestantism it claims, which it might, with a wise and statesmanlike policy, attain? I think not Rome has declared the Protestant Episcopal Church outcast. Why will the Church not put herself as she may, at the head of the Christian forces outside of Rome?—The Episcopal Recorder.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

What is the Cause, and What shall be the Remedy

Are queries occupying the minds of many Friend in different places at the present time. What is the cause of departures from the true life and the declension from that spiritual discernment so powerfully manifest in the lives, conduct and conversation of many of the members of the Society of Friends in former years. Although these discouraging features are not pleasant to dwell upon, neither is it good to criticize when Truth does not call for it, for this would be poor food indeed to feed upon, but that such is too true we cannot deny, and we trust there are many concerned Friends who have ever felt it their duty earnestly to contend for the faith once delivered to the saints, who cannot close their eyes to these facts while they endeavor to observe the first and second Commandments, which are, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, etc., and thy neighbor as thyself.

But what is the cause? Why do we not all speak the same language, walk by the same rule, and mind the same thing? Why do we not people speak a language as it were half Jew and half Ashdod? Then the query arises, What shall the remedy be? Dear Friends everywhere, is not the time now at hand which calls loudly for a more full, impartial investigation of these things, each one for one. For if we as a people are again to shine forth in our ancient strength and beauty (of which there are encouraging symptoms of late in some places), shall it not be by individual faithfulness, until we see eye to eye when the Lord shall bring again Zion, for He is the alone healer of breaches and the restore of paths to dwell in. Then what is the real cause? Why has the good become dim and the most fine gold changed? Have we been more diligent in cultivating our intellectual abilities and relied on this instead of cultivating the good seed in our hearts? Have we consulted our own wisdom and warmed ourselves in some measure with sparks of our own kindling, until our visions have become clouded and our sight dim until we overlook the light which shines in our hearts, and until it is hard to distinguish the voice of the true Shepherd from that of the stranger? Or has Ephraim as it were, mixed himself with the people, and strangers devour his strength and he knoweth it not? Have we hewn to ourselves cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water, and forsaken the true fountain? Or have we compromised our precious principles in a measure for the sake of meeting the world half way, supposing by this to gather them, but have we gathered them, and have they not rather scattered us? Now whether these or any of them is the cause or whether they are not, is left for the serious consideration of every honest-hearted Friend.

However, we must acknowledge that "blindness in part hath happened to Israel," and what concerns us now principally is, "What shall the remedy be?" As there is no new way to the kingdom (for the Truth changes not), then it must be by an abiding in Christ, who said, "I am the way, the truth and the life, no man cometh to the Father but by me," etc.

Therefore, will not the true remedy be simply or all to return to first principles, and as Israel did of old, to build again the things which were destroyed, even to submit ourselves to the transmuting power of Divine grace, being crucified with Christ and raised again to serve Him in newness of life; and all who are thus willing to Him to rule and reign in their hearts, can truly call Him Lord, and that by the Holy Ghost, and thus being armed with his armor, wear the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, and being tried and proven, will be mighty through Him to the pulling down of strongholds, etc., and virtually say by their lives and conversations, "Come, follow us, as we have followed Christ," evincing to all sincere inquirers after the Truth that there is a reality in the religion we profess, because it is Christianity revived in its ancient purity, and because it changes the heart from a state of nature to a state of grace, causing its followers to love the things they once hated and hate the things they once loved; being thus renewed in the spirit of their minds, they put off the old man with his deeds, which is corrupt, and put on the new man, even Christ Jesus, whom to now is life eternal; for if the cause was in departing from the true Guide, or from not faithfully following Him, then a returning to Him with the whole heart and an abiding in Him must be the remedy for us as a people to regain that spiritual discernment so desirable and helpful for the unity and welfare of the body. Then no wise should we lower the standard or compromise our principles, which are still near and dear to many. Neither will our strength be in giving encouragement to innovations or countenancing departures to strengthen that dirt which seems to be seeking more ease and liberties in some places, for it is plainly evident that this is not a remedy for the unsettlement now existing among us, but our strength lies rather in faithfulness and in obedience to the race already received, and there is no cause or any to give way to discouragement, for help is laid upon one that is mighty.

Now would it not be well for both the older and younger to leave those things which are behind, as Paul said, "I count not myself to have apprehended, but leaving those things which are behind, I press toward the mark," etc. Again he says, "I will not glory save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by which I am crucified to the world, and the world unto me," and is there not cause for believing that brighter days are in store for us in the near future if faithfulness is abode in? Man, with all his intellectual nature and abilities, can never make any improvements over the pure, unchangeable Truth; either is it hard to be understood. "Fear God and keep his commandments"—this is the whole duty of man.

MIND YOUR STOPS.—Not understanding the use and importance of punctuation marks, the people of Uganda make some curious mistakes and consequently receive wrong impressions. A native came one day to one of the missionaries when he was in the country, and read the following passage: "As they were sitting and eating a woman (one) came who had an alabaster box," etc., and asked, "Why were they eating a woman?"—The Spirit of Missions.

A Letter From E. S. Kite.

Roselawneg, Twelfth Mo. 25th, 1897.

A German Christmas, especially in a minister's family, is really something beautiful to experience. It is essentially different from our way of celebrating it in America, and consists of the family alone. I think perhaps they would enjoy hearing just how the Germans celebrate the day, or series of days as it is with them. In the first place the different members of the family write out a list of the things they want—that is real needs, or something they especially wish, then there are great secrets, and the afternoon before all things are brought together. Dresses, shoes, aprons, or whatnot, everything is brought together, and for every member of the family a plate is set with cakes, and apples, and nuts, and their presents by the side. There is always a tree, even when only two old people live together, and at the appointed time the candles are lit and the children and work-people who are waiting, come in. At first there is a pause, and then all join in singing a hymn, after which is generally read an appropriate portion of Scripture, and perhaps another hymn sung. Then each one is at liberty to seek his own table and enjoy the surprises waiting him. The servants of course have their tables, too, and are often quite as much favored as any one. Last evening we had the "Bescherung," as they call it, at six, and all the family from the first floor, together with the servants, came up, and of course the children were the principal part of it, our children I mean. I had helped Fräulein Feistmann arrange the tables in the big room, and when all was ready the bell was rung and the people (in all about twelve) came in procession in the room, singing. After supper we all went down stairs, where it was even more beautifully arranged. They have so many people to help, as their place is quite large, that the number gathered was a good deal larger. We collected in the Director's study, and when the doors opened into the beautifully decorated room, we entered in procession, singing as before and after which, and reading from the Bible and more singing, we could look around. Every one had a plate of good things, and as they knew my love of fruit, my plate had less sweetmeats, [but in place of them] apples and oranges. I had been made to write out my wishes with the red, and as my chief desire was "books, no matter whether old or not," I had a good share, all proving very acceptable, and ones that I wanted.

I know that thee, as being a good Friend, does not approve of Christmas celebration, but I think thee would feel quite comfortable even at such a gathering, for it is more a family gathering and a giving of pleasure to those about one and of the things they need.

One would be interested to see in what order the garden is kept here. For instance, all the grape vines are taken down, trimmed and laid along the ground, covered with straw and bound. The roses in like manner laid prostrate and covered with pine branches, and the vines on the house that cannot be removed are completely protected by pine branches, that look very pretty in winter, as they lie flat against the house, worked into the trellis that supports the vine. On the flower beds are piled up the fallen leaves, and over this pine boughs; and the fruit trees are all scraped and white washed, and the paths put in perfect order as well as all shrubbery trimmed. In the spring the work of putting the garden to rights must be comparatively small.

The Director's family are most excellent people, and kind as they can be. It is very pleasant living in the same house with another family. Fräulein F. has lived on the second floor or eighteen years, and is almost like a member of the family, and they take her boarders in the same way. Of course she only has the few and they are not of the miscellaneous sort. We are very often invited down, as I have told thee. Fräulein Oltmanns has gone home for vacation, she is also a most admirable person, and improves daily on acquaintance; I could not have dropped into better surroundings.

As I write I hear Albanæ laughing in Louisiana room. Among other things they have a game of German authors, with a picture of each one and their chief works, and they prefer playing with that to anything else, which is very satisfactory to me, as they learn a good deal at the same time.

Of all the things that I received, the one that most overcame me was a pot of blooming lilies of the valley with a gorgeous red tulip in the centre, from a dear invalid woman, sister of the school Director, who lives here in the summer on account of the quiet and fresh air. She is quite a noted woman, having translated over a hundred books from English into German, and she had among others a book relating to the "Quakers" in England. She had become in this way deeply interested in the sect, and though she seldom receives visitors, had quite often expressed a wish to see me, and I made her several times a thy visit. Whittier is a great favorite of her's and she had a great many questions to ask about the customs, etc., of the Society. On all such points, as well as the history and development of the Society, I am pretty well able to answer, thanks to the thorough training I received in this respect as a child. The first-day afternoon readings from "Friend's Library," that extended through my childhood, have not been lost upon me, and I am very glad to be able to answer such questions as are put to me, and should indeed be very much ashamed if I could not. In this book the person of whom I speak had taken great pains to translate the peculiar expressions of the "Friends" into equivalent German, as for instance, "ministering Friends or Friends travelling in the ministry," and so on. In order to do this she had put herself into connection with a small body of members of the Society, who live in the neighborhood of Pymont, the pretty little watering place I resided in the spring, on the trip to Leutenbergsward. I have been very sorry since that I did not know of this remnant of the Society at the time. I should have been strongly tempted to have staid a day longer and gone over into Frieden- (that the name means "peace valley"), where there is still a small meeting—it would have been very interesting I think. I was going to say that through this community she learned the correct terms for all these peculiar expressions of the Friends.

I think I told thee that one day while keeping house here alone, I invited the Director's family to an American tea, and the invalid among the number, and because she could not accept, I sent her supper to her, and this seems to be the reason of the pot of flowers to-day. I feel quite ashamed because I have not called upon her since we went back to her house in town, but that has only been because I have been afraid I would trouble her. I wish now I had gone anyway. I could at least have shown my good intentions, and gone away if she were unable to see me.

The Director's family all come up to tea to-night and I must now go and make myself ready to receive them.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Friends' Testimony to Plainness, Simplicity, and Truth Speaking.

There has been a feeling with me for some time past to write something as to the foundation of the holding of some, at least, of those who bear the name of Friend, in the particulars above mentioned. Not with any intention to vindicate the position taken, which to these is one of necessity, but rather as opening up somewhat of the secret work of the Spirit of God in these matters, as to the way He leads, teaches and instructs as well as guides into all truth by the exercise of obedience to his own behests.

It remains still a truth that that believeth shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or of man. The fruit and effect being righteousness, the assurance, peace and quietness of spirit, which nothing in the world can take away, so long as there is a keeping to Him who keeps in safety from the fear of evil.

This is not the effect of imagination, any more than it is of reason, but is born of the faith that bloweth where it listeth, by which the new birth is begotten, and from which the man child from God doth spring. Abraham believed God and it was accounted unto him for righteousness. He did not see the end from the beginning, or the why and the therefore, he was called to offer up his son, but he believed God, and the end justified the means, for God permitted no violence to be done.

It is that which underlies the act that exemplifies the great lesson taught—that Abraham believed God. It is this bowing implicitly to God in the little as well as in the larger concerns of life in which is the secret of all true blessing. We may not know why, but there is the sense, the Almighty calls for a sacrifice at our hands, and we bow obediently thereto and have peace. This will be called blind obedience, but it is not to man, or any gathering or association of men, but to the Infinite, all-loving and gracious God.

Here is the safety to the child of God, in his following the intuition of the Spirit of God in and upon his own spirit, subduing and controlling its own motions, and making submissive in thought, word and action to the mind of the Master.

This is no creed or device of man, but a loving surrender of will and desire to Him, whose will is the delight of this new-born nature in man. Insincerity and flattery in language is untruthfulness to the mind that sees with the eye single to the glory of God. And simplicity in dress is a necessity to the mind disciplined to the will of God. The mode and manner in all may not be alike, but there will be a sense of that which is becoming and suitable to individual requirements and occupation. The light of Divine Truth is the measure and guide in each one in these as in other individual concerns, and a censorious spirit, watchful to pick faults and to find inconsistencies, is out of harmony with the spirit of the Master just as much as he who gives wing to his own will to do as he lists, in these as in other things that so materially affect our well-being God-ward.

The secret exercise of soul before God, that is so great a benefit and blessing, and for the want of which there is so much leanness and poverty, and so little known of the fresh begettings of the Spirit of God, is the cause of the spiritual blindness that hath in part happened unto spiritual Israel in this our day.

Not the love of display, but a readiness to be in the Master's hand just what He wills, is that which makes all the difference between professing the Truth and possessing it, and that which is the outcome of mere conformity in the exterior, and not the outcome of individual conviction, however apparently good it may appear, will but wither and die, not having the virtue of the natural growth in it of the Spirit of the living God.

My spirit has often been pained by the way in which many who bear the name of Friend treat these matters, some in one way and some in another, but both alike away from the centre of individual duty and requiring by Him, who alone has the right to order and direct his own children and servants. The servant's and the child's place is obedience to the one Master, and we are required not to stop and to enquire "And what shall this one do," but learn the lesson of obedience and follow.

If there were more true followers there would be truer leaders and teachers under the one Master Spirit.

Christ learned obedience by the things that He suffered, and think ye are there no lessons so to be learnt by us at the Master's feet? Yea, verily, there is still the measure of suffering to be known and filled up by those who follow Christ, for this world still loves its own, and the spirit thereof is not of the Master, so that He who will be a friend of this world is the enemy of Christ. It is this seeking to blend the unholy and impure with the work of God that mars and defaces the image of God in man, and there are many who have begun in the Spirit who are seeking to be made perfect by the works of the flesh, and these are often unconscious of how they have shifted ground, living in and working from the man's nature in themselves, deceiving themselves and deceiving one another by their own words and works in the things of God, not perceiving that the passive condition has been departed from, and the active nature of the creature has taken its place, and thus the life of God, at one time known in them, and to work through them, has become slain.

Thus the innocent life becomes sacrificed and Christ is again crucified, and the shame of their own nakedness doth again appear.

In this condition the outward sacrifice of Christ is held up much to view, but the hidden man of the heart is neglected, or a seeming spirituality takes possession of the mind, apart from the humility and self-abasement that neither knows or has any spiritual possessions apart from the renewed and renewing power of Christ.

It is this latter condition as much as the former one that feels no necessity to live under the crucifying power of Christ, and that finds no necessity to take heed to the limitations and teachings of the Spirit of Truth, regarding the conscientious scruples of its fellows as delusion or enthusiasm of an heated or ill-regulated mind.

Abraham believed God, and it is by our so coming to believe in Him as to obey his Spirit in us, that we truly own the work of Christ without, by being made a partaker of the renewing nature of Christ within us. Only thus can we truly and availingly own Christ, by being made a partaker of his nature.

The revival of vital godliness can only come by thus owning Christ and his work in man, as well as his work for man, by the exemplification of his renewed and renewing nature, bringing forth those fruits that are well-pleasing to God, both in avoidance of the evil in whatever form it may appear, and in doing whatsoever is required of us. No words spoken, no action done, no demeanor manifested can be, or is, pleasing to God, that is untrue and insincere, or that doth in any way tend to foster pride, vanity or the love of adulation the one from the other.

There are balances of the sanctuary, unerring and true, by which we will each one be tried, and the light of Christ will reveal the dark recesses of the heart, if we are but willing to look at the footstool of Divine grace, out of and apart from our own reasoning, which will bring into the clear light of God's love and favors, if there is but a willingness to forego our own judgment in order to know the judgment of God set over us.

After having written the foregoing, I think it but right to say, I have now read in THE FRIEND the article written in the B. F. by J. W. Graham. It might be snappish I had been led in my thus writing by what I there had read, and therefore make the allusion I now do.

Perhaps it will not be well to add further to what has been written. My sole object in writing is to point out that however false and untrue may be the standing and the holding of some in this matter, there are those who have herein solid ground beneath their feet, and are in these matters, as in others, no image worshippers, but having been brought to bow to the Spirit of God, know the worship of Him, which is a spirit and in truth; which is not confined to time or place or thing, but is the regulating power in their life, and the boundary and fence about their liberty, and beyond which they can not go without condemnation and a violation of their peace and happiness, which is in and from God.

It is the answering to the Heavenly look, motion, or uprising in heart and mind that which is of God, that sense of the Divine in man that makes God-like in all things, that is the only and ever-blessed redeeming power of God and therefrom springs every virtue that is gotten or springs from the blessed work of Christ, both inwardly and outwardly manifested and brought forth; for however man may misjudge and misunderstand the Truth of God that Truth remains the same, and can only be known by the revelation of God the Father through the Son and the work of the Spirit.

Happy day when the Truth of God thus revealed, is known, understood, and obeyed by man, so as to transform his nature, that glory to God shall arise in each heart and praise for each life a blessed condition without alloy, because made free from the power of sin, the error for which Christ came in the flesh, and the effect of his revelation into the heart when the rightful place is resigned unto Him, the government of the will, so that it is no longer that that lives, but Christ that liveth in us.

Divine forbearance doth still wait, and grace is still offered, but who shall say how long this may continue toward any, and if the Master arises, shuts to the door, can another open? It not when, neither is it how we may please that we are to be made again partakers of the Divine nature, but in the day of merciful visitation and in the obedience thereunto, the way to the kingdom is still by the crucifying power of Christ, and in no other way. The entrance hereinto is by the door of mercy, but mercy as her own price, and that repentance and faith, and that is a theory apart from the reality of obedience is dead, and therefore can never know the resurrection life of God in the soul, that quickens into doing as well as teaches us to wait the further opening of its own life in the soul.

O, that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men, by answering his holy purpose and call, which would be to his own truest happiness and God's glory, here and hereafter.

The Ninth day of the First Month was a lovely winter day. The snow that fell a few weeks ago had disappeared, and the surface of the ground had frozen, so that there was no need to interfere with walking, and yet the temperature was so mild that it was pleasant to be abroad in the open air. Some of our people had become much interested in the study of natural history, especially of the oaks, and had been diligently collecting leaves and acorns; and so it was arranged that I should accompany a party of three bright, lively and intelligent young women to a grove of oaks, about a mile east of Masonville, in Burlington County, N. J.

On alighting from the cars at Masonville, I met my company, who had preceded me on their bicycles, and we started on foot to the place of our destination. We soon noticed that many of the oak trees retained their leaves on the lower branches, while the tops were entirely stripped of foliage.

As Gray describes nineteen species of oaks and nine hybrids, growing in the northern United States, above the southern lines of Virginia. These are subdivided into several groups. The leaves furnish important characters for distinguishing the species, although they are so variable that it requires considerable familiarity with the foliage to decide the species of oak to which they belong. In the White oak group the leaves are more or less deeply indented, so as to form a series of lobes, which are mostly rounded on the outer edge and without any sharp projecting points. The indentations are also rounded at base.

In the Black oak group, the lobes are more regular in outline, and furnished with teeth which are pointed with slender bristles.

Another well-marked group is the Chestnut oaks, so called from the resemblance of the leaves to those of the chestnut tree, but the teeth along the edge are in a general way somewhat rounded, and not sharp-pointed as in the chestnut itself.

A botanical friend, Benjamin Heritage, of Mickleton, N. J., was passing under a Spanish oak, about the time that its leaves were falling in the fall of the year, and became interested in the different shapes they had assumed. He gathered many of them, and on patiently examining them at his home, found one hundred and fifty distinct shapes among them. So, to make a complete exhibit of the leaves of this oak, it would be needful to collect at least one hundred and fifty specimens. The other oak-ways much, perhaps not quite to the same extent. But it is evident that to know oak leaves perfectly requires considerable research, and that one is by no means sure of identifying the species by a chance leaf. It illustrates the remark of that skillful botanist, Dr. Engelmann, of St. Louis, who, when one brought him an oak leaf, wishing to be told the species to which it belonged, replied by telling the inquirer to bring him the whole tree.

There are marked differences in the acorns as well as in the leaves of oaks. In some the cup is rather shallow and only embraces the base of the acorn. In others it almost covers the nut. We passed a tree standing alone on the side of the road, under which were numerous acorns. I was interested in noticing the eagerness with which my companions gathered this harvest of the forest, the fruit not being familiar to them.

We turned down the lane of a deserted farm lying along the Rancoas Creek. It was rather a melancholy sight to see a large and expensive house abandoned to the weather, and rapidly going to decay with the outbuildings. There were some beautiful lines of red cedar trees, with their pyramids of green foliage, and arbutus trees, which had evidently been planted by a former owner. The land was a barren sand, and possessed so little fertility that it had little attractions for a farmer. The buildings and arrangements indicated that they were designed for the summer residence of a wealthy family, but the owner appears not to have succeeded in renting it to such an one.

One proof of the character of the soil was a large patch of Prickly Pear (Opuntia vulgaris). It belongs to the Cactus family, and the stem is composed of flattened oval and roundish joints with clusters of short barbed bristles, which readily enter the skin when incautiously handled, as my three companions soon discovered. On inquiring the next day as to how they had fared, I found that they had spent a part of the intervening time in endeavoring to remove these unpleasant reminders of their walk. The color of the joints in summer is light green, but the winter had changed this to a purplish hue. The flowers which appear in summer are about two inches broad, yellow and showy; of course they had long since disappeared, and had been succeeded by the pulpy fruit of a reddish color and eatable. The roots were rather thick fibrous starting from the under surface of some of the joints, and penetrating the earth to a distance of several inches.

We returned home well satisfied with our little excursion, which had introduced the female members of the party into new grounds to them and which they expressed the wish to revisit when summer came. J. W.

MANY wealthy men in various parts of the country are getting possession of large blocks of forest land, either as permanent investments, as game preserves or places of summer residence. Clubs and private individuals now own nearly a million acres of forest preserves in New York, while in Maine, especially in the Rangely Lake country, in the upper White Mountains of New Hampshire, and along the tributaries of the Connecticut and Androscoggin rivers there are many large preserves. Blue Mountain Park, which was established by Austin Corbin in the south-western part of New Hampshire, covers thirty-two square miles, while the estate of G. W. Vanderbilt, of Asheville, N. C., contains a forest of one hundred thousand acres, which will be the field of systematic experiments in practical and scientific forestry. Garden and Forest.

The Arm-Chair.

{A Friend in Canada suggests the printing in THE FRIEND of a series of poetical sketches of many of the worthies of a past generation, written by the late Joseph Kite. On re-reading this production, the Editor has been impressed with the beauty and force of many of the lines, and the clear discrimination of character shown in them; and believing they would prove instructive and interesting to many of our readers, concludes to insert them in the columns of THE FRIEND.—ED.]

"Your fathers, where are they? And the prophets, do they live forever?"

[The history of these rhymes is briefly this: An Arm-Chair made in 1852, by John Letchworth for Leonard and Jane Snodden, was presented to the author, with some information of the worthies who were wont to visit the estimable owners; accompanied with an intimation that it would be a suitable theme for some verses. The result follows:]

Cowper, the poet of the Christian muse,
Sang of the sofa; could I but imuse
Some of its toil-in my lagged old quill,
Some of his genius on my verse distill,
Then would I sing—my theme, my strain,—
Of thy ebonic, rhyme-creating CHAIR!

He who with art's skill scooped out thy seat,
Trim made thy ribs, and upright, and thy feet,
Now fourscore years and lo! has aged and old,
And has his summons to the heavenly shore,
Honest as sunshine, he "who once may read,"
That LETCHWORTH is "an Israelite indeed;"
No guide within him ever finds a place,
Love of the Father sprays to all the race,
His Gospel ministry is void of show.

For "few and sawney" are the drops that flow;
Condense his faith, are his perils found,
Rich in their matter, nothing for mere sound!
So preaches he, Ah, what a sad mistake,
When empty sounds upon the people break,
When a stentorian voice in efforts vain
Pours to the people—thunder without rain!
Its bounding melody may be of aid,
But no reviving showers of nature fall,
Would that my age—if age to me be given—
Might prove like his, who calmly looks to heaven, Waiting with patience for the mandate blessed—
"Thy labor finished, enter into rest!"

"Here," said the patriarch no more doomed to range,
"Quiescent, secure, may be thy stage,
For when thou wilt the faithful life will prove
A rich example, legacy of love!"

Ah, my Arm Chair, supporter of the good,
Beneath how many a worthy hast thou stood!
Fear no more high seas, thy long career
Some of the faithful who have passed away.

Here HARRISON "spoke of what he saw
In visions deep, when filled with holy awe,
The certain of the future said with awe,
While coming objects glided into view;
Or as the rust on memory's tablet rose—
Rehearsed her Gospel joys, her Gospel woes—
Told how King George, as woe-held hidden springs,
Bow'd at her message from the King of kings;
Of deep doubts as for her Lord she paid;
Of her toil-hope, of time, of time at hand;
Told how her soul in sympathy had long
Borne a deep burden for the negro's wrong,
Till the church tread her at her Master's will,
In Southern States bore's purpose to fulfill,
With Gospel power for truth and right she spoke,
Till slumbering consciences to feeling woke;
Oppressors' hearts with justice learned to beat.

Sarah Harrison was sent to Jamestown, N. H. on a religious visit in Great Britain, she felt her mind engaged to speak for the Third. When she commenced speaking she told of all her labors, and the work she had done during her communication. She died in Philadelphia, the twenty-ninth of Twelfth Mo. 1812, aged seventy-six; a minister fifty-five years.

White handmen's shackles fell beneath their feet.
 Her's was a righteous mission to the poor
 Of selfish masters she her message bore;
 She shot no fiery missiles from afar,
 Kindling those feelings that engender war;
 But face to face, truth's message would impart,
 Whilst love-pierced fingers entered may a heart!
 Thus won she freedom for the sore oppressed;
 Her words were grand and her ministrings;
 —O'er the present did her thoughts engage,
 Gave to her juniors dear-bought counsel sage,
 Taught her loved ones deep-serve in vessel pure,
 Her sacred gift, and make her calling sure;
 Made her true partner as an Aaron be,
 Upheld her hands, supported her ministry;
 Gave salt and leaven, and then that charge redeemed;
 When through her heart the Gospel current streamed,
 In secret labor was thy spirit found!
 While trembling forth she sent the Gospel sound;
 A very Quaker, as she gave the law,
 Her outward motion spoke her inward awe.

Here SCATTERED-GOD, when evening came at length,
 From the day's toil reposed his weary strength;
 From Christian sympathy that salve drew,
 Which doth no tyrant who heavently joys pursue.
 Mournful of spirit he was ever found,
 In sympathy with souls by sorrow bound,
 As fell his plaintive voice upon the ear,
 The poor in spirit felt a friend was near.
 Prompt in his duty at the house of prayer,
 To plead with fervor for the Master's care;
 To urge the lame, the stumbling one, that zealous tongue,
 Which only woke as living waters sprung,
 He never preached himself—his every word
 Directed to a slain and risen Lord.
 He to the weary consolation brought,
 He for the burdened, sweet deliverance wrought;
 Though bound himself, the fettered set free—
 The Jeremiah of his age was he!

SAVERY has here oft passed a friendly hour,
 Feeling of sympathy the magic power;
 As he sat to hear the secret influence sent,
 As prayer ascended where no knee was bent,
 As for each other's welfare sighs were given,
 And then with words, their wishes entering heaven,
 The Indian's friend, he sought their native wood,
 An anxious laborer for the Redman's good;
 Beside the lake, he sat in peaceful tree,
 His Gospel message broadcast as Truth set free.

Here too has sat—like him of stature small,
 Great heart of heart, and mind of like mold;
 One who, obedient to his Master's will,
 Was studious found his duty to fulfil.
 Six times went EMLEN o'er the Atlantic wave,
 On Gospel errands, sinful man to save;
 And still returning from his work of love,
 Came with his olive-branch and peaceful dove.
 Though years rolled on and outward sight grew dim,
 The lamp of Truth still brightly burned with him,
 Shining distinctly in its sear-aching light,
 Dosh that the actors deemed were hid in night,
 His Friend and his Dinwiddie was with God,
 And he, obedient to his Master's nod,
 As secret feeling told him of distress,
 The sufferer's door still soon in his hand pressed.
 Thus mercy led—and pleasantly he said
 That he "by joy-riding earned his daily bread"
 Ah, these were juncos in our midst, set with joy,
 A heavenly relish free from all alloy;
 Some of that bread of which the righteous eat,
 That others know not of—sustaining meat.

Here too REBECCA JOHNS sweet converse sought,
 With friends in union of faith and thought;
 With words which were the life and fire, she knew
 To labor as her Lord and Master drew,
 He next of purpose ardent in reproof,
 To those who stood from duty's path aloof;
 In public gatherings or in private life;
 To warn the giddy of impending strife,
 To rebuke the forward, and the bold, where
 A mild rebuke would do the work of fire—
 Instant in duty, though severe, yet kind,
 She showed the vigor of a heaven-led mind.

Samuel Emlen felt concerned often to look up the sick, weak, and halt of the flock; and for this purpose, in the latter part of his life, he kept a one horse chair, in which he rode about "doing good," in allusion to which practice he sometimes said, "I earned his bread by riding." He died the thirtieth of Twelfth Month, 1799, aged seventy-five.

"Surely never did nature and grace exert themselves in so powerful a manner, each for mastery, as in that awful period of time when the salvation of mankind was at stake, dependent on the obedience of the Son to his Father; when Christ was wounded for our transgressions, bruised for our iniquities, and the chastisement of our peace was upon Him; when He felt the terror of his Father for sin, who knew no sin; when the sword of God's indignation and justice pierced his soul; He might well drop that emphatical sentence, 'Now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say?' as if He had been afraid to let that petition escape his lips, which nature, sinking under the weight of oppression and apprehension of future misery, had naturally dictated,—well befitting a son that had never offended his parent, said He, 'Save me from this hour.' Grace immediately recalls the request, when He remembers the end of his coming in this prepared body, which was for our salvation, 'but for this cause came I unto this hour.' What could be grievous to his manhood that He did not suffer?—at his birth, a manger, a place for beasts, was his reception; nor did the ungrateful world afford Him much better through the course of his painful pilgrimage, for though the foxes had holes, and the birds of the air had nests, He had no place whereon to lay his head. Set at naught by the then visible churches and high professors of religion, a people who had received the oracles of God,—betrayed by one disciple, denied by another, forsaken of them all, and left to tread the wine-press alone in the most trying hour.

Many followed Him, crying Hosanna, when He rode in triumph, but none desirous to be his companions when He crossed the painful, ignominious death of the cross between two thieves, as a deceiver,—all his acquaintance, and even the women, the most tender by nature, that had followed Him from Galilee, stood now afar off. O, my soul! treasure up those things faithfully in thy remembrance, with this additional obligation, that all this was in part for thy sake, without which thou must have been irretrievably lost in the realms of woe, a fugitive and a vagabond, driven from the face of thy God! Rejoice then in tribulation, and count it all joy when thou faltest into divers temptations or trials, for the refining of thy faith in Christ."

THE HARVEST OF THE INSANE ASYLUMS.—Every industrial campaign increases the number of lunatics in the country. The institutions for the insane all expect their population to be augmented within a few months, from this cause. Protracted excitement, irregular habits, the loss of money in gambling bets, and in a few instances real heart sorrow at the defeat of a favorite candidate are among the exciting causes. When Clay was defeated the last time, a number of his enthusiastic admirers lost their reason. In the few days that we spent at the General Missionary Committee in Detroit we noticed three cases in that single State, one in McCob's Township, a young man of twenty-six who kept up a continual shriek of "16 to 1." Just over the line, in Indiana, a wealthy citizen who was particularly active in the work of the campaign, was in his delirium constantly shouted for Bryan and in apparently sane periods piteously bemoaned his fate. A young woman, a devotee of McKinley, was so delighted at his election that she leaped from the table and maniacally shouted, "Hurrah for McKinley!" emphasizing it by hurling a water pitcher in the face of her sister.

CAUSES OF INSANITY.—The causes of insanity are predisposing and exciting. Probably the predisposition was strong in all these cases, but as no one can tell without a trial how much excitement he can endure, and the trial may ruin him if he goes beyond a safe margin, in exciting times everyone should sleep more than usual and never lose self-control for an instant. Even in religion the man who neglects his meals and sings or shouts or talks to past mid-night, is in a bad way. The mighty revivals of Wesley were managed with due caution. He went to bed and compelled his ministers and helpers to go to bed at the usual hour, and he was known to rebuke most strenuously those who in this particular would not obey him.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"Under the impression of duty he committed to the flames all of his books, whose tendency was objectionable. The day preceding the reading of the record, in THE FRIEND, of this commendable incident in the early life of our lately removed, beloved friend, Clarkson Shepard, the writer received a letter from one who had had a birth-right in our religious Society, and who has been for some time engaged, in a small way, selling second-hand articles, including books and pamphlets. He wrote: "The old year closed with novels and trashy stuff all burned up, so far as I knew the bad. My range had no other fuel for all of one day, and I assure thee this made a very comfortable bed for body and mind alike. If our dear Father shall enable me to keep buying, this three hundred will be but the small end of lots of the same [demoralizing sort] coming amongst better goods, for my stove's warning." Recommending a general exercise of this process by fire, not even sparing elegant illustrations and fine bindings where the books are evidently of bad tendency, the writer adds the following extract, pertinent to the matter, from his tract "The Pernicious in Libraries!":

"One cannot, it has been sagely said, 'take fire into his bosom and not be burned.' Now, it is the spirit of judgment and of sacrifice that the times call for—when men shall be willing to 'come out, be separate, and touch not the unclean thing,' and when there shall be a readiness manifested to do, in effect, as did the convinced ones at Ephesus among whom 'the word of God grew mightily and prevailed,' in making an end by fire of their 'curious and entertaining, but soul-destroying books. Or, as did at a later day those Florentines whom the searching testimony of Savonarola pricked to the heart, and who in the great plaza of their beautiful city, burnt in one vast heap the pernicious books and all the other wretched trash which they were conscious had been instrumental in keeping them away from their God." J. W. L.

"A MOTTO button given with every package of "cigarettes." As the cigarette trade rarely lays its hand on any advertising device except to leave a noisome imprint, it need be no surprise to any one to be told that the buttons thus exploited are very often vulgar and of vile innuendo in language. Some recently used have been simply of a political cast; others, though seemingly morally harmless are calculated to encourage baldness and audacity between the sexes. In the schools at Patterson, New Jersey, the teachers finding that "motto-utton bad" was proving a powerful factor in advancing slang and vulgarity and promoting immorality among the children, took steps to suppress the nuisance. The assistant pastor of the Roman Catholic church of St. Vincent de Paul, at Williamsburg, New York, seeing that he craze had reached large proportions in his parochial school, called all the children together, and required them to hand up the obnoxious buttons. About one thousand were thus gathered, and after the campaign buttons had been returned to their owners, a bon-fire was made of the rest. That was the way of Svanorala, a Catholic priest also, in St. Louis, reproved the young men of his congregation for their vulgarity, by calling on them to hand to him the motto buttons they were wearing. A committee of the Woman's Town Improvement Association at Montclair, New Jersey, went into the stores where the buttons were sold, and in nearly all cases induced the tradesman to cease sending them. At Bridgeton, in the same State, when the State Convention of the W. C. T. U. was held here last autumn, a resolution was adopted protesting "against the manufacture and sale of motto buttons in cigarette packages as tending to corrupt the morals of youth." A merchant friend of mine, in Philadelphia, having sent me a sample book of the buttons, hoping that they were manufactured in Newark, New Jersey, the United States District Attorney for that district was communicated with, and the matter has been placed in the hands of a post-office inspector. Parents will need to exert themselves not a little if they have any solicitude about the suppression of his enemy of the home.—J. W. L. in Christian Statesman.

Isaac Sharp and the Flask of Brandy.
As I was going from London to Plymouth to take the Durabin Castle for Africa, a friend sitting next to me in the railway carriage said, "Hast thou any brandy with thee?" "No," I replied, "I do not take brandy." He said, "Thou art going into the wilds of Africa, and by life may depend upon it." He then took from his bag a flask of brandy and handed it to me. I knew that he did it in the kindness of his heart, and not wishing to offend him, I took it. I was in Africa when the heat of the sun was enough to make young ostriches blink, but that was certainly not the time to take brandy. Later in the year I was in New Zealand, and started, with my friend—Neave, to go from Christchurch to Nelson. When we came to that wonderful pass called Porters' Pass, those who were inclined to walk were invited by the coachman to do so. We met a rover coming along with his sheep, and, looking up at Donald, the coachman, he said, "You had better stay where you are." But Donald was in charge of Her Majesty's mails, and he went on until we got three thousand feet above the level of the sea, and there our coach stuck and fast in the snow. One of the proprietors of the coach was with us, and he said, "Donald, it's no use; you cannot get on. Not if I do not try," said he. I admired his luck and determination. We were within three miles of where we wished to go, and he shipped up the horses. They plunged and careed and finally broke the harness, and Donald was obliged to give in. He kindly offered me one of the horses, but, as the snow was falling thick and fast, I thought it better to stay where I was rather than to take the risk of being lost in the snow. Discretion is said to be the better part of valour, and I believe it was that night. But I must tell you that the curtains of the carriage did not meet by about three inches, and when we sat there and the midnight blast came through, it was pretty cold. We remained there from five o'clock in the afternoon until nine o'clock the next morning. But was that the time to take brandy? Not a bit of it. It would have made bad worse, as some of you know very well. Well, I journeyed on through different parts of the world, carrying the flask with me. I was in jeopardy in one place, because had it been known that I carried brandy, I would have been heavily fined—that was in the Indian territory. To make a long story short, however, I may tell you that at the end of six and a quarter years I met my dear friend. I said I had to thank him again, as I had already done, for the loan of the flask, and that it now gave me great pleasure to return it to him. I said that I verily believed that there was brandy in it, but I did not know certain because the cork had never been drawn.—Temperance Record.

The Distribution of Wealth in America.

The following interesting article from the Christian Advocate of New York may tend to lessen the apprehensions of those who have been evidently afraid of the accumulation of wealth and power in the hands of a few.

"The rich may be growing richer. It so, and honestly, none need complain. The poor are not growing poorer, whatever may be the social injustices inflicted upon working people. Average wages have increased from two hundred and fifty-five dollars per annum in 1850 to three hundred and sixty-five dollars in 1880, and still higher figures in 1896, and the sum of human comfort has more than doubled in the same time.

"Savings are larger than ever before. The State of New York presents an example of popular prosperity more or less characteristic of all the States. On June 30, 1896, the Superintendent of the State Banking Department showed that in the fiscal year then closing the resources of the savings banks had increased $41,240,196; the amount due depositors had increased $47,766,883; the number of depositors had increased 77,953; deposits during the year had increased $16,880,859, and interest credited to depositors had increased $1,564,458. The total resources of all the savings banks were $806,751,426; due depositors, $715,032,899; surplus (July 1, 1896), $91,307,370; number of depositors, 1,732,382; number of accounts opened during the year, 346,147; number of accounts closed during the year, 268,189; amount of deposits received, $215,490,558; amount of deposits withdrawn, $194,652,293; amount of interest credited to depositors, $24,958,727; current expenses of the banks, $2,397,496.

"These figures are simply magnificent. Their significance is wonderful. In any other country they would be regarded with pride and gratitude as indices of social prosperity. More than one in four twenty-six out of every one hundred of the people in the State are savings bank depositors, whose money is skillfully handled for them at the low cost of three and one-third mills per dollar per year. They avail themselves of what are business philanthropic institutions, scientifically guarded by legal restrictions against loss or wrong.

Wealth is more evenly divided than in any prior era of American history. There is money at interest in savings banks to the extent of more than one hundred dollars for every man, woman, and child in the Knickerbocker commonwealth, and the average amount is annually augmenting. The 1,732,382 depositors are all creditors at the rate of four hundred and twelve dollars apiece. More than half the people in the State of New York are directly interested in savings bank accumulations, and they are—almost exclusively—of the common people. Industry, thrift, integrity created these accumulations, and will preserve them at their gold value. Every dollar is an argument convincing, conclusive, beneficent.

The mightiest "money power" in the republic is in the hands of such depositors—"the potentates of the dinner pail," who, in banks and savings banks, trust and building and loan associations, hold investments aggregating $5,330,000,000, owned by 10,000,000 thrifty folks, whose holdings average about five hundred dollars apiece—some of them more than that sum, others only a few dollars. This vast army of plain, good-sense, excellent people hold the foremost liens upon the assets of our great insurance companies. Out of their ranks issue the millionaires of to-morrow.

A WISE DOG.—The London Spectator tells the following story: "A collie in Scotland, whom I know well, is in the habit of leaping from his master's room slippers, cap, keys or anything he is sent for. One day, sent on the errand, he did not re-appear. His master followed, and found that the door of the bedroom had blown to, and that the dog was a prisoner. Some days later he was again told to fetch something, and as the wind was high his master after a few minutes' delay, followed him. He found him in the act of fixing the door firmly back with the door mat, which he had rolled up for the purpose; and, having taken this precaution, the prudent animal proceeded to look for the slippers. This same collie, when walking with me, ran in front and rang the gate bell of the house to which I was going, so that I had not to wait when I arrived there."

A SAVING IMPULSE.—In First Month, 1896, the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., was startled by the sudden fall of the Willey Building on Wood Street. A few moments after the catastrophe occurred, a stranger who was gazing at the wrecked structures from the opposite side of Wood Street entered into a conversation with a Dispatch reporter. He looked a good deal agitated and said:

"For about five years on every week-day I have passed along that side of Wood Street at about the hour this terrible disaster occurred. To-day I was on my way to Fifth Avenue, and had reached the Chamber of Commerce Building when a sudden impulse came upon me to take the other side of the street. I crossed over, and before I reached the sidewalk the crash came. Had I kept along as I was going I would have been in front of the Willey Building just in time to be crushed by bricks and falling timber. I can no more account for the action which probably saved my life than you can; I simply felt that I must do so, and I do not know that I felt even a premonition of danger."

"The Lord shall guide thee continually" (Isa. lviii: 11). "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord" (Ps. xxxvii: 23). "Who-so is wise and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving kindness of the Lord" (Ps. cvii: 43).—Exchange.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 6, 1897.

The Spirit of the Lord operating on the heart of man is the root and ground of religious growth; and experience shows that it pleases Him from whom comes every good and perfect gift, to make use of servants in his cause, whose eyes are not fully opened to see the mysteries of his kingdom.

We have recently been impressed with this fact in reading the experiences of a man named Dalling, a minister of the Church of England, who labored for a number of years in the town of Portsmouth, England, endeavoring to elevate the character of the people in that place, when religion and morality was to a very low ebb. He was a very laborious, self-sacrificing man, who spared no pains to benefit the poor people under his care, and much success appears to have attended his efforts; and yet his religious views were such as seem to us very outward, and not likely to be productive of much good. He was very high church, and appears to have placed his chief dependence on daily masses, and the partaking of his congregation in bread and wine over which he had said the prescribed formula. His case is an illustration of the fact, that it sometimes pleases the Almighty to bless the labors of those who are in a state of partial blindness, where there is a sincere desire to promote his cause.

A letter from a valuable Friend in one of the country districts of New York Yearly Meeting relates the following incident:

"Some ten or more years since, during our Quarterly Meeting, two of our members were sitting on our porch singing very loudly. It was trying to my feelings, I told them I was pleased to entertain them, but did not approve of their singing. And I am well satisfied if those who were not in favor of it being practised in our meetings had raised their voices against it; the condition of our Society would have been much better than it is at present [in this matter] as well as [in respect] to other departments from consistent Quakerism."

We have introduced this extract, in hopes that it may impress on the minds of others, the importance of maintaining a faithful testimony to our principles and practices. The word of the Lord that came to the prophet Ezekiel, was that if he did not declare the warnings that were given him to communicate, the blood of those that perished should be required at his hands. Does not a measure of similar responsibility rest upon those in our day, who, through timidity, or other unworthy motive, fail to uphold the standard of truth and righteousness?

CORRECTION.—The Friend who sent us the manuscript copy of the poem "Midnight Musings," printed on page 136 of THE FRIEND, writes to us that the author's name is Hatfield—not Hatfield; that in the last line of the first stanza "brightest" should read "lightest," and that the word "loved" should be inserted before "ones" in the first line of the tenth stanza.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—A treaty for the settlement of the Alaskan boundary was signed in Washington on the 23d ult, by Secretary Olney and the British Ambassador.

Many prominent citizens have signed a memorial to the United States Senate, urging the prompt ratification of the proposed arbitration treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

In 1897 the Senate of the United States and the House of Representatives adopted the following concurrent resolution: "That the President be and is hereby requested to invite from time to time, as fit occasions may arise, negotiations with any Government with which the United States has or may have diplomatic relations, to the end that any differences between the United States and the two Governments, which cannot be adjusted by diplomatic agency, may be referred to arbitration, and be peaceably adjusted by such means."

The United States debt statement shows a net increase in the public debt, less the Treasury, during First Month of $15,978,723. Total cash in the Treasury, $858,553,910.

The following United States Senators were elected last week: Republicans, John C. Spooner, Wisconsin, and George F. Turner, Washington. The last named is of free silver proclivities, and is a Populist. Silver Republican, John P. Jones, of Nevada. Populists, Joseph H. Earle, South Carolina, R. Harris, Kansas, and Henry Heitfeld, Idaho.

The fusionists in the Oklahoma Legislature have passed a bill prohibiting gold contracts in the territory and also one abolishing the militia, declaring it to be "the instrument of a corrupt central government, used to the oppression of the people."

The New York correspondent of the Public Ledger says: "Much has been written concerning 'Greater New York,' but few have any conception how great a city it will be. Only London will exceed it in population, wealth and business. Its area will be 306 square miles or 194,840 acres. It will have an estimated population of 3,430,000. Its bonded debt will be $216,481,593. Its annual tax budget will exceed $53,000,000. The assessed value of its real estate (New York, Brooklyn and Staten Island) will amount to $2,207,091,000. Its parks and park lands will comprise 7536 acres, not counting several big roadways, such as the Harlem Speedway and the Coney Island Boulevard, which are under Park control. The city will have seven bridges across the Harlem and one across the East River. Another East River bridge has been started, and one across the North River is projected. There are thirty three different ferries. The forty-five lines of street railway carry 792,000,000 passengers every year over 454 miles of track. There will be 1000 street cars under Park control. There are 218 banks and banking institutions in New York and Brooklyn alone, and the clearings of the Clearing House aggregate $28,000,000,000 a year. The big city will transact a considerably more than one-half the foreign commerce of the country. These statistics give some idea of the immensity of the new city for which the charter has just been completed."

During 1896 the big Anaconda copper mine in Montana, earned a profit of $4,000,000, the output in that year being 107,000,000 pounds of copper, nearly 500,000 ounces of silver, and about 15,000 ounces of gold. More than $1,000,000 was spent in improvements.

The 250 savings institutions in Massachusetts had 1,249,068 depositors at the close of last year, with $45,220,257 to their credit.

The snow storm of the night of the 27th ult, was general throughout this State, and from six to ten inches of snow fell in the city, and in some of the country roads were badly drifted. In several instances trolley roads have been obliged to suspend the running of cars, as the cuts on their lines are choked with snow.

Advices from the Cheyenne Indian Agency, in South Dakota, state that, as a result of the recent cold wave—three Indians froze in their tents, and 300 others will die from the effect of the exposure. Thousands of head of cattle perished in the storm, and 300 were found dead in one place.

George B. Roberts, President of the Pennsylvania Rail Road Company, died on the 30th ult, at the family home in Philadelphia, of Bright's disease.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 576, which is 108 more than the previous week, and 576 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 261 were males and 295 females; 107 died of pneumonia; 72 of consumption; 49 of heart disease; 34 of diphtheria; 23 of cholera; 22 of apoplexy; 18 of paralysis; 17 of nephritis; 16 of Bright's disease; 16 of cancer; 13 of convulsions; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of marasmus; 10 of rheumatism, and 9 from casualties.

FOREIGN.—The Globe, commenting upon the modification of the arbitration treaty, says: "The Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate have left the treaty meaningless, and it would be discredit to the American sense of duty if they should approve of a treaty as it has been altered."

The Pull-Mull Gazette says: "The committee is doing its best to make hay with the treaty. It has not done, to brave public opinion in withholding its approval absolutely, but it has left the treaty without value."

It is semi-officially announced that if the negotiations for an arbitration treaty are resumed between France and the United States it will not be until the Anglo-American treaty is definitely concluded.

It has been estimated that the subscribed capital of the brewing and distillery firms in the United Kingdom amounts to $250,000,000, while the market value of the shares is nearly double that amount.

Spain is reported to have been the largest importer of the production of amber last year in Germany worth about 440 tons, or nearly 100 tons more than in the previous year. By far the larger portion of the amber quantity is put out by the two mines of Palanico and Kraxepellen, belonging to the firm of Stantien & Becker, while the smaller portion is obtained by dredging and searching the shores of the Baltic Sea.

A draft of the reforms demanded by the Powers in Turkey has at last been presented to the Sultan through Baron Calice, the President of the Ambassadorial conferences. The Sultan is to govern through his Ministers, and not through the palace functionaries and the administration of justice is also to be reformed. An official report shows that there have been 438 cases of the bubonic plague in Bombay and 325 deaths, and 694 cases and 644 deaths from the plague in Karachi. Thoroughly reliable and independent Indian advisers concur in stating that relief will be required for about 3,500,000 people before the fairer states, the period of relief extending to Ninth Month. It is estimated that the total extent of the famine will be 14 million and eight millions next.

Twenty-five thousand four hundred and seventy-eight immigrants arrived in Canada during 1896; against 25,571 in 1895. Of these 8,645 went thence to the United States, as against 654 the previous year.

1870.—Ninth Month 19th.—In a letter to a friend, she says: "We gave in our minutes on a bird day morning, and since then have felt a quiet peace. It seems to me, I am to have good, long rest." In the same letter she writes, "Ah this undercurrent of peace in Him, ow it buoy up the soul above the waves, which sometimes threaten to overwhelm. All hidden in Him! Let the world pass by as it will; it cannot harm us if we be followers of that which is good. Let us then be of good cheer, and so overcome as He, our blessed Lord, vercame. My little flock have gathered in, seven of them (a few more expected), and we are journeying lovingly together. . . . I am trying to centre my interest and strength for the winter, with my little ones. Sometimes my courage fails, but 'God is our strength and our portion forever.' Is it not so? for He promises never to leave nor forsake, and I think we shall be kept by his power. Nothing in our selves as of ourselves, but all his goodness and mercy. Oh, my dear friends, let us bind on the shield of faith and faithfulness yet more closely."

Tenth Month 31st.—The diary continues: "A day of great humiliation! Shortly after taking my seat in meeting the words arose, 'It is appointed unto all men once to die, and after death the judgment.' There is no returning back to rectify mistakes. I had to revive them with a little reference to their solemnity and a desire that all might dwell lowly and watchfully on as to be enabled to walk worthy of that blessed sentence, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world.' Shortly after, dear S. F. arose with the remainder of the passage, 'So Christ was once offered to bear the sins of many, and unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without sin unto salvation,' and enlarged so sweetly upon the offices of Christ. If my Heavenly Father would only give me the power to do others good! Thy will be done in me, Oh, Lord."

Eleventh Mo. 6th.—D. B., from New York State, at our meeting morning and afternoon. He seems wonderfully enabled to illustrate Scripture, and words flow so easily. My prayer for him is that he may speak only the pure Word from the Fountain. Dined with my beloved friends E. and S. A. Richie, and was so glad to meet our Elkland friend Eleanor Battin. I am bowed in thankfulness to learn that one in that land is faithful as the Lord showed me she should be, and enabled me to speak plainly to her in regard to the ministry.

Twelfth Month 10th.—Meeting this morning was silent. While sitting with my friends this afternoon, I felt the desire to arise to dig and beg before the Most High for the arising of his life in our midst, and I soon found it to be his will that I should refer to it in testimony, and endeavored to encourage every traveller Zionward that they might see his face, and to sow to the Spirit that they may reap eternal life, for unto such He will arise as a morning without clouds. One week ago it seemed required that I should go to Woodbury and attend a meeting there. There seemed to be a wrestling for life, and they were encouraged to wait before the Lord, that He might prepare the sacrifice himself. God will provide himself a Lamb for a burnt offering.

1871.—New Year's night.—Oh, Father, help me. Oh, my Father, preserve me from falling away, and draw me nearer to thyself in spirit, that I may be a fruit-bearing branch, doing only thy will. Have mercy upon me, and give me wisdom. Oh, Father, be pleased to give me more of thy Holy Spirit to help me, that I may move only as thou wilt.

Fourth Month 9th.—Week after week bring new evidences of my Heavenly Father's goodness and mercy to me, but I do not serve Him as much in near abiding in Him as I wish I could. This day I felt humbled, having to rise twice in meeting, but cannot find condemnation. The Yearly Meeting is approaching. Oh, that thou, Holy Father, would stand in our midst, and chain down all improper feelings and subdue all unto thyself.

Second day, 10th.—Our Select Preparative Meeting to-day. We had some life amongst us; some lively elders. E. Pears, so lively and gentle and true. L. Starr said, "If we waited to feel first, Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel, our offerings would be in the life, and would reach the witness, or bear the evidence to others who were alive." C. W. said, "Words without life were burdensome." E. Richie made a few remarks in regard to waiting—"We were not to wait for something to say, but wait on God." S. F. Balderson came with a heart full of love and expressed the same; said "I were to feel freedom with and not to be only one of another." L. B. Kite, "Search me, Oh, God, and know my heart," etc. There were other lively spirits.

First-day, Yearly Meeting week.—We were favored with a good meeting this morning. Morris Cope—"I am the true vine," etc.; P. W. Roberts, "The kingdom of heaven is within you," Thomas Yarnall, "The foundation sure," etc.; A. W. Hall, "Cast me not off in time of old age; forsake me not when my strength fail-eth," etc. There were some who had long fought the fight of faith, and some who had fought but a short time, but these were all encouraged. E. A. had thought of the preciousness of the love of God shed abroad in our hearts. There was a difference between feeling the touches of his love, and realizing it to be shed abroad in our hearts. Clarkson Sheppard, in an earnest supplication, just my heart's desire.

Susanna Lightfoot said in her last sickness, that she remembered when young she perceived the spirit of supplication to move from one end of the gallery to the other before anyone would give up to it, and remarks, "Oh, it is a fine thing to sit lively in meetings, and to witness the Holy Oil to run from vessel to vessel." So it seemed to me, a few moments before C. S. knelt. The spirit of supplication was there, but it was not my place, and I was rejoiced to hear his voice, rejoiced that evidence was thus given that the Master was with us, giving us fellowship with Him and one with another.

Sixth Month 25th.—All day at home; also last First-day, on account of my brother Sidas' illness. We have very little hope of his recovery. . . . It seems very sweet and pleasant, thankful for many mercies and desirous of saying—struggling to say, "Thy will be done."

About four o'clock on First-day, the second of Seventh Month, we thought he was passing from us, but he revived and continued until quarter past twelve o'clock, when he passed very quietly to his eternal rest. A song of praise was frequently on his lips for the many mercies granted to him.

In the Eighth Month of this year, he attended Bucks Quarterly Meeting, of which she writes: "Altogether it was a dull time in spiritual things to me. Was it my fault, or was it that the people sit so little in hunger and thirst after Christ's righteousness; filled with their own attainments, mourning because others do not do just as they think right, yet neglecting the living work in themselves. Oh, my God, make us all sensible as to what is our condition before thee, and give us thy restoring grace, that we may serve thee, and thee only. Oh, lead us to the true place of prayer and cause us to be frequent there. Look upon those whose souls are exercised before thee and hear their cry."

She spent part of the Ninth and Tenth months of this year with her friends W. and D. S. at Bryn Mawr. On the eighth of Tenth Month, she writes in her diary: "We visited Merion Meeting to-day, a very small meeting indeed, but I believe our Heavenly Father would have the living in Israel encouraged."

In relation to this visit, she writes to a friend, "Two weeks ago I felt like sitting with the little company at Merion. Our meeting here commenced at eleven o'clock. We started a little after nine o'clock, and rode down towards Overbrook Station, but no one seemed to know where the meeting-house was, at least five minutes before eleven. We drove up to George Randolph's to inquire. They directed us a mile down the pike, and we found the place about twelve minutes after eleven. It was a little company indeed, none in the galleries. I was reminded of the time when the disciples were assembled, and the doors being shut, our Saviour appeared, and said, "Peace be unto you," etc. A few minutes before twelve, Henry Morris arose. It was their usual time for closing the meeting, but he felt he had received his penny, and thought others could say so, too; it was a very short meeting for all."

Under the same date she says in her diary: "As I ride along day by day," to and from her school in the city, "the foliage in the forest increases in beauty. Such beautiful scenes, and to feel with Cowper the thrill of joy that, 'My Father made them all, is such secret satisfaction. My health seems to be improving, and I have to feel so grateful to our gracious Heavenly Parent for inclining the hearts of my dear friends towards me, just at a time when I was in need. Gracious and merciful art thou, Oh, Lord."

15th.—W. and D. took me to Germantown Meeting to-day. I sat with Friends there, as a little child, not knowing that He would call for service. A little word from the "Prisoners of Hope," arose and they were encouraged to trust in the Lord, and unexpectedly thoughts came entirely new to me. Society seemed like a ship sailing for eternity, and the members thereof as stately trees, which should be subject to the Great Mass or Builder, that they may be squared and fitted to their proper places. We returned home grateful for the day's favors.

AN OLD SEA CAPTAIN.—Captain James Watson, of Westchester, N. Y., who died at the great age of ninety-eight, retained his mental and physical vigor to a remarkable degree up to the day of his death. He was a retired sea captain, and his ancestral acres in Westchester County have constituted an historic landmark for more than a century. He was born in the old homestead there, and when fifteen years of age went on his first voyage as a cabin boy in the Havre packet ship Courier. Fenimore Cooper and George Blunt (the latter afterward noted as a nautical publisher in New York city) were cabin boys on the same ship. Watson worked himself up, step by step, to the rank of captain, and it was often said of him that he was one of the most popular navigators. In consequence of his high standing his vessel, the Virginia, was chosen by the government three generations ago to bring the French indemnity money to this country. About fifty years ago Captain Watson retired from active sea life. His recollections were always of interest, especially those of the war of 1812. He was one of the lads who helped to throw up breastworks in defense of New York city against the British, and he also saw the British fleet lying in Westchester Creek.—The Outlook.

THE VALUE OF APPLES.—A Brooklyn physician translates the following from a German writer: "The apple is such a common fruit that few persons are familiar with its remarkably efficacious medicinal properties. Everybody ought to know that the very best thing they can do is to eat apples just before going to bed. The apple is excellent brain food, because it has more phosphoric acid, in an easily-digestible shape, than any other fruit known. It excites the action of the liver, promotes sound and healthy sleep, and thoroughly disinfects the mouth. It also agglutinates the surplus acids of the stomach, helps the kidney secretions, and prevents calculus growth, while it obviates indigestion and is one of the best preventives of disease of the throat. Next to the lemon and orange, it is also the best antidote for the thirst and craving of persons addicted to the alcohol and opium habit."—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Fallen Rose.

The remarks of the Editor of THE FRIEND, in No. 27, on the removal of so many by death from among us of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting were examples to the flock—men and women sanctified by Divine Grace and devoted to the service of Christ—may well claim our serious consideration, and incite us who are left on the stage of action a little longer to increased concern, as the Editor says, "So to live in communion with God as to hear his voice, and be prepared to do his will, so that the work of the Church may still be carried on." While we may truly mourn for the loss the Church has lately sustained in the removal of these worthies, it may be said of them, comparatively speaking, as was said of Moses at his death, "His eye was not dim, nor his natural force abated." It is comforting in thinking of those worthies of our day who were as leaders of the flock towards the land of promise, whom the Lord after taking them as to the "top of Pisgah," giving them a sight and sense of the heavenly Jerusalem as He gave Moses a sight of the land of promise, has taken them from us, that it may be said of them, their spiritual eye was not dim, nor the force of their Christian character abated.

What was, in itself, a very simple circumstance, occurred with the writer last summer, that led to instructive and impressive thoughts. Seeing a rose bush well laden with bloom, I thought to pluck a rose to hand to a child then present, when lo, as the hand touched it, the beautiful flower fell to the earth. In an instant it had fallen to pieces. A feeling of impressive sadness, which is yet fresh with me as I think of it, came over me in seeing how suddenly, how unexpectedly, the rose, so beautiful, so fragrant a moment before, now fallen to the earth from a slight touch of the hand. Then the thought followed, that though one might be sad at seeing such a beautiful flower so quickly gone, who might not desire when the hand of death touches them, to be found, if consistent with the Divine will, thus clothed with all the freshness and fragrance of a Christian life. But it is not for us to choose, for an all-wise Creator has seen fit that many bright flowers in his creation should remain on the stem that binds to earth, until nothing seems to be left for us to admire; we can think of how brightly they once shone and how fragrant they had been, but how changed. Ah! may be an All-wise Providence has so ordered it that they may ripen seed. So has He a purpose in lengthening out the lives of some persons, until it seems as if we had to look backward, if we would view them as beautiful plants in his garden. Let us not doubt his wisdom.

Choice plants have been removed from among us just at the time when perhaps, like myself with the rose, I was admiring its beauty and its fragrance without the feelings ascending higher than to the plant itself—not sufficiently alive to the thought that the rose did not make itself, neither had it the power to remain to please the eye and gratify with its fragrance. A frail thing it was, in all its beauty. A touch with the hand and it falls. Is there not a need for us at this day, dear Friends, to ever bear in mind more than we do, how frail we are of ourselves, that whatever there may be of heavenly beauty and fragrance in our lives, it is all of grace. As our Saviour thanked the Father for hiding the things of his kingdom from the wise and prudent, and revealing them unto babes, even so may we rejoice that He does still reveal these things unto his little ones. But if we should so admire the plants that He has planted and cased to be watered, and "God has given the increase," as to forget to render all the praise where alone it is due, He may see meet as in a moment, when our admiration is highest, to cause the choicest flower in his garden to fall to the earth with what might seem like a slight touch of the un-sparing hand of death. There certainly is a cause for one after another being removed from among us in the midst of their usefulness, and of the Society's need, as we think. "Let us examine ourselves." Let us forever bear in mind that however favored any may be, we of ourselves are as nothing. Christ is all in all to his humble, dependent children, and his promise to these is, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world."

Scripture Illustration.

"THE DAY OF PENTECOST."—"The 'feast of weeks,' or Pentecost, had come to be more universally observed, by attendance at the temple worship, on the part of those Jews who were living in Gentile countries, than the passover itself. For this there were, possibly, two reasons. Not only was the week observed as the feast of the first fruits,—that is, a thanksgiving for the harvest,—but also there was added a commemoration of the giving of the law on the fiftieth day after the departure from Egypt. Since the destruction of Jerusalem this latter has been the chief object of the festival, since the Jews, landless almost everywhere, have ceased to be connected with agriculture. A second reason for the popularity of the festival may have been that the observance fell on a time of year more suitable for travelling than the early spring.

"Jews, Devout Men, Out of Every Nation Under Heaven."—It is to be remembered that long before the desolation of the land by the Roman Titus the Jews had been scattered through every part of the known world, from the frontiers of the then known world in the East to the farthest Spain. There were no Gentiles, unless they may have been proselytes, among the thousands who listened to Peter. The writers of that time were in the habit of speaking of three dispersions,—the first when the kingdom of Israel was destroyed by Shalmaneser, and the ten tribes were transplanted to the eastern confines of his empire, to Persia and Parthia; the second, the captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, who caused the plantation of many thousand Jews in the region between the Euphrates and the Tigris, where their descendants still remain, as isolated and distinct a race as everywhere else, although for twenty-five hundred years their ancestors have had no home in Palestine. The third dispersion was when, after the death of Alexander the Great, Ptolemy Lagos transplanted many into Egypt until it was said that there were more Jews in Alexandria than in Jerusalem, and more Jews than Greeks in Alexandria. It is from this last dispersion, rather than from the captive after the fall of Jerusalem, that the Jewish donies to be found in every city in North Africa, probably derived their origin. They have penetrated far beyond the coast. In the case of the Sahara large numbers of Jews are to be found, with features most indistinctly Hebrew, and yet in color far darker than the Arabs. I have seen many, especially in the Sabæan cases, darker than a Hindu. These are known as the black Jews, and I was much interested by being told on several occasions that they had nothing to do with the rejection of Christ, because their ancestors had left Palestine long before his time. To such expatriated donists Hebrew had become, even two thousand years ago, merely a literary and dead language, studied, indeed, by all, but not used in ordinary concerns of life. So, at the present day, the Jews in London have a peculiar jargon, known as Yiddish,—a barbarous mixture of Hebrew with German, Polish, or Russian, as the case may be. And, in like manner, at the times of the apostles, the Jews of Parthia, of Rome would speak a widely different dialect, their mother-tongue being adulterated by language of the land of their adoption. The story of the "parts of Libya about Cyrene" is especially interesting, though Cyrene itself is now a desolation, when we notice the number of Hebrew colonies in all the scattered oases to the south of it. While the aborigines and the benedict and Greek settlers have vanished before the Arab invaders, and left no trace behind, the Jew has remained, and now is really the oldest inhabitant of those parts.—S. S. Times.

FOR THE FRIEND.

Word in Season is Better Than Fine Gold.
Oh ye servants of the Most High, draw near unto God, for here is safety that will keep and staid through all the trials of time. With such a Heavenly Guide, what need we fear to go forth and obey his every command. If we abide in true and faithful obedience unto God, I will be well with us here and hereafter; and that greater reward can we think of, or ask, than to feel the presence of our Saviour, and his tender love filling our hearts to overflowing, then if we are commanded, let us go forth and break the bread of life, and administer the same to hungry, thirsty souls, that such these may have strength to arise and journey forth towards the holy city of our God, as instruments in his mighty Hand, to draw many unto the Heavenly garner, there to partake of the pure fountain of eternal life. Oh, great is the reward of the faithful servants of the Lord. I would that many may come forth,—from the East and West, and from the North and South, and proclaim the wisdom and power of God. That there may be a turning and overturning by the mighty hand of our God, bringing forth fruits of righteousness, that it may cover the earth as the waters cover the sea; that many may be brought forth that sit in deep mourning, and show forth the great wisdom and power of God, as revealed within the heart, by and through the spirit of the dear Son of God.

The call has gone forth from Him who rules the Heavens and on the earth. Oh, ye that could receive the blessing of God, come forth. Why will you tarry in deep mourning, wearing the sackcloth underneath; come forth and gather in the tender lambs that are bleating and cunnings to and fro, and thus find no rest for the soles of their feet. Oh, I feel the command has gone forth, Arise ye that have heard the sound of the trumpet, even the voice of the Lord saying, Why will you tarry and lose your reward, by burying your talents in the earth.

Yes, my spirit yearns on behalf of the blind, and those that will not hear the still low voice that speaks within the heart, that would guide and lead all those that will give heed to the tender entreaties of Him who suffered and died upon the cross, to redeem all that will be willing to partake of the fullness of his redeeming love.

The Place of Progressive Euchre.

"Euchre for Charity" in aid of the Jewish Maternity Home. One hundred and fifty tables will be provided in the banquet hall of the building obtained for the festive occasion; upward of sixty handsome prizes will be awarded, after which there will be a dance. In aid of the building fund of the new Roman Catholic Church of our Lady of Mercy, a progressive euchre party will be given in the Second Regiment Armory, three hundred tables to be provided, and more than two hundred valuable prizes. The euchre party has been decided upon by the ladies of the congregation as a popular means of raising funds towards the necessarily heavy expenses connected with a building of such magnitude as the projected church. The Hotel — presented a remarkable scene last evening, when over eleven hundred persons engaged in a progressive euchre party there, in aid of the Samaritan Hospital. The prizes, one hundred in all, were varied and beautiful. In aid of St. Luke's Homeopathic Hospital, the largest euchre party, it is said, composed exclusively of ladies, ever held in this city, took place yesterday. A progressive euchre party, at which there will be over one hundred tables, is to be given at the Broad Street Drawing Rooms, for the relief of the sick and wounded Cuban soldiers. Dancing will follow the euchre.

The above are samples of newspaper announcements and reports concerning euchre-for-charity entertainments similar to hundreds that are being given in all the cities this winter. At seaside hotels, such as those of Atlantic City, the play has become the absorbing winter pastime; while for evenings and dull days at the summer resorts generally it appears to hold first place as a dis-sipation. It would be very unnecessary to quote from "The Week in Vanity Fair" columns of the daily papers to show to how great an extent the parlors of private houses are used for progressive euchre parties.

My impression of the game of euchre had always been that it was a quite respectable kind of gambling—though when it comes to grading that vice, I know of no kind that can in any wise be labelled as respectable. When a man has been boldly cheated out of this or that piece of personal property, the vicious character of the transaction is thought to be sufficiently indicated when he is said to have been "euchred out of it." Now, this play of progressive euchre, with which fashionable society has been so much taken of late years, has been judicially defined with a good deal of clearness. Here is what two judges, of the States of Kentucky and Tennessee, respectively, have to say concerning it:

In his charge to the Grand Jury of Hamilton County, Tenn., perhaps two years ago, Judge Moon, at Chattanooga, using the following clear language: "Not only is gambling carried on in regular gambling resorts, but people of high standing and respectability gamble. They may not put down money, but they set an example for others in playing for prizes and awards. In these progressive euchre games these persons play for fine pictures or gold headed canes. Examples are set that are a violation of the law, and it is just as demoralizing as common gambling. A conviction of one man of a higher class, is better, as an example, than the conviction of only ordinary people for common gambling."

Similarly, Judge Green, of Kentucky, in his charge to the Grand Jury of Boone County, in that State, took occasion lately to give his view of the difference between progressive euchre as known in society, and what is spoken of as common gambling. He said, "I don't know anything about progressive euchre, but I know that when two 'one-gallus' fellows play cards for money, or other property, down in a hollow, that is gambling. Progressive means advancing, and when parties deal in silks, satins, broad-cloth, diamonds, gold watches and gold chains meet in a parlor and play a series of games, and upon the result of the series the property in the prizes changes ownership, I think the game has progressed very far from the 'one-gallus' fellows in the hollow, but it is still gambling."

The substitution of every scheme of gambling or gain-getting through men's chance, is from the one malignant root. It is a bad thing for the Italian news-boy to pitch pennies and to throw dice. It is a bad and risky thing for the negro in the "slams" to be found playing policy. The merchant's clerk who has so far surrendered his sense of self-respect as to gamble for a bicycle, ought to bend very low over his unworthy and unlawfully acquired wheel at the recollection of the loss of moral uprightness that it has cost him. The lady possessor of a sofa that has been gotten by progressive euchre, as she blandly waves her visitor to be seated,—well, it isn't altogether re-aversing to reflect how the non-discriminating Kentucky judge ranges progressive euchre winners with the common gambling "gallus" fellows in the hollow. The manifestations of the lottery distemper are many and very varied, and may afflict when not witnessed all classes and conditions of society. A sound, moral sentiment in the community regarding it will most effectually hold it in check.

At present that sentiment is very far from sound, while there are influences tending to weaken it coming from the side of those who we might reasonably suppose would have a care how they engaged in practices that a just construction of the law would not sustain them in. Thus, there was a public euchre party, such as indicated in the first paragraph of this paper, given last winter at a large hall in Philadelphia, at which as appeared by the newspaper list of the participants, female members of the families of some of our judiciary, the magistracy, the district attorney's office, the city council and of others officially interested in the city's administration, were represented. Under these circumstances it would seem as though the judicial condemnation of this kind of card-playing for stakes must bristle with difficulties.

The highly pernicious consequence of such examples in helping to extend the gambling evil, already alarmingly widespread, may be gathered from such a paragraph as the following, taken from the New York letter of the Public Ledger a few days before these lines were written. It is one of the best known of metropolitan bank officials who is quoted by the correspondent. Having stated that for ten years he had made the subject of bank failures and their mismanagement a matter of close study in order to ascertain the true causes of weakness, he thus illustrates some of the points taken:

"The banks of an inland city have this year been obliged to stand a loss of $800,000 in loans made to one man of the town. They must have known the first life he was living, the orgies he was conducting on his yacht, and the like, but they shut their eyes to it all, and loaned him the money. They thought he had a profitable business and didn't care how he was living. This man came to me for a loan, but I refused it, because I knew what his habits were, just as I refused a loan to-day to a merchant whose business is undoubtedly sound, but who, I have discovered, is gambling and playing the races."

But, Poker and Playing the Races, as the two judges below the Ohio have shown us, are very brothers and boon companions of Progressive Eucharie. The crazing effects, the squandering of money, and drop in the moral tone, are the like symptoms of each.

[Since the preparation of the editorial comments on Hodzkin's Life of G. Fox, the following remarks have been received from another source.—Ed.]

George Fox.

By Thomas Hodgkin. B. C. L. Withen & Co., 36 Essex St., W. C. London, 1870.

The above is a small work of about three hundred pages, having for its frontispiece a portrait of George Fox, taken from the supposed picture alleged to have been painted by Sir Peter Lely. The preface informs that there are frequent quotations from Barclay's Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth, a work of more than doubtful authority as to its facts, so far as they relate to the Society of Friends, and wholly unreliable as respects the conclusions drawn therefrom.

Many of the pages bear clear evidence that the views of the compiler of the Inner Life have been largely interwoven in this narrative. The position and character of George Fox are presented in a light which Friends have never adopted, and which but few, even in the present day, will be prepared to accept.

The author thinks that as Presbyterianism was the dominant form of church government during the earlier part of George Fox's career, that it was not high sacramental teaching or discourses on the Apostolical Succession which his soul revolted at; that the Episcopal parsons and squires who were the chief agents in persecuting Friends, during a long period of the Society's early history, were not the chief objects of his religious polemic, and that it was Calvinistic teaching against which he bore his most persistent protest. Further he thinks that Fox's utterances were directed against insincerity and hypocrisy rather than against doctrinal views different from his own. Thus we see this great man's protest against sacerdotalism and other prevailing errors, almost wholly set aside.

The author takes occasion to pronounce a panegyric upon Priest Lumpitt, who George Fox had characterized as a deceiver and a perverter of the right way of the Lord, and in other instances he speaks well of Priests whom Fox had condemned. Whilst we have an interesting and readable work, it is disappointing and hardly such as we should have expected from the pen of so able an author.

MAX raises many objections to God's sovereignty, but the great cause of all is, he says, to be sovereign himself.

THE ARM CHAIR.

Of ardent temper, quick and flashing zeal,
Keen as high po! shod, but too brittle steel,
In earlier life James CRESSON had been found,
Like a high steel when first in harness bound;
But grace had tempered and obduracy wrought
A change so clear from wrong and thought;
His ardent feelings felt the love of calm,
Fitting a follower of the lowly Lamb.

A pointing finger to none other shown,
A secret whisper to none other known,
Bade ARTHUR HOWELL batten on his prey,
When a sedition's mutiny gave-yard way,
A few sad mourners stood beside a grave,
Where 't' no dust, a solemn language gave!
Soon from his lips burst forth the ardent strain:
"I know not whom this coffin may contain,
But my good Master, in whose power I came,
Now bids me clear from wrong an injured name:
Who who now rests within this narrow bed,
By slasher wounded, bled her sorrowing head;
Accused of that in which she had no part,
She died in innocence—a broken heart!"

—As from a stranger came these words, a thrill
Of secret wondering joy the mourners fill;
For such who die, as yet, as apparitions end,
That God a witness to her grave would send,
Who to her innocence should boldly bear
A clear, convincing testimony there.
And He whose ways are wrapt in mystery still,
Bid himself his servant led to do his will!
—On to the grave this servant of the Lord
Was sent to preach the everlasting word
To rouse the thoughtless from delusion's dream,
Memento mori was his frequent theme.

When pestilence her raven wing outspread,
When terror swept the living from the dead,
When love's sweet ties were severed in afflict,
And all that he had lost, he wanted not;
OPELEY and others, a devoted band,
Before the march of terror took their stand!
They nobly dared in that dark hour to make Themselves an offering for the people's sake,
He was accepted! Great the church's loss,
She mourned a faithful champion of the cross,
Gathered at mid day, soon the face was gone
Long ere the evening shades his labor done!
—Two of the worthies living of that day,
LEITCHWORTH and WISTAL hastening fast away.

Shrewd, witty, eloquent—with ample store
Of all that schools could give of classic lore;
Sarcastic powers opposing views to chill,
When such the purpose of his subtle will,
A learned lawyer, NICHOLAS WALN could sway,
A jury's feelings in his youthful day;
But soon like Paul, when the misson one spoke,
Humble he bowed and bore the Christian yoke;
Gambal's lessons ceasing to repeat,
He lay a learner at the Saviour's feet,
Simple of heart and of a feeble frame,
Feeling unworthy even Christ to name;

Yet raised by Him, of living hopes to tell,
And show his people a faithful guide;
JAMES SIMON, like his Lord, from things around,
Fit subjects for important lessons found;
A cloud overspreading, or a bird in wing,
Would to the theme in hand instruction bring!
Filled by his Master, wondrously he shone;
This emptied vessel scarce could stand alone.

Slow as a traveller winds o'er miry ways,
Whose prudent care his onward course delays,
So RICHARD JORDAN preached; at first each word
Came slowly forth, nor life nor feeling stirred;
But soon the channel cleared, the onward flow
In freer volume swifter currents found;
Bolder and higher than it gathers force,
A mountain torrent rushing down its course:
So JORDAN ministered in life's mid-day,
A B-uzer's thunder on his way!
Fishes and flosses, worthless not a few,
Touched by love's sunbeams, his ofen drew;
SMITH, with his venerable locks of snow,
Sedately cautious the right path to know,
Devoted ministers, alas! no more.

David Bacon and descendants. William Wilson, an elder of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting. Sarah Proctor Wilson, a minister of the Southern District Monthly Meeting.

And worthy elders who the ark once bore,
When these were gone—their bodies to the sod,
Their spirits taken to their fixed abode—
A cloud around our Israel's camp arose,
When our first leaders started up our foes;
While a bold infidel his poison spread,
And with his scorpions hungry children fed;
Another race, part of the by gone age,
Yet of the present, then employed the stage.

When beding mists were gathering force and form,
RUTH RICHARDSON was taken from the storm;
True to her Master, she was free to die,
Yet nature shrank from the last agony;
Gladly would she have left this scene of pain,
The promised kingdom of her Lord to gain;
But awful feelings shadowed forth the strife,
The dread emergency of a nation's life,
Gently her spirit from its house of clay,
Was sent on wings of mercy on its way;
When came the pale faced messenger to free,
Her eyes were holden that he did not see,
No pain, no sorrows, e'er her evening prayer
Joined with her morning hymn of glory there,
She felt no agony nor pain or grief,
Taken in kindness without tasting death!

Melodious singer of heart-thrilling songs,
Of Zion's injuries and Israel's wrongs;
Whose lonely harp still on the willow hung,
Till fresh-felt mercies every chord restrung;
Then touched to praise his foes as in distress broke,
That in each heart responsive feelings woke!
—Oh, I beheld thee, as I last beheld,
When Gospel love thy grateful bosom swelled,
When weeping listeners he rd the tale of woe,
Of mental conflicts it was thine to know;
When as a flood the enemy came in,
Sweeping awing the sin;
When from a pit of horror burst thy moan,
Illumed by no brightness from the throne;
When Satan's shadows compassed thee around;
When Satan's legions pierced with many a wound;
When the rank weeds were wrappd about thy head
When hostile-ross billows over thee were spread:
Then He who died for thee, thy sins to purge away,
Arose in might thy struggling soul to save;
Bade the waves sunder and temptations dry,
The scattering clouds haste from the brightening sky:
The Sun of righteousness with cheering ray,
Shed the full radiance of perfected day.
—Then from thy lips poured forth a joyful song
To the Redeemer—thy Redeemer's King
In most melodious energy of praise,
To God, the Saviour, Him of ancient days,
The heart and language rising with the theme,
Till praise gushed forth, one living, glowing stream.
Then from thy lips the thrilling language fell,
"O Glory to Him who raised my soul from hell!"
—Emphatic in tears was many a cheek that day,
As SARAH CRESSON told her chequered way,
'Twas her last Gospel-labor here of love,
Mercy soon gathered her to praise above.

HOW A CAT SAVED A PRISONER'S LIFE.

In the fifteenth century there was a captive in the Tower of London, concerning whom a remarkable tradition has come down to us. This was Sir Henry Wyatt, grandfather of a rebel imprisoned in a later century, who, because his opinions were opposed to those of the king, was confined for a very long time in a cold and narrow cell, in which he neither had enough food to eat, clothes to warm him, nor even a bed to lie upon; so badly treated, indeed, was the unfortunate man that, but for a devoted little attendant which regularly visited him, he would probably have died of starvation.

This attendant was none other than a cat which, it is said, came down one day to the dungeon and forthwith formed a friendship with him, he having gladly welcomed her, placing her in his bosom to warm him, and "by making much of her won her love." The attachment to the lonely prisoner having been thus begun, the cat used to come to him several times each day, and when able, she would sometimes carry a pigeon to him.

There arose, however, the difficulty as to how to cook the birds; but Sir Henry was soon able to surmount this. On one occasion of his jailer sitting him, he complained of his meagre fare, and when told, as he knew he would be, that it was impossible to better it, he asked, "But supposing I provide any, will you dress it for me?" "I may well enough agree to do that," replied the man, thinking probably how little respect there was of being called upon to carry it his promise. And so, much to his astonishment, Wyatt told him about his little visitor; and from that time, whenever a pigeon was caught, the good keeper always dressed it for him.

When at last Sir Henry was released from the Tower, and prosperity came again, we are told that he ever showed great affection for cats; and in his portraits one was generally by his side.—Sunday School Visitor.

FOR "THE FRIENDS."

Some Reminiscences of John Salkeld.

Supposing I may be the only person living familiar with some of these incidents, I pen them down for preservation, seeing that though often facetious, they really occurred to one highly favored as a living Gospel minister in his day. It should be remembered that like our ancient friend, John Roberts, he was seldom at loss for an answer to all comers, nor did he often find himself outmatched. As an instance, take the following: Standing quite demurely, holding his horse on a ferry-boat on one occasion, several young men on board concluded to have a little sport with him, and so one, noticing that John's horse had a white face, queried with him, "What ails your horse that he is so pale a face?" The answer was, "Thine would be pale too, if thou had looked through a halter as long as he has." Not succeeding in raising the expected laugh, he there-upon stepped back, and another who would try what he could do, addressed him very familiarly with, "How do you do, Mr. Salkeld?" "Thou seems to have the advantage of me; I do not know thee." "Not know me? my name is More." John, after looking down meditatively for a moment, said, "Oh, I do recollect, there was Adam and Eve in the garden, and one more." The rest concluding it safest, allowed our friend to conclude his passage in peace.

Being in his dearborn on a very muddy road, he was on one occasion met by one called a gentleman, who looking for deference, very peremptorily ordered John to turn out and give him the road, but he only sat still and remarked, "Thou may turn out thyself," and at length it came to quite an altercation as to which should do so. Finally, John, drawing himself up to his full height, and speaking earnestly, said, "Well, if thou dost not turn out, I shall serve thee as I did a man whom I met a short distance back." The boldness and determination of his words and manner rather alarmed the other, who therefore said to his driver, "I think we had better turn out, and not have any quarrel with the old Quaker." Accordingly they did so, but feeling a curiosity to know what kind of a fate he had escaped by his compliance, he said in passing, "I wish you would tell me what it was you did to that man." "Oh," said John, very demurely, "He wouldn't turn out, and so I had to."

and disarmed him, when taking him by the collar of his coat and the seat of his pantaloons, he carried him bodily to a stream of water near by, and plunging him under again and again, would, during the intervals allowed as breathing spells, lecture him upon the evil of his ways. It is to be noted that John was taking it very much at his ease; not so the other, who at length, nearly strangled, stammered out, "Do you—intend—to—drown—me?" "I intend to keep thee here until thou departs this wicked life," and again he went under. Nor would John let him go until he had made promise so to do, which as Joseph Hoag affirmed he did, becoming a reformed character. This may fitly be styled baptism by immersion, and that upon repentance.

While loving and honoring John for his faithful occupancy of the powerful gift bestowed upon him, his friends were yet watchful to endeavor, what in them lay, to restrain his eccentricities, though not always with the desired result, as the following incident shows: Some of them making him a visit one morning, took him into another room to impress upon him the necessity of being more guarded in his expressions, etc., and it seems were in hopes that some permanent profitable impression had been made. However, the lecture had been long, when John excused himself for a few minutes, whether with malice aforethought or only incidentally, I cannot say, but he soon returned, and with a countenance and voice expressive of the deepest concern said, "Oh, friends, do come quickly, my wife is speechless." They hurrying after, he led them to the sitting room, and pointed to her enjoying a sound nap in her easy chair. Comment on this is unnecessary, only I think that as they rode homeward, they must have been troubled with grave doubts whether they had not gone for once without their guide.

That John could receive in a becoming manner the admonitions of a concerned mind, may be seen from his reply to J. Churchman's cautions on this subject, "Why, John, I have already overcome ten times as much as thou ever had to contend with." This was no doubt true, and yet we must all admit, it had been better if he had overcome more. Though borne with and even feeling a liberty in some things many would scruple at, as for instance, when returning from a religious visit, he was very free in his remarks, rather to the grief of his sober-minded companion, who, when John actually proposed they should try the nettle of their horses in a race, could not forbear expostulating with him, to which he replied, "I have been out on my Master's work, and I have done it faithfully. I am now coming home with my reward, and I have liberty to enjoy myself."

An incident occurring during a visit to England is perhaps better known, yet I subjoin it as follows:

Being disappointed in a companion to a certain meeting, he went alone and on foot, and presenting himself at the habitation of a Friend, asked for entertainment. Being dressed, I suppose, somewhat rustically, he was coolly received and told that in consequence of their expecting a Friend from America, it would be inconvenient, and yet if he was willing to lodge with their hired man he might stay; and when morning came he was further informed that if he would help load manure until breakfast time, he might partake of it, with the hired man, I suppose. John thought he could load manure, and did so, when his host supplemented his kindness by telling him of its being their meeting day, and inviting him to go to it, after which the family drove off, wondering meanwhile, why the preacher had failed to put in an appearance. John found his way to the house unattended, and to the consternation of a certain Friend, took the head of the gallery. An apology and invitation to dine was proffered, to which John's laconic reply was, "I have been at thy house."

Being on his way to a meeting, he was observed by some young men, who said among themselves, "There goes John Salkeld, watch him; he'll preach," etc. Accordingly, he soon arose with their very words. Doubtless he had a message for some of them, and this was designed to render it more impressive.

This reminds me of a friend's saying that seeing the late William Scattergood come into their meeting in London Britain, the salutation arose in his mind, "Well, what is thy business here," and as if replying when he stood up, he began, "My business here to day is"—and so. These incidents are, I believe, reliable, and I thought possibly worth preservation. J. K.

A GOOD LAW.—The Washington Post has the following: It is not often that a man who comes to Congress with a hobby has the good fortune to see his hobby crystallize into a law. Yet this is the unusual experience of Representative Curtis, of New York.

General Curtis is probably the greatest authority on the subject of the literature of capital punishment in the world. Ever since he was a boy he has held the opinion that nothing is gained by putting a criminal to death, and he thinks that the farther the world gets from capital punishment the better it becomes. He is writing a book upon the subject and has made arguments to every one who would listen to him. One of his first acts upon coming to Congress was to introduce a bill decreasing the number of crimes for which the death penalty could be inflicted. He kept persistently at his hobby, supporting the bill by able reports, and has the satisfaction of seeing the measure, which had already been agreed to in the House, also pass the Senate.

It may not be generally known that there are sixty offenses under the Federal laws for which death may be inflicted as a punishment. To be sure, there have been no executions for these offenses for many years, but they are upon the statute books, giving, as General Curtis points out, a sanguinary character to our laws. Under the new law executions can take place only for offenses against the army and the navy, murder and rape, and to the latter two cases the jury is given discretionary authority to add to the verdict of guilty the words "without capital punishment." It is an interesting fact that the passage of a law which cuts off such a large number of death penalties was accomplished without a word of debate. The simple reading of the bill seemed to be sufficient.

PUTTING OFF REPENTANCE.—A hermit was conducted by an angel into a wood, where he saw an old man cutting down boughs to make up a burden. When it was large enough he tied it up, and attempted to lift it on his shoulder to carry it away; but finding it very heavy he laid it down, cut more wood and heaped it on, and then tried again to carry it off. This he repeated several times, always adding something to his load, after trying in vain to raise it from the ground. In the meantime the hermit, astonished at the old man's folly, desired the angel to explain what this meant. "You behold," said he, "in the foolish old man, an exact representation of those who, being made sensible of the burdens of their sins, resolve to repent, but soon grow weary, and instead of lessening their burden, increase it every day. At each trial they find the task more difficult than before, and so put it off a little longer, in vain hoping that they will by and by be more able to accomplish it.

Thus they go on adding to the burden till it grows too heavy to be borne, and then, in despair of God's mercy, and with their sins unre-pented of, they lie down and die. Turn again, my son, and behold the end of the old man whom thou sawest just now heaping up a load of lumps." The hermit looked, and saw him in vain attempting to remove the pile, which was now accumulated far beyond his strength to raise. His feeble limbs tottered over their burden; the poor remains of his strength were fast ebbing away; the darkness of death was gathering around him; and after a convulsive and impotent attempt to lift the pile, he fell down and expired.—Healed of Truth.

FROM "THE LONDON FRIEND."

Elihu Burritt on the Quakers.

George Fox came out from under the weaver's roof, and preached a strange gospel to Papist, Episcopalian, Puritan, and Presbyterian. His rationalism was most sweeping and unsparring. He laid his broad axe to the root of all religious systems and creeds, or, rather, to the trunk of them just where it joined the root. He preached against all outward forms and ordinances (hitherto known and revered; against a man-ordained and salaried ministry of whatever sect; against all formal or stated prayer and praise, read, said, or sung at fixed hours of worship; against pulpit and priest and water baptism of any form; and all the sacred ceremonies and sacraments, dear alike to rigid Puritans and Papists.

He would pull off his hat to no one but God himself, and to Him only in prayer. He abjured and denounced oaths to human Governments and persons as profane. With his hedge-bill he slashed this way and that, until, as he believed, he had reduced the faith as it was in Christ and his first disciples to its first simplicity, purity, and experience.

True religion, he insisted, was a living spirit in the human soul, and breathed into it directly from above, inspiring thought, speech, and life; moving men and women to speak as it dictated, and to hold their peace in prayerful silence until it did move, whether they sat in the "ministers' gallery" or on lower benches among the common waiters at the mercy-seat. They were to follow the Saviour of mankind in the fresh and full footsteps He made on earth, without shadow of turning into the by-paths or cross-tracks of human traditions, even in language as well as life and spirit. This they served as they would have done the music and painted glass of the cathedral. They put away from it all ornamental phraseology or florid diction, and made it as plain in utterance as their own death-words and homely words in dress.

They swept every department of domestic and social life clean of all worldly superfluities, and sobered down even the natural impulses and reveries of childhood to the even beat of stud and domestic morality. The quaint men and women, who retired to the arms, or oaths, or cross for any form of Government, temporal or spiritual, set themselves to the work of winning the last great victory of religious opinion and worship.

We are too far from their starting-point to understand or to account for the almost universal feeling of repugnance which their strange words and ways inspired. Being more speechful and energetic under the pressure of persecution than in later and quieter years, their first voice in the wilderness was as sharp as John the Baptist's to the Pharisees when they denounced the ceremonial forms and ordinances of both Church and Dissent. Thus, they were regarded as a kind of broad-brimmed Ishmaelites, with their hand against every Christian sect, and every sect's hand against them.

Their mission was to hold up a quiet, steady, and unwavering testimony in face of the religious and political powers against their long-established and strong-built systems; to assert not only the rights of the individual conscience in the matter of Christian belief and worship, but the sovereign supremacy of the Holy Spirit's role in the heart and life, which no human Government might despise or alienate.

They were few in numbers, and bore such testimony against all the recognized denominations, that they would have been overpowered and silenced had it not been for the intensity of their religious belief, the even and quiet goodness of their lives, and a pertinacity and serenity of patience under suffering which made them not only invincible but victors in the great conflict for the rights of conscience, which they were raised up in due time to achieve. They learned to suffer and be strong beyond any other denomination in the great Non-conformist struggle.

Not only did they lift up their testimony against the rites but against the rates of the Established Church, and opposed to every prerogative it claimed a passive resistance, which for persistence and duration has no parallel in the history of English Christendom. One of their periodical assemblies still commemorates their stern experiences through the long conflict—"The Meeting for Sufferings."

The annals of the Christian Church have not produced a more characteristic and significant institution than this term implies. It was a meeting to comfort and strengthen with sympathy and watch with loving ministry the members of their communion suffering imprisonment or the spoiling of their goods for holding up their great testimony.

Doubtless it was one of these Meetings for Sufferings during the Commonwealth that one of the most beautiful acts of brotherly love on record was inspired. One hundred and sixty-four Quakers from different parts of the nation came up to Westminster, and pleaded at the bar of the House of Commons for permission to substitute themselves, body for body, for their friends then lying in different prisons throughout the kingdom. With the very odor of their lives of faith and charity breathing inward upon the British Senate, they stood before the Speaker with their quiet and serene faces, and preferred this strange, embarrassing request to a Parliament which had deposed Charles I., and put him to death for trenching upon the political rights of the people.

The little priestless set of Quakers, therefore, was raised up for a great and timely mission: to reform the reformers; to make the freedom of the human conscience, or liberty to worship God according to its dictates, perfect through suffering.

Their invincible patience was irresistible.

The unjust judge, though he feared not God nor regarded man, was constrained to arise and avenge them of their adversaries. He could not stand out against their quiet faces and mild voices from year to year. He yielded point after point; and what he yielded to them availed for those who had not the strength of patience to ask in the same way. The Non-conformist sects of Great Britain owe a great deal more to the patient, persistent, passive testimony of the Quakers than to any other, or, perhaps, to all other denominations put together.

Thus, the honor was reserved to this small sect to be the last contingent of that army of martyrs which through the ages has been enlisted by the Spirit of God to make the Christian faith free, pure, and perfect through suffering.

Natural History, Science, etc.

A Double Star Revolving in a Day and a Half has recently been detected by means of photo spectroscopy, on plates examined by — Fleming. The speed with which such bodies move must be enormous, if, as is probable, they are comparable in size to our own. Or we might compare them with the living and the dead couple which form the variable star Beta Perse. These revolve in three days at a distance of three and a quarter million miles, and the smaller ("dead") one is moving two hundred thous and miles an hour. The newly-found pair, revolving in half the time, must lie much closer together.

A Meteor Seen in Space.—The ordinary shooting-star is visible because it is burning in the atmosphere. Its enormous velocity, measured in miles per second, causes sufficient friction for this, even where the rarity of the air is ten thousand times greater than what we breathe. The average height is about fifty miles. No ordinary meteors have yet been seen by reflected sunlight, for even one which, on burning shines like Sirius, may be only as large as a bullet, and the largest masses are too small to shine like a miniature moon while still one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles from the earth. But on Seventh Month 21st, Professor Brooks, of Smith Observatory, Geneva, New York, watching the moon, saw through his telescope a dark, round object move horizontally across its disc. It was almost undoubtedly a meteor, moving through space between the earth and moon. If he had but reckoned how long it took we might roughly calculate its greatest distance. But he only says "rather slowly." Let us assume this to mean at least one and a half seconds, the moon being about three-quarters full. The average speed of a meteor, at the earth's distance from the sun, is about twenty-five miles per second. Hence it travels fifty miles whilst crossing a disc which is two thousand miles across. Consequently, its distance would be one-fortieth that of the moon's which is about two hundred and thirty thousand miles away. Upon the above assumptions it was distant, therefore, about six thousand mile from the observer. If one only knew the exact time it took crossing, whether at right angles to the line of sight, and whether precisely over the centre of the moon, this distance could be told accurately. The whole forms an interesting matter for speculation, but as it stands the 'ifs' are decidedly too prominent. In any case I must have been an abnormally large meteor! The largest on record, seen more than a hundred years ago, was estimated to measure!

ile in diameter: it moved down the German ocean and the Channel, dropping a fragment in the way, and disappeared over the Atlantic. calculations indicated that it never came very close to the earth, and that it probably returned to the realms of space.—Edmund Clark.

Lucy Gregory.

1836.—Eleventh Month 19th.—Indisposition plagues me to spend most of the day alone. The odds look full of ruin; and the wind, roaring round my dwelling, forms a striking contrast to the calm tranquillity which reigns within. My feelings are so indescribably consoling at the present moment, that I am ready to marvel why it should be thus with me. I so often seem waded down under a deep sense of my manifold infirmities, and the proneness in my nature to turn aside from the paths of rectitude and self-denial; and that—and amid all these weaknesses of the flesh—my Saviour, my blessed Saviour should so tenderly watch over so poor, unworthy a creature, proves indeed that his love is infinite, free, and unbounded. Yes, and I have faith to believe that He will still continue to manifest himself as the "Sinner's Friend," and that no capon of the destroyer will ever be suffered to art the precious seed of the Kingdom, which trust is beginning to take root in my heart. What a privilege to know that "my Redeemer yeth;" and, whilst He condescends to direct my steps, whatever the future events of my life may be, I have no cause for anxious fear.

Twelfth Month 31st—1837 is fast verging towards its close; and, in bidding adieu to this yearful year, I can say it has been one of the happiest I have ever passed. The astonishing improvement in my health has allowed me the opportunity of partaking more fully of those social and rational pleasures, which tend to cheer and enliven the path of life, and which, oftentimes, I have more thoroughly enjoyed upon having so long known their deprivation. Here is so very much in nature calculated to animate and instruct the mind, as well as to ratify the outward eye, that frequently when wandering amidst the beauties of creation, whilst beholding the rich display of his goodness, my thoughts have been directed towards the beneficent Creator of all, who thus so bountifully provides for his creatures.

1838.—Second Month 2nd.—My thoughts are dwelt much on the privileges and advantages I enjoy from having been brought up within the pale of a Society from which the dishonourable amusements of life are excluded. And I have also thought, whilst we conscientiously condemn the lamentable abuse of time and talents, which the practice of these vain pursuits must occasion, that we should be exceedingly cautious how we judge those whose situation in the world is totally different from our own; many of whom, no doubt, feel almost associated to sanction—by their presence—that they would gladly be excused from, if left to the influence of their own unbiassed judgment. Teach me, O my dear Saviour, to turn my eyes not upon others but upon myself.

Eighth Month 2nd.—Oh! Holy Father, accept I pray thee, the simple though sincere offering of praise, from a heart overflowing with gratitude for the continued extension of thy goodness; and grant me, I beseech thee, a measure of that strength which will enable me more and more to look on myself as nothing, only as thou art graciously pleased to work thy will in me, through the quickening influence of thy blessed spirit. Oh, humble me, I pray thee, under a sense of my natural proneness to sin; and, if it be thy will, preserve me from evil, and refresh my soul.

WHOEVER partakes of Tobacco or Intoxicating Drink doth put an enemy into his mouth to steal away his brains, is just so far a drunkard, and the more liable to be sent to his last account unwashed, unhalloved, unanointed, unanointed, with all his imperfections on his head. Let us be sober, be vigilant, putting on the breast-plate of faith and love, and for a helmet, the hope of salvation.—S. X.

HE is safe in the greatest dangers whom God undertakes to protect; and He undertakes the protection of all who commit their cause to Him; think of Noah, David and Daniel.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 13, 1897.

(GEORGE FOX. By Thomas Hodgkin).—This book forms one of a series of biographies of men who have been prominent as leaders in the great religious movements of modern times. It is skillfully prepared as a literary work, and is an interesting book. Indeed, the character and experiences of George Fox are of such a striking nature, that the work might reasonably be expected to be attractive to the reader.

T. Hodgkin appears to have been quite careful that his own profession as a Friend should not lead him to overestimate the character of George Fox, or the value of his services to religion and his country. Indeed, the chief criticism we have to make on his work is that in some points he fails to do full justice to that remarkable man.

It rates rather harshly on the feelings of one who has all his life been accustomed to look with great and deserved respect on the sayings and experiences of this great reformer, and to trace the Divine hand in his movements, to hear him spoken of as narrow-minded and manifesting bitterness to those that opposed him, and to see such epithets as "strange, excited discourse," applied to communications delivered under a weighty sense of Divine requiring, and whose authority was proven by the wonderful effect they produced on the listeners.

Thomas Hodgkin appears to have been influenced by the writings of the late Robert Barclay, who in his Inner Life of the Religious Societies of the Commonwealth, largely substitutes his own imaginations and inferences from the history of the times, for the explicit statements of the early members of our Society, thus endeavoring to make them responsible for views which they did not entertain. Some of these points are shown in a review of his work, by the late Dr. Charles Evans, of Philadelphia, entitled "An Examen," to which the reader is referred.

The impression left on the mind by the reading of T. Hodgkin's work is a wish, that in addition to the literary qualifications which the author possessed for writing such a book, he had been animated by such a love for the principles of Quakerism and a sense of the responsibility of his work, as would have eliminated from his book all that tends to lessen one's veneration for those faithful advocates for the Truth, who counted not their lives dear unto themselves so that they might finish their course with joy, and the ministry they had received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the Grace of God.

Our Friend, Josiah W. Leeds, having been exercised over the spread of what is called "Progressive Eucher," in the community, has issued a tract on this form of gambling, a part of which is published in THE FRIEND of this week.

A personal letter from him states that in some public houses kept by members of our Society, the tables have been allowed to be used for this evil purpose. This is a sad and unexpected piece of information. The evil of gambling is so well known, that few indeed are the persons who can plead ignorance as an excuse for indulging in it. And the proprietors of boarding houses, who permit their tables to be used for such objects, certainly fall far short of bearing that open testimony against wrongdoing, which is required of a consistent Christian.

If any of our readers have given way to the temptation to indulge in this form of gambling, or any other; or to sanction it in any way, our desire for them is that expressed by our Saviour to the woman who was brought to Him as an offender, "Go and sin no more."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 2nd instant, at the State Department, the Anglo-Venezuelan Arbitration treaty was signed by Sir Julian Pauncefote, the British Ambassador, and Jose Andrade, the Venezuelan Minister. The arbitration tribunal will consist of Baron Hirsch and Sir Richard Henn Collins, on the part of Great Britain; Melville W. Fuller, Chief Justice, and David J. Brewer, Associate Justice of the United States Supreme Court, on the part of Venezuela, and a fifth jurist to be selected by the four persons nominated.

On the 30th inst. a bill creating a new Judicial District in Texas was passed over the President's veto in the United States Senate. The Anglo-American Arbitration Treaty was considered in executive council.

The United States last year produced 32,000,000 barrels of fermented liquor.

On the 2nd instant the Secretary of the Interior sent to the Senate the geological survey report on the gold deposits in Alaska. It shows the presence of a gold belt 200 miles in length, which enters the Territory near the mouth of Forty Mile Creek, and extends westward across the Yukon Valley. It is the opinion of the geologist that it is practicable to prosecute quartz mining throughout the year in this region. Large areas of bituminous coal were also discovered along the river. The report says that there can be little dispute as to the boundary line where it crosses the State of Idaho to the west of the 115th meridian.

The State Capitol building, at Harrisburg, was completely destroyed by fire on the afternoon of the 2nd instant. Both Houses of the Legislature were in session when the fire started, and hasty adjournments were taken. The flames, which started in the Lieutenant-Governor's apartments over the Senate Chamber, and leaped so rapidly that practically nothing could be done to check them. The loss is estimated at over $300,000. The legislative records were saved.

On Fourth-day last, the New York Central Railroad Company, with its affiliated branches, began regular and efficient traffic over the great steel viaduct and new Harlem River bridge, which have been in course of construction for the last few years. The only one of the steel viaduct can best be explained by some figures. The structure is about two miles in length, and raises the grade a maximum distance of 20 feet. The viaduct is 55 feet in width, giving room for the four tracks that have been built in it, and which are laid in a solid water-tight flooring of cement. The new Harlem bridge, at its upper end, is 100 feet wide. The new Harlem bridge, as it is called, has been a constant and expensive annoyance to the railroad company and to navigators, for its draw has to be opened even for the smallest craft. The new bridge being twenty or thirty feet high water mark, makes it possible for tugs, barges and scows to pass under it. It will be necessary to open the draw only for the passage of large boats. The drawbridge is the largest of the kind ever built. It is 61 feet wide, and 400 feet long, carries four tracks, and the rails and weights 400 tons. When open it leaves two navigable passages, each 100 feet wide.

When P. A. Spiller settled in Kansas many years ago, he made a discovery in digging a well, bordering a neighbor in digging a well, found a fine, rich surface soil at a depth of 100 feet. Digging through this, the workmen found gravel, clay and water. This earth, which was thrown out was found covered in the course of a few weeks with a rich growth of tropical vegetation. There were little date trees and other varieties of palms, berries, straws, weeds and grasses. In great numbers, all totally unlike anything which grew or could grow in the open air throughout the year in that climate.

What is considered the greatest quantity of pure sulphur ever found in the West has been discovered in the Cascade Mountains, Washington, not far from the Northern Pacific Railroad. John Kenneth, of Oting, the discoverer, has kept the exact location secret, but has brought out samples which evidence the high value of the find. By correspondence, it is said, Kenneth has been able to interest a syndicate, headed by John P. B. Pfeiffer, in the discovery.

It is reported by Philadelphia, Pa., that the New York, states that Thomas A. Edison, after much experimenting, has discovered a chemical that, in connection with the Fluoroscope, will make some of the internal parts of the body plainly visible. When the vital organs are not destroyed the blind under certain circumstances may be cured.

Prominent stockmen of the Indian Territory and the Panhandle report that the recent blizzard has resulted in the death of thousands of cattle on the range. For the first time in a hundred years large water courses are frozen over.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 505, which is 10 more than the previous week, and 38 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 250 were males and 255 females; 104 died of pneumonia; 54 of consumption; 45 of heart disease; 27 of diphtheria; 23 of apoplexy; 20 of old age; 17 of bronchitis; 14 of nephritis; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 13 of cerebral palsy; and 12 of Bright's disease.

Of the 505 deaths, 48 were males, 48, negro, 111; 112, colored, 112 and 112, white, 122; 5, 112; 115; cholera, 6; 103, 106.

FOREIGN.—In the British House of Commons last week, Sir Michael Hicks-Beach, Chancellor of the Exchequer, moved a resolution granting £780,000 to meet the first instalment of the Anglo-Egyptian expedition to the Sudan. It was adopted by a vote of 169 to 57.

The Prince of Wales, on the occasion of his arrival at a hotel, to be called the Prince of Wales Hotel, in London, for the purpose of commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of the Queen's accession to the throne.

The Under Secretary of the Foreign Affairs stated in the House of Commons on the 8th inst. that the removal of the last vestige of the length of the cable had been successfully completed.

Five thousand refugees have entered from Canada, and that place is now a wretched quagmire.

It is said one can no longer claim to possess the longest railway bridge in the world. The recently completed bridge in the State of Oregon is 10,000 feet long. This distance is nearly 2,000 feet longer than the longest new structure, exclusive of its approaches. It is 13,225 feet, while its principal spans over the main channel of the river are 620 and 455 feet respectively. The remaining spans extend over some nine miles of low-lying land, which for several months of the year is completely submerged.

The plan of reform for Cuba was signed by the Queen Regent on the 13th inst. The principal features will be a Council of Administration, most of whose members will be elective. The high officials of the island will be appointed by the Governor General, but they must be Cubans or Spaniards of two years' residence on the island. The Council of Administration will frame a tariff and draw up a budget. The plan is not favorably received in Spain, as it gives the Cubans everything.

Spain's Prime Minister says the Government would not wait for the complete pacification of Cuba to introduce the reforms. If the rebellion is confined to the Eastern provinces it will be sufficient. There is much dissatisfaction in Madrid over what are believed to be the excessive concessions made to the Cubans in the scheme of reform, and it is thought that Cabinet changes are likely to result.

A despatch of the 3rd inst. from Porto Rico, says, The autonomists of the island have issued a manifesto announcing strong dissatisfaction at the reforms recently granted. The manifesto states that because of the party's attitude its members will refuse to vote at the coming municipal elections. These elections are the first practical application of the new law.

Permission to excavate the site of old Corinth, between the Acropolis and the modern city, has been granted by the American School at Athens by the Greek Government.

It is stated that the Czar of Russia has epileptic seizures about once a month. His medical attendants have prescribed a strict regimen designed to strengthen especially the nervous system. He has abandoned smoking and only takes a very small quantity of wine. Apen granted a long respite to his health is good.

The Governor of the Transvaal has recently announced that the bubonic plague has appeared at Candahar, Afghanistan.

A Force of Cossacks will be sent to watch along the Amu Darya River, to prevent, if possible, the introduction of the disease into Russian territory. The names of the men who recently explored the Pamirs and the Himalayas, found there unknown tribes who are fire-worshippers and ignorant of the use of money. Their animals are all dwarfed, the cows being the size of ponies, the donkeys of large dogs and the sheep of fox or wild sheep appearance. Their chief article of barter is tins.

Rupshu, a district on the north slope of the Himalayas, 15,000 feet above sea level and surrounded by mountains from 3000 to 5000 feet higher, has a permanent population of 500 persons, who live in goat-skin tents all the year round. Water freezes there every night, but the falling water prevents the dryness of the air. The people are shepherds, and dress in pajamas and a long cloak, wearing an additional cloak in unusually cold weather.

DIED, Twelfth Month 23rd, 1896, at his home in New Garden Township, Chester County, Pa., JON THOMAS in his eighty-first year; an esteemed elder and overseer of New Garden Monthly and Particular Meeting, of which he was a regular attendant, but one and especially the last days; nothing but sickness debarred him from his usual faithful and faithful holder of the testimonies and practices of our Friends. It was the last trip he was making to our week meeting when he was stricken down by his horse running off, and breaking both of his legs, which laid him up on a bed of languishing. The shock was to him and especially the nervous system, and he never fully recovered his normal condition. During his illness he was as meek as a child, and his prayer was, that he might depart and be at rest, leaving us (his children and friends), the comforting legacy that his end was peace and he has left us a priceless legacy of a reputation for integrity worthy to be imitated. His love for ever one and especially the poor and needy of his neighborhood, was one of his sterling attributes. He was ever thankful, often expressing his appreciation of the doctor's services. Thus we feel clear in having ministered to his last wants, trying to nurse him back to health; and we keenly feel the loss of his society and all that we might have gained from his wise counsel and high his precept and example will live long after him.

—, at his residence near Downingtown, Pa., First Month 2nd, 1897, WILLIAM CURTIS DIZELER, a member and minister of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Western District, aged nearly seventy-six. The son of a Lutheran preacher, he possessed a fine musical talent, and was a young man young he came under the influence of the Holy Spirit, and was brought to a sense of the mission of his sins. Abiding in the same power, he was convinced of the spiritual nature of the Gospel including the true baptism and communion, and was in principle a Friend before he knew there were people professing the Truth as it had been opened to himself. A faithful adherence to the light manifested to him soon separated him from observances in which he had been taught, and eventually, before he was aged, led his steps to Philadelphia, where he heard there was a people in sympathy with his views. Following Friends whom he saw on their way to meeting he was led to the knowledge of that which satisfied him that they were spiritually true, and so he came in due time faithfully attached to their religion Society, where he was at length brought forth in living ministry. In the exercise of this acknowledged gift he was especially and powerfully, at times, enlarged upon country meetings and in prisons and almshouses, he was in the habit of visiting in his younger days New Jersey, Delaware and Ohio. In his younger days he did much self-sacrificing work in the most dangerous quarters of the city. Several remarkable instances of his guidance in special cases are remembered, illustrating the power of Divine Grace. He kept his regular course of self-denial, and in his younger days he had many of his persons open to Philadelphia, less for gain than for a place of refuge for those who were afflicted and persecuted; with the young who need counsel and the strength of his fatherly sympathy, with the older concerning the welfare of Truth; and with ministers of various denominations who craved an abiding in a higher spirituality. In the places where he labored he knew no more, we miss a valiant soldier of Truth upon the field of his life, and in his younger days he was one to the Captain of his salvation, who stood witness to the immediate opening and direction of the Spirit of Truth, and one whose last remembered testimony on a religious visit was: "The same that mad George Fox a Friend, was a me Friend."

In his younger days he did much self-sacrificing work in the most dangerous quarters of the city. Several remarkable instances of his guidance in special cases are remembered, illustrating the power of Divine Grace. He kept his regular course of self-denial, and in his younger days he had many of his persons open to Philadelphia, less for gain than for a place of refuge for those who were afflicted and persecuted; with the young who need counsel and the strength of his fatherly sympathy, with the older concerning the welfare of Truth; and with ministers of various denominations who craved an abiding in a higher spirituality. In the places where he labored he knew no more, we miss a valiant soldier of Truth upon the field of his life, and in his younger days he was one to the Captain of his salvation, who stood witness to the immediate opening and direction of the Spirit of Truth, and one whose last remembered testimony on a religious visit was: "The same that mad George Fox a Friend, was a me Friend."

1871.—Twelfth Month.—A cold winter, with the snow or rain. The small-pox has visited this city, so that there has been over two hundred deaths every week for some time. It seems a solemn consideration, death apparently so near. The sweet promise has been much with me. It shall not come nigh thy dwelling," accompanied with a secret hope for preservation.

1872.—Fourth Month 2nd.—Yesterday went Mr. M. and L. E. B. to attend the funeral of my dear friend Anna S. Bailey, near Pottstown, sorrowful indeed it is to part with one so much loved, but there is sweet evidence that she is entered into the rest prepared for the people of God.

In a letter to a Friend dated Fourth Month 1st, she thus alludes to the approaching Yearly Meeting: "How close it is upon us. I think sometimes that the weight of it ought to rest (bare) on my spirit, for it is always a serious foe. The young look forward to it as a season of strengthening, the middle aged also, and the older ones as a time of great responsibility. How differently I go up to them, from what I did to do. Then there was such a longing for a greater manifestation of his will, and desire for confirmation of my already taken stumbling footsteps. Blessed forever be his holy name. He did not leave me comfortless, unattended, but sent message after message, answering all my objections, confirming all my convictions. How the words of precious ones gone before used to distil as the dew upon the thirsty gourd, cheering, brightening every living desire. And how true it was, the more faithfulness vs. abode in, the easier the pathway became, and the light seemed to shine brighter, but obedience brought clouds of doubt, a wilderness journey. How expressive are the words, 'he path of the just is as a shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.'" Fifth Month 5th.—A month of much exercise and many blessings. Yearly Meeting has passed. Went with dear E. A. and Ann Jones over to the other side of the meeting-house. It was a trial, but I want to do whatever will serve the Lord's cause the most in the hearts of the children of men; our side (the east), was so full and the other so vacant. The Yearly Meeting was more satisfactory than many of late. Abbie Heald, the only woman Friend with a minute. She is weighty and deeply exercised.

In a letter to a Friend she alludes to some of the exercises of the Yearly Meeting:

"E. R. E. gave us such a good testimony in regard to the Queries, addressing the young, that they should not look upon them as a mere form, that it was possible to keep themselves unspotted from the world; that the helge was thrown around them by their elder friends, who were influenced by the Spirit of Truth. It was very good. Thy poor friend felt the weight of the meeting. Once called: the first session, 'I am the Lord thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt; open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it;' believing a hungering and thirsting in our meetings would have its reward. If there was no sensible evidence of acceptance, yet if there was an effort to draw near unto Him, they could no more be hidden than the poor woman who came in the press behind our Saviour to touch the hem of his garment, virtue would go out of Him."

26th.—A variously exercised Meeting. First, P. A. Elkinton in supplication; then S. F. B. in testimony, quite excellently. After a good pause, J. Collins Stokes knelt in supplication, the first time in public, desiring that every trial may be sanctified to us, etc. He has had many trials, but perhaps all intended to bring him to a willingness to acknowledge his Master's name publicly. Oh, that others in our meeting would be faithful. We hear that our Ohio friends have arrived safely at their home, and in a sweet letter to day from E. Fawcett, she desires for me, that I may be kept in the "safe enclosure" of the Great Head of the Church, and bring forth fruit, to the praise of his Great Name.

Seventh Month 2nd.—I feel like being much alone to-day: much with God. One year ago to-night brother Silas died, went, we humbly believe, to his everlasting rest.

In the summer she visited Watkins Glen, Niagara, went down the St. Lawrence to Lake Champlain and Lake George, Hudson River, and to her relatives living in Providence, R. I., of which she says: "It was a summer full of rest and pleasure, which had seemed promised me by my Heavenly Father." In a letter to a friend, alluding to this journey, she makes the following remarks, which are so characteristic, it was thought best to insert them: "We have been so favored, some annoyances, but much to be thankful for. 'I thank thee for this, and please give us the other,' has so continually been my prayer, and, dear, so granted."

From Boston, Eighth Month 21st, she writes: "Brother seemed anxious to take us to Rocky Point, to get a baked clam dinner and see the various objects of interest there. We found much to enjoy, particularly the rocks piled in wild confusion, and so massive, too, some forming natural bridges, and others small caverns and elevated pathways. I quite enjoyed going through them all, and am often reminded of that passage in Prov., 'The conies are little people, they dwell among the rocks. There were so many places for 'little people' to hide, both from the enemy and from the storm. Can we not take the lesson home? Our Saviour's arms are always open for us, and we can hide in Him all our griefs, and He will in no wise cast out. He is our Refuge, our Rock, our High Tower and Fortress. 'Be not faithless, but believing.' We had many beautiful drives and were at meeting several times. It was quite small, many out of the city. There is one Friend I love so much—Elizabeth Meader—she is Joseph Hoag's daughter, and is one of the few who have the good old ways. She came out to call on us, but we were away, so we returned it before long. She says she has faith to believe that our Society will yet be revived, and come back to the old standard. It is cause of rejoicing to many here that S. F. S. is not made a subject of conversation. She seems to be one of the past, influence all gone, and almost forgotten. Many young and inexperienced feel the query arise, 'Why was she not settled in her mind, and grounded before she went forth to teach others.' The public opinion seems to be that she has left her strength behind her. She will not have the extended influence she had while connected with the Society. 'So dear, we see, 'The Lord will work, and who shall let Him.' Oh, that He would winnow more and more the chaff from amongst us, and breathe upon the dry bones, that there may be a shaking and an arising into life. Life! Life! More of that in our day of Quakerism, and we shall prevail!—take that away and we are nothing, worse than nothing—stumbling blocks.' . . . Alluding to her return to Philadelphia, she says, "I scarcely know where home is to be just now, but as the poet says, 'In some way or other the Lord will provide.'"

"It may not be my way,

It may not be thy way,

And yet in his own way,

The Lord will provide."

"So I just trust it to Him. . . . How sweet to feel there is a refuge in every doubt and trial, and that it is blessed to trust in Him. 'Blessed are all they that put their trust in Him.'"

Under date of Ninth Month 9th, she writes: "Poor E. Rhoads, released at last from suffering. It seems almost certain that she is safe in our Father's love, for innocence and purity shone so conspicuously in her daily life. Only to be ready, seems our daily watchword. What an affliction for her husband. How many interesting young mothers have been removed of late years."

Eleventh Month 7th.—Our hearts have been made sad this week, from the decease of our dear friend Lydia B. Kite, on Sixth-day morning. Our meeting was very remarkable, seeming more like a funeral than a First-day morning meeting. Dear Lydia was of a very gentle, loving spirit—a lively minister, and when the end came she could feel that it was a solemn thing to die, but so glorious." She saw the pearl gates open to receive her, with an eye of faith, and waited the moment when she should depart.

Twelfth Month 6th.—Attended Arch Street Meeting, it being the last time it was to be held there on First-day mornings. The Southern Meeting has been joined with it, and the meetings are to be held at Orange Street. It seems sad. We had a good meeting. Richard Esterbrook was there, and quite lively in testimony. My dear Master gave me to supplicate for them, that they might die to live, suffer to reign, and not deny Him.

In a letter to a friend she thus alludes to the union of these meetings, Twelfth Month 8th, 1872: "Well, dear, I wrote to you of the prospect of the two meetings being united—that was very quietly accomplished last Fifth-day at an adjourned meeting, though all the business was not completed, they (expect) this week to finish. It has been quite a grief to some Friends, but I am continually reminded of the accounts we read of the stork. It is said they live to a great age, and that when old and infirm, the younger ones watch over and care for them, bearing them on their wings to places of safety, so it seems to me, the junior meeting is to come home and support the senior, and good nourishment and care they will get. I think, for many of the Southern Friends are so valuable. Some call the union of the two meetings their marriage, but others say both parties are consulted in marriage. I went down last First-day morning to Arch Street, thinking it would be pleasant to see the last one."

In a letter of Twelfth Month 29th she thus speaks of her dear friend, S. F. Balderston: "S. F. Balderston was very excellent in testimony, as he always is. I think he is a great blessing to our meeting in the hand of his Maker, so gentle spirited, so meek, and so filled with the Heavenly illuminating oil in his ministerial services, bringing forth things, new and old."

1873.—Fourth Month 19th.—My birth-day. Forty-three years have passed since life was mine. Now, how do I pass it? Am I desiring above all to glorify my Creator and Redeemer? Oh, Lord, thou knowest! thou knowest my desire to do and be whatever is thy will. Strengthen me, Oh, Lord, lead and guide me and give me thy own spirit and thy wisdom.

21st.—Our Yearly Meeting has commenced, and we humbly hope the Shepherd of Israel will watch over us for good, and restrain all unruly spirits.

27th.—Yearly Meeting passed over, and we have great cause to bless the name of our King, who has divided the sea, whose waves roared, and made a way for his people to pass over. We feel that his blessed hand was with us. We have been greatly favored in our meetings here at our North Meeting-house many times of late. Be pleased, Oh Father, to hear the petitions of thy children.

"THESE words spake Jesus, and lifted up his eyes to heaven, and said, Father, the hour is come; glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee: as thou hast given Him power over all flesh, that He should give eternal life to as many as thou hast given Him. And this is life eternal, that they might know thee the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."—John xvii: 1-3.

THE Lord often crosses our will: for the benefit of our souls.

A Flight Across the Sea.

It had long been my desire to cross the ocean, to visit the country beyond the sea. Accordingly about two months previous to the date of sailing, I secured a berth on the Rhynland (one of the American Line steamers, running between Philadelphia and Liverpool). It was about 8.30 on a morning in late summer, one of those extremely hot days, we sailed out from the harbor in Philadelphia. A pilot boat guided us out to the breakwater, where it left us about four p. m. I had often wondered why an experienced captain could not guide his own ship out of the harbor at either end of the trip, without going to the expense of hiring a pilot, whom they have to pay from one hundred and fifty to two hundred dollars, according to the weight of the vessel. The point in question is this, The majority of the ocean steamers with their cargo are insured, and if anything should happen them without a pilot, the company will not hold themselves responsible for the insurance. A captain is held responsible for the safety of his ship all the way through, and is required to be stationed at his post on the bridge at every time of danger, no matter how long it lasts. The distance from Philadelphia to Liverpool is about three thousand four hundred miles, while from New York it is three thousand. The fastest time on record is made by the St. Paul and St. Louis, in five days and five hours, but in order to do that they are compelled to consume about five hundred tons of coal each day. The small ones consume about sixty tons of coal a day.

Soon after we left the breakwater we encountered a heavy fog, which continued with us for about four days and nights. During that time they kept the fog whistle blowing at intervals of only about two minutes each. Strange to say I went to my berth each night and slept soundly through it. The most dangerous part of the route is opposite Sable Island (just this side of the Banks of Newfoundland) where it is most always foggy and stormy, and unless extremely careful, vessels are very apt to run aground.

The deepest part of the ocean is at a point called Flenish Cap, or the Devil's Hole (as the sailors call it), where it is said to be unfathomable. One of the first questions which greeted my ear soon after my return was, "Did I get sea-sick?" Notwithstanding the fact we were favored in not having any storm, there is a peculiar recking motions at times, which is very apt to upset one's equilibrium. In regard to myself, I will candidly admit it did not lose any time in getting there, as I was sick the very first night. But the next morning was able to be up on deck again, and so continued to be all the way through the trip. One evening especially during the voyage, I witnessed one of the most gorgeous sunsets that ever decked the horizon. After a time Luna shed her rays over the water, lending new enchantment to the scene, and making one of those brilliant panoramas of nature which we sometimes read of but seldom witness.

Early on the morning of the 19th we were safely landed at the docks in Liverpool. There was only a few minutes detention at the custom-house. After unlodging my trunk and standing back, expecting to see one of the officials in charge step forward and dive through the entire contents of it, was surprised to hear him say, "Have you any tobacco or cigars in there?" And when I quickly answered him in the negative, he said, "All right, you can lock it up again." In regard to tobacco, they do not raise it to any extent over there, so cigars are consequently a luxury which only the wealthy class can enjoy. Four of us secured a bus and were driven to Lime St. Station (about three miles distant) for the sum of a shilling each (twenty-five cents.)

I will state here, in order to avoid having trouble with money there, it is very important to obtain English currency before leaving the American shore. At the above station I secured a ticket on the London and North-western Railway for Euston, London, and in a few minutes was comfortably seated in one of the cars, in route for that point. The distance from Liverpool to London is one hundred and ninety-six miles. Our route extended mostly through beautiful agricultural districts. In some sections they seemed just to have finished their wheat harvest, as it was all shocked ready for hauling in. But then things in general seem to be much more backward through England than in America (excepting the people). Owing to the scarcity of timber through England, Ireland and Scotland, the houses are all built of brick and stone. Almost before we were aware of it our train halted at Euston Station, London, the terminus of the road. After looking after my trunk, which I failed at that time to find, and by the way it is a regular nuisance to be bothered with in travelling, as it is much better to adopt the plan of Nellie Bly, and carry all the clothes one needs with them. I secured a hansom and was driven to 21 Windsor Road, where I had previously engaged boarding. Next morning, bright and early, I started out sight-seeing. Having resolved before leaving home if I got to London to make it a point to visit Windsor Castle, the Queen's residence, I went to Victoria station, and after a ride of thirty-five miles, was set down in the town of Windsor. Conspicuous among all the buildings was the Castle itself, situated on a prominent eminence overlooking the picturesque river Thames, and built in such a manner as to form almost a circle. Ascending a long flight of stone steps, we found ourselves within the Castle grounds. The Queen was absent at the Isle of Wight, her seaside resort. When the Queen and court are absent the state apartments of the Castle are usually open to the public on certain days of the week from eleven o'clock until four in summer, and from eleven until three, in winter. Tickets of admission are issued at the Lord Chamberlain's in Castle Yard. The suite consists of the following rooms: The "Vandyck room," so called on account of the paintings contained therein by that master. The Zuccarelli room contains nine large paintings, but will not take the time or space to describe them. The ceiling of the state ante-room is painted by Verri and represents a banquet of the gods. The grand vestibule is a lofty apartment, lighted from above by an octagonal lantern of elegant design. The "Waterloo Chamber" is a noble room of large dimensions. In it many of the state banquets are given. Visitors are conducted to the Throne room. It contains a handsome ivory throne, a gift to the Queen by the Maharajah of Travancore. Next to be seen is the grand reception room. This is simply magnificent, ornamented in the style of the period of Louis XIV. The walls are embellished with some fine specimens of Gobelins tapestry. The room also contains a magnificent Malachite vase, a gift to the Queen by Nicholas Emperor of Russia. Over the door by which he visitor enters the "Queen's Audience Chamber," is an interesting whole length portrait of Mary, Queen of Scots, in a mourning habit, with a crucifix in her right hand and a breviary in the other. In the background is a representation of her execution at Fotheringhay, under which scene is a Latin inscription to the following effect, The Queen, the daughter, consort and mother of kings, was struck by the axe of the executioners, and after being cruelly wounded by a first and second blow, at the third her head was severed in the presence of her officers of Queen Elizabeth. In the upper border of the picture is another thus given in English, Mary, "Queen of Scotland, true Princess and legitimate heiress of England and Ireland, and mother of James, King of Great Britain, who harassed by the heresy of her people, and overpowered by rebellion, came into England in 1568, for the sake of sanctuary and relying on the word of her kinswoman, Queen Elizabeth, is perfidiously detained captive for sixteen years, and traduced by a thousand alumnies, is by the cruel sentence of the English Parliament, at the instigation of heresy, handed over to execution; and on the 18th of February, 1587, is beheaded by the common executioner, in the forty-fifth year of her life and reign."

The Castle was first built in the eleventh century, and has been added from time to time by the different kings. Victoria is not only Queen of England, but also Princess of India. She is eighty-one years of age, and has already completed the sixtieth year of her reign. She has reigned longer than any other sovereign by two years; George III having reigned for fifty-eight years. We were conducted through the stables, where she has at her command almost one hundred head of horses, all bob tails. In a room adjoining the stables the walls are covered with elegant sets of harness, which almost dazzles one's eyes to look at. Another room is filled with carriages of all sizes and patterns, while still another very large one, the floor of which is covered with turf, is called the School-room, where Princess Beatrice's children are now learning to ride.

First Month 21st.—At a literary entertainment recently held at Westport Ontario, various opinions were given respecting the qualities that a true education should develop, among which was the following graphic description given by Minnie M. Wright, a young woman of high educational attainments.

I will mention only two qualities that should be developed by a true education:—"Charity and humility, and they embrace nearly every good and great quality—Charity toward all mankind, and humility on our own part. Let us look for a moment into each. Charity to others, and what a train comes along with it—selfishness, sympathy, pity, love, forbearance, mercy that is twice blessed, kindness to virtues and faults, gentleness, a desire to uplift all who we around us, an ennobling quality indeed. Humility teaches us to see ourselves as God sees us, in all our human weaknesses and shortcomings, and need of Divine help, it is for all of us spiritually and intellectually to sometimes stand on the threshold of the bitter valley of humiliation to which a truly educated writer has said only the wisest and bravest of men can descend, owing themselves forever as children gathering pebbles upon an endless shore. E. R.

AMBITION carries the torch of discord.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A TENDER EXHORTATION TO OUR DEAR YOUNG AND UN-ESTABLISHED FRIENDS TO SUPPORT OUR ANCIENT AND ESTABLISHED DOCTRINES AND PRACTICES.

Immediate revelation to each individual, in their communion with God, those who in willing submission yield obedience to his requirements are brought to realize the fulfillment of his gracious promise, "If ye continue in my word, then are ye my disciples indeed, and ye shall know the Truth, and the Truth shall make you free." It is here we receive what we ask for of Him, because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight, and "herely know we the Spirit of Truth, and the spirit of error—the first tenders our hearts, drawing them up to God; the second leads into a state of forgetfulness of God and of consideration of our latter end. The message to the church in Philadelphia appeals with great responsibility to you, "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it, for thou hast a little strength."

In the measure of light, with which you are enlightened, strength lieth, "That was the true Light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world," therefore "in that which convinceth you of sin abide," therefore "repent and do the first works." What are the first works? "Stand still," the true light gives sight, and sight brings a godly sorrow for sin. He that believeth in the Lord shall not make haste. True repentance is comparable to the laying of a foundation to a great building. It is of this tender visitation and deep work the prophet Malachi speaks, "Behold, I will send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me." "The Spirit that I will send shall convince the world of the Son of righteousness and of judgment," and the Lord whom ye seek shall suddenly come to his temple, even the messenger of the covenant, whom ye delight in. "Behold, He shall come, saith the Lord of hosts," and then querieth, "But who may abide the day of his coming, and who shall stand when He appeareth? For He is like a refiner's fire, and like fuller's soap, and He shall sit as a refiner and purifier of silver." Then follows the thorough result of his work, "And He shall purify the sons of Levi, and purge them as gold and silver, that they may offer unto the Lord an offering in righteousness; then shall the offering of Judah and Jerusalem be pleasant unto the Lord as in days of old, and as in former years."

Then the prophet speaks of the continuation of the work of sanctification, and a true preparation to be made "pillars in the house of our God, to go out no more." Here is the "patience of saints," the true love "that endureth all things," and waiteth in patience to receive and feel the eternal reality of "the things hoped for," and another: "They will not follow because they know the voice of the true Shepherd," always remembering as long as we are in the flesh, we have an unwearied enemy that will deceive the very elect if it is possible, yet with every temptation, He (Christ), will make a way for our escape, so that we shall be able to endure it, so our love is seas med with that fear that keeps the eye single to God.

If there is any point in life that requires sober consideration, it is the choice of a life of true godliness, because here we have the flesh, the world, and the devil against us, contesting every step in taking up our daily cross of self-denying. Our practices, wherein we differ from the changeable customs of the world in dress and address, have for their foundation positive Scripture commandments, "Be ye not conformed to this world, but be ye transformed in the spirit of your own mind, to know what is that good and acceptable will of God," and to let our yea be yea, and our nay be nay. The devil and the world appeal to the lusts of the flesh, the pride of life, captivating the mind, blinding it, saying, "there is nothing in those little things." Mark the effect, for it is truly great. The spiritual sensibility of life is benumbed and enfeebled, so that the way is often effectually closed from making any further progress. "Like as the foxes, the little foxes that spoil the vine," for our vines have tender grapes. Experience of age and depth in the knowledge of Divine things in every generation has set its seal to the truth that our doctrines and practices are the very laws and commandments of God, and lead their humble and obedient followers to the peaceful shores of eternal rest.

Therefore, dear young and inexperienced Friends, be not wiser than your Maker and Lawgiver, before Him every knee shall bow either in mercy or judgment, and every tongue confess, that Jesus is Lord, to the glory of God, the Father.

PETER N. DYER.

WEST BRANCH, IOWA.

The Engineer's Experience.

Travelling recently from Chicago to New York, I found in the morning, upon crawling out of my berth, that the train was standing stock still. The porter told me it had been standing thus for an hour and a half, while I had been sleeping. I dressed and peeped out, and saw that we were alongside the platform of a country station. I took a good breakfast in the dining car, and then went out to stroll up and down the platform.

In the cab sat the engineer alone, waiting. Having a natural fondness for machinery I stopped to admire the huge monster.

The engineer seeing my admiration of his machine, asked me to come into the cab. I gladly accepted his invitation.

The engineer, a bright, pleasant faced man, about forty years old, explained to me the uses of the numerous valves and levers about him. They were all as bright and shining as polish could make them, for an engineer is as proud of his engine as any housekeeper is of the neatness of her dwelling. I glanced at the two shining steam gauges with the clock between them, and then I noticed what seemed to be an ordinary white moth, mounted in a gilt frame, hanging against the wall of the cab.

"Is that for an ornament?" I asked, pointing at the moth.

The engineer smiled. "Well, partly for an ornament," he said, "but a good deal more for sentiment. I put that moth there because it saved my life, and the lives of two hundred and fifty people as well."

"How in the world could an insect save human lives?" I asked.

"Well, I will tell you if you want to hear the story. I reckon there's time enough before we are able to get out of this."

I settled myself in the absent stoker's seat and prepared to listen.

"It was 'sich a long time back," said the engineer, "only a year ago last spring. I was running this very train, and this very engine—old 449. My fireman, Jim Meade, the same fellow as I have got now. You can see him over there against the telegraph office.

We were timed to leave M— about one o'clock in the morning, and to arrive in S— about six o'clock. On the night when the thing took place a fearful storm of wind and rain had been raging since early evening, and was at the height of its fury when I started from the engine shed.

It was about midnight and the wind seemed to sweep clear round and through the building. It was terribly dismal. Jim was there, and the engine was already, so after getting my working clothes on, I ran the engine down to the station. Our train, the vestibule limited, was an hour late. I gave the engine a thorough oiling, and made sure that all was in order.

As we sat in the cab we could hear the storm raging outside, while the rain, driven by the gusts of wind, beat fiercely against the windows. Presently our train came in long and heavy, consisting mainly of sleepers.

By-and-by the little gong above my head clanged sharply, and with a puff and hiss of escaping steam we were off into the night and storm, rattling over junctions, past signal lights, and between long lines of carriages till, with a roar and a rumble, we rushed over the long iron bridge and away through the hills, waking their slumbering echoes with our shrill whistle.

The darkness grew more intense, if possible, while the wind shrieked by. The rain became more blinding, till nothing could be distinguished in the gray murk which enveloped us.

Suddenly through the mist and rain I saw looming right in front of us the gigantic figure of a woman wrapped in a long, black mantle, which seemed to flutter in the wind. She waved great spectral arms about in swift, twisting movements. As I stood looking in horror, the figure vanished with a final wave of the arms.

I was too much astonished and stupefied even to make a movement of my hand toward the throttle. At that moment Jim had been bend-over the fire. As he looked up he exclaimed: "Hallo, Frank. What's up? You look as though you had seen a ghost."

I did not answer. My mind was too full of the strange figure I had perceived.

We were now nearing Rock Creek, where there was a bridge over a deep stream. I felt more nervous than ever. We dashed around the curve and whizzed by Rock Creek station, which is only a mile from the bridge. As we passed I glanced at the steam gauge for an instant. A cry from Jim caused me to turn quickly toward him. He sat rigid, his eyes large and starting. His jaw dropped, the very picture of terror. He pointed with a shaking finger out into the darkness. I turned and looked, and then I began myself to shake.

There on the track was the same hideous figure of a woman outlined on the background of light from the engine, now motionless, now whirling in a waltz dance, but all the time motioning us back.

"Frank," gasped Jim, but scarcely above a whisper, "don't go over that bridge. Don't go for heaven's sake! Don't go until you are sure it's safe."

I suppose I was pretty badly scared. At any rate, I put on the brake for all I was worth. I couldn't have resisted the impulse to stop the train.

As we came to a stop I could hear the roar of the water in Rock Creek just ahead. I stepped out of the cab and met the conductor coming up.

"What's the matter? What's the matter?" he asked impatiently.

I felt decidedly foolish. There was no gigantic woman to be seen now. Nothing could be made out more than a few feet away in the blinding storm.

"Well," said I, "we've seen something. I don't know what it is—seemed liked it was a great black ghost that was waving its arms, and warning us not to go forward."

The conductor looked at me curiously. "Are you crazy, Frank," he said. "But we're so near the bridge we'll take a look at it."

We took our lanterns and went ahead, leaving Jim with the engine; he looked frightened to death. But I tell you, we hadn't gone five rods before we stopped in horror.

There at our feet lay a black chasm, filled with the roar of the river, as swollen with the spring rains, it dashed down toward the lake. The bridge was washed away.

Only a few splinters of wood and twisted iron clung to the abutment; while now far out over the blackness, that awful figure of a woman danced again on the thin air, relieved against the shaft of light that the headlight threw.

It was flinging its arms about as if in wild glee. The conductor stared at the chasm and then at me.

"Was that the thing you saw when you stopped the train?" he asked.

"Yes."

"Well, it's something more than luck that saved us to-night, Frank."

We went back slowly to the train, feeling very queer and thankful too, I can assure you.

Several passengers had come running forward by this time. Among them was a young man from Chicago, about eighteen years old, who was smarter than the whole of us, as it turned out.

When he was told of the woman in black he turned and looked at the locomotive headlight.

Then he ran up toward it. I looked up as he did so, and I saw a peculiar spot on the glass.

"There's your woman in black!" said the boy.

And there it was, sure enough—that same moth miller that you see there in the frame. He was clinging to the inside of the glass. As I tapped on the glass the creature flew back and lighted on the reflector.

That's the whole story, sir. The moth by fluttering on the glass just in front of the illuminator, had produced a great black shadow like that of a cloaked woman darting in front of us, and when he flapped his wings in his vain attempt to sail through the glass, he gave his mysterious shadow the appearance of waving the arms widely.

Then when he flew back out of the direct shine of the light, the figure disappeared, of course.

We never knew how he got in there.

Anyhow, he saved our lives by scaring us with that woman in black.

So you see why I keep that moth in the frame. It's to remind me of the way we were saved that night. Yes, you may call it accidental, but I called it providential! —Words of Cheer.

"STRANGERS OF ROME."—The word "strangers," applied only to those from Rome, refers to those Jews who were expelled from Italy by Tiberius, and who, though the edict was revoked, did not return. The Jews in Rome were so numerous in the time of Augustus that eight thousand of them supported an embassy from Judea to the emperor.—H. B. Tristram, in S. S. Times.

THE ARM CHAIR.

Of polished manners and of graceful mien,
Lovely in life was MARY MORTON seen;
Each native talent sanctified by grace,
Was kept, obedient, in its proper place.
Not quick to offer, cautious still to try,
As Gideon did his fleece, both wet and dry;
Like leave among waters, 'tumbled on her knee,
Her spirit wrestled for the heavenly dew;
She dug for water in a weary soil,
Till bubbling life-springs recompensed her toil.
As gently passed the fleeting breath away,
Retentive memory brought her youthful day,
And one fond look back on the past she drew,
Which "Oh, my mother!" trembled on her tongue;
Then the freed spirit passed, and beauteous lay
The rifled casket, lovely in decay!

Widows and orphans, ye may mourn indeed!
Who now shall clothe you, who the hungry feed!
Yes! show your garments, tattered ones, and say,
These SASSON gave us in a wintry day.
From the bleak storm she clothed the shivering frame
When sickness pestered, with healing cordials came,
When age went tottering with no hand to save,
She gave the crutch supporting to the grave!
No cold philosophy was her to dream
Of Babel's tower, or of Malthe's scheme.
As the heart prompted, the concurring hand
Obeyed instinctively, each kind command.
When streams of suffering ran beside her door,
The bitter waters lost their nauseous power;
The prophet's sail she in the current threw,
And sat and saw the changing waters grow.
Careful her Master's bounty to bestow,
A faithful stewardship of gifts to show;
That she might hear that language at the close—
"To me ye did it, as ye did to those!"

A pillar of the church, erect and strong,
Swayed by no friendship to the church's wrong;
Unwarped, unmoved, sound to the very core,
And rendered firmer by the weight he bore;
An honest watchman the alarm to sound,
When foes were sowing tares within our ground,
Or rootless plants luxuriously would shoot,
In spreading branches, and produce no fruit;
Was EVANS. Off the archers' bows were bent
To turn the veteran from his firm intent;
Their malice moved not, and their threats were vain,
Fixed at his post determined to remain;
And when at last the signal was given,
Death's message found him with his armor on;
No oilless lamp to trim, no loins to gird,
Ready to enter at the bridegroom's word;
Where his loved HANNAH, earlier called away,
Was his fellow-runner to the realms of day.

So too our SHEPPARD, when she heard the cry,
Her wings expanding sought her home on high;
One thought upon a faithful sufferer cast,
Told her own hopes, then to her aid past.
Aid the wrongs of that time, and
When into waiting went forth his power;
Though meek of manners and of gentle heart,
JANE BETTLE played a Christian soldier's part.
Though courteous, firm, unwavering, though kind,
Pupil of Christ, he disciplined her mind.
Secured him from active service here,
Yet bearing burdens in her private sphere;
Who waited waiting for his faithful word,
Until her fetters were in love unbound.
Her youthful Edward, but of promise rare,
Was early called to bloom in regions fair;
Another chord, strong though unseen, to move
The heart to seek a resting place above.

ALLEN, when all around was clothed in night,
Passed from earth's darkness to eternal light.
Oh, what a blessed change to thee was given,
To sleep in Jesus and to wake in heaven;
Leave thy worn vestments with their earthly stain,
A spotless robe of righteousness to gain!

YE WHO MY BEING GAVE—ye too have flown,
To join the ransomed souls in that eternal throne.
When the redemptive Sire, as death drew near,
Saw the vale awful, but devoid of fear;
He whom he loved was near him in that hour,
Death had no terrors, and the grave no power.
Before thee, Mother, rose a "brilliant path,"

*Catherine Sheppard, an elder of the Northern District Monthly Meeting, died the fifteenth of Twelfth Month, 1842, aged eighty years.

'or thee thy Saviour had no looks of wrath,
 Who died to save Him long and, at the last,
 His arm supported as ye Jordan passed!

'hus, one by one, in quick suc-cession go,
 Whose who have labored in the church below!
 We dare not murmur as we kiss the rod,
 'Nor art our helper, save thy church, O God!
 'Hine, in our midst, the forms we dare not shun,
 A earth and heaven alike, thy will be done!

'ell me, my old AEM CHAIR, when thou wert young,
 Vere Quaker parlors with gilt pictures hung?
 'd art Quaker to his image fall,
 A household idol placed along the wall?
 'h, we do not know, 'till we cry to pride, Abomination!" as she turned aside.
 —But times are altered: splendid mansions glow,
 And gilded mirrors humble Quakers show.
 With Turkish carpets are their parlors spread,
 While silken curtains hang about their bed?
 'What contradiction! grave the dame and sire;
 'Jongous their dwelling—simple their attire!
 'Their children moulding to the place they dwell,
 'n London fashions, Paris manners swell;
 'While parents scarcely wish to set them free,
 'or what they won't restrain they love to see.

're there no worthies now to fill the place
 'f those victors, who have run their race?
 're we deserted? has all merit flown?
 'nd must the church in helpless anguish moan?
 'h, no! the grace that made them what they were,
 ' living remnant in due measure share;
 'nd haply they on whom their mantle fit,
 'ay where the ancients sat, in judgment sit.

'aith, give me power to see a brighter day,
 'hen all these "letting things" shall pass away;
 'hen the convulsion, which has now begun,
 'hall pause in silence, all its purpose done.
 'hen the oppressors of the seed shall wear
 'he mask no longer, all their acts laid bare;
 'hen chaff and chert shall to the wind be doimed,
 'nd dress the world in the robes of fire!
 'hen to the world the worldly part is given;
 'hen the redeemed shall clove walk with heaven;
 'hen to our Zion shall the weary come,
 'ike "doves to windows," pressing to their home.
 'h, haste the day, when through his power Divine,
 'he Father's light around his church shall shine!

Many there are whose prayers avail for this;
 Whose greatest joy would be in Zion's bliss;
 Whose morning breathing and whose evening prayer,
 Is that the Lord would place his glory there.
 What though a worldly spirit has crept in,
 That faint the kingdom through new ways would win;
 Scorning the narrow path our fathers tread,
 And following man, would pass the crosses and rod,
 Yet they who look from P'egaz's height can see,
 Such by-paths lead away from Calvary;
 While they who seek in empty forms for bliss,
 Will grasp at shadows and the substance miss.
 No, no! As ancient PENNOCK clearly saw,
 Still with his people shall abide the law;
 Still shall the testimony here be found,
 Still our and daughters to the altar bound.
 The Lord himself his attributes shall take;
 Again shall order out of chaos break.
 Then shall the church in rapturous numbers sing,
 And shout victorious as she owns her King;
 While those who seek to draw her from the way,
 Themselves shall lose in error's paths astray!

THE METHODS OF QUACKING.—One of the most amusing, and at the same time sad things, is to see certificates published in religious papers and others, signed by men certifying that they have been cured of disease by a machine, or a medicine, which is an infallible cure for the maladies spoken of, when to our certain knowledge the signers of the said certificates subsequently died of the same disease. We have noted fifteen cases of as many different remedies, which in corroboration of this statement we should publish, were it not for the grief it would give to the bereaved; and were we to publish them without the names the vendors would deny the facts.—Christian Advocate.

The Absurdity of War.

War is the last remnant of man's mode of deciding disputes in the animal or savage state, says E. L. Goulkin in the "Century." As soon as he started on the road to civilization he set up Judges or Courts to settle controversies. Before that, when two men differed about anything, they tore or mutilated each other's bodies, and it was tacitly agreed that the man who was most mutilated, if not killed, should give way. But he abode by the decisions of Courts very reluctantly. The earliest battle of the reformers of the race was to get him to submit to the Judges. He always preferred in his heart some kind of mutilation of his adversary's body, and in order to give a certain dignity to this mode of settling quarrels, he got up the theory that God presided over it, and always gave the victory to the man that was right. In England this notion lasted in the "trial by battle," or "wager of battle," almost down to our own time. It was held that the Deity was on the side of the man who gave most cuts and stabs.

When the wager of battle as the settlement of disputes of any kind became too absurd, the turbulent classes were driven into starting the duel. They felt that there must be some mode reserved of getting at an adversary's body with some weapon. So they established the rule that all offences against what they called their "honor"—that is, their sense of personal dignity—must be avenged by cutting, stabbing, or shooting, and that each man must decide when his "honor" was injured, and when cutting, stabbing, or shooting was necessary. This was a very cunning arrangement; for if it were left to other people to say when your "honor" was injured, you might never, or very rarely, get a chance to cut or stab or shoot at all, because they might say your honor was not injured. But there was even a better device than this; it was arranged that the man who you said had injured your honor could not deny it or apologize without disgrace. He was held bound, no matter how trifling the injury, to give you a chance to cut him or stab him, and to do his best to cut or stab you. In what manner this mended your honor was never explained. To all outward appearance, after the theory of the interest of the Deity in the matter had died out, your honor remained after the fight exactly what it was before the fight. The cutting and stabbing had neither proved nor disproved anything; it had simply gratified an animal instinct of the primeval time. Duelling however, has disappeared here and in England. It flourishes still in the old barbarous, absurd form, on the Continent.

Disputes between nations, for obvious reasons, have not come as rapidly under human methods of decision as disputes between individuals. Nations have never agreed to have Judges and arguments as individuals have. The result is that their mode of deciding differences of opinion has always remained the old animal one of doing as much material injury as possible to the other side; and there still lingers the belief that God is on the side of the one which does the most injury; that He counts up the number of killed and wounded, and decides that the one which has most killed and wounded is in the wrong. During war He is prayed to see that the number of killed and wounded on the other side be the larger, and after what is called a "victory"—that is, the killing and wounding of a larger number of your enemies than they have managed to kill and wound on your side—people hurry to church and sing hymns of thanks. This belief is very strong still in our day, and the enemy's dead are counted joyfully. The human plan of deciding differences of opinion by Judges, proofs, and argumentative persuasion, as distinguished from the animal or feline plan of deciding by the tearing and rending of bodies, has in fact not made much progress, though it has begun to receive attention. —Selected.

WHEN PEOPLE CATCH COLD.—The "cold spots," meaning thereby the surface areas peculiarly susceptible to cold, are principally the nape of the neck and the lower part of the back of the head, the front of the abdomen, and the shins. The acute discomfort and the sense of impending disaster which result from the steady play of a current of cold air upon the neck from behind are well known. The necessity of keeping the abdomen warmly clad is also generally recognized, though perhaps not as generally carried into practice. Curiously enough, few people are conscious of the danger they run by exposing the usually inadequately protected shins to currents of cold air. This is the usual way in which colds are caught on omnibuses. When driving one takes care to cover the legs with a rug or waterproof, but on the more democratic conveyance rugs are not often available, and the reckless passenger by and by awakens to the fact that the iron has entered into his soul—in other words, that he has "caught cold." People who wear stockings, such as Highlanders, golfers, and cyclists, invariably take the precaution of turning the thick woolen material down over the shins, the better to protect them against loss of heat, though, incidentally, the artificial embellishment of the calves may not be altogether foreign to the manoeuvre. This is an instance of how all things work together for good. It does not, of course, follow, because certain areas are peculiarly susceptible to cold, that a chill may not be conveyed to the nervous system from other points. Prolonged sitting on a stone, or even on the damp grass, is well known to be a fertile source of disease; and wet, cold feet are also, with reason, credited with paving the way to an early grave.—London Medical Press.

A ST. BERNARD DOG, which lives near Boston, proves a great comfort to a widow to whom he does not belong. Dogs usually confine their care to their own households, but this one, recognizing the unprotected state of the widow, who lives alone, extends his services to her house. She is afraid of tramps who pass her home on the way to Boston. The farmer who owns the dog, therefore, when he sees a suspicious character coming up the road, says to his dog:

"Jack, go over to Mrs. H's and sit on her piazza till the tramp gets by."

Whereupon the dog runs over to H's, and posts himself at the door, and if the tramp comes up the walk steps forward and growls at him. As the dog is a big one and rather forbidding, though he has never been known to bite anyone, the tramp, in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, remembers that it is setting late and that he hasn't any time to fool away along the road. When he is well out of sight the dog returns home.

The dog carries his gallantry to the same lady to such an extent that when she is visiting his master's house of an evening, he always accompanies her home to the door of her house. —N. Y. Tribune.

A Reminiscence.

The writer has not seen a printed or historical account of the life work of either Clarkson Sheppard or Joseph Scattergood, but has great cause to remember their visit in the love of the Gospel to the churches and members of the Society of Friends west of the Mississippi River, being in company with them at the house of the late S. W. Stauley, from whence they took leave of those present, to go, I think, direct to their eastern homes. The latter turned the writer aside and proposed that we should enter into a friendly correspondence, which gave rise to a quick succession of thoughts on the part of the writer, viz: to refuse such proffered kindness would be indecorous, and it is not likely that I can interest so great and good a man, but perchance some good may come to one whose life has been spent on the frontier. The proposition was accepted with, I think, the understanding that he would inform of his arrival at home, etc. It was not long till a pleasant note was received giving that information with some remarks on the isolated situation of the portion of Society that they had visited in the west, and of his thoughts of establishing a fund to be considered as a nucleus that might be added to until enough accumulated to establish a boarding-school within the limits of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting, a branch of Ohio Yearly Meeting, in the State of Iowa.

Owing to many and varied interruptions in the domestic career of the writer, none of this correspondence is now extant, leaving nothing to guide my pen in this sketch but memory. The boarding-school has been in operation for several years, but is not self-supporting, nor can it be, unless a more general interest is manifested in its usefulness or object.

It is not far from the time of this visit that the officials of the State of Iowa decided to build a prison at the little city of Anamosa, Jones County. Shortly after the work began, wife and I, being in that place for social purposes, in company with others, proposed visiting the new begin prison, and were informed that a small sum would be required of each adult with the explanation that the object was to accumulate funds to purchase books to establish a library for the benefit of the convicts, making it a pleasant fund to aid in. Not long after this, in writing to my Friend J. S., allusion was made to this visit, and of their wish to form a library. Pretty soon I received a note informing that at date there was due at my address a package of books for the prison library. I called for books, but being informed that the express charges west of Chicago were charged to me, I thought it doubtful whether I could take the books, but found my slender purse contained the exact amount. On reaching home, wife and I began to feel the responsibility of the charge we had assumed. Being familiar with the history of the Society of Friends, we thought of many instances of suffering and abuse that had fallen to the lot of not a few for much less officiousness than we were engaged in, viz: offering to our State officials books advocating the tenets of doctrine held by the once despised Quakers, and we knew not but that in this case it would incur great displeasure. At the close of our following mid-week meeting I informed Friends of the trust I had in care, proposing that if any one felt inclined to join me in it it would be pleasant to have company, it was not long till a Friend called and informed that he and wife were inclined to join wife and I in going with the books. A time was set when they would call, our place being in route for them.

A pleasant ride of eight miles brought us to the gate of the prison yard. It seemed in place for me to go forward. On informing the turnkey that I had business with the warden, he informed me that that official was not in; leading to a brief explanation of my business. Oh, said he, I presume the clerk can wait on you, bidding his attendant to escort the gentlemen to the clerk's office. I followed with trembling steps and faltering heart, but, oh, how changed were my feelings on approaching that official as he grasped my hand as that of an old acquaintance, remarking that he took me to be a member of the Society of Friends and that he had not met with any of our people in a long time, adding, I have great respect for that Society, leading to the query, Why so? Because, said he, My parents were members. I was raised in it, I was one of the first set of students admitted in the Mt. Pleasant Boarding-school, and in those days Jacob and Mary Ouz, my grand-parents, sat at the head of Ohio Yearly Meeting. Oh, said I, that makes us almost relations, for my elder brother married thy first cousin. The opening for social chat was so wide I must needs excuse myself, telling my friends were waiting out in the cold, adding that through the kindness of a Friend of Philadelphia I had the privilege of offering them a parcel of books for their library, adding that I knew not how they might feel about receiving a parcel of our books. Oh, said he, you could not suit me better, and I am sure the warden will thank you. At this juncture he bid his attendant to bring in the books and the Friends, taking cognizance of the books.

In his official capacity he showed us everything of interest that they had completed, and by use of drawings, what was intended, making us as welcome as life-long friends; inviting us to return at every convenience, laying his hand on my shoulder, saying, You remember that any of your family or Friends are always welcome here on account of those books. But, said I, it is my Philadelphia friend deserves thanks for the books. No, said he, it is you that we know in that matter, and you must accept our thanks. You may thank your friend all you please, saying at the rate we pay for books, there were fifty dollars worth. Mention was made of my paying express charges, and it was refunded.

Shortly after this, being in Cedar County, I met with Elizabeth Williams, who, with her husband, many years deceased, were the first caretakers of the Mt. Pleasant Boarding-school, of Ohio Yearly Meeting. Relating to her something of my acquaintance at the prison, giving the name of Louis Kinzie, as Secretary. She started with emotions of interest and sympathy, saying she knew him from his beginning in life's voyage, that he received his education principally under the tuition of her husband, and she remembered him well as a student in the Boarding-school, desiring me at the first opportunity to remember her kindly to him. At hearing the name of the dear old woman, his emotions blazed, giving utterance to the ejaculations, Is it possible that my old matron is still alive, I supposed her in heaven long ago, for there is where she belongs when she quits this world; desiring me if opportunity offered, to give his respects to her. Thus it was my privilege to exchange their friendly greetings, until the death of Elizabeth Williams, in the autumn of 1881. Whether Louis Kinzie is in the body or out of the body, I know not.

My acquaintance extended to the warden and several of the principal of police, whose kindness was such that they, or the warden, informed me that at any time any of our ministers might incline to hold religious service with the convicts, no preliminary arrangements would be necessary, just use freedom and come to the chapel at their usual hour for collecting and the announcement would be made that the service for the day would be left entirely with the Friends or the visitors. It has been the privilege of the writer to attend several meetings thus held, that were without doubt highly favored seasons; as in the case of the late Elwood Dean, and a woman and her husband for companion, from eastern Ohio, our committee on the latter occasion may have reached the number of twelve or fifteen. We were treated with much respect; we inclined to spend much time in the prison, to be present at their dining and afterward to see them in their individual cells. As we passed into that apartment I queried of the guard at the door, why he didn't escort us as I had noticed him do on other occasions. Because, said he, we know that you people will do our men no harm; you are at full liberty to talk to them all you wish. A messenger soon came to inform that No. — wished to see me; as I approached he extended his hand through the iron bars, saying, as I received it in mine, O, Mr. D., you don't know the good it does us to have you come in and talk to us, for we see that you have no pre-arranged matter, what you say comes right from your heart, and it does us good. The chaplain said he, comes in with a discourse written down and reads it off to us, but has no feeling of interest in us at all; he is an hireling. I could but think had the guard been present, the poor convict would not have felt that freedom. My own words of cheer are not now at my command, but his parting words were, May God bless you; come and see us often.

My present thought is the Society of Friends have much to be thankful for, and the work owes much to the Society of Friends. I wish now to say that recently a destructive fire occurred in the State prison at Anamosa, Iowa by which the entire library was destroyed. Whom my readers will respond, as did that worthy man, Joseph Scattergood, and send a parcel of books to the same address, Wm. R. Dewees, Springville, Linn County, Iowa, or direct to Warden Madden, Anamosa, Jones Co., Iowa.

CONCERNING STORIES TOLD TO CHILDREN — We cannot take too great care in our conversation before children. I call to mind an incident which will illustrate this truth. A father told a story of a lie which, in very early childhood, he told his mother. A little girl, six years of age, heard the story, and a few days after was found guilty of an untruth. On being reproved, and the mother expressing both grief and surprise, she said, "Papa told a lie when he was a little boy, and it was just as bad for him as for me!"

The mother, remembering the story, explained that papa was but two and a half years old, was punished at the time, was sorry for his sin, and became thereafter a truthful boy and a good true man. But both father and mother learned a valuable lesson from this incident.

I doubt the wisdom of allowing boys to hear the stories of the pranks of their fathers in their college days. Reminiscences between collegians in the absence of the young may be harmless, but fathers, in the presence of their children, should pause long enough to decide whether they are willing their sons do likewise. Nor do we always remember that children are kely to misunderstand or misinterpret what they hear. A gentleman told me this story of a childhood, over seventy five years ago. A boy was told before him of a boy who had omitted some crime, and it was observed that he was a "Sunday-school scholar." To appreciate the story, we must remember that Sunday-schools at that time were few and they were wholly unknown to the boy. His inference was that the crime was the natural result of the boy's wickedness in the attendance of school on that day. This was not the thought of the narrator of the story, who, believed in the good of Sunday-schools, and that the boy's sin was greater on account of his unusual advantage. In telling me the story, the person said, "It was some time before, as a child, I could feel it was quite right to have school on the Sabbath."

A minister, in a sermon, to young people, in telling, for their interest and benefit, the story of his childhood and youth, no doubt to illustrate the grace of God in the change wrought within him, entered into particulars of his early life,—his smoking, swearing, and drinking. A father who was not a Christian, relates the following instance: his son, who heard the sermon, was found, soon after, smoking and swearing. When asked for the reason, as he had never been known to do either, the boy said, "If I can learn to do these things when a boy, perhaps, when I become a man, I can be a preacher like —," whom, by the way, the boy greatly admired.

It is not my intention to enlarge upon these incidents, but leave them to speak for themselves to others, as they have done to me.—Alice Hamilton Rich, in S. S. Times.

The Treaty of Arbitration.

It has been a cause of sincere rejoicing, we believe, among a large portion of our fellow-citizens, that an agreement has been made between the representatives of Great Britain and the United States providing for the establishment of a tribunal for the peaceful settlement of certain questions of dispute by arbitration, should such hereafter arise between these two countries, and which now only awaits the sanction of the Senate of the United States, and the Privy Council of Great Britain to give it the force of law.

The widespread interest which this important measure has awakened in the United States is shown by the close attention with which the proceedings of the Senate in regard to it are observed from day to day, and by the editorial and other comments of the daily press.

The delay which has taken place in acting upon it by the Senate has awakened fears lest that body should not approve of it as originally prepared. Evidence of these apprehensions is afforded in the large number of communications which have been addressed to the Senate urging its prompt ratification. These have come not only from bodies of religious professors of different denominations and peace societies, but from associations of lawyers, of bankers and business men, boards of trade, citizens in various parts of the country in their individual capacity, and by the Legislatures of at least two States—Minnesota and Massachusetts. It should be mentioned also that a few memorials have been received by the Senate remonstrating against its ratification.

The usual course upon the presentation of a proposed treaty to the Senate is to refer it to its standing Committee on Foreign Relations, by which when it is satisfied to do so, it is reported to the Senate either with or without amendments. A final decision upon it is reached by the Senate in executive session, the proceedings of which are not public. After the approval of a treaty in this manner, should no alteration in it be made, it is proclaimed by the President and becomes a part of the law of the land.

In the present instance the full text of the Treaty was soon obtained by the public press, and thus became known throughout both countries before the respective bodies gave it the consideration required by their respective forms of government.

In the promotion of a treaty which indicates so great an advance in the cause of peace, it could not but be expected that the Society of Friends would be deeply interested, and also concerned to use the influence which it might possess in its favor, if it would open for it.

At a late special meeting of the Representative body of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting an Essay of a Memorial on the subject was adopted as follows, and directed to be submitted to the Senate. A committee of three of its members was appointed to attend to its presentation:

*To the Senate of the United States:—*The Memorial of the Representatives of the Yearly Meeting of the religious Society of Friends for Pennsylvania, New Jersey and Delaware, respectfully represents:

That they have observed with much satisfaction that a treaty has been laid before the Senate providing for the reference to arbitration of certain questions of dispute, should such hereafter arise, between this country and Great Britain.

Within the past fifty years the method of settling international differences by arbitration has led to gratifying results in several cases in which the United States has been one of the parties in interest; and an extension of this method by the treaty now under consideration appears to us eminently wise and proper.

The advantage of an established system under which matters of dispute may be withdrawn from irritating discussion and referred for judicial and peaceful settlement, as thus proposed, must be apparent. We rejoice in the belief that such a course commends itself to the Christian sentiment of a large body of religious professors on both sides of the Atlantic, and if adopted would strengthen the close ties which already exist of a common language and lineage, and commercial and friendly intercourse.

The substitution of arbitration for an appeal to the sword we believe is in harmony with the spirit and teachings of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace, and that so far as it is accepted it will hasten the approach of that happy period which we believe it is the Divine purpose to bring about in the earth, as foretold in ancient prophecy, "When nation shall not lift up the sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."

We would express the hope that on the present favorable occasion the Senate of the United States will so act, as to be instrumental, under the Divine blessing, in further establishing this method of ending differences as a part of our national system, by the speedy ratification of the Treaty, without making such amendments to it as will materially limit its application.

By direction and on behalf of a meeting of the Representatives aforesaid, held the eighth of Second Month, 1897.

GEORGE M. COMFORT, Clerk.

It is understood that the Committee of our Meeting for Sufferings took the above Memorial to Washington, and that the way opened for a personal interview of a satisfactory kind with four of the Senators. What the final issue will be, cannot at this time be told, but it may be hoped that the Meeting for Sufferings will have the satisfaction of feeling that they have done what they could.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 20, 1897.

Among the pleasant recollections of the days spent at school is the time occupied in studying the Essays of Jonathan Dymond on the Principles of Morality. The clearness of his style, and the directness and force of his reasoning, made it a book which has remained fresh in memory during the many succeeding years. We are pleased therefore, to find that the Book Committee of our Meeting for Sufferings, has issued a new edition of this valuable work, which is for sale at Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia. Price, 75 cents.

In the essays as left by their author, the general principles of morality are applied to a great variety of cases. Some of these are not so applicable to American institutions and customs as to those of England, and therefore their retention in a volume especially designed for circulation in this country would unnecessarily swell its size. Bearing this in mind, the Committee who superintended its publication have somewhat abridged the book by the omission of some parts which could be left out without weakening the force of the arguments or the general value of the work.

We hope it may have a wide circulation, believing its thoughtful perusal will prove of great advantage to many.

The Committee have prefixed a brief biography of the author, which we propose reprinting in THE FRIEND.

We understand that the Report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education gives extracts from twenty-four books of English history, touching on the relations between England and the United States, and that these do not inculcate a spirit of antagonism towards this country. Although circumstances have at times brought the two countries into collision, yet there are no two nations that ought to be more closely united. They speak the same language, are descended from the same ancestors, look with reverence on the same noble examples of virtue and patriotism; and although both have cause to blush at their treatment of weaker races, yet there are probably no other nations that have shown a more earnest desire to promote the welfare of the world, as for example in the suppression of slavery.

It is a remarkable circumstance that a comparatively small island should exercise such a preponderating influence over a large part of the world, and that it should reckon among its subjects more millions of people than ever Cyrus or Alexander governed.

A letter recently received from a Friend in England speaks of the two books recently published by our Meeting for Sufferings—Dymond's Essays, and Memoirs of Stephen Grellet.

It mentions that the late Joseph Pease had Dymond's Essays translated and published in Spanish, and that the King of Spain was so favorably impressed with it, that he offered Joseph Pease a title, which the latter declined. Of S. Grellet he remarks, "I regard it as a very useful book. I have given several copies of it to persons who appreciate it much."

"When in Russia, three years ago, we were mentioning the book as having been read by the late Princess Alice to her mother, Queen Victoria (who has always taken an interest in Friends), to one of the ladies of honor to the Empress (Alexandra). She at once said, 'I know the book well. I have read it, and she accepted a copy to hand to one of the court ladies who would value it.'"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Congress in joint session on the 10th instant witnessed the count of the Electoral vote for President and Vice President of the United States for the term beginning Third Month 4th, 1887. The votes of the several States were read in the following order, as prescribed, by Vice President S. Cresswell, who presided. It was that McKinley had received 271 votes for President and Bryan, 176; that Hobart had received 271 votes for Vice-President, Sewall, 149, and Watson, 27.

The Mas-sachusetts Legislative Committee on Constitutional Amendments has voted to refer an amendment to the Constitution striking out the word "male," thus giving to women the full right of suffrage.

The Police Department of Taunton, Mass., is trying a novel experiment to decrease drunkenness in that place. The name of every person arrested and convicted of the offense in question is to be sent to each licensed liquor dealer in the city, with a warning that if he sells to any one of them within six months after the receipt of their names the person so doing will be liable to a fine.

The Iowa Supreme Court has decided that the Miliat liquor law does not apply to cities under special charters. This restores the prohibitory law in Davenport, Iowa, Cedar Rapids, Keokuk and several other cities.

Newark, N. J., consumes more beer per capita than any other American city.

John Gray Evans, who, until a few weeks ago was Governor of South Carolina, is in New York sending the praises of the dispensary law of that State, which, he says, has put an end to the rum-drunkeries in South Carolina. Governor Evans also says that his State is already in favor of silver as before election, but likes McKinley better than Cleveland. He believes that the next Congress will do something for a more flexible currency. South Carolina farmers have learned economy, and now enjoy a notable degree of prosperity.

News of the discovery of the richest copper deposit ever found was brought to Spokane, Washington, last week, by Paul Gaston, a well-known mining man. He shows samples of the ore taken from the ledge, which was assessed as 45 to 50 per cent copper and 5 to 6 per cent silver. The ledge from which the ore was taken runs from twelve to forty feet in width, and is well defined for several miles. It lies in an entirely new mineral district, and is located on the Canadian boundary line north of Okanogan County, Washington.—The ledge extends on both sides of the boundary line.

The worst snow storm of the year, rage I on the 11th inst. in Western and Central Kansas. Deaths in this city last week numbered 540, which is 25 more than the previous week, and 48 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 297 were males and 243 females; 121 died of pneumonia; 41 of consumption; 32 of heart disease; 21 of old age; 23 of diphtheria; 19 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 17 of cancer; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 16 of bright disease; 15 of epilepsy; 14 of inanition; 10 of convulsions; 12 from asphyxiation; 10 of portulacium and 10 of unknown causes.

Med. Cas. 46: 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140.

FEED.—Spring range 4 from $12.25 to $12.75 per ton for winter in full, and $12.00 to $12.50 for spring in sacks.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.55 a $2.80; do, extras, $2.00 a $2.30; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $4.10 a $4.25; do, do, straight, $4.25 a $4.40; Western winter, clear, $4.10 a $4.25; do, do, straight, $4.25 a $4.40; do, extras, $4.50 a $4.65; spring, clear, $3.50 a $3.75; do, inferior brands, higher. City mills, extra, $3.05 a $3.30; do, clear, $4.05 a $4.30; do, straight, $4.30 a $4.50; do, patent, $4.55 a $4.80. RYE FLOUR.—$2.75 per bbl. for choice Pennsylvania. BUCKWHEAT FLOUR.—$1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.20; do, No. 1, 2 1/2 a 2 3/4. No. 2 white oats, 2 1/4 a 2 1/2.

BEEF CATTLE.—EXTRA, 4 a 5; good, 4 1/4 a 4 3/4; medium, 4 a 4 1/2; common, 4 a 4 1/2.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—EXTRA, 4 a 4 1/2; good, 4 a 4 1/2; medium, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4; 2 a 3 1/2; lambs, 4 a 5 1/2.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4; other Western, 5 a 5 1/2; 5 1/2 a 5 3/4.

FOREIGN.—The House of Commons has rejected a bill providing for the closing of public houses on the first day of the week.

Lord Dufferin is President of the committee in charge of the celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of North America, which will be held this year at Bristol, Cabot's home port.

In England about one in twenty-one of the population have an account in a savings bank; in Wales, one in forty; in Scotland, one in twelve; in Ireland, one in one hundred. The average annual income of English depositors is $1 U. S. in the Welsh, 1 1/2 in the Scotch, $1 1/2 to $1.50; and to the Irish, 75c. 100.

It was one hundred years ago this month that a man was arrested in London for wearing a tall silk hat, the first article of headgear of that kind ever seen in the world.

The town of Bida, the capital of the Foulah tribe, in Senegal, captured by the British Niger Expedition. No details of the battle have yet been received.

Several university professors, who signed a declaration in favor of the striking dock laborers of Hamburg, are to be prosecuted by order of the German Government.

The Cretan insurgents have bombarded Crete, the Cape of Crete, and the Turks returned their fire with sanguinary results. Greece has notified the Powers that ties of race and religion compel her to intervene in behalf of the oppressed and outraged Christians in Crete. Preparations were made to land men and armaments of war upon the shores of Crete.

The committee on the reform of the British currency has recommended there have informed Prince George, commanding the Greek torpedo flotilla, that they have received orders to prevent the occupation of the island of Crete by Greece, and if necessary to use force to carry out their instructions. On the 15th inst. all the foreign warships had formed a cordon around Crete, in readiness for action; the French admiral in command. It was thought probable that foreign occupation of Crete will be developed upon by the Powers, which will likely be limited to a considerable increase of the gendarmerie on the island, with the co-operation of the foreign fleets controlling the Cretan ports.

The Spanish Prime Minister stated last week that the treaty, which it arrived for putting into effect the reforms in Cuba.

Prime Minister Canovas del Castillo has issued a statement in which he says it will not be incompatible to apply the reforms in Cuba while General Weyler is in command there, but he adds, the moment to effect the reforms has not arrived.

The London Times publishes a Madrid despatch saying that the papers there announce that the Duke of Tetuan, Minister of Foreign Affairs, has received from Dupuy de Lome, the Spanish Minister to the United States, a telegram stating that President Cleveland, Secretary of State Olney and all of the other members of the United States Government are in favor of Cuba recently adopted by the Spanish Government as ample. Minister de Lome, the despatch says, added that the Cuban question may be considered as dead so far as the United States Congress and public opinion are concerned. President-elect McKinley is also believed to regard the reforms favorably. The Times says that the United States Government is reserved, but that the foregoing is more or less correct.

On the 16th instant the Havana Official Gazette published two decrees, the first of which provides for making compulsory the circulation of script at par with silver; for the trial of deprecators of paper money on charges of being in league with the rebels; and for the sending of an order to the American Bank

Note Company of New York for the printing of fractional currency, which order is to be immediately executed. The second decree provides regulation for the sale of lottery tickets.

The Cuban tobacco yield the past year has been 75,000 hales, instead of 500,000 hales, the yield this year. The sugar crop has been reduced to one fourth of its former size, and will be smaller the coming year.

Since the beginning of this century no less than fifty-two volcanic islands have risen out of the sea. Nineteen of that number have since disappeared and ten are now inhabited.

DIED, at the house of her son-in-law, Charles Cope Winona, Ohio, First Month 28th, 1887, of pneumonia, ANNA E. ELLIOTT, widow of the late Joseph Edgerton, in the eightieth year of her age; a member of New Garden Monthly Meeting of Friends. She was through life strongly attached to the ancient principles and practices of Friends, and mourned the dear partners therefrom. She was enabled to feel the strengthening support of the Divine arm through penitential trials, and for months before her death gave evidence that her spirit was ripening for a more enduring inheritance; and as the period of dissolution approached, her anxiety and concern increased to be prepared for the solemn change, saying at one time, "I crave to be washed and made clean from every defilement at once, as I feel that I have not yet passed all understanding." She passed quietly and peacefully away, leaving to her relatives and Friends the comforting belief that through the merits and mercies of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, she was enabled to attain to that condition she so earnestly longed for, and being really when she was out to meet Him."

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1873.—Sixth Mo. 24th.—Monthly Meeting laid before Friends the impression I had had, but it was the will of my Heavenly Father that a visit be offered to Salem and Haddonfield Quarterly Meetings, and they granted me a minute. Oh, that I may be equipped with the armor of God.

In regard to this visit she writes to a Friend under date of Sixth Month 29th: "You will be interested in what lies nearest my best life at his time, viz: my proposed visit in the service of Truth. Oh, that it may be to the honor and praise of the blessed, holy and eternal Name. He has been very good to give me quiet trust in Him and many confirmations. Friends granted is all three* minutes, and we are to enter upon our work next Third-day morning. I go in rembling, but seek to hide under the shadow of his wing of the Almighty. Oh, that I may see the states of the people, and minister his Word of the strengthening of his children. . . . I know you will think of us, and please desire that my spirit may draw all its supplies from the alone true Fountain of Light."

Seventh Month 22nd, she again writes, "The dear Master has indeed been good, supplying all my needs so far, and the query, 'Lacked ye anything,' with the answer, 'Nothing, Lord,' has often come to mind. Sometimes I feel so poor, and as though I had done so poorly, and then the kind words of unity from dear Friends would cheer me on my way. I have not felt like giving out, only after having to be very plain, and thinking others could do it so much better, I felt such an abhorrence of self, no condemnation that I could see, but such an unprofitable servant. We are to leave the result to the Master."

Ninth Month 15th.—She gives some account of Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting. "It was favored, I think, with a solid exercise. Several of the Committee were there—H. Wood, P. W. Roberts, and others. In Select Meeting, P. W. R. supplicated for the living, that they might be strengthened and enabled to persevere, referring to those that had been gathered. We missed J. Snowdon very much and E. B. Stokes also. . . . 'Cast not away your confidence, which has great recompense of reward,' seemed to be my message to them, and it felt to me the chariot wheels were only waiting to convey other redeemed spirits over the border. Mary Lippincott, a dear aged afflicted Friend was there. She has wheels to her chair, and is brought to meeting in that way, whenever the weather is suitable. Her home is with her son-in-law, and we took tea there, Phoebe and Abby also. She seemed so redeemed and just ready to step into the good country. There was a little silence before separating, and encouragement offered." After giving the exercises of a number of Friends in the general Quarterly Meeting the —day following, she writes:

"Next thy poor friend thought a little was required of her. 'We have an altar, whereof they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle.' God is the judge. He knows those upon the altar of whose hearts the flame is kept burning, whose spirits cry, 'Search me, oh, God, and know my heart, try me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting; purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean,' etc. But some, it is feared, have settled upon this; but feeling that once experiencing the forgiveness of sins is enough, they are safe now. But we have not so learned Christ. Encouragement was given to bear the cross daily, to sit alone and keep silence, a putting of the mouth as in the dust, being willing to appear as a Fool for Christ's sake. This was a close testimony given me to bear. It is often sealed upon my spirit, that this people are not willing sufficiently to descend into humiliation, do not realize the words, 'This people have I formed for myself: they shall show forth my praise.' I think there is a deepening with many; but if it was more general, would not Zion arise and shake herself from the dust and put on her beautiful garments."

In her diary, alluding to the closing up of this visit, she writes, Tenth Month 3rd, 1873: "This visit has been performed greatly to the peace of my mind, and my spirit magnifies the power of the Holy One of Israel for help granted in many needful times. Without thee I am so poor, and with thee very rich. My endeared friends, Edward and Sarah Richie accompanied me, greatly to my comfort and satisfaction. There are many concerned Friends in all parts, but more need of cross-bearing is apparent."

12th.—The sweetness and force of the words, "The name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it and are safe," have impressed my mind much this day. The Lord is good to them that put their trust in Him, blessed forever be his name, in that He enables me to run into it this day as into a high tower, where the waves of trial break harmlessly at my feet. Oh, that all might taste and see that the Lord is good, might seek Him in prosperity, that He may be with them in trouble.

Twelfth Month 7th.—My prayer is unto thee,

Oh, thou Almighty Helper of the weak, for more strength, more power of endurance, more faith in thee and thy love. Oh, Father, thou hast supported me through many trials. Be pleased to be near me always, and also hear thy wrestling children everywhere.

21st.—Feeling a constraining of love towards Friends at Plymouth, we spent this day with them, and attended meeting. They seem a weak company, but might be more lively if some of them would be willing to come forward and fill up their ranks in righteousness.

1874.—First Month 10th.—This morning went to Frankford for the first time, and feel that the Lord is good to remember mercy to his poor hand-maid. J. S. E. had an appointed meeting in the afternoon, which we attended, afterwards visited S. D., who had just lost her husband. We had sweet sympathy with and for her.

During the fore-part of the Monthly Meeting, my spirit was wounded by the remembrance of a remark, made some days before, by a person who was with me. I tried to turn again and again from the thoughts, lest they would come back, and nothing but a pers-vereing, 'Get thee behind me, Satan,' could avail me anything. A sheltering wing remained with me the remainder of the day. It seems to me to be very important for ministers to have feeling companions with them.

In a letter dated First Month 21st, 1874, she writes: "Thou knows Aaron and Hur were of great service to Israel, by upholding the hands of Moses, so, my dear, do not feel anxious about much service, for the dear Master will show unto thee all that He requires, be it much or little, and thou knowest too that the beauty of that parable of the sheep and the goats is, that those who had done the most service, and whom the dear Master had received and blest, to whom that sweet welcome was addressed, 'Come, ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world,' did not seem to realize that they had done any good. So, my precious Friends, you do not know, but the blessed Master knows, and all that we have to do is to keep close to the Fountain, and obedient to every little manifestation. The manifestation to my mind for Frankford was very small indeed, but child-like obedience seemed the impressed law, and the result clothed my soul with thankfulness for his great mercies. My night is little, but, oh, the desire that it may be pure, is very strong."

In a letter dated First Month 28th, 1874, she says: "The kind words of Friends often bring encouragement, and cheer the pathway, but the weaned soul finds it needful to return them to the Treasury again, and to realize the truth, 'We are unprofitable servants; we have done nothing but what was our duty to do.'"

In a letter to a friend of Second Month 23rd, 1874, she writes: "I can feel to embrace thee in the arms of true sisterly love and affection. How often I have wanted to find a sister in whom I could confide, and whom I could trust to remain steadfastly mine, through heights and through depths. But perhaps it is not best for us to have many earthly props, lest the heart's affections should turn around them too closely, and we should lean upon them instead of upon the arm of Almighty power.

"Years ago, when the conflicts and exercises for the ministry were much upon my spirit, I used to think, 'If I had a sister like S. A. R. and H. E., how I should enjoy going to meetings with them, and sitting as under their wing, but I used to notice that the two Elizabeths almost never came in with them, but always alone, just as I had to go, 'Alone with God.' 'I will allure her into the wilderness, and there will I speak comfortably unto her: I will give her the valley of Achor for a door of hope.' Is it not true? Do we not find it so; that the path of regeneration and a being born again is a tribulated path, not an easy going one of, 'only believe, and all is well?' But now, having followed Him, our Lord and Master, unto Calvary, we can at times taste the blessedness of a rest in Him. Oh, how the soul feels that it has got hold of an anchor and a star—a sure refuge for every emergency; feels that its Divine Leader has promised 'Never to leave nor forsake, and having loved his own which are in the world, He loveth them unto the end.' D. B."

Nevada's Disgrace.

Nevada is a sovereign State of the American Union. It sends to the United States Congress two Senators, and is allowed there by its vote to balance the vote of New York or Pennsylvania or Georgia. Its population is less than fifty thousand, just that of Saginaw, Michigan. It cast ten thousand three hundred and sixteen votes for President, of which eight thousand three hundred and fifty seven were for Bryan. It has the smallest population of any State in the Union. It never ought to have been made an independent State; but it was believed, when it was admitted, that it would rapidly increase in population, because of its mineral wealth. These anticipations have not been fulfilled; it has rather declined. The population in 1890 was seventeen thousand less than in 1880, and it is not supposed to have increased since.

It is not disgraceful to be small; a diamond is small. It is not disgraceful to have voted for Bryan. Many good people made that mistake. But what disgrace Nevada is that last week it passed a bill through its Legislature, instantly signed by its Governor, making prize-fighting a legal sport. This was done with the particular purpose of bringing to Carson City the fight between Corbett and Fitzsimmons, which every other State in the Union rejects with disgust. The Christian people of Nevada—for there are such, not many—protested; but they were not heard. Louisiana, Florida, the Dakotas refused to legalize the Lottery, and refused great bribes; and all the States had crowded the brutal prize-ring out of civilization, and Texas and Mexico had refused to welcome anything more brutal than the game-cocks and bull-fights. So the tough-skinned Barneys and Aarons appealed to the Legislature of Nevada, got the backing of its "business men," that is barkeepers, and held up the delusions of thousands of desirable citizens attracted by the fight who would remain to invest in silver mines and scenery; and the Legislature and the Governor took the glitter for gold, and enacted the law, and the shame.

It will not last long. The good opponents in the end. All the States had the lottery two or three generations ago, and the last of them has settled the matter finally only lately. Nevada is full of mining camps, and the tag end of the mining camp followers. It will get civilized by and by. The State is horribly disgraced, but we will not quite yet cut its star out of the flag. Churches and schools take time to get in their work; but theirs is the only work that is permanent—the saloon and the prize-ring have no vitality in them. "The memory of the just is blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot; and their power is as sure to perish as their name."—The Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Having of late felt my mind drawn toward the dear young people of our Society, I thought perhaps what I have to say to them might be communicated through the columns of THE FRIEND. In the first place I desire that you may choose good associates, even the association of those whose lives are pure, and who you know are living for something better and nobler and higher than the pleasures and treasures of earth. I can say from sad experience that if you choose loose, evil associates, and persist in it against the will of your parents, it will bring sorrow upon yourselves and may bring down your parents in sorrow to the grave. Oh, dear young people, the first commandment with promise is, "Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee."

I remember when a boy, at one time of disobeying my father, my mother having been called home prior to this, and oh, I wish I could make you to understand and realize what I suffered in thus disobeying him who I believe was endeavoring to train up his children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; and I never shall forget the suffering it caused him, neither shall I ever forget the earnestness in which he reprimanded me for so doing. Many were the bitter tears of sorrow he shed, and many were the tears of remorse I shed in thus grieving him.

Obeys your parents in the Lord, for this is right. In this fast age, it seems to me, there are so many snares to draw away from the strait and narrow path which leads to life eternal—so much entertainment, some of which may be innocent in themselves, but many which have a tendency to draw the young and tender mind away from the one thing needful, which is the salvation of their souls.

I have been pained to see in so many of our young people a tendency to depart from the simplicity in dress and address, from what the Society of Friends have always believed was right for them to observe. Am sorry some have gone out into the world, and even surpass those who have not known or mingled with Friends. Dear young people, I advise you to stop and think of that dear Saviour who was made willing to suffer for us all, and meditate on the marvellous love of our Heavenly Father in sending his dear Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish, but have everlasting life. Remember this same Son and Saviour wore a seamless garment—no pride, no gay attire, but a meek and lowly Jesus, who tasted death for every man; and if we are his true followers, we must in a measure be like Him. Remember, dear young people, our blessed Saviour said to his followers, "Marvel not, brethren, if the world hate you; for ye know that it hated me before it hated you," and I am a firm believer that we cannot please Him and meet the world half way, for we are told in the Scriptures of Truth that if we love the world, the love of the Father is not in us; and I believe this not only means the sin pleasing of earth, but it also means the changeable fashions thereof and customs.

I have also been pained that so many of our dear young people are in the practice of going to other places of worship very frequently. Now, I do not want to judge, but I have fears that some go because perhaps their inclination are to be entertained; but, dear ones, can we believe that when we go to a place of worship we go to be entertained? I feel to say that while I believe there are many Christians in other societies, yet I believe that a pre-arranged programme of words, music and song, often has a tendency to draw away from pure spiritual worship, it is more pleasing to the natural will of man, and I have heard it remarked that our meetings are too quiet, even by younger members, and that they are not interesting enough. Oh, I exhort you to remember the command "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet and shut the door (even the closet of the heart), and pray to thy Father who is in secret, and thy Father who heareth in secret will reward thee openly."

Dear ones, despise not silence, for it is in the silent breathings of the soul to its Maker, and communion with Him individually, that each may have our strength renewed, and when it pleases God to call instruments to speak vocally to the people, they can only stir up the pure mind by way of remembrance, they cannot save our souls. This is an individual work. Oh, let us not depend on man as our leader, but follow Christ, the Leader and Bishop of souls. We must not only believe in Him as to the outward sacrifice, but we must accept Him, even the last Adam, which is a quickening spirit, let us mind the Light which enlighteneth every man that cometh into the world, and which reproves for sin, and which justifies us and gives peace when we do well. This, I believe, is the rule of salvation, and not the Bible. If the New Testament Scriptures are the only rule of salvation, as some claim, then how could Daniel, Noah, Job, Enoch, and many others have been saved? and if the Bible is the word of God, as some that even call themselves Friends claim (sad indeed to me), how could the Bible take upon itself flesh, and dwell amongst us? for it testifies that the Word was made flesh and dwelt amongst us.

Dear young people, be not deceived, for one may say, "Lo, here is Christ," and another, "Lo, He is there," but behold, the kingdom of God is within you; may you not look to the "Lo, here's" and the "Lo, there's," but keep an eye single to the Captain of Salvation, who I believe will teach you as never yet man yet taught. Oh, I desire that you may not build upon the sand, for if you do, when the trials of life and tribulations come upon you, and bereavements, and the enemy tempts you, you will fall, but if you build upon the Rock of Ages, Christ Jesus, He will enable you, if faithful to Him, to overcome the world, the flesh and the devil, and will give you an inheritance among those that are sanctified. I believe the gate is just as strait and the way just as narrow as ever it was, and that it is the way of the cross, for "except a man deny himself and take up his daily cross, he cannot be my disciple," saith the dear Master.

The Convincement of Elizabeth Fry.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A work recently published in England concerns particulars of Elizabeth Fry's convincement, some of which have probably never before met the public eye. As the statements are written from the standpoint of those who were not in sympathy with her course, but antagonized it, they possess a peculiar interest. It may be remarked that Elizabeth Fry's parents were of a class commonly known as gay Quakers. Elizabeth's mother died when she was twelve years old, and the training of a large family of young children devolved upon an elder sister, who was then but seventeen, and had but little in any sympathy with Friends. The father, evincing insistency upon his children attending Friends' Meetings seems not to have taken much art in their bringing up, and they were educated in all the indulgences and follies of a fashionable life.

The editor thus describes Elizabeth at the age of nineteen: "She had hitherto been the sweetest and brightest of the sisterhood. She was one who most enjoyed dancing, and who always took pleasure in the admiration she excited. But her sister's journals record how one day . . . when she was in her twentieth year the whole family went to the meeting at Goats [this was the name of the street in Norwich where the meeting-house was located]. The seven sisters sat in a row in front of the gallery. Elizabeth had on a pair of new purple boots laced with scarlet. They were a perfect delight to her; she intended to console herself with them or the oppressive dullness she expected. Hitherto she had often been excused from "Goats," for her health was less strong than that of her sisters, but her uncle Joseph, in whom the Quaker spirit was stronger than in her father, had urged that she ought to make an effort to attend and had induced her father to insist upon it. So, not unwillingly she had gone."

At this meeting William Savery, from Philadelphia, was present. What followed is told in an extract from the diary of her sister Richenda, then sixteen years old, as follows:

"He began to preach. His voice and manner were arresting, and we all liked the sound, but Betsy's attention became fixed, and at last I saw her begin to weep, and she became a good deal agitated. As soon as meeting was over, she made her way to the men's side, and having found my father, she asked him if she might line at . . . our uncle Joseph's, where William Savery was staying. He consented, though rather surprised by the request. We others went home as usual, and for a wonder we wished to go again in the afternoon. As we returned in the carriage Betsy sat in the middle, and astonished us all by weeping most of the way home. The next morning William Savery came to breakfast, and preached afterward to our sister, prophesying a high and important calling to which she would be led."

The editor proceeds, "From that day Betsy's love of pleasure and the world seemed gone. She began to lead a life apart from the rest of the family, gradually but firmly withdrawing herself more and more from its daily interests and occupations. By the little Richenda, for whom life still sparkled . . . this change in Betsy was bitterly felt. It kept her awake with grief and annoyance."

Richenda further writes in her diary: "At length I felt I ought to tell her openly what my feelings were, and when we went to bed together, I openly told her my mind, and how I disliked the change which I saw was taking place in her, and I asked her what influenced her in it. She told me she felt it was her duty to be a Quaker; she was certain she was acting from reason and not from enthusiasm, and that she had felt far happier since she had adopted the principles of Quakers than she had ever done before. She said she knew it was her path to tread in. . . . To some," she said, "drawing and singing may be innocent and pure amusements; to me they are not, therefore I give them up."

Her sister Catharine, who was five years her senior, thus writes: "I have a clear picture of Betsy's appearance at this time. It was peculiarly lovely. Her fine flaxen hair combed simply behind, and parted in front. Her white gown plainly fitted her figure, which was beautifully proportioned. I remember her sitting on the window seat in what we then called the blue room, with her feet up, in deep meditation."

But a change became daily more evident in her, and appeared more and more as a reality, though at that time we could not in the least understand it, and it was a very great cross to me. I now see how much the expression of our feeling must have added to her difficulty. When she told me she could not dance with us any more (which was at that time my greatest delight), it was almost more than I could bear, and I tried to argue with her, and begged and persecuted her. But it was all in vain. The firmness of her character was called into play, and I never remember her to have been shaken in one single point which she felt to be her duty. The Bible became her study, visiting the poor, especially the sick, her great object. . . . To us (who were tried by many things in her which were great crosses to us), she was now always amiable and patient, forbearing and humble. And in looking back upon the change in her life and its great results, we may feel assured that God was at work in her soul and that she was at that time truly awakening to a new life in Christ Jesus and called to a most important service."

And now came a great struggle when Satan put forth his power once more to win her back to the world. But she was victorious. The editor tells us that after this Elizabeth took a most remarkable step. "She begged that she might be allowed to visit London and examine for herself into all the fascinations and amusements of the world. And to London . . . she was sent. She 'tasted London,' as she called it, had dancing lessons in the mornings, concerts and parties in the afternoons, the theatres in the evenings and balls at night. But the result was that when she came home she was quite decided as to the course she meant to follow. The narrowest way of religion was chosen. . . . The pleasures of the world . . . renounced forever. With Quaker principles she began to adopt Quaker peculiarities. . . . It is remembered that she even refused to look at the picture which Opie was painting of her own father."

Thus we have seen in a brief period of the life of this remarkable woman, the wonderful awakening under a powerful Gospel ministry as she sat in Norwich Meeting enjoying her purple boots with red strings, her quick perception of the heavenly call, the various stages of a gradual conversion, as shown in her struggle through the allurements which surrounded her, the final temptation of her London experiences—and her ultimate victory.

This paper would not be complete without adding that it is further stated that subsequently when on a visit to one of her relations, she was in company with Deborah Darby, who told her that she would be "a light to the blind, speech to the dumb, and feet to the lame." And Elizabeth wrote in her journal, "Can it be? She almost seems as if she thought I was to be a minister of Christ. Can I ever be one?"

Let it be remembered that all that has been mentioned here occurred before Elizabeth Fry had completed her twentieth year. G. V.

Clay Eaters.

A Washington Post correspondent, who was attached to a corps of engineers, geologists and naturalists who were making a tour of investigation through the wilderness of the Smoky mountain region of North Carolina several years since, when near the water-hed which drains westward into the New River in West Virginia and the head waters of the Big Sandy, was informed by resident mountaineers that about twenty miles away there was a neighborhood in which every resident was said to be a clay eater. Accompanied by Captain Denton, a mountain guide, and a negro servant, he says, we crossed the range through a narrow gap, and descended after a ten-mile ride, upon a narrow creek, which subdivided a little valley between two parallel mountains. Here we struck the first cabin in a strung-out settlement of perhaps forty or fifty families.

"Every person on this yer creek is a clay eater," said the guide, as we approached a low-roofed, rude log cabin, the door of which stood wide open, facing the stream.

A tall, sallow, stoop-shouldered man of forty or fifty stood near the door, from which, on our approach, streamed nearly a dozen bare-headed, bare-footed children, ranging from two to eighteen years of age. The man was clad in a coarse hempen shirt and trousers. Like the children, he was bare-headed and bare-footed.

Our guide spoke to the man, calling him by name, Dinker, and abruptly introduced the subject of our call.

"Dinker," said he, "they uns hev rid over, the moun'tin jes' to see sun us you-uns eet clay. They-uns sez they-uns don't b'liev we uns kin eet it."

"You-uns 'lite an' kum rite in," said Dinker. "Morg," turning to one of the large boys, "tek off'n they-uns' saddl's an' brides an' turn they-uns' hosses inter the pasture."

The boy took charge of the animals and led them into a small patch of ground fenced in with a brush fence.

We declined to enter the house, giving as an excuse that it was much pleasanter under the shade of a big tree which stood near the door. At our request, Dinker sent one of his boys, a sallow-faced, tow-headed lad of fifteen or sixteen, after some of the clay which was said to be edible. The guide and myself accompanied him to the creek, where he stopped in front of a layer or ledge of bluish gray clay several inches in thickness. The stuff, when taken in hand and moistened, felt pliable, soft and oily like putty, and bore much the same general appearance. The boy carried a handful of the clay to his father, who, after taking it, gave it another wotting, then, rolling it into a ball, began manipulating it as a painter preparing putty for use. He rolled it, pressed it out, and manipulated it until the greasy, slippery mass became soft, pliable and tenacious. Then he separated it into pills or boluses, from the size of a bullet to that of an ordinary marble, with two or three as large almost as a walnut. He gave the smaller children several of the smallest balls or pills, and the larger ones the balance, reserving to himself two of the balls of clay.

The boys, girls and the man then put the balls of clay in their mouth, when, by constant chewing and the aid of the secretions, they soon converted them into soft mucilaginous masses, which, with no apparent difficulty, they swallowed.

For fear that there might be some sleight-of-hand locus-pocus about the affair I determined to try the clay myself. I took a piece about the size of a bullet and put it into my mouth. In a short time, without chewing or manipulating it at all, I found that the saliva had completely dissolved the mass. There were no gritty particles apparent, but, on the contrary, the stuff left an oily feeling, but without semblance of taste.

I didn't swallow the stuff, but could have easily done so but for the repugnance I naturally felt toward eating dirt.

After the clay had all been swallowed by the man and children, I said:

"Does this stuff satisfy your hunger?"

"Sartin; that's why we-uns eet it. A feller kin eet nuff to las' three or foh days, but this yer bunch'll only las' till to-morry."

"Doesn't the stuff make you sick? Doesn't it affect you some way when you make what you call a meal out of it?"

"Never heard us nobody gettin' sick on it, but that's some es say it makes they-un weak."

A Poor Business.

It is a poor business that has to be apologized for, or defended, by those who are engaged in it. The business of an actor seems to be of this sort. Some of its best representatives have confessed to a sense of its unworthiness, and others of them have endeavored to defend it against the accusations of their fellow-actors. Henry Irving opens an article on his art, in a recent number of "The Forum," with an attempt to show that acting is not itself "degrading." He speaks of "the curious perversity which has prompted some distinguished artists to decry the art of acting," and cites in this line the examples of Macready and Fanny Kemble. Macready felt the degrading influence of his art when he availed himself of his real grief over the recent death of his daughter, to force force to his simulating, before an audience, of a father's grief over a dead child. And Fanny Kemble found acting "repulsive" to her best nature, "because it quenched the springs of natural emotion." It would seem as if this testimony from such actors was entitled to respect; but the strange thing about it is, that Henry Irving cannot see why this imitation of real feeling on a stage should be any more degrading in its effect on the actor than the analysis and formal representation of such feelings by a novelist or a poet in his writings. The poet or the novelist describes the feelings which he would exhibit in his characters. He tells by his pen how those characters feel. But the actor simulates in his own person the feelings of love or of lust, of anger or of hatred, of ennobling or degrading sentiments; and in so doing he degrades his best nature, and lessens his responsive power to the influence of noble sentiments brought to bear upon him in the actual experience of life. The dramatist exercises his personality in the creation of a character; but the actor gives his personality to the mere imitation of a character created by the dramatist.—N. Y. Times.

The Divine Superintendence.

The Divine superintendence of the workings of the universe and of the affairs of men is an important article of Christian belief. Nobody who believes in prayer doubts it. God, we say, is in the events of history, in the work of his Church, and is not unmindful of the doings of the wicked. But it is one thing to have a general article of belief, it is another to realize the truth of it.

Practically, most men limit the Divine superintendence to certain fields of operation. They see God's power in the universe and the evidence of his laws in nature; they believe he gives close attention to things embraced in the religious sphere, and they love to think that the conduct of every individual is a matter of concern to Him. But there are many things of value and interest to them with which they in no wise associate Him. They are little things, too little for the Almighty to care about. For example, there are a multitude of personal acts assumed to be morally colorless. The question of right or wrong does not enter into them. The Infinite Father, absorbed with greater concerns, makes no note of them.

Is this really so? Not if the words of Christ mean anything. The hairs of your head are all numbered. There is nothing that concerns you which escapes the Divine attention. He who numbers the hairs of the head knoweth also the thoughts of the heart. If nothing, even so insignificant a thing as the hair of the head or a thought of the heart, is unknown to Him, of course nothing is unobserved by Him. The Divine superintendence is not confined to great things, such as flying worlds, the fate of nations, the work of the Church, the spread of intelligence, the deepening of conscience, the improvement of a people's morals. It is all-comprehensive. If not even a sparrow falls without Divine observation, or a sheep is lost without awakening Divine concern, surely human thoughts and actions, human joys and sufferings, little though they may be, claim Divine consideration; for a man is of much more value than many sparrows or many sheep.

The thought that One whose eye never slumbers, whose hand never rests, is in vigilant superintendence over every individual life, may be pleasant or distressful, according to our relations to Him. While his mercies come to all, his promises are to them who love and obey Him. It is to those who have been conformed to his likeness, that the reality of his constant superintendence is most precious. The Lord is mindful of his own. His own are precious to Him. He knows their down-sitting and their uprising, understands their thought afar off, and is acquainted with all their ways. No act or thought or experience is too little to escape Him.

It follows that life is larger and more comprehensive and more important than many have supposed. My Father cares about everything that I care about. The thoughts and acts which seem too little to concern Him are not unimportant to me, and therefore not unimportant to Him. They go to make or mar a character, and that is of supreme concern. When those great lenses which give modern telescopes such wondrous power are nearly completed all polishing tools are laid aside, and they are brought to their delicate perfection by touches of the thumb dipped in the finest of rouge. The lines of flinty glass are changed by so light a thing as the finger-tip. Character is perfected by little touches. And it is a beautiful thought that the Infinite

Being who made the worlds and holds them in his mighty hand superintends with wondrous patience and surpassing gentleness every process in shaping and perfecting the character.

Does this truth make life seem greater and more difficult and more responsible? If so it also enlarges the compass of prayer and makes the Divine fellowship more real and helpful.—The Independent.

A Flight Across the Sea.

From the Castle grounds we wended our way to Windsor Church the royal church of England, where the Queen attends. Her seat was soon discernible among the others, being covered with the coat-of-arms. I was glad to avail myself of the opportunity to rest myself in it for a few minutes, and, while sitting there, tried to imagine how I should feel if I was Queen. I had not long, however, to meditate on such reflections as these, for the shades of evening were fast gathering around, warning us it was time to seek our train, back again into the big, foggy city of London. If the city seems like a thoroughfare by day, it certainly seems doubly so at night, with the 'buses, hansoms and all sorts of vehicles running in every direction, while, on the pavements, their is a regular procession of people. One day, soon after I got there, I stepped into a bank and asked the clerk if he would please exchange a sum of money for me. "We cannot do that here," he said. "You will have to go to one of the banks in the city to have that done." "In the city," I said, "I thought I was in the city." "Oh, no," he said "you are merely on the outskirts." Another day was spent at Westminster Abbey. Although the building has stood there, braving the storms of more than eight centuries, it really looks as though it might still remain there for centuries to come. Soon after entering the building, I was surprised to find, placed near the entrance the bust of our American poet, Longfellow. Underneath was this inscription, "This bust was placed amongst the memorials of the poets of England by the English admirers of an American poet, 1884." On the floor of the abbey was inscribed, "Near this stone lie buried the remains of Alfred Lord Tennyson. Born August 6th, 1809. Died October 6th, 1892." Alongside of him was Robert Browning. Near by were busts of Milton, Goldsmith, Campbell, Charles Dickens, Shakespeare, Robert Southey and Robert Burns. A small room adjoining these statues was called "The Chapel of Faith," where all who enter are requested to keep silent. On the floor in another part of the abbey was this inscription, "Brought by faithful hands over land and sea, here lies the remains of David Livingstone, Missionary, Traveller, Philanthropist," etc. As we stood there within the walls of that mighty sepulchre, gazing in wonder and admiration at the cold, silent faces of those long since departed, what a crowd of recollections come surging through your mind. Generations will come and go, monuments will crumble into dust, but they have left behind them names, which will remain fresh throughout ages of futurity.

Concerning the India exhibition at Earl's Court, London, perhaps a short sketch would be of interest. There were exhibits from Ceylon, Burmah and other Eastern dependencies. Beautiful tapestries of various designs, linens, embroidery, jewelry unique and inexpensive, and statuary. The so-called "Queen's Palace," erected there, of beautiful architectural design, covers an area of thirty-two thousand square feet. There also is the Empress Theatre, said to be the largest of any building in England. In the latter there are entertainments given, every afternoon and evening, by a Hungarian named Imre Kiralfy, who has represented some of the scenery of that country, and hundreds of men and women dressed in their native costumes. There are students of Dr. Jenner, discoverer of vaccination, who died in 1823, and James Watts, improver of steam-engine, and George Stevenson, engineer, who died in 1848. Here, also, was to be seen the like groups of West African negroes (Delta of the Niger); opium-eaters of Java; bushman and family, a race represented by Africans; 300 groups of Zulus, of South Africa. Last, but not least, was the great Ferris wheel. It was built in London, and has an altitude of three hundred feet. The axle is seven feet in diameter, and has eight columns, one hundred and fifty feet high; forty cars, twenty-four feet long, nine feet wide and ten feet high and accommodating twelve hundred persons. About two months previous to my visit there, something went wrong with the machinery, and there were several hundred people compelled to remain suspended a mid-air all night, but, in compensation, each was presented with the sum of five pounds, felt particularly anxious to obtain a view over the city, so decided that this was my opportunity, but will candidly admit I could not refrain from breathing a sigh of relief when I set my feet on terra firma again. "Earl's Court" is reached by the underground railway, of which he least said the better. One evening, while here, I attended the services at St. Paul's Cathedral, which ranks second only, in size and age, to being the largest and oldest cathedral in the world. The one at Cologne, in Germany, the oldest. The parks throughout England are inferior to our American ones. The principal one in the city is Hyde Park, and is quite a fashionable resort. One custom over there, entirely different from the American custom, is to ask one for a penny for any little privilege they may stand in need of. At the railway stations you do not see cans of ice-water for the accommodation of the public. When you want a drink, you must ask, and pay a penny for it. When you want to wash your hands, you must pay a penny for the privilege. One day, while at Hyde Park, I happened to sit down on a seat at rest. Directly opposite to me was Rotten Row, one of the most noisy streets in London. While sitting there, and wondering why they should give this handsome street such a homely name, I was surprised to see a man dressed in uniform step up in front of me, and say, "A penny, please!" I said, "What for?" "Why, for sitting down on that seat," he said. I will not reply. Within walking distance of Hyde Park are Buckingham Palace and Marlborough Head. The former is where the Queen resides while in the city, and the latter where the Prince and Princess of Wales, England's future king and queen, reside. Among the other places of interest visited were Kensington Museum, London Bridge, and the Tower of London near by, where can be seen the block-headed Lady Jane Grey was beheaded, dunces where kings were confined, and various other sombre reminiscences of past dark ages. Here, also, can be seen the crown jewels. As all earthly pleasures fade away, so, to all too soon, the same fate for my departure. Again I find myself at the docks in Liverpool, among a heterogeneous collection of men, women and children, each and all awaiting their turn to be taken, on a tender, to meet the Penobscot, which is awaiting us out on the Mersey River. It is pouring rain, and the picture is gloomy in the extreme. First comes the steerage passengers—and such a lot of them. One might naturally wonder where they would stow them all. Next come the cabin passengers, and, after all, the baggage. Time after time the tender returns with the latter, but finally she has left us to return no more, and steerage, cabin passengers and baggage are all stowed away in some part of the ship. It is two P. M. We take one last, lingering look at the shores and merry skies of England, and we are soon on our way down the Channel. At the same hour the next day a halt opposite Queenstown is made. A tender comes out to meet us. We take on a few passengers, and send back by them our mail, which goes on a fast line to New York. A few of the Irish peasantry came on board with articles to sell, such as silk shawls, lace collars, canes, etc. After disposing of quite a number among the cabin passengers on the upper deck, they slid down a heavy coil of rope into a small row-boat awaiting them from below, and were soon heading for the shore. Gradually the Irish coast recedes from view, the myriads of sea-gulls have disappeared, and we, too, are heading for the shore. Our return voyage was similar, in many respects, to the out-going one. We encountered the same heavy fog as we did then, many times coming close up to the sides of the ship. At such times of danger, especially while out in mid-ocean, one is made to feel and realize their utter dependence on the goodness and mercy of an all-wise and ruling Providence. Whenever anything goes wrong with the machinery, it is never worth while to question the officers concerning it, for they will give you but little satisfaction. One night, between the hours of ten and eleven, when most of the passengers were cleverly settled in their berths, the vessel slowed up, and finally stopped. Of course, some of the men passengers—who seem to be by nature more nervous and easily excited than women—hurried up on deck to try and ascertain, if possible, the cause of the delay. The only satisfaction they could get was, they had broken a shovel. In about fifteen minutes, however, we were moving on. Once again, when the vessel stopped for a short time, we did not think it worth while to ask any questions, but tried to console ourselves in the belief that, perhaps, they had simply broken another shovel. But now we are fast nearing the end of our journey. It is nearly noon, and again we are in the midst of a dense fog. But hark! In the distance we hear the sound of a gun. Loudly the captain responds with his whistle. Again and again it is repeated, and gladly we hail that sound, for it is our pilot, coming out in the ocean to meet us. At last there emerges through the fog a sailing vessel. Now it is close beside the ship, and in almost less time than it takes to write it, he is standing beside the captain, on the bridge. And now, in conclusion, let me say, although England can proudly boast of her lordly castles, her ancient cathedrals and her magnificent palaces, yet it seemed to me I had never witnessed a grander, fairer scene than on the morrow, when we came in view of the shores of our own United States of America. C.

WHEN we are much engaged in our Master's work, it seems to me next to impossible that we should escape some little spots and stains, though we may be ever so careful of our clothing, and wrap it ever so closely about us, it will get a little soiled by being used every day. I am sure mine does so, and if I should hinder my Master from stripping it off, and washing both them and me, I should ere now have made but a very mean appearance in the sight of Him who sees through every false covering; for He holds no beauty nor comeliness in anything that is not derived from himself, who is the only unmixed fountain of light and purity.—Mary Peckley.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

LORENZO'S DEFEAT.

The air was full of fragrance
From the blossoming of spring,
Yet thou, oh, learned and mighty,
Hadst need of any more healing;
Without that priceless jewel,
Life, with its good and ill,
Is lost and undone forever—
O, fainting heart, be still!

The monk stood by that death bed,
In Florence sweet and fair,
To bring such consolation
As might be wanting there,
"There be three things, my father,
That will not let me rest,
And I know not if I shall ever
Will forgive for those oppressed."

Then the Padre said, "God's mercy
Covers the judgment seat;
Have faith that He can save thee,
Do works for repentance meet,
Restore that thou hast taken,
Bring back the scattered sheep,
Give this fair city freedom,
And He will grant thee sleep."

Lorenzo, "the Magnificent," Joined to his idols fast,
Turned his face to the wall
And that day was his last,
Stript in the midst of plenty.

In manhood's strength laid low;
Unrepentant and unrepentant!
We reap the things we sow!

Lorenzo, "the Victorious,"
A victor now no more;
The sacked and pillaged cities,
The orphan's wail in the street—
When such sad thoughts disturb thee
Met by the Judgment blast;
Unrepentant and unrepentant,
Thou hast met defeat at last!

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

The Oak Family.

At the usual monthly meeting of the Moorestown Natural History Society, held on the ninth of Second Month, the Oaks formed the subject of investigation. One of the women Friends had undertaken to illustrate the forms of the leaves, and she had evidently entered into her subject with much energy and enthusiasm, having prepared 20 sheets, on which were mounted numerous specimens of as many species of oaks. About one half of these belonged to the White Oak group, and about the same number to the Black and Red Oaks and their near allies. The leaves of most of these Oaks are more or less lobed, and in the second group these lobes terminate in a fine bristle, the elongation of one of the ribs of the leaf. The bristle is not present in the first or White Oak group. The leaves vary considerably in outline in the same species, especially in the Spanish Oak (Quercus foliata), of which one hundred and fifty forms have been collected from the same tree; and perhaps half that number were exhibited to us in the evening. The groups of leaves were not only instructive and interesting, but graceful and pretty. The largest and most valuable of the oaks is the White Oak (Quercus alba), which attains its largest size in Southern New Jersey, and on similar geological formations further South, in Maryland and Virginia. Our well-informed friend, Benjamin Heritage, of Mickleton, N. J., described one growing on the farm of the late Joseph Tatum, below Woodbury, which measured thirty-three feet in girth, near the ground. There is also a very fine specimen in the graveyard, at Salem, N. J. The wood is strong and tough, and much used in the mechanic arts, and in ship building.

B. Heritage had brought with him a segment of white oak from a noted tree in his part of the State. It had formed one of the monuments of an old property line, and had itself been a common corner tree for four farms, but as they had fallen into the hands of a common owner, who had no botanical enthusiasm, he had turned this valuable specimen into fire-wood. The specimen which Benjamin had rescued from the flames was about one foot in length, and contained two hundred and seventy-four rings of annual growth. As it probably did not reach more than half way from the bark to the central pith, it is fair to estimate that the tree was five hundred years old.

There are oaks in England whose history reaches back one thousand years, but even these ancients are young when compared with some of the giant sequoias of California, which are believed to be three thousand years old, and to have been among the oldest specimens in the forests when the Christian era commenced. If these trees are destroyed, there is no probability that the human eye will ever again see such magnificent vegetable productions. It is well therefore that the Government has taken measures to protect them.

Some doubts have been expressed as to whether the number of rings of growth accurately measure the age of a tree. But one item of Benjamin's experience seems to remove this uncertainty. When young his father cut down a piece of woodland on his farm, in which Benjamin assisted. Thirty-six years after, it was determined to again cut the timber which had grown, and B. H. took advantage of the opportunity to count the rings on many of the stumps that were left, and he found them all to indicate thirty-six years of growth.

On his oak segment, he had driven in pins at different places, one indicating the outside of the tree at the time of the Declaration of Independence, another the founding of Philadelphia, and a third the birth of George Fox. In the same manner a section of Sequoia might be made to register all the most important events of history for the last three thousand years.

The acorns that were exhibited were also interesting, varying in size from those of the Oregon Oak (Quercus macrocarpa), two inches or more in diameter, down to those of the Willow Oak (Quercus phellos), not much larger than a large pea.

When the exhibition had been displayed and sufficiently admired, one of the men Friends gave us a disposition on oaks of a more general character, embodying a considerable amount of general information. Then a third person produced sections of ten or eleven species, to show the character of the wood and bark.

The whole entertainment was one of exceptional interest and was much enjoyed by the large number of persons in attendance. This was largely due to the thorough manner in which those who had agreed to prepare the exhibition had performed their duties.

Letter from Germany.

ROSDORFERWEG, First Month 21st, '97.

My Very Dear Auntie!—I go to bed regularly and earlier than before, and get up earlier. This morning is the one when I have to be in the lecture room by a little after eight. I was going to tell thee about that course. It is upon the prophets of Israel. I have always realized that they were noble and deeply inspired men, but have never known anything especially about them. When I heard the course was to be given, I said to Fraulien Meyer, "Oh, I would like to hear that," and she said at once (she has charge of the course for women), I might go without paying if I choose, she would be only too glad to have one more to hear the professor. It is a course not much attended, so of course I was glad to accept, as I had proposed to go anyway. The lectures are simply fascinating. He explains the history of the times, the condition of the people, and gives places in different parts of the Bible to look up that bear on the subject. But most interesting are his descriptions of the prophets themselves. How fearless they stood in opposition to the whole people, proclaiming what they knew to be given them to say, and suffering whatever might be done against them. The professor is a young man; though not at all what one would call eloquent, yet he makes a manner so quiet and earnest that it makes a deep impression. He is himself so thoroughly imbued with his subject that it is a simple delight to listen to him.

These last two weeks the lectures have been upon Jeremiah, and I have come home from both lectures so enthusiastic, it seemed almost that I had been there in Jerusalem and been present at some of the gatherings of the enraged populace, who preferred to listen to the pleasant prophecies of the false prophets than those of Jeremiah, which spoke only of the fall of their beloved city.

There was one thing in this morning's lecture that interested me, especially where he dwelt upon one scene which he said was probably the most characteristic in the entire Bible, of the real character and meaning of the prophets. Where the false prophet Hananiah, after contradicting Jeremiah, took the wooden yoke from his shoulder and broke it in two as a symbol to the people of how the power of the Babylonians should be broken, saying at the same time that the Lord had inspired him with the words he spoke. Then Jeremiah went quietly away; but soon the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah, and told him to go to Hananiah and reproach him with having misled the people, etc.—thee probably knows the history very well, but it was simply this point which he made so clear this morning, of the humility of the true prophet, who made no reply until sure that it was the word of the Lord that had been given him to say, but then, when he had this assurance, how he was bold as a lion. I find a little difficulty in telling about it in English—always a German word comes up. I must put in my whole evening writing up the lecture and reading all the passages he mentioned, for to-morrow morning I have my lesson, and when I have corrected what I write before copying to keep. It is excellent exercise, not only for what I learn in relation to the subject itself, but also for the practice in writing the German. After hearing a lecture like that I can write it out exactly as well as if it were English. I make mistakes, of course, but only small ones, and generally what I really know, but there are so many little points to consider, and when I write, I never think of how to write, but only of the thoughts I want to express.

I had a fine French lesson this morning. The first two with the French professor I found difficult. I was rather afraid to speak, I guess, and that made it so I could not, but by this time I am used to him, and I could talk fairly well. He stayed half an hour over the time, talking on all sorts of things, principally America. But I must go now to my work, I have not answered thy letter yet, but will do that next time.

First-day evening.—Oh, I have been so lazy to-day! By the end of the week I am tired and must rest. I went to bed a little after ten last night and rose a little before ten this morning. Then on coming into my sitting-room, I found my breakfast waiting me, and in a few minutes Fraulien Oltmann came. She had slept as long as I—so I was very glad to have company. I love to talk with her, and we are both so busy we do less of it than we wish. After sleeping so very, very soundly, I am always stupid, and I felt entirely too dull to write then, so I read until dinner time, and as soon as that was over I laid down and slept like a rock for about three hours. I roused myself for the afternoon meal, and then joined Herr Director and a young woman who lives there, on a walk. On returning, I felt bright as a cricket. I had first to read aloud to Albanae a little. The poor child has had an inflamed eye for a week, so that she dare not do any reading or sewing or use them in any way. She goes in the different classes, and in this way gets something from the school, but it is quite distressing. She is also not allowed to be much out of doors, so the time passes slowly for her. Still another week she must take care of her eyes, but I hope by that time she will be better. Every evening she must bathe them for fifteen minutes with oak water, and two or three times a week have them touched with some preparation. I read to her a little every day, but do not take a much time as I should like to give her. I am really too busy. I am so rested now that I can keep going all week, though by the end of the week I will be tired, of course. Albanae has just come to set the table—she has to be doing something, and so helps the maid quite a good deal. This is the Bertha of whom I have written a number of times, and whose home we visit in Mengershausen. She is a very nice girl. I like to have her about, and so original and good, and perfectly reliable. I have laughingly told her a good many times that she must come home to America with me, and keep house for me there. Really, if I had a sure position as a house, nothing would be better. In every way I should be delighted if she would come and engage to stay long enough to make it worth while. They become very, very little herewages, I mean, and she is thoroughly trust-worthy—a person I could always trust Albanae with, and intelligent and good-natured as possible, and without any airs or pretensions, and really from an excellent family. However, this is only talk, but it is not impossible. With the care and work I will have when I come home giving lessons and all that, I must have some one I can implicitly trust, and I dread to begin with such servants as one gets in America very often; she is the sort of a character that would not be easily spoiled.

We have had a deep snow for several days and everything looks so lovely. The best part of it is that the mercury, though even at night not very low, does not reach the melting point t noon, so that the snow remains beautiful, the first evening after it fell, I made snow-cream, and we had a regular jollification all to itself. Albanac was beside herself for joy, and all thought it very good. I like to surprise with something American now and then. I am simply in love with the French language. The lecture yesterday afternoon was so delightful. I have never understood one so well, that makes me so happy, to feel that from oak to week I make real progress. In Paris I will attend the lectures in the Sorbonne, the university of Paris. I have my guide-book of Paris (of course in the French language), always, and whenever I hear or read anything of the city, I look it up at once and place it on my maps. In this way I am getting already quite familiar with the names of the streets and objects of interest, and particular things that I just see in special museums etc. Then I have had some in the history of Paris. Altogether, when I get out of the cars at the "Gare du Nord" (the North railway station), where the train from Cologne comes in, I shall feel quite at home, and know just where to go. Of course my guide book will be my inseparable companion, and the plan of Paris I will keep open all the time, more or less. Oh, I like that, to feel myself a stranger in a strange place, and to be one, and only myself to depend on. It is so much more interesting than to have some one arrange all that for one.

But I must draw my letter to a close. The creator's family are coming up this evening to say awhile, and they complain very much that I am always studying and never show myself. I have promised to be sociable this evening, with a great deal of love, thy affectionate
E. S. KITE.

How Gadabout Changes His Color.

Gadabout is the most interesting pet in my family, although a tiny creature and somewhat tubesome, for as his name suggests he is a regular little truant. Whenever he can he runs away from his home, and hides in the most unexpected nooks and corners for a day or even to days. After a long search perhaps I will accidentally see his diminutive head peeping out between the covers of some volume in the library, his bright little almond shaped eyes blinking saucily, as if saying, "Well, here I am!" Or I may discover him snugly curled up within the reel of a fishing rod taking a nap, and almost invisible because he had assumed the same color as a fish line upon which he lies.

Gadabout is a little lizard, not quite six inches long, his tail making half of this length.

It was after a great many curious experiences all much journeying that Gadabout found his way from the Florida woods to his present home in California. At first he was supposed to be dead. At my approach he ran and concealed himself beneath the leafy flooring of his little creche. There he would peer out and eye me cautiously. Gradually he became tamer and accustomed to my handling him, until he would lie quietly on my finger while I watched his side-like coat fade to the palest gray; for, as nicely as possible, Gadabout takes the color of whatever he rests upon.

It is this habit that makes the little creature so interesting, and how he changes his color all why are questions that puzzle all who observe his transformations.

When asleep upon his nasturtium leaf bed he is of an exquisite green tint. When he lies on my brown gown he quickly changes to a brown hue. When he lies on the carpet his armored coat is so spotted and velvet-like as a leopard's. Indeed, these changes in Gadabout's colors seem endless, and take place in a marvelously short time.

In all probability Gadabout himself knows very little about his many-tinted coats; for this power of changing color is one of nature's ways of protecting some of her small, helpless creatures. If in his native woods Gadabout should crawl out, or rather dart out (for these little lizards are like a flash of light in their movements), upon the brown limb of a tree or upon the sandy ground, he would be a very conspicuous object, as he is naturally of a beautiful light-green hue. He would be quickly noticed by the first bird or other lizard-eating enemy that came along. But mother Nature enables him to take the color of his surroundings and thus find protection by not being easily seen.

But how does Mother Nature do this.

The magic change in Gadabout is caused by the effect which the color he lies upon has on his color cells.

In an inner layer of the skin of Gadabout there are little bags or cells filled with coloring matter—some with red, some with brown, some with black, some with green, and so on. These cells, though very small indeed, have the power both of expanding and contracting; and a colored light carried to them through Gadabout's eyes causes that same color to appear on Gadabout's skin. When Gadabout's eyes catch the color of my brown dress, then the brown cells expand and Gadabout looks brown!

This is the way that Gadabout so often hides from me. If he nestles on a red cushion he looks red. If he climbs into a green palm he looks green. And on a many-colored Persian rug he looks like some little Persian figure of the design!—Sarah E. Ufford, in Little Men and Women.

THE MANIA FOR HIGH BUILDINGS.—High buildings have their evils. The family of an official occupying apartments on the top of a downtown office building looking out on the bay, has almost been broken up from the effects of foul air from soil-pipes on adjoining roofs. In a Wall Street building the janitor is suffering from typho-malaria from the same cause, and a law firm occupying an office on the floor next the roof have suffered annoyance and positive injury from the gases from chimneys and soil pipes on adjoining but lower buildings, being wafted into their windows. As these buildings are heated by steam, there is no ventilation except by open windows; if they open the windows, the foul air causes headache and nausea, while if they kept them closed, the heat radiated by steam pipes is overpowering and debilitating.

In another building foul air rises from the cellar and is diffused through the floors, and several tenants have been advised to abandon their offices.

Wingate, the sanitary engineer, says that these huge office buildings, family hotels, and apartment houses, "like gigantic cupping glasses, suck up and diffuse impure ground air or other foul odors throughout every cranny in their structure." This he says affects the tenants of upper floors as much as it does the others, if not more; while they are specially subject to gases from plumbing pipes, chimney stacks, and other things around them.—Christian Advocate.

How prone we are to be selfish in our griefs. In our bereavements we think of ourselves, of our sorrows, of our losses, rather than of the griefs of others who are stricken with us, or of the joy into which our loved ones have entered. A group of mourners stood about the death-bed of a lovely saint, whose life had been one of doing and enduring for others. One of these, turning to another, said in a natural and impulsive outburst of sorrow: "I don't think we can realize how much we have lost." The other, whose very heart was riven in this bereavement, responded in the calmness of unselfish trust: "I don't think we can realize how much she has gained." What finer tribute could there be than this to the character of her who had trained her loved son to this self-perpetual love and faith!—S. S. Times.

THE FRIEND.

SECOND MONTH 27, 1897.

It has recently come to the knowledge of the editor of THE FRIEND that a fear lest Philadelphia Yearly Meeting should ultimately adopt the methods of holding meetings for worship which prevail to a lamentable extent in some parts of what professes to be the Society of Friends, has acted as a discouragement to some whose thoughts had been in degree turned towards seeking membership with it. We are not surprised that such a hesitation should be felt by any who have been favored to hold that Divine communion which is the crown of our religious meetings, if they think that Friends are preparing to desert their ancient ground, and imitate the practice of those who place more dependence on outward performances than on the inward travail of spirit.

While we can but hope that the fears of such are needlessly excited, yet the signs of the times indicate the importance of being on our guard, and of withstanding the first steps in the direction of introducing such novelties.

Robert Barclay says of singing of psalms in public worship, that the case is just the same as in preaching or praying. It is very sweet and refreshing when it proceeds from a true sense of God's love in the heart, and arises from the Divine influence of the spirit. But as for the formal, customary way of singing, it has no foundation in Scripture, nor any ground in true Christianity. While we cannot recall any instance of such singing in a Friend's Meeting recorded in the history of the Society in its purer days, yet we do not doubt, that the mind may be so impressed with a sense of the goodness of God, that ejaculations of prayer or praise may spring from the motions of the spirit, which will be edifying to the church. But this cannot be counted in that "artificial music," for which, as Barclay states, "we have neither example nor precept in the New Testament."

George Whitehead, when in Edmondshury prison, was put in a dungeon four yards underground, with two other Friends, fellow-prisoners, for reproving the jailer for permitting drunkenness among his prisoners. He says: "There we were detained nearly four hours, singing praises to the Lord our God, in the sweet enjoyment and living sense of his glorious presence." After his release from prison, G. Whitehead wrote as follows: "In the comfortable enjoyment of the Lord's glorious Divine power and presence, several of us have often been made to sing aloud in praise to his glorious Name; yet, his high praises have been in our mouths oftentimes, to the great amazement and astonishment of the malfactors shut up in the same ward with us. When walking therein, our hearts had been lifted up in living praise to the Lord, often for several hours together, with voices of melody."

We do not believe that these "voices of melody," were any utterance of artificial tunes, prepared by man and committed to memory, but the natural harmonious expression of that "sweet enjoyment with which they were Divinely favored."

It was so also with Barbara Blandin, one of our women Friends, who, when barbarously beaten, was so filled with Divine joy, that she sang aloud to give vent to her feelings, and G. Fox likewise, when beaten in prison by a cruel jailer, was moved to sing aloud.

It would be easy to produce evidence that our early Friends recognized the distinction between formal singing and that which comes from the spirit. Edward Burrough, in an address to the people of England, says: "True singing I own, with the spirit and with understanding, singing in the spirit, making melody in the heart to the Lord. But your singing is carnal, traditional and heathenish, and is an imitation, and is not with the Spirit of Jesus."

In his tract, entitled "A Measure of the Times," the same zealous writer says: "When singing in the spirit and with the understanding was ceased, and not known, then began people to get the form of singing of David's experiences in rhyme and meter."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNRECORDED AMERICAN IMMIGRATION bill, having passed both Houses of Congress, is now in the hands of the President. It adds to the classes of excluded aliens all persons over sixteen years of age who cannot read the English language or some other language—except that admissible immigrants may bring with them or send for illiterate parents or grandparents not over fifty years old, wives and minor children. It also prohibits from employment on public works any who come regularly or habitually into the United States for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, and who have not made declaration of intention to become American citizens. The Secretary of the Treasury, however, may permit the entrance of aliens for the purpose of teaching new arts and industries. The act is not to apply to persons coming here from Cuba during the continuance of the present disorders there.

The Arbitration Treaty will go over to the next Congress. Senator Sherman is of opinion that it will then pass as a two-thirds majority bill.

On the recommendation of Secretary Francis and a Forestry Commissioner of the National Academy of Sciences, the President, on Sec and Month 22nd, 1891, signed and promulgated thirteen proclamations establishing thirteen additional forest reserves, containing an aggregate area of 21,372,940 acres.

The Senate ratifies the South Dakota vote broken on the eighteenth instant by the re-election of James H. Kyle, by the votes of the Republicans and a few Populists.

A bill granting women the right of suffrage in Oklahoma Territory has been defeated in the House by a vote of 159 to 157.

In the Massachusetts House a woman suffrage amendment was defeated by a vote of 96 to 53.

The Missouri Legislature, on the 20th instant, repealed the vagrancy law, and there is now no statute in that State for the punishment of vagrants. The law repealed permitted persons convicted of vagrancy to be held by the sheriff of the district to which sent for a day, or as negroes in times of slavery.

It is estimated that the turkey trade of the United States exceeds $1,200,000 annually. The greatest of the turkey-raising States are Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, Kansas, Kentucky and Michigan.

Success has attended the experiment of some landowners at Orlando, Fla., who undertook to raise Kentucky blue grass and timothy. The Orlando plot chosen for the experiment is hummock land, with mair underneath, and great hopes are built upon the favorable indications of this first year.

The grain-raiser says more than 1,000,000,000 cigarettes were smoked in America last year, an increase of 233,687,340 over the record for 1890.

One hundred and seventy-five Catholic churches of Boston have asked the Legislature to restrict the liquor traffic.

Great destitution is reported in the parishes of Winn and Jackson, in the State of Louisiana. This district of the State is composed of a farming population, in the main well-to-do, but last summer a protracted drouth visited the section, which prevented the maturing of crops. In fact, nothing was raised, and the farmers have no produce with which to feed either their families or their animals. Nearly all of the sufferers are entirely worthy, and they need food and clothing. In the parish of Winn more than 500 families are actually suffering for the necessities of life, and the number is daily increasing. The relief tendered by the State is entirely inadequate to tide the people over the emergency, and outside aid is urgently needed.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 530, which is 10 less than the previous week, and 59 more than the corresponding week of 1890. Of the foregoing, 263 were males and 267 females; 115 died of pneumonia; 67 of heart disease; 57 of consumption; 27 of diphtheria; 21 of cholera; 20 of typhoid fever; 18 of other forms of fever; 17 of apoplexy; 14 of bronchitis; 12 of Bright's disease; and 9 of inflammation of the brain.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 95 1/2; 4's, 97; 4 1/2's, 111 1/2; 112; coupon, 112 1/2; 113; new 4's, 124 1/2; 122 1/2; 5's, 113 1/2; 114 1/2; currency 6's, 103 1/2 100.

Corn was steady at 7 1/2c per pound for middling quality.

FLOUR.—Spot bran ranged from $12.50 to $13.00 per ton for winter in bulk, and $12.25 a $12.75 for spring in sacks.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.55 a $2.80; do., extras, $2.90 a $3.20; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $4.10 a $4.25; do., do., straight, $4.25 a $4.10; Western winter, clear, $4.10 a $4.25; do., do., straight, $4.25 a $4.40; do., do., patent, $4.50 a $4.65; spring, clear, $3.65 a $3.80; do., straight, $4.00 a $4.25; do., patent, $4.30 a $4.45; do., favorite brands, higher. City mills, clear, $3.05 a $3.20; do., clear, $4.05 a $4.30; do., straight, $4.50 a $4.50; do., patent, $4.55 a $4.80. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 per barrel. WHEAT.—No. 1, $1.10 a $1.25 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

WHEAT.—No. 2 white oats, 23 1/2 a 23 1/2.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 4 1/2 a 5c; good, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4c; medium, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2c; common, 4 a 4 1/4c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/2 a 5c; good, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2c; medium, 3 3/4 a 4 1/2c; common, 3 a 3 1/2c; tans, 4 a 4 1/2c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4c; other Western, 5 a 5 1/2c; State, 4 1/2 a 5c.

FOREIGN.—About one-third of the land in Great Britain is owned by members of the House of Lords.

During the last sixty-five years the increase of population has been as follows: France, 10 per cent; Austria, 45 per cent; Italy, 45; United Kingdom, 63; Germany, 75; Russia, 32; British Colonies, 510; United States, 626.

Bonito, the discoverer of a method of photographing the sea bottom, has succeeded in taking several photographs of the vegetation that grows on the rocks, by means of a water-tight camera and flash-light. He placed a camera or box, with a lens, at the bottom of the sea in a barrel containing oxygen. A puff of gas from the barrel carries magnesium powder into the flame of a spirit-lamp, standing under a bell-jar on the upper end of the barrel. Another puff actuates the magnesium shutter of the camera at the same time. He found that this method is very useful in exploring coral reefs.

Russia's penal statistics, just published at St. Petersburg, show that, in the dominion of the Czar, the women criminals outnumber the men by nearly fifty per cent, just the contrary being the case in other countries. At 87 of the women criminals are unmarried, and the majority come from the laboring classes in the cities.

It has been officially announced in Constantinople that two thousand Moslems had been killed in Setia, a town in the eastern extremity of Crete, by the Christians. Of all the M-hammuleh residents of the place, only 100 were left escaped.

On the 16th inst. Colonel Vassos, commander of the Greek forces in Crete, issued a proclamation, proclaiming a Greek occupation of the island. He promises, in the name of King George, to protect the lives and property of the inhabitants, without distinction of nationality, and to respect all religious convictions of the inhabitants, while bringing to them peace and law.

The Greeks, it is said, attacked and captured For Agbia, taking 400 Mus-sulman prisoners. Among them numbers are 100 Turkish troops, the remainder of which prisoners being Moslems, who had taken refuge in the fort.

A Turkish force has sailed from Constantinople for Crete. They will not be permitted to land if the Greek torpedo flotilla can prevent it.

On the 21st instant, insurgents in the vicinity of Cana made an attack upon the town, whereupon the commandant of the foreign Powers sent shells into the camp, and the Greek flag was lowered. Several men were wounded, but, it is stated, none were killed.

The Powers have agreed to authorize Italy to capture and administer the affairs of Crete, pending the establishment of a constitutional autonomy. It has been decided by the Powers that the granting of autonomy to Crete must be preceded by a complete cessation of Greek interference.

The French Minister of Foreign Affairs says it will be necessary to effect reforms in the entire East with the co-operation of the Sultan.

Scandinavia wants to secure peace in case of a European war, by having its neutrality guaranteed by the Powers of the North, the case of Belgium and Switzerland. Resolutions asking for the same, were submitted in the Norwegian Storting, the Swedish Riksdag and the Danish Folketing.

Brazil has about 2,000,000 acres planted in coffee.

The New York Herald has a dispatch from Buenc Aires which says: "A protocol has been signed by the Brazilian Minister of Foreign Affairs and the diplomatic representative of France resident in Rio Janeiro. The protocol embodies terms of settlement of the Amazon question, and rules for the determination of the line of demarcation in Guiana. The Federal Council of Switzerland is named in the protocol as the arbitrator. The Brazilian Congress will discuss the protocol, but the consideration will be brief, and it is likely that any objection will be offered at the terms."

Pitcairn's Island has been annexed to New South Wales. It has over 800 inhabitants, descendants of the mutineers of the British brig Bounty. They are an interesting Christian community.

The authorities of the Dominion of Canada have presented the Hawaiian Government with 80,000 young salmon, to be placed in the rivers of the Hawaiian Islands.

Women in Canada will soon practice law as barristers. The Ontario Law School some time ago passed rules to this effect, with the following regulations to dress: "They must be bareheaded, wear blue gowns over a black dress, and white collars and cuffs."

WESTWTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters in regard to instruction and discipline should be addressed to WILLIAM F. WICKESHAM, Principal.

Payments on account of board and tuition, and communications in regard to business should be forwarded to EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent. Address, Westwton P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

WESTWTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westwton School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.46 a. m. and 2.53 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare on regular trips, fifteen cent on special trips, twenty-five cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, wire West Chester Phone 8.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent.

WESTWTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—The spring term will begin on Third Month 15th, 1891. Application for admission should be made to Wm F. WICKESHAM, Principal, Westwton, Pa.

WANTED.—A middle aged Friend to serve as m-tron for the Barclay Home; to enter upon her duties Fourth Month 13th, 1891. Application may be made to

THE BARCLAY HOME, 326 N. WALTON ST., West Chester, Pa.

CORRECTION.—In the last number of THE FRIEND page 243, for "She is eighty-one years of age, and I already completed the sixtieth year of her reign" read "She is nearly eighty-eight years of age, and on Sixth Month 28th, 1891, if living, will have completed the sixtieth year of her reign."

1874.—Third Month 15th.—“Now, if we can only pursue in the pathway of life unto Him,” think I have the expression quoted somewhere. The path of light is living,” and does not an earnest character find it so, that he must keep a new nature renewed day by day? . . . I do doubt you have your dippings and baptisms, ut through all the blessed Master is near and reaches over the gold with tender interest. “In our patience, possess ye your souls. But there hall not an hair of your head perish.” What wonderful assertion! True, though, for we now that it is from the lip of Truth. He nows how to encompass as with a shield, all ose who trust in Him. . . . The little tract, “What Is It” [of which she was the author], is eing stereotyped. It passed the committee ithout dissent, except the desire for the chilren to mind their parents and friends. Some ought the parents might not always be fit to rect their children and give proper commands.

29th.—Alluding to two unsavory supplications in meeting, she says: “I could not enjoy tither of the prayers. Pouring out our natural esires seems more appropriate for the closet. I ink there is a deeper baptism and inspiration ed for our public approaches to the throne f Grace.”

Fourth Month 3rd.—At home to-day because f a hemorrhage of the lungs—a little last night so. It is a long time since I wrote in this urnal, and much has transpired. My mind as drawn to visit Trenton, N. J., and E. and s. Richie went with me. It was not a time of ounding, but I hope the good cause did not suffer. P. and E. C. D. entertained us very kindly, nd we dined at Henry Wood’s.

20th.—Second-day.—This is Yearly Meeting eek, and yesterday was my birth-day, and I m laid upon a sick-bed. Surely “Man proposes, but God disposes.” This is the third week f my sickness, and I am not yet allowed to sit p. Thou, oh, Lord, seems near me; be pleased o teach me every lesson it is thy design I should arn from this illness.

29th.—Quite a snow-storm this morning, coning for nearly two hours. The roofs and avements are quite white. Now about noon the sun is shining and the snow all gone. I am sitting up in bed, gradually recovering. Oh, Father in heaven, be pleased to bow down thy ear and hear my cry for help, to walk with greater nearness unto thee. Oh, keep my spirit seasoned with thy grace.

Fifth Month 6th.—This is the fifth week of my sickness, and I am able to sit up in a chair twice a day for half an hour.

11th.—First-day. I am down stairs; came down yesterday, and feel pretty strong.

21st.—Came to Bryn Mawr to spend a little time with my dear friends, W. and D. C. S. They have indeed a lovely home out here, and sweet Christian kindness and careful government of temper reigning in the hearts of the heads thereof, makes it delightful to be with them.

Sixth Month 2nd.—Came into town again much improved in health. Went to meeting for the first time. Parvin Masters and Mary Townsend were married. P. E. and E. Sharpless had good service. I added my mite at the last in regard to the solemn covenant and the need of making a similar covenant with the Lord our God. “Oh, that thou hadst hearkened to my commandments, then had thy peace been as a river, and thy righteousness as the waves of the sea.”

7th.—Came down to Cape May by the kind invitation of Anna P. Cook, and am remaining at her house.

10th.—Awakened quite sick; had hemorrhages in the night, felt quiet and peaceful. Some return the next day and sent for a physician. Soon much better and able to be about again.

14th.—First-day. Sat down together to worship God, some others coming in besides Anna’s family. A solemn time, and I hope a time of refreshment to some.

21st.—Again several of us assembled for worship, and oh, that the seed so often sown in the hearts of some may indeed bear fruit. “Come, see a man who told me all things that ever I did,” was the language of my heart. A. P. C. knelt at the last, and poured out her heart’s desire for her household, herself and family. I thank thee, oh, Father, for the blessing of having been here, and I humbly implore thy mercies upon her, for all her kindness to me. Restrain, O, Lord, and guide and preserve her children from the evil path; keep them innocent and tender.

27th.—Came to West Chester to Ann Sheppard’s.

28th.—First-day meeting large. It is a blessed thing to be gathered inward to the Source and Centre of all Good.

Seventh Month 6th.—Came on Seventh-day to be with W. and A. M. T. for some time. A pleasant visit with A. How thankful I am for so many favors and kindnesses. To-day we learn of the funeral of Mary Lippincott.

15th.—Went to Whiteland Meeting. Dined at I. and A. W. Hall’s. Sarah Williams there. They have just lost their brother Jesse.

17th.—Tea at Anne Pim’s, aged eighty-two, and a very upright and smart woman. Her natural force seems scarcely abated.

On the tenth of the month there was a sad accident at Atlantic City. Several persons went out sailing, and in returning the boat upset. Anna Roberts, Ollay Sharpless, wife and two children were drowned.

Eighth Month 7th.—I am on the eve of departure from West Chester to Parkerville for a three weeks’ visit, having been here six weeks, the last five with W. and A. M. T. It has been so delightful here. My spirit seems so united to theirs in Christian fellowship and the spiritual warfare. We have visited several meetings together, and I can acknowledge that heavenly help has been near, to my humbling admiration. I feel helped spiritually, and my health has improved very much.

Ninth Month 5th.—To-morrow I commence school, if health permits.

On the Fourth-day before leaving West Chester was their Monthly Meeting.

To-day Zechariah second chapter, verse five, seems to be for my health and strength—“For I, saith the Lord, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and will be the glory in the midst of her.” Oh, my Lord, bless me, bless and preserve me, keep me close to thy side.

Alluding to this subject in a letter, she says: “I was so thankful to hear of your good visit from ——. Better times coming, and we can serve Him as much by suffering his will, as doing it. How thankful I am too, for my delightful sojourn with you. My spirit bows in humility and praise. I have opened so many times up a Zechariah second chapter, verse five. It seemed almost new to me, and so sweet. If we can only lay hold upon it, and keep inward with our Light and Guide as much as we long to do. . . . H. Scull referred to the words in connection with Jehovah’s: ‘Jehovah Jireh.’ The Lord will provide.’ ‘Jehovah Nissi—the Lord my banner.’ ‘Jehovah Shalom—the Lord send peace.’ Are they not beautiful?”

20th.—I am improving in health, but am I improving in gentleness and meekness? I fear my manner has not been so quiet and gentle with the children during the past week, as it should have been. Be pleased in thy mercy to forgive me, oh, Father, and heal me; strengthen me, oh, Lord, to be calm and quiet and govern in quietness, for I feel persuaded nothing else will so reach the witness for Thee in the hearts of the children. Oh, Father, I abhor myself, and repent and beg to be restored to the subdued peaceful manners of thy true children. Set thy fear before my eyes all the day long. I beseech of Thee, for thou art worthy to be served.

27th.—A better week, but had to be decided. I did try to bring them the unruly ones, to the fear of the Lord, showing that He was ready to forgive.

After attending a funeral, she wrote, Tenth Month 15th: “J. S. S. said a little up-stairs. We both felt something. Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the "Lord delivereth him out of them all." It opened so plainly the difference between those that had no Anchor, and those who are on the Rock. One is delivered out of his afflictions, while the other is forced to seek alleviation from outward sources until they are all found to be as the shifting sand, and they are lost in perdition. Let us hold fast our confidence, our anchor on the Rock. "He delivereth them out of them all."

Tenth Month 18th.—At Haverford Meeting, Clarkson Sheppard and wife, also J. S. E. were at meeting, Clarkson largely engaged in testimony, J. S. E. a little at the last. My wife was also added, a desire for some that they might bow in submission, he willing to let the Master come in as with a whip of small cords, and cleanse and purify the temple of the heart. Clarkson's text was: "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." They dined at Haverford College. My little scholars seem brought into good order again.

28th.—She writes in reference to a place to board: "This morn dear S. A. R. went to S. A. Cooper's and asked about rooms, and finds three spare ones, so to-morrow I intend to go and engage, if it seems as bright. She and her daughter are kind."

Alluding to a recent visit to some friends under trial, she says: "How often since being with you, has my spirit been in sympathy with your sufferings. Have we not been baptized together, but in the baptism we feel that He, our blessed Lord, is with us, sanctifying, blessing. In all their afflictions He was afflicted, and the angel of his presence saved them." I feel that there is salvation and preservation in meekly bowing to his will. The cup that my Father has given me, shall I not drink it? Please tell W.—that I believe all things will work together for his eternal good, for he loves the Master. Think of the white robe of righteousness that the great tribulations bring, who would want to be without them? Then let us love Him ardently and centre our treasure in heaven. My love kindly to him and thy own dear self. Your kindness is like balm, and the reward for the cup of cold water is sure."

Extract from a letter dated Twelfth Month 6th, 1874: "How interesting THE FRIEND is this week. I recognize W's handiwork in the account of W. E. Underzook."

The blessed Master knows how to use us; how to bring us forward in his work, and then to help us to lay all crowns at his feet and to wear our wreath humbly when returned. Is it not so true, "My times are in his hand," and it is so sweet to look to Him in everything, to feel that He knows our situations, and will order all things for our eternal good. I was struck with a remark of John Woolman's in the (Life of) S. L. Grubb. It said "he was brought into a low season, and in it he remembered he had called God Father, and he felt that he loved Him. S. F. B. gave me a printed poem on John Woolman which contained these lines:

"There is glory to me in his name,
Meek follower of Bethlehem's Child.
More to bring by far than the splendor of fame
By which the vain world is beguiled.
'Tis the glory of goodness, the praise of the just,
Which outlives even death, and is fragrant in dust."
"I have thought how fragrant his name was,"

God respects not the arithmetic of our prayers, how many they are; nor the rhetoric of our prayers, how long they are; nor the music of our prayers, how melodious they are; nor the logic of our prayers, how methodical they are—but the divinity of our prayers, how heart-sprung they are. Not gifts, but graces, prevail in prayer.—Selected.

FROM "THE (LONDON) FRIEND," Persecuted For Love's Sake.

Scattered items of news have appeared of late in the Russian newspapers, to the effect that some sect of "Doukhobors" (spiritual wrestlers, have been mis-conducting themselves in some way, and have been subjected to repressive measures by the Russian Government. But, unfortunately, very few people know definitely who these Doukhobors are, how they have evoked the displeasure of the Government, or what punishment has been inflicted on them for their offences. The absence of any detailed accounts of the matter is due to the fact that in this case (as in all its dealings with the so-called sectarian movement) the Russian Government, though it considers its conduct justifiable, tries carefully to hide its deeds from the knowledge of the rest of the population. It does this by elaborate restriction of all endeavors to find out and to proclaim the true facts of the case; and to mention that the censor decides what news may be printed.

We therefore think it desirable to make known to others, in a brief form, the trustworthy information concerning the present state of the Doukhobors which we have obtained with great difficulty, and have carefully verified. We feel sure that a knowledge of their real intentions, conduct, and sufferings will evoke in the readers those feelings of sympathy and compassion which are so dear to men who sacrifice themselves for the sake of what they hold to be the truth.

Of the whole twenty thousand so-called Doukhobors living in the Caucasus, twelve thousand men are, and have been for the last two years, suffering most cruel persecution. More than four thousand of them, deprived of the possibility of supplying themselves with the most elementary necessities of life, are suffering from cold, hunger, disease of all kinds, and general exhaustion. Many have already died, others are dying at the present moment, and they are all in danger of being exterminated if the persecution is not stopped. These people are persecuted because their religious convictions do not allow them to fulfil those demands of the Government which are, directly or indirectly, connected with the slaughter of their fellow-men.

Their belief is, that to man has been given the possibility of perceiving in his own soul the voice of the indwelling God, to whom he owes obedience more than to the dictates of his personal desire, or to the external demands of others which clash with this voice. This inner voice, in the conception of the Doukhobors, is simply love; which should primarily be directed towards God, and be expressed in doing his will, and secondly to man, and be expressed chiefly in abstaining from all that is opposed to their well-being—for instance, from irritation, anger, fighting, murder, war, military service, and every form of violence.

"The Spirit of God lives in us and gives us life," writes one of them in reply to our question, what they meant by the "Book of Life." He who is pure in body and in his acts, meek and humble, never disputes with anyone, never contradicts anyone, follows after good, and withdraws himself, from evil deeds, who loves the Lord his God with all his heart, with all his soul, and with all his mind, and also loves his neighbor, and all who surround him, as him self; in a word, he who does not harm any living thing on earth, but fulfils the law of God, and has a conscience pure and unspotted—such a man has "the Book of Life." The Deity, according to the Doukhobors, dwells in the soul of man; and there, consequently, is the real temple of God. Temples built with hands, ceremonies, and sacraments they altogether reject. "God, they say, is a Spirit, and it is in spirit that we must bow down and pray." The religion of the Doukhobors is purely spiritual, and they willingly call themselves not only Christians, but also "Doukhobors," taking this name as meaning that they live by the Spirit (doukh), and in the Spirit wrestle (boryatsya) with evil.

The attitude of the Doukhobors to the Government and the authorities is expressed by the following words of theirs: "We remember that it is said, 'Render unto God that which is God's; and to Cesar that which is Cesar's,' and we do not oppose the authorities if they demand from us that which is not forbidden by God; but that which is God's we cannot give up. We are ready to lay down our life for any man and would lay it down for the Tsar if we saw him in distress; if, for instance, he were drowning, or people were killing him, or he were badly off in some other way, we should be ready to lay down our lives for him as well as for any other man. Only we will not kill people for anyone; the right way to defend people from their foes is not with arms, but with words of truth. Truth should be spoken straight to people's faces, and then they will be ashamed to do evil deeds. It is a fearful sin to lift one hand against a brother-man. It is sad to kill even a little bird."

After their first appearance, in the middle of the last century, the Doukhobors were soon subjected to various forms of persecution by the Government, because their consciences forbade their complying with some demands of the authorities, especially with the demand to serve in the army. The Doukhobors always based their refusal of military service, and of participation in other forms of violence, on Christ's teaching, and on conscientious motive which every Christian is bound to respect. In order, therefore, to find a pretext for persecuting, judging, and punishing them, the real religious ground for their conduct was usually concealed, and other reasons, generally of a political and criminal character, were attributed to them. It was stated that the Doukhobors were rebels, that they roused people against the authorities, and committed a number of other criminal offences—robberies, murder, money forging, debauchery, &c.

The primary and chief propagators of these beliefs were the representatives of the Orthodox Church, which the Doukhobors, from their religious convictions, repudiated. The Orthodox Church, as is well known, is protected by the Government, collects its revenues with its assistance, and in its turn justifies and blesses every demand of its protector, however contrary to the teaching of Christ such a demand may be. The prayers to "read enemies underfoot," and the Church's demonstrative and official participation in all the military organizations for human slaughter, are striking illustrations of this. It is, therefore, natural that the convictions and conduct of such people as the Doukhobors, serving as a lively reproach to the representative of the Orthodox Church for their own apostasy, om Christ, should evoke in the latter feelings of anger and even of hatred.

Not having power to decide the fate of the Doukhobors at their own free will, the church authorities, who wish to destroy them, sought to discredit them before the civil power, which alone could inflict punishment. In the case of the Doukhobors, the same thing was repeated which was first seen in Christian history when Christ was libelled by the Jewish high priests before Pilate, and which still continues in Russia to-day in the case of all the so-called scoundrels, whom the representatives of the Established Church try to represent as political criminals—accusing some of Socialism, some of deauehery, and others of anarchism, etc.

Although these revolting libels are in contradiction to the whole teaching and life of the Doukhobors, people have always been found who readily believed such reports. The Russian Government believed them, and consequently inflicted cruel punishments on the Doukhobors. At the end of the last century large numbers of them were imprisoned and sent to penal servitude, where they were beaten to death. Only the Emperor Alexander I. forms an exception. Trusting the reports and libels against the Doukhobors he appointed a special Commission to investigate the movement; and when the Commission, after careful investigation, reported at the Doukhobors were neither rebels nor political criminals, but peaceful, honest, sober, and good people, he issued more than one ukase defending them from the fanaticism of the priests and from persecution at the hands of the local administrators. In contradiction to the demands of the Archbishop Job of Ekaterinoslav, who slandered the Doukhobors and demanded their banishment, and, in general, that rigorous measures should be taken for the destruction, in his words, of "so harmful, offensive to God, and soul-destroying a heresy," Alexander I., in a ukase of ninth December, 1816, addressed to the Military Governor of Kherson, wrote:—"Is it seemly for an enlightened Christian Government to turn wanderers back to the bosom of the church by cruel and harsh means—tortures, lashings, and so forth? The teaching of the Saviour of the world, Who came on earth to seek and save those who were lost, cannot be instilled by violence and executions, and cannot minister to the extinction of those it is desired to recall to the way of Truth. True belief is instilled by the grace of the Lord through persuasion, teaching, mildness, and good examples. Cruelty convinces no one, but rather renders them. All the rigorous measures which were exhausted on the Doukhobors during the thirty years preceding the year 1801, so far from destroying that sect, more and more increased the number of its followers. All these circumstances show clearly enough that it is unmeet not to consider any project for a fresh lishment of these people, but rather to think of defending them from all excessive exactness on account of their difference of opinion in matters of salvation and conscience, with reference to which neither compulsion nor oppression can ever have any part." The same Emperor Alexander I. decreed that the Doukhobors should be allowed to return from banishment and from prison, and granted them permission to emigrate from various parts of Russia to the "Zolotchniia Voli," in the Tavrichiski Government. But when, in the reign of Nicholas I. the enemies of the Doukhobors renewed their cunning and denunciations, the Emperor believed them, and by his orders, in the forties, the Doukhobors were torn from their homes and settlements, and I moved, as criminals, to the "Wet Mountains" in the Caucasus.

It was unfeeling were the accusations of rioting, debauchery, and all kinds of crime brought against the Doukhobors, may be seen, in addition to other evidence, by the fact that, living in the Caucasus during the two following reigns of Alexander II. and Alexander III., which lasted for half a century, the Doukhobors were not found guilty of any one of the crimes of which they have been accused, and which would certainly have appeared had they been habitual to them. But, on the contrary, by their peaceful, honest, temperate, and industrious life, the Doukhobors earned the general respect not only of their Russian neighbors and of the Circassian mountaineers, but even of the representatives of the military and civil power, with whom they were in excellent repute.

The locality to which the Doukhobors were banished by Nicholas I. is situated in what now is the Akhalkalaky District of the Tiflis Government. It was expected, as is mentioned already in the Ordinance of the Committee of Ministers of sixth February, 1826, that here, in the vicinity of Turkey and Persia, surrounded by warlike tribes, who at that time had not yet been subdued, and who continually committed raids on the Russian settlements, the Doukhobors would not be able to maintain their principle of not resisting evil by violence; and that, in any case, the damp and unfavorable climate and the extremely unproductive soil of the locality assigned to them would prevent their increasing in numbers or again collecting wealth. But these expectations of the Government were not realized; and we have here once more an illustration of the incredible physical obstacles which can be surmounted by people who live a moral life.

Notwithstanding the exceptionally unfavorable conditions in which the colony of Doukhobors was situated, they, to the astonishment of everyone, began to flourish; and their numbers, after a time, increased so largely that they were crowded for room, and the surplus population emigrated, partly to the Elisavetpol Government, and partly to the recently acquired district of Kars. But having grown rich, that fate befel the Doukhobors which usually befalls people who try to serve two masters—God and mammon. Under the influence of a material prosperity they degenerated morally. Influenced by avarice, they began to go to law in the Government courts; in order not to be interfered with, they bribed the local authorities, who, in the Caucasus, are almost all venal; for the maintenance of external order they appointed leaders amongst themselves, who inflicted punishments by force; and having lost their manly firmness, they began to enter the military service when, in the reign of the Emperor Alexander III., this was demanded of them. They began also to smoke, to drink, and to keep arms for the defence of their riches. But although they temporarily, in external life, renounced the demands of their faith, yet in their inner consciousness they never abandoned their fundamental principles; and consequently, as soon as events disturbed their material well-being the religious spirit which had guided their fathers awoke within them.

The apparent cause of their religious revival was the circumstance that after the death, nine years ago, of the woman Kalmykova, who was their leader, her relations and their adherents, by bribing the local authorities, arranged matters so that the communal funds of the Doukhobors were declared to be the private property of the deceased, and therefore had to pass, as an inheritance, to the near-of-kin relations of Kalmykova. This revolting injustice split the Doukhobors, in 1887, into two parties. One, the "large party," consisting of fifteen thousand people, demanded that the communal money should be refunded, and acknowledged as their leader Kalmykova's former assistant, Peter Verigin, whom, before dying, she had appointed to be her successor; the "small party," consisting of the other five thousand and people, took the side of those who had obtained the communal funds, and tried in every way, especially by accusations to the Government and bribes to its representatives, to ruin Verigin and his followers.

Outraged they succeeded in this. Verigin was banished to the extreme north, and his nearest friends suffered a similar exile. But the evident injustice of this persecution produced the most beneficial spiritual results on Verigin, his friends, and on the "large party" of the Doukhobors.

A LETTER FROM CHARLES DINGLE TO HIS DAUGHTER MARTHA, WHILE TEACHING SCHOOL AT NEW GARDEN, OHIO.

Affectionate Daughter:—In reading one of thy late letters to thy sister H., I found that thy remote situation, separated from thy near connections and associates in these parts proved considerably trying to thee, which impressed my mind with sympathy, but nevertheless afforded satisfaction in finding it had a tendency to promote in thy mind serious thoughtfulness, which caused thee to express some tender feelings which had taken place in one of thy solitary walks. I was glad to find thou had such walks or opportunities of solitude, and my desire for thee is that thou may more and more be concerned to cultivate and cherish this disposition. Thou, no doubt, it will produce delicious fruits of retirement, which will far exceed all the trifling waste-time pursuits and creaturely gratifications which so much and so easily beset and mislead many of the children of men. Well assured I am, it is for want of a true sense of the unspeakable loss sustained in being diverted from, and divested of, this sweet, soul-enlivening enjoyment, which, indeed, is to be found in frequent and fervent retirement. Yea, this is the direct path that leads to the banqueting-house, where we shall oft find (as we are thus concerned to be fitted for it) admission, and the banner over us to be love. This is a prize worth leaving all to obtain. Thus the spiritual life, by virtue of a Divine influence, comes to have dominion in us, and our ability increases to hold converse with the spiritual appearance of Him who will become the chiefest amongst ten thousand. And thus, as we are concerned to draw near to Him in secret, we shall be induced to acknowledge that one hour in his presence is better than a thousand elsewhere. Yea, how doth this experience enlarge and sweeten, not only our spiritual life, but also our temporal enjoyments of the good things of this life. Yes, we shall soon find that it is good for a young man, and of course for a young woman, or, indeed, for any of us, to sit alone and keep silence, not only as to the outward, but, as much as may be, from every hindering, obtruding thought, save only in a hope and reliance on Him who hath said, "Ask and it shall be given you; seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." And when we have found this hid and heavenly treasure, how are we convinced that we have been diverted by vain shadows, and feeding, as it were, on husks, and all for want of returning to the Father's house, where there is bread enough and to spare.

Oh, saith my soul, may we leave all and follow Him in the way of his requiring. So shall we inherit substance and be in possession of that peace which the world cannot give. Yet the effectual means is plainly pointed out by the lip of Truth, that, to be faithful in the small requirements, to do, or otherwise not to do, such things which the awakened soul finds the discoveries of Truth are for, or against. This being the case, we begin to find the efficacy of the Divine gifts: faith springs up, yea, that faith which works by the love of God to the purifying of the heart, and thus the soul is enabled to triumph over the fear of death, hell and the grave, which must, indeed, be the combined king of terrors to all such who are destitute of the operation, more or less, of this essential means of salvation; for it is declared that, without it, it is impossible to please God, but with it, although it may be small, represented as a grain of mustard seed, yet, as we are concerned to cherish and cultivate it in the field or garden of our hearts, how it will enlarge, branch out and bring forth of its prostrating and soul-cleansing productions, whereby we shall become rich in faith and good works. This is the way to lay up treasure in heaven, where we have security given that it is out of the reach of danger. Then, O then, how will it yield us a more heartfelt satisfaction than any other, for where our treasure is, there will our heart be also. And thus a change is wrought in us, as represented by our sovereign Lord, who beautifully illustrates it by the well-known operation of leaven, which a woman hid in three measures of meal, till all was leavened. But why in three measures of meal? This affords a lively type, if I conceive aright, of our three-fold capacity of body, soul and spirit. And as we become passive, and do not contract its heavenly operations, but become co-workers with it, how it will effect a change throughout. Even the body will participate, in measure, of its Divine influence, so as to control, subject, yea, and considerably to shate the natural and carnal propensities which lead astray and make work for repentance. But it is to be feared it too often happens, a right application, from a true sense and sorrow for error, is neglected and put by until a more convenient season. And thus we are in danger of letting the time allotted us pass by unimproved, until this sorrowful situation overtakes us. "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and we are not saved" (Jeremiah, viii: 20).

Dear daughter, the draught of my mind hath led me to communicate serious considerations to thee, which, I hope, if it affect thy mind in reading (and the impression is lasting) as it has mine in writing, it will answer the desire of thy affectionate father for thy welfare, more especially as relates to that never-ending duration which time only separates us from.

SPARE THE CHILDREN'S FEET.—A ragged woman was crossing the corner of a public park in London where the children of the poor are accustomed to play, many of them bare foot. A policeman stationed on the corner watched the woman suspiciously. Half way across, she stopped and picked up something which she hid in her apron. In an instant the policeman was by her side. With gruff voice and threatening manner he demanded:

"What are you carrying off in your apron?"

The woman seemed embarrassed and refused to answer. Thereupon the officer of the law, thinking that she had doubtless picked up a pocket-book, which she was trying to make away with, threatened to arrest her unless she told him at once what she had in her apron.

At this the woman reluctantly unfolded her apron and disclosed a handful of broken glass. In stupid wonderment the policeman asked:

"What do you want with that stuff?"

A flush passed over the woman's face, then she answered simply, "If you please, sir, I just thought I'd like to take it out of the way of the children's feet."

Blessings on the kind-hearted care-taker who was so thoughtful of the children's feet. And should not we imitate so good an example, and take out of the path of the little ones anything which can wound them, injure them, or cause them to stumble?—Selected.

GRANDMA'S PATCHWORK QUILT.

A motley and but meaningless—
To you a thing of shreds
And patches—but a queer and quaint Old curio, its threads
All make a clew to lead me down
The labyrinth of time,
And set my grandma's wedding bells
Once more, for me, a-chime.

The air grows sweet, as with the breath
Of orange blossoms, and lo!
I seem to see the happy bride
And happy bridegroom go,
I all but hear the hearts that beat
Within each happy breast,
Beneath those bills of grandma's gown
And grandpa's wedding vest.

Nor is it only wedding bells
I hear, nor orange bloom
That fills the air. The cypress hangs
All heavy o'er a tomb;
And sad and far away I hear
Or seem to hear the bell
That tolls above a lovely dead
Laid low, the funeral knell.

My hand fal's tenderly, as on
A grave, whence'er I touch
That tear-stained bit of lace-blue;
"Thy' well we know "of such"
As she, who wore it long ago,
"The kingdom" is, dry-eyed
We cannot see what once was hers,
The little girl that died.

And grandma tells with trembling lips
How old she'd be to-day,
Her first-born—fifty-five—and thinks
Of childish hair grown gray
With grief. Yet, tho' she gives to God
Thanks that her pet ne'er knew
A care, her tears still fall upon
That bit of "baby-blue."

And so she follows, one by one,
The friends of other days;
The loved and lost come back to her
Along the patchwork maze;
And ancestors I never knew
Of faded silk combine
As grandma points the pieces out
Of garments that they wore.

Like storied stones that go to make
The names of great men shine
Thro' mist's of years, these little bits
Of faded silk combine
That humber lives be not forgot
To many a heart you've built
A monument, O tiny blocks
Of grandma's patchwork quilt.

The Need of Conscientiousness as to the Newspaper We Buy and Encourage.

The Evening Post, of New York, in its issue of the ninth instant, had a thoughtful, and so far as its associate daily publications were concerned, a commendably outspoken editorial upon the subject of "The Press and Juvenile Crime." It quotes a writer in the Revue de Deux Mondes, Alfred Fouillée, to show how startling has been the increase of juvenile crime in France since the year 1880, the ratio of said increase in thirteen years being twenty-five per cent, as compared with eleven per cent, for adult criminals. In Paris, more than half the arrests were of offenders under twenty-one year of age. An English writer shows that these figures are typical for Great Britain and the United States also.

In probing for the causes of this increase, it finds that, while they are doubtless numerous yet the "one, unmistakable cause is a crime loving and a crime-producing newspaper press"—quoting, in special support of this, the last report of the New York Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, wherein the president, Elbridge T. Gerry, says, "The first cause of their training in vice is what may well be called vicious journalism. Lurid stories of crime illustrated by vivid pictures representing criminals in daring and attractive attitudes; descriptions of criminals arrested for gross immoralities, with the like pictorial illustrations. An one conversing with children held for crime may soon learn whence the suggestions of crime are derived. They are only too ready to talk on the subject, and frequently to compare the exploits with those chronicled in these newspapers." The records of the above society, the Evening Post adds, "show case after case where juvenile crime was as directly caused by newspaper papers as if the editors had gone out, like many Fagins, and taught children to pick pocket, fire buildings and poison food."

During twenty years or more, the compiler of this article has sought to show, by tracts and by very many contributed articles, the direct connection between pernicious reading matter with immoral and brutalizing pictures, and the commission of crime. Until within quite a few years, however, the daily newspaper had not much attraction for the lad under sixteen, it fatuated with criminal-heraldic ideals, as had its sensational story paper, the dime novel and the detective library, so called. The vicious illustrations of criminals and their bad deeds, now so common in the dailies, have tended to bring the latter and the sensational story paper publication much more on a par. Nevertheless, the reading-matter of the latter, purposely thrown into short paragraphs, easily apprehended, filled with slang and constant references to the police and pistols, presents special attractions for the boy of low or warped moral calibre. In "An Examen of the Boys' Job of Train Derailment near Rome, N. Y.," contributed by the writer about a year ago, to the Episcopal Record occurs the following sufficiently convincing illustration, I think, of the connection noted:

"All of the party denied that they had been drinking, but said they were in their sob senses, and they wrecked the train because was a purpose which they had long cherished and which they foolishly believed they could safely execute after the fashion of some of the 'heroes' of whom they had read. This was plainly enough substantiated by the evidence officer who went to the room of the boy, Bristol. He was found lying on a bed. On a chair by the bedside was a yellow-covered volume giving the adventures of the James boys, and train robbers. The officer said to the boy, as he took him in charge, that such stories are very exciting. Bristol said, yes, but he sought they were a pack of lies. In the room of the leader, Hildreth, were found a revolver, several packs of cards, 'blood and thunder' novels, boxing-gloves, etc. The novels found were published by —, of New York City. One of them bears the startling title 'The Last Dark Seeds of the James Boys; or, The Great Robbery on the Rock Island Road.' On the outside the back cover is a list of over one hundred evils relating to the James boys.

"This is the kind of trash," says the Rome editor, "that the young train wreckers were fond of reading, and which inflamed their minds and turned their weak brains to such an extent that they worked themselves up to commit a criminal deed that stands without a parallel in the history of the country."

"Dozens, if not hundreds, of the daily and religious papers of the land made similar acknowledgment. The Rome train derailment case, with its tragic and fatal accompaniments, and all the rest evidence as to cause and effect which it applied, brought with it at least the shock of a much needed awakening.

Going back to the editorial in the Evening Post, the writer makes some remarks on homicidal mania, as induced by lurid pictures and details of assassination, expresses the view that the American press is the worst in the world as the recorder and provoker of crime," and his issue with Elbridge T. Gerry that it (the press) has never yet disregarded an appeal based on principles of public morality and public decency." He is forced to believe, by what he has observed, that the money argument is much more weight than exhortation.

"We do not propose," he impetuously concludes, "to waste any breath on newspaper proprietors. It is to the general public, to the Christian men and women who buy their daily paper, to the business men and philanthropists to keep their wretched and infectious sheets alive by advertising in them, that the appeal should be made. Their is the responsibility, and in their hands is the remedy."

"That is a bold breaking away from a slavish editorial courtesy," and a note of dissent from a quarter where it has long been greatly needed. It is likewise a pointing to the practical remedy necessary to be laid hold of by a very large number of advertisers and readers, before there to be any improvement in the make-up of our daily papers generally. Most of the morning issues of Philadelphia issue their papers on the first day of the week the same as on other days, with the difference that the "Sunday" issue is the most objectionable of the seven, and the highest priced. One of these, which I lately scanned, contained thirty-eight pages of matter, together with a twelve-page (smaller size page) supplement of vulgar jest and pictured indecency. In reading matter was of the world, its business, politics, sports and vanities, while many of the advertisements were absolutely vicious, and any serious minded person doubt that it is plain duty to refuse to patronize such a sheet — not simply the First-day issue, but the publication itself? The abstention from "pernicious reading" and from "the corrupting influences of worldly associations," referred to in the third query of our Book of Discipline, would seem to commend a pretty general uniformity of testimony and practice in the above indicated particular.

JOSEPH W. LELAND.

A COPY OF AN ESSAY OF A TESTIMONY FROM WESTLAND MONTHLY MEETING CONCERNING CHARLES DINGEE, WHO DIED THE 30th OF TWELFTH MONTH, 1815.

"Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God." "Blessed are they who do hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

For the sake of survivors, and as a small tribute due to the memory of our departed Friend, we feel engaged to give forth this short testimony concerning him. We believe that in the morning of his day he was acquainted with the voice of the Shepherd of Israel; and with his heart-tendering visitation; and by obedience to the discoveries of light, experienced a growth in the ever blessed and unchangeable Truth, and became qualified for usefulness in Society in different respects.

Since his removal among us he was reappointed to the station of an elder, which place he filled so much to the satisfaction of his friends, that in the remembrance of him, the language of Holy Writ occurs, "The path of the just is as a shining light, that shineth more and more unto the perfect day."

His death was sudden, having spent a part of the evening preceding his close according to his usual practice in devotional retirement (as we apprehend), he afterwards prepared to take his natural rest, laid down in apparent health and in a little time expired, having attained to the sixty-fourth year of his age.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

"The memory of the just is blessed."

"The fathers where are they, and the prophets do they live forever?"

These passages seem appropriate to the memory of our dearly beloved Friend, Samuel F. Bolderston.

His careful and consistent Christian walk in life among us, and his constant desire to live in peace and love with all men, and to the glory of his Divine Master, seem to make it incumbent upon survivors that some memoranda should be preserved of him—for such examples are rare.

He was the son of Ely and Esther Bolderston, and was born in the city of Baltimore, the twenty-second of Eleventh Month, 1810. His parents, grandparents and great-grandparents were members of the Society of Friends, and included among them several who were worthy elders and gifted ministers.

He was of a tender conscience and spirit from childhood, and was mercifully kept from violation of the moral law, although he deeply felt, very early in life, the tendency to sin, and the need of Divine help to overcome it.

He was sent to Westtown School when in his eleventh year, and remained there for two years. His recollection of this time and the attachment formed for some of the teachers and scholars continued to be a source of pleasure to him through life. While at the school a sermon preached by Samuel Bettle, Sr., had a powerful effect upon his heart, which was never dissipated. In his seventeenth year he conscientiously and understandingly relinquished worldly honors and hopes, and accepted the rule of the meek and lowly One, whom he received and obeyed as Redeemer, Prophet, Priest and King, as his wisdom, righteousness, sanctification and redemption. By obedience to this light and leading he followed Him unflinchingly through his long life.

He served an apprenticeship to the leather business, but did not pursue it on account of the great reverses in business suffered by his father, who was reduced from affluence to the condition of a bread-earner, and obliged to start life anew. Samuel then learned the wall-paper business, which he conducted in connection with the queen-ware business with his father, in Frederick, Md.

When nineteen years of age he felt it to be his duty to put on a plain dress, which he did, and with this change gave up everything which interfered with a consistent maintenance of the principles of the Society of Friends, to which he was ever after a devoted adherent, believing that they represented the pure teachings of the Gospel of Christ.

About this time he first appeared in testimony in meetings, and was recorded a minister at the age of twenty four years.

In 1833, following the leadings of duty, he went to Frederick County, Virginia, and taught school. He then went to Ohio, where he was similarly employed for one year. Returning to Virginia in 1835, he was married the same year to Martha Ann Griffith, at old Hopewell Meeting-house. She was the daughter of John and Rachel Griffith, both honored elders, and greatly beloved in that State. She proved to be a true helpmeet to her husband in every way, and was enabled to be deeply baptized with him in the many and varied exercises which were permitted to come upon him as a minister of Jesus Christ.

He continued teaching in Virginia until 1846, when he removed to Bellefonte, Pa., and took charge of the Academy there, where he continued for three years, having among his scholars the Curtins, Valentines, Thomases, etc., who retained a great respect for him.

He was unusually well-qualified for teaching, combining great gentleness with firmness, and gained both the respect and affection of his numerous pupils. He managed, without difficulty, large boys and young men who had defied previous teachers, and, at Bellefonte especially, brought a state of disorder and rebellion into order and discipline.

When visiting Virginia he was always called upon by some of his old pupils, now prominent men and active in the business and politics of that State, who remembered him and his influence over them with affection and gratitude.

In the summer of 1848 he made a visit to Virginia, travelling with his wife and four small children in a carriage; there being then no other mode of conveyance. The trip occupied a week each way upon the road.

In the spring of 1849 he removed, with his family of six children to Philadelphia, settling in the limits of the Northern District Monthly Meeting, which he continued to attend diligently throughout his life, never omitting the attendance of week-day meetings, whatever the pressure of business might be.

He seldom attended meetings other than his own, feeling that, while duty led some to visits in Gospel love more or less extended, it was his place to remain at home and minister to the flock there, as such service might be required.

He was favored to attain to an introversion of spirit in meeting to such a remarkable degree that, although oppressed with cares all his long life, he repeatedly said, "These were never allowed to hinder his communion and worship there."

He was a diligent reader of the Holy Scriptures, making them his daily companion, and was more familiar with their contents than most Bible students, being able to locate almost any verse or incident that might be inquired for at any time. He was quite conversant with the writings and Journals of Friends, and had printed and largely distributed, at different times, extracts from the writings of George Fox, William Penn, John Woolman and others; also from the sermons of Stephen Crisp and Samuel Fothergill, besides several papers of his own composition. He was also acquainted with many of the best authors, both ancient and modern, from whom he often quoted.

While diligent in business he was fervent in spirit, serving the Lord, doing all things as in his sight, and as unto Him.

In the exercise of his gift as a minister, he was dignified, earnest, clear, forcible and convincing, ever having an eye single to the glory of God. He rarely repeated in his sermons any part of a former communication, but brought forth from the treasury matter both old and new, often quoting some extracts from pious authors to elucidate his subject. In the last sermon, at his own meeting, in Ninth Month, 1893, he quoted these lines:

Wife as the world is God's command,
Vast as eternity his love,
Firm as a rock his Truth shall stand
When rolling years shall cease to move.

He always regarded public prayer as a service of the greatest importance.

Samuel F. Baldwin left but little written matter expressive of his own exercises and feelings, except a few letters, mostly addressed to his children.

In one, written in 1880, he says, "This morning, as I lay reflecting, I felt my strength renewed in the omnipotence of God. Omnipotence, what a word to dwell upon! And what a mercy inexpressible, that we may lean upon Him, yes, 'Lean upon Him on whom archangels lean.'"

"I am renewedly convinced that the more we seek for and trust in Divine aid and power the more we shall receive it from Him.

"Let every one's faith stand in the power of God," was the constant language of George Fox. And truly, there is no other help, no other support but in his power and goodness and mercy, manifested to mankind in his Son, to whom He bare this record on the Mount: "This is My beloved Son. Hear ye Him." Through many and varied trials and vicissitudes, for fifty-three years, this has been my support, my help, my hope, my trust."

In a letter of another date he writes:

"Greatly do I desire your present happiness, which can only be found in true wisdom's pleasant ways, but far more do I desire for you, and for us all, that when the curtain shall be drawn and eternity shall open upon us, we may all be gathered safe into the heavenly garner, even into that holy and heavenly city whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are everlasting praise. A city which needeth not the light of the outward sun nor of the moon to shine in it, but the Lord God and the Lamb are the light thereof. I find as I draw nearer to the close of life, an increasing desire for myself, and for all dear to me, that we may all be permitted to join with the innumerable multitude in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb. My soul bows before the Eternal Majesty on your behalf, and for us all, that we may be preserved unto the end of our days, and at last enter into eternal rest and peace."

Toward the close of life our dear Friend was afflicted with the total loss of sight, and an illness continuing nearly a year and a half, during which he manifested great patience and uttered many weighty expressions.

He departed this life the fifth of First Month, 1895, in the eighty-fifth year of his age, having been an acceptable minister nearly sixty years, and we doubt not has joined the just of all generations.

THE DEVIL'S MISSIONARY WORK.—The American Issue quotes from the note-book of one who was present at a meeting of the Ohio Liquor League some years ago, these words from an officer of the League who, when discussing and citing the conditions of success in the trade, remarked:

"It will appear from these facts, gentlemen, that the success of our business is dependent largely upon the creation of appetite for drink. Men who drink liquor, like others, will die, and if there is no new appetite created, our counters will be empty, as will our coffers. Our children will be hungry, or we must change our business to that of some other more remunerative.

"The open field for the creation of this appetite is among the boys. After men are grown and their habits are formed, they rarely ever change in this regard. It will be useful, therefore, that missionary work be done among the boys, and I make the suggestion, gentlemen, that nickels expended in treats to the boys now, will return in dollars to your tills after the appetite has been formed. Above all things create appetite."

This is the kind of "missionary work" done by the fifty-five thousand eight hundred and seven bartenders and seventy-one thousand four hundred and twelve saloon-keepers who act as Satan's missionaries in the dram-shops of this country. Could Satan himself show greater and more malignant craft? What are you doing to hinder it?

Is it not true that Christians do a little missionary work in the same "open field"? Who will help? The people should be taught, the young should be warned, the unwary should be cautioned. Cheap illustrated literature should be scattered everywhere to show the dangers of indulgence in strong drink and guide the young in paths of truth and soberness.

A LETTER from Augustine, Fla., is published in The American Journal of Science, which tells of the body of "an immense octopus" thrown ashore some miles south of that city. Nothing but the stump of the tentacles remained, as it had evidently been dead for some time before being washed ashore. The body measured eighteen feet in length by ten feet in breadth. Its immense size and condition prevented all attempts at preservation. Prof. A. E. Verrill says that the proportions given indicate that this may have been a squid-like form and not an octopus. The "breadth" is evidently that of the softened and collapsed body, and would represent an actual maximum diameter in life of at least seven feet, and a probable weight of four to five tons for the body and head. These dimensions are decidedly larger than those of any of the well-authenticated Newfoundland specimens. It is perhaps a species of Architeuthis. Professor Sienstrup recorded many years ago a species of this genus (A. dux), taken in 1855 in the West Indian seas, but his example was much smaller than the one here recorded.—Late Paper.

A Vision.

A minister of the Society of Friends, while on a religious visit to Russia, had the following experience. He says:—

"While in the Transcaucasus my mind had been much exercised about Prussia— and her son, dear Christian people of the Greek Church. He was a fine young man of about twenty years of age, who, on the occasion of our taking a meal at his mother's house in Northern Russia, had pleaded in the loving earnestness of his heart for what I felt the Spirit of the Lord condemned. As my thought turned toward them, while lying awake on my bed one night, it seemed as if the Saviour appeared and beckoned to me, and I rose up and followed. We came shortly to a large gateway over which was written in bold letters:

"The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof: thou shalt worship the Lord thy God and Him only shalt thou serve."

"We passed through into a beautiful garden where were all manner of shrubs, trees, and flowers, 'pleasant to the sight and good for food.' The air was balmy, and there was a clear brightness that did not dazzle; the song of birds and hum of happy life caused a sweetness of harmony that cannot be described; nothing jarred or disturbed the perfection of the whole. We passed on, through paths of beauty that seemed endless, till we came to a more open part, where were erected large and magnificent buildings, judged by a sense I had once known, but which now looked nothing more than the toy buildings I made when I was a boy with my little wooden bricks. One of these was called the 'Greek Church,' another the 'Roman Catholic,' and another the 'Anglican,' while spreading in all directions were smaller buildings of a similar kind, but all professedly erected for the same object. From some of them music was issuing that some might consider the perfection of harmony and sound, but it fell dead and lifeless on the ear. We entered first the 'Greek Church'; not a seat was vacant and priests in gorgeous vestments were attending to the duties of their Order; numerous candles lit up a magnificent display of colors, pictures, and arrangements most imposing. During a little lull in the service my Companion called, in a voice of power, pity and love,

'Come to Me.'

A very few appeared to hear Him, but among them I noticed my friend and her son turn a responsive look. "Not one of the priests did I see take any notice, except that two or three who kept their backs toward Him, were more diligent in their respective employments. With a look of deep tenderness He turned and went out, no one following Him. Oh! that a lost world could see that look. I have seen nothing to compare it to; no pen nor pencil could describe it. We entered each building in turn and in each the same loving invitation from his lips went forth, 'Come to Me.' In some of the smaller and less pretentious buildings the proportion of those who turned a responsive look to his tender call was much larger than it the more showy ones, but none arose and followed. He looked sad and thoughtful, but beneath it all could be discerned a Kingly power. "We walked on, leaving these churches behind us, but there was a change in all sur ounding; the garden, though still retaining huch of its beauty, had lost its former freshness and a blight and sense of oppression rested over and over all. Presently we came to a deep, wide, and extensive ditch, in which were human ones—the collection of centuries, and the outcome of persecutions by the professing Church. Many of them were fresh, and in some cases the flesh was still decaying on the skeleton. Now He spoke to me, as we gazed on the sad spectacle, and said, "Son of man, seest thou what these people have done, and are still doing, in thy name, and for my honor?"

"Close by was a building, differing from any I had seen before. Over the doorway was written: 'I was in prison and ye visited me.' As we passed through we heard the clank of our arms, and entering a cell, a prisoner, whose face was radiant with joy, rose up to meet Him; He recognized his Lord. He took his hand and sat down by him, and for the first time smiled at rest. Motioning me to leave, He said: 'Go and tell my Church where they will find Me.'"

HE HEARS AND HELPS.—A young accountant in New York City got his accounts entangled. He knew he was honest, and yet he could not make his accounts come out right, and he toiled all that day and night until he was nearly crazed. It seemed by these books that something had been misappropriated, and he knew before God he was honest. The last day came, and he knew if he could not that day make his accounts come out right he would go into disgrace and go into banishment from the business establishment. He went over there very early, before there was anybody in the place, and he went down at the desk and said: "O Lord, you knowest I have tried to be honest, but I cannot make these things come out right! Help me to-day—help me this morning!" The young man arose hardly knowing why he did so, opened a book that lay on the desk, and there was a card containing a line of figures which explained everything. In other words, he cast his burden upon the Lord, and the Lord sustained him. A young man, do you hear that? O, yes, God is a sympathy with anybody that is in any kind of toil! He knows how heavy is the load of bricks that the workman carries up the ladder of the wall; He hears the pickaxe of the miner down in the coal shaft; He knows how long the tempest strikes the sailor at the masthead; He sees the factory girl among the spindles, and knows how her arms ache; He sees a woman in the fourth story, and knows how few fence she gets for making a garment; and louder than all the din and roar of the city comes the voice of a sympathetic God: "Cast thy burden upon the Lord, and He shall sustain thee."—Talmage.

As to Miracles.

Miracles! Why should anybody stumble over them? The world itself is a miracle. It can be accounted for on no other basis. The scientists have failed to create a world upon their own theories. The scoffers have been nonplussed. The creation of the world is a miracle of miracles.

It is not the province of a daily newspaper to dispute with theologians, but it is too much to suggest that the miraculous foundation of the planetary system may very well include minor miracles? Why the simplest surroundings of every-day life are miracles. Open the palm of your hand before you and then close the fingers. How is it done? How account for the force unless it is of the marvellous? Every sense is a miracle—seeing, hearing, tasting, smelling, feeling. The air you breathe is a miracle. The brain, which gives you power to think, is a miracle.

What is the use of wasting time over the discussion of miracles? The fact that you are alive is a big enough miracle itself to swallow all these petty discussions.

The above extract brings to remembrance the lines of Whittier:—

"A miracle seems the Universe,
A marvel our life and death;
A mystery which I cannot pierce,
Around, above, beneath.

In vain I task my aching brain,
In vain the sages' thought I scan,
I only feel how weak and vain,
How poor and blind is man."

World-Wide Peace Progress.

A consideration of the recent world-wide progress of Peace and Arbitration, in spite of vast armaments, is well calculated to afford renewed encouragement to the many earnest workers, who on both sides of the Atlantic, have long been striving, through evil and good report, to promote the brotherhood of nations.

Perhaps no year of the century, now so near its close, has witnessed more cheering signs of this progress than the one just terminated. For although it began amidst alarms of war and dangers of an unusual character, yet, as the months pass on, it is manifest that the pacific influences at work amongst the peoples and their rulers were more powerful than those tending to strife, and that good feeling was to triumph over wild passion.

In particular, the end of 1896 brought across the Atlantic the welcome intelligence that the very important aim of so many friends of Peace, for many years past, namely, the establishment and official acceptance of a general Treaty of Arbitration between the United States and Great Britain has been practically attained, and that the American Secretary of State and the English Ambassador at Washington have almost completed the terms of such a Treaty, providing for the constitution of an Arbitral body consisting of three Judges of the United States Supreme Court and three of the English Judges, to whose decision are to be submitted all differences which may arise between the two countries during the next five years—the present limit of the Treaty, as an experimental measure. It may be well believed, that having been once tried, this Treaty will become a permanent institution by subsequent renewals. In conjunction with the previous announcement, in President Cleveland's Message to Congress, that the Venezuela difficulty between the two countries has also been put in the way of a final peaceful solution, this event is a matter for profound thankfulness and satisfaction—a feeling which is intensified by the expression, on the part of the incoming President of the United States, William McKinley, as conveyed in a letter from him to the Pennsylvania Peace Union, that he also rejoices in the peaceful relations between England and America; and he remarks with emphasis, "Most certainly the citizens of the United States have a right to take pride in that their country is far-most in efforts towards arbitrating international disputes."

Turning from the Western to the Eastern Hemisphere, we also find increasingly pacific conditions, almost everywhere. One of the most gratifying of these is the growth of more cordial relations between Great Britain and the vast Empire of Russia, and also between her and her near neighbor the French Republic. The once formidable "Central Asian" bogey, which used to awaken so many fears, and so much controversy, has almost disappeared, by the completion, in the last weeks of 1896, of the delimitation of the Russian boundaries on the confines of India and Afghanistan. The Russian Government has shown a very conciliatory and honorable spirit in its procedure in this matter. The long-continued divergence of policy between Russia and Great Britain, in reference to the Ottoman Empire, also shows signs of a closer agreement in the future. And the French Government appears more inclined than previously to unite in such international concert. One good effect of this is already shown by a quieter aspect of affairs in Armenia—that district whose mis-government has been, for two years, the source of imminent danger to the peace of the world. The peril in that direction has by no means passed away, but it has decidedly lessened during recent months.

One of the most desirable elements for the promotion of International Peace, is an increasing degree of amity and co-operation between France and Great Britain. And here also, both President Faure and M. Hanotaux, as Minister of State, have recently given hopeful indications of a willingness to reciprocate any advances which may be forthcoming from this side of the Channel. And it is a cheering sign that one of the most influential of Parisian journals, the Figaro, has just published an article in favor of more intimate relations between the two countries, an object which, it says, is desired by the majority of the French people and of their Parliamentary representatives. Italy, although suffering grievously from her naval ambition and warlike aspirations in Africa, has nevertheless concluded a peace with her late enemies. In Asia, the two neighboring nations, China and Japan, are peacefully settling down after their war, which has inflicted serious injuries both upon the victors and the vanquished. British India, with Burma and Assam, are quiescent; and so, in general, is all the vast continent of Asia. In Siberia, railways and commercial activity are progressing apace.

Even in poor Africa, with its irritating sores in Egypt, the Sudan, Zanzibar, and the South, matters are not nearly so bad as they were a year ago. The Matabele War is reported as ended. The relations between the Transvaal and England are less strained, and in the great island of Madagascar, affairs are perhaps somewhat less threatening than they were not long ago.

The conditions of Spain as to Cuba and the Philippines, and with that of Turkey in reference to Armenia and the Great Powers, afford ground for continuing anxiety, which, however, is not so acute as it was some months ago. For Turkey shows some signs of yielding to combined European pressure, especially now that the very uneasy agitation for solitary British interference has almost died away; and in Cuba there are not wanting indications that the long and terrible Civil War is approaching some sort of termination.

May these remaining clouds on the political horizon of the new year be gradually dispelled, and Peace continue yet further its world-wide progress. But, for what has been already, and especially of late, attained, there is abundant cause to take heart and thank God.—The Herald of Peace.

A REMARKABLE incident which was told me by G. W. Taylor, illustrative of Burritt's singular mastery of languages, happened while he was still at work at the forge in his native town of Worcester. A vessel sailing from Boston had been cast away on one of the South Sea Islands, and the details of the shipwreck, set forth in the dialect of the island, were forwarded to the vessel's owners, and presented by them to the Boston insurers. The learned pundits of Harvard College were thereupon consulted as to this evidence, but none could unlock the lingual mystery. Finally, one of them remarking that he had heard of the notable attainments in languages of a blacksmith over in Worcester, a delegation was appointed to proceed thither and have a talk with the man. Elihu was found busily at work at his forge. Could he enlighten the professors as to those "crow tracks" which were all a mystery to them? Scanning the manuscript, he confessed that the writing was one with which he was not exactly familiar, but if they would leave it in his care he would see what he could do with it. This was done. In a short time a complete translation was forwarded, and the underwriters being fully satisfied as to the loss, the claim of the owners, which amounted to thousands of dollars, was paid. How was Burritt to be reimbursed? The forge was again visited, and the "Learned Blacksmith" was asked for his bill. Despite all expostulations to the contrary, he refused to charge any more compensation for his valuable labor than what he would have received had he been engaged at his ordinary daily employment. However, when afterward in England (he was appointed United States Consul at Birmingham in 1865), his grateful beneficiaries settled a thousand dollar annuity upon him, the interest of which was paid him the rest of his life.—Selected.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The United States Treasury debt statement shows a net increase in the public debt, less cash in the Treasury, during Second Mo., of $1,592,137. For each in the Treasury, $864,338,167.

At the British Embassy at Washington, the Spanish draft of the Anglo-Venezuelan treaty has been signed by Sir Julian Pauncefote and Minister Andrade, and the document is finally ready for submission to the Venezuelan Congress, conforming to the constitutional provision that it must be in the language of that country.

On the 29th of Second Month the Spanish Minister in Washington was advised by Marquis de Almonada that the pardon for Julio Sanguill had been received from Madrid. Sanguill was immediately released from prison, and has since settled for Ky. Wt.

Great Britain favors the establishment of administrative autonomy in Crete, and believes that, subject to a stipulation, Crete ought to remain a portion of the Turkish Empire. Notice has been sent to the Powers to this effect.

It is said that King George and his cabinet declare that it is impossible for them to recall the Greek troops from Crete. They are resolved to maintain their present policy. The proposal of the Powers is regarded as a proceeding contrary to right, which will only add to the crisis. The blockade of Crete by the foreign warships is being strictly maintained.

A number of Cretan Deputies have presented a memorial to King George, stating that they had decided not to accept autonomy, but to continue their struggle to realize union with Greece.

Several prominent persons say that many officials there declare that Turkey will never give her consent to the scheme of the Powers to establish autonomous government in Crete.

The peace of Europe may hang upon the settlement of the present difficulty in Crete, and the way that is safest, that of the Powers insisting upon the island as a part of the Turkish Empire, is the one that is most unpopular to the people of all the countries whose interests are involved. If the Powers crush Greece the whole world will protest; if they do not, the peace of Europe may be imperilled. It is an awkward situation any way it is looked at, and the most obvious thought it suggests is that it may form a final settlement of the Armenian question, which is such a disgrace to modern civilization, and which would have been settled long ago had not each great nation feared the influence of the other. Every day the situation is becoming more desperate, owing to the fact that should the island the state of war prevents any attention to the Armenian question, the towns which are besieged by the insurgents the situation is much worse than it is in the country districts. In Heraklion alone, where there has been a very large influx of refugees, the outlook is very serious. There is now in the town, counting the regular Moslem population and the refugees, fully 25,000 persons. Provisions are very scarce and a famine is imminent. Large number of the refugees are already dying of starvation, and it was knowledge of this fact that led Korakas, the Greek leader, to issue his order permitting the cultivation of the fields.

China imported 13,000,000 square feet of American lumber last year, most of it from the States of Oregon and Washington.

A Bombay dispatch dated Second Month 23rd says: "The official plague-returns for the past week show a distinct abatement in the ravages of the disease." The Japanese Government has decided to state that in Sira, a district there is more suffering from the famine than in any other section of the Southern Punjab, the death-rate has reached 23 per cent. of the population, 40,000 persons having died. The killing of the cat by the Mohammedans is causing trouble with the Hindus. The users are repining at the loss of the cat. The Japanese Government has intended to adopt gold standard of currency upon a ratio of 32 1/2 to the silver yen, or dollar, will be gradually withdrawn from circulation, and the smallest gold piece will be of the value of five yen. The new standard will go into operation Third Month next.

A New York  Herald  correspondent writes: "Cheerful news from Buenos Aires, that owing to the Government's progress of negotiations with Argentine looking to the settlement of the boundary dispute with the Republic. It is stated that the Commissioners of Chili and Argentina have arrived at a perfect understanding as to the boundary line through Atacama. This highly important, as the settlement of the dispute will chief bone of contention, involving relations with Bolivia. If this line should be determined by arbitration, as is now proposed, a signal victory in the interests of peaceful relations with Argentina will have been achieved."

During the last several years of feeble health, those about him were comforted with evidences of a peaceful preparation for his final change. The promise, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed in Thee; because he trusteth in Thee," was of great benefit to his comfort, and when articulation had become tremendously difficult, in answer to the inquiry how he was feeling, a few words of that Scripture gave evidence that his mind was indeed stayed in peacefulness, through his protracted decline he manifested a calm and grateful spirit, in which he quietly passed away.

1874.—Twelfth Month 20th.—Yesterday was the funeral of our valued Friend, Lydia Starr, she passed away suddenly on the morning of the sixteenth. It seems mournful to see our folks thinning, but it is our hope that some day we may be guided by the power of Truth and come forth and serve the Lord. Oh, that the young people would "taste and see that the Lord is God."

I can bless thy Holy Name, oh, Lord, in that thou givest me such a comfortable home, and much peace and rest in thy presence. Two first-days, I have had such a heavy cold, not to go out to meeting, but the Lord was near, my little sanctuary in all places whither I go. Blessed, forever blessed and holy be thy name.

1875.—Third Month 28th.—The new year is come and nearly three months of it gone, and my entry has been made here; but I have it a very happy season—so pleasant and cheerful a home; so many kind friends who love me. Many thanksgivings have arisen for my comfortable, cheerful room and returning health. Since writing here, our beloved friend Thomas Smedley, has been called from work—rewards, and such is the sweet savor his name gives, that we humbly believe he is gathered home through the redeemed of the Lord. Our Yearly Meeting is near at hand. May the Lord be with us.

Fifth Month 2nd.—Here, at my kind friends, V. and D. C. S., and I feel so thankful for the favor. Our Yearly Meeting has passed, and on the whole was a comfortable one. Hannah Stratton, from Ohio, was favored in the ministry. Deborah Rhoads had a reaching testimony or the young.

To-day I went to Haverford Meeting; a little testimony was required, "I have meat to eat, hie ye know not of." Oh, my God, be pleased to help me in every way, fill me with thy Holy Spirit, and preserve me from all evil; keep me lively, neck and watchful.

7th.—There are fields Elysian. There is a home for the soul, there are pleasures at his right and, and in his presence fullness of joy. These words were formed in my soul during afternoon meeting, and expressed with addition, "He brought me into his banqueting house, and his banner over me was love."

30th.—Still at Bryn Mawr, enjoying it very much indeed, getting stronger all the time, and able to be out in the open air without taking cold so easily. On the sixteenth we went over to Springfield meeting—a time of exercise, in testimony and supplication. I feel a jealous fear over myself lest I should speak without the true anointing. The requiring seemed there, and I tried to obey.

Oh, my Father in heaven, look down upon thy dependent little one, and preserve me from opening my mouth, unless thou alone draws me.* Oh, that I might be filled with the Holy Spirit and power. Keep me more lively in glory all the day long.

On the first of Eleventh Month, I came to S. Mason McCollin's to board. They all seemed very kind and interesting.

1876.—Ninth Mo.—My vacation closed and my mind thankful for the many favors granted during this season of rest. Visited relations in Sandwich, Boston, Lynn, Providence, Duchess Co., New York, and many friends besides in these parts.

In allusion to this visit, she writes from Sandwich. "We have such lovely walks together (with her sister), sometimes with the wind blowing in the salt flats, and I breathe in such monthfuls; it is so good. We can see a whole reach of bay, almost a semicircle, as we go from one cousin's house to another. It is interesting, too, to realize that here my grandparents lived, and trod upon this same ground, besides my mother and a multitude of aunts and uncles. Here they had their childish sports and here sealed their marriage vows, preparatory to dispersing north, south, east and west. The meeting on First-day was interesting. I could own all that was said. It is called one of the most "Friendly" meetings in the Quarter. It was real pleasant last evening to see the Philadelphia FRIEND. I have been brought to wonder several times if there was not a service in my coming here, even though the visit was intended to be purely of a social nature. Those who advocate new things go so far that the lover of the pure Truth cannot follow them. There is something here worth cherishing, and so I suppose there is in parts of all other Yearly Meetings."

Tenth Month.—During this summer the great Centennial Exhibition was held in this city, and it was wonderful to see the good order preserved throughout.

In a letter of Ninth Mo. 12th, she writes, "Our meetings on First-day mornings are much visited by strangers, probably Centennial visitors, and they continue coming about every ten minutes or so, until nearly time to close. It does not seem really disturbing either, for they evidently want to know our principles, and the dear Master, who never fails in his supplies, has so far felt them, to our dumbing admiration.

* This exercise brings to mind a somewhat similar one in the diary of our late highly valued friend, Hannah Gibbs, when near the close of her lengthened out life, and of ministry some fifty years, she says, on returning from a meeting in which she had spoken, and felt some doubt as to its right authority, she wrote, "Thou knowest, I have never dared to open my mouth unless I believed the word was in it if I did not."

"On my first return to the city, the longing desire was to rest from service for about three weeks, but they seemed as sleep having no Shepherd, and his compassionate love was toward them, so what could the poor instruments do but follow the beckonings of his hand in the feeding of them. Many many baskets full of fragments be taken up."

Tenth Month 24th.—The following Minute was adopted by our Monthly Meeting: "A concern having been revived at this time on account of the many deficiencies existing among us and in us, the belief that advantage would result in the appointment of a Committee to visit as way may open for it, the members of this meeting, it was on deliberate consideration concluded to separate one for this purpose, who are desired as ability may be afforded, to tenderly counsel and encourage all of our members to increased faithfulness and dedication in the discharge of their religious duties."

In reference to this committee, of which she was one, she writes to a friend, Twelfth Month 17th, 1876:

"I am truly glad to hear of the appearance of J. S. in your meeting. He is indeed a promising young man, and may be an instrument of much good—if he keeps near the Master. As—said when I bid him farewell, 'It is only as we are kept.' So true it is, and so much I feel it in these visits in our meeting. 'Only as He gives wisdom, only as He opens the way, opens the mouth, gives tongue and utterance.' I shrink very much from making them all religious family sittings, it is so weighty, but do feel willing to spend the time socially, and then as our minute says, 'If way opens.' We are greatly encouraged to believe the dear Master is with us, and that so far the visits are acceptable."

1877.—Second Mo. 25th.—I am at home today from the effects of a cold, and wish to commemorate the goodness of my God, in that He has helped us all, through his great work.

On Third-day (Monthly Meeting) a minute was read expressive of the exercise of the Committee, and some of us had to feel "that we were unprofitable servants," having done nothing but what it was our duty to do. The kindness with which we have been received leads us to hope that it may do good. I think it beneficial to visit by committee: once in every few years.

She writes to a friend on the death of her father, Fifth Month 17th, 1877: "My heart seems with thee so much, that I think I must just send thee a little reminder of tender love and sympathy. I know what the feeling is, after passing through such a scene—how we feel inward, away from the world, shut out as it were from the spirit, with a shrinking from ever treading its walks again, and an earnest desire to keep close to the Fountain, that the good savor may not flee away from us. Oh! it is an effort to face it again, but one we have to make under the constant feeling of needing to watch and pray, lest we fall into temptation. I trust you had a satisfactory time on that last occasion of deep feeling. . . . I thought so much of him of late, and of the child-like simplicity that seemed to be about his spirit, and remember how delightful it is always to witness it before the departure of beloved friends; it seems like ripening for the kingdom. How conspicuously it shone in Samuel Cope. I have remembered how his parents were accessory in helping the poor slaves to freedom, and thought of the truth of the passage, "Inasmuch as ye have done it to one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

Eighth Month 27th.—Not unto us, oh, Lord, not unto us, but unto thy Name, give glory for thy mercy and for thy Truth's sake. Thou hast been good unto thy poor child, showing down blessings and favors all through these months of rest. Thou hast helped thy poor child to speak what seemed thy will in many meetings. I thank thee, oh, Father, for this peace.

In a letter to a friend dated Twelfth Month 30th, 1877, she thus writes of a "train of thought which occurred to me in the night season." I had been deeply exercised on account of some alterations which should be made, but why did not open for it, so of course the dear Master was to be told, and when the soul is full, how ardently we press our cause, and then comes the satisfied rest and feeling that He knows all and will do what is good. After this I remembered the remarks by some author, "That truth was not true prayer which did not end in still submission." So dear, the still submission came to my troubled spirit and continued many days, through the clearing clouds, until it is all accomplished; and how thankful I can be now. Here we are just on the threshold of a new year, the past year full of goodness and mercies, even our afflictions tempered by Him who is touched with a feeling of all our infirmities.

I do not know whether it is good to dwell too much on the harrowing thoughts that come up at this season, but rather committing our way unto Him, press onward. I can seem to see thee, my dear, slowly recovering, leaning on his arm, so desirous to walk carefully before Him. He will accept thee and strengthen thee, so trust and be not afraid. Dear S. E. was at our M-ly Meeting, and so strengthening to the laborers. I felt real thankful. Does He not know how to hand cups of cold water?

A few days before the decease of Mary Pealey, she attended the M-ly Meeting at Mount Melick, where she was drawn forth in a wonderful manner—that was as a people were the hidden guests, and if we make excuses too long, our excuses at length would be taken, and then the Lord would send to the highways and hedges, and compel others to come in; for his table must be filled with guests; that a glorious day would yet come, when the Lord would bring from the east and from the west, and from the north and south, and thousands and tens of thousands would be brought to sit down with Him in his kingdom; and that the invited unfaithful children of the kingdom would be cast out.

She also had to declare that she saw (and that in the Light) that the fields were already white unto harvest, and the faithful laborers but few; so she desired that all might do their day's work in their day, and mind the things that belong to their peace, before it should be hid from their eyes.

Crater Lake, Oregon.

In 1886, Captain C. E. Dutton, then on the United States Geological Survey, first discovered and brought to notice this remarkable body of water. During the past season, J. S. Diller, who has for some years been in charge of the work of the survey in northern California and southern Oregon, has supplemented Captain Dutton's work upon the lake, and brought to light additional facts, which altogether make it one of the most interesting and instructive geological phenomena of the world.

Crater Lake is situated sixty-five miles north of the California line, near the intersection of the forty-third parallel and the one hundred and twenty-second meridian, not far from the Klamath Indian Reservation. As its name signifies, the lake occupies the bed of an extinct volcano. It is seven thousand feet above the sea, and is elliptical in form, with diameters of six and a quarter and four, and a quarter miles. There is no drainage-basin emptying into it outside of the rim of the crater, so that the water of the lake is wholly derived from the precipitation over its surface. The lake lies nine hundred and fifty feet below the surrounding rim, with sides sloping nowhere more than forty degrees. There is nowhere room for a camp on the immediate shore. From the rim the land slopes away from the crater in every direction.

The bottom of the lake is a comparatively level plain, from sixteen hundred to two thousand feet below the surface of the water, making it the deepest body of fresh water on this continent, if not in the world. But there is, rising from the bottom, a subsidiary volcanic cone which projects six hundred and fifty feet above the water. This and the entire rim of the crater are composed of lava in very fresh condition.

The problem which J. S. Diller discussed at the last meeting of the Geological Society related to the age and origin of this remarkable lake basin. One of the most striking facts brought to light by his investigations was that the basin has been formed since the glacial period, for the sides of this truncated cone, wherever exposed near the rim, are covered with glacial scratches and furrowed with shallow depressions resulting from the erosion of pre-glacial water-courses. It is evident, therefore, that in glacial times the cone was perfect, or nearly so, running up the height of Mount Hood or Mount St. Helens, and supporting glaciers of vast size. From many indications in the surrounding valleys, it would appear that these glaciers were suddenly melted by volcanic heat, giving rise to tremendous floods.

But what has become of the portion of the cone which has disappeared? Was it blown out and scattered far and wide, like that of Krakatoa a few years ago, or did it fall inward and disappear in the cavernous depths below? Diller is of the opinion that the latter explanation is the correct one, for there are no fragments scattered abroad, such as would result from an explosion. But, it will be asked, how could the cone fall in and be so completely engulfed as it is? Diller's answer would be, that probably the vast lake of lava underneath has found some lower outlet, and been drawn off sufficiently to leave the present cavity, together with sufficient room to engulf the upper part of the truncated cone.

With reference to the date of this eruption nothing more can be said than that it synchronizes with the glacial period, concerning which there is abundant evidence that upon the Pacific Coast it is geologically very recent, the ice no yet having departed from the higher peaks of the vicinity, while the indications of erosion since the formation of the lake are very slight. In previous papers Diller has confirmed the surmises of Captain Dutton that there have been extensive volcanic eruptions and lava flow in that region during the past two hundred years. In some places, indeed, these have been so recent that the forests overwhelmed by them have not had time to decay, though constantly exposed to the weather.

FROM "THE UNITED FRIEND."

A Young Minister of the Olden Time and His Gift.

Early in the second quarter of the last century, there lived within the limits of Abington Meeting near Philadelphia, a lad by the name of John Griffith. Welsh by birth, and of Quaker parentage, he had been attracted by the fair reports of the province of Pennsylvania to quit his native hills and seek a home in the new world.

Here, removed from the watchful care of his parents, the boy fell into some ways that were not good for him; but though the earthly parent was not near to reprove, the Heavenly Father did not neglect his child. By the visits tations of his grace, He would have turned him from the indulgence in that which was harmful and set his heart on better things; but, he says: "I was very unwilling to give up to the call of Christ. I could plead abundance of excuse concluding among other things, that I was young and might live a great many years; that if I did take my swing a few years, I might [still] become religious sooner than many other had done who were brave men in their days. I would, however—to make myself more easy for that time—fully determine to be a very religious, good man at one time or other; but I must be not yet."

The wisdomfulness of his heart does not seem to have manifested itself in any marked improprieties of conduct, for he speaks of standing fairly well before men. "I was afraid to tell a lie," he says, "except to embellish or set off a pleasant or merry tale or story; apprehending it no great crime to tell a lie in jest. I do not remember ever to have sworn an oath, or uttered a curse." He attended meetings for worship in a perfunctory way, though what he heard there was to him "like water spilt upon a stone." "I was indeed for some time," he writes, "like a heath in the desert, not knowing when good came; and if at any time the seed of God's kingdom fell upon my heart, which was like the highway ground, it was soon taken away and I presently lost the savor thereof."

One evening, when he was about nineteen years of age, he was engaged in boisterous merrymaking with some young companions, as they carried their roystering to such a degree that after retiring for the night, John felt some sharp lashes of conscience for his part in the affair. The thought that men are not brought into this world for such a frivolous purpose was pressed home to him, and he was sobered though his conviction did not prevent his prettily soon getting to sleep. He had not slept long before he was awakened by one who brought the news that one of his merry-making companions, who was in the same house, was ver-and likely to die. In an agony of mind, John hastened to him—the thought of the way in which the evening had been mis-spent, and he sudden illness that had fallen on this poor friend, weighing him down with distress. He felt as though his own last hour was at hand, and that there was no hope of deliverance from an everlasting misery.

"This happened," he says, "on a Seventh-day night, and though the young man in his time recovered, yet he was not fit to be left next day, which hindered me from going to meeting, where I was exceedingly desirous to go; for by this time I was pretty thoroughly awakened to a sense of duty, and it being a week before the like opportunity presented to me again, it seemed the longest week I had ever known. O how did I long to present myself before the Lord in the assemblies of his people! that I might pour forth my inward cries before Him in a state of sincere repentance and deep contrition of soul; which, through the effectual operation of his power in my heart, I was then in condition to do."

"Now I clearly saw that repentance is the gift of God, and that his love, wherewith He hath loved us in Christ Jesus our Lord, leads us thenceforth. The fleshly will being for he present overcome and silenced, there was a living up with all readiness of mind to the Lord's requirements. There was not anything so near to part with for the real and substantial enjoyment of the Beloved of my soul; or I was brought in degree to experience that I came "for judgment into this world, that I might see that I might see; and that they which see might be made blind." I could no longer look upon my former delights with any satisfaction, but instead thereof had a glorious view of the beautiful situation of Mount Zion. My face was turned thitherward, and for the joy which was set before me, I was made willing to endure the cross of Christ and despise the shame; and though I became a wonder and a gazelock to my former companions, I did not much regard it, knowing I had just cause so to be. My great change struck them with some awe, or I observed they had not the boldness to mock or deride me before my face."

When First-day came the young man went to meeting, and it proved a memorable occasion. "We strangers who were present, spoke in the ministry, and their words seemed especially addressed to his state. "Now did I in some degree," he writes, "experience the substance of that was intended by the 'baptism of water unto repentance; the washing of water by the Word; and the being born of water and the Spirit.' All which would be fully seen and clearly understood by the professors of Christianity, were they rightly acquainted with the Gospel of Christ, 'which is the power of God unto salvation, [to every one that believeth.]" His power inwardly revealed, is alone able to work that change in them without which, our Lord saith, none shall so much as see the kingdom of God. But alas! being carnal in their minds, a spiritual religion doth not suit them; or as saith the Scripture, 'the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned.' Hence it is, that professors of the Christian name retain signs and shadows, whilst the substance is neglected; pleading for the continuance of types, when the anti-type is but too regarded. Where this latter is experienced, the shadows and types vanish and come to an end; as did the legal types, when Christ the Anti-type came and introduced His dispensation, which is altogether of a spiritual nature. . . .

"This administration of water by the Word continued in a remarkable manner upon me, for about three months, in which I found great satisfaction, as it was accompanied with an heavenly sweetness, my heart being balm to my wounded spirit; my like being melted before the Lord as wax is melted before the fire. Great was my delight in reading the Holy Scriptures and other good books; being favored at that time to receive much comfort and improvement thereby. But this easy, melting dispensation was to give way to a more powerful one, that the floor might be thoroughly purged, even the baptism with the Holy Ghost and with fire. For the former dispensation of the Lord to my soul seemed much to resemble John's baptism with water unto repentance, as being the real thing signified thereby in order to prepare the way of the Lord."

Under this fiery dispensation, he tells us, he was for a time greatly distressed, believing himself utterly forsaken. "All the former tenderness was gone, and I was as the parched ground." His mind was often beset with evil thoughts, but he was mercifully preserved from succumbing to them, though often apprehensive that he was not so earnest as he might have been in resisting them. "Very great," he says, "were my temptations, and deep my distress of mind, for about a year; in which time I was but as a little child in understanding the way and work of God upon me for my redemption. Yet He who will not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax, until He sends forth judgment unto victory, by his invisible power bore up my head above the raging waves of temptation so that the enemy found he could not overwhelm me therewith. The Lord taught my hands to war and my fingers to light under his banner through whose blessing and assistance I found some degree of victory over the beast, viz: that part which hath its life in fleshly gratifications."

But now the young man, though he could not be drawn into sensuality, was lured into a subtler error. So anxious was he to walk strictly according to the Divine Will and deny himself in all things inconsistent therewith, that he mistook certain of his own morbid imaginings for the Lord's voice, and fancied himself divinely commanded to refrain from some of the necessities of life, and to curtail his hours of natural rest. These unnatural mortifications of the flesh did not continue without attracting the sympathizing notice of his friends; and finally a ministering Friend of the meeting to which John belonged, was drawn to have some close conversation with him on the subject, and so laid bare the matter to the young man that his eyes were opened to the delusion. The experience was a useful one, for, as he says, "I then clearly saw that Satan in his religious appearances is carefully to be guarded against, as nothing in religion can be acceptable to God but the genuine product of his own unerring Spirit."

It was not long after this that John Griffith had a view that he should be called to the work of the ministry. Over the careless, self-indulgent, jest-loving youth a mighty change had come; "my mind," he says, "being at times wonderfully overshadowed with the universal love of God to mankind in the glorious Gospel of his Son, to such a degree that I thought I could, in the strength thereof, give up to spend and be spent for the gathering of souls to Him, the great Shepherd of Israel, and that I could lift up my voice like a trumpet to awaken the inhabitants of the earth. But I found all this was only by way of preparation for this important work, and that I had not yet received a commission to engage therein."

The lamb that had but lately strayed after the stranger, had now come to know better the voice of the true Shepherd, and waited to hear it. "A fear and care were upon my mind lest I should presume to enter upon this solemn undertaking without a right call; it appearing to me exceedingly dangerous, to speak in the name of the Lord without clear evidence in the mind that He required it of me, which I then fully believed He would do in his own time [and that] was to be waited for. From this time until I was really called into the work, I frequently had—especially in religious meetings—openings of Scripture passages, with lively operations of the Divine power in my mind; and sometimes with so much energy that I have been almost ready to offer to others what I had upon my mind. But as, through a holy awe which dwelt upon my heart, I endeavored to try my offering in the unerring balance of the sanctuary, I found it too light to be offered; and was thankful to the Lord for his merciful preservation in that I had been enabled to avoid offering the sacrifice of fools. But when the time really came that it was Divinely required of me, the evidence was so indisputably clear, that there was not the least room to doubt."

In his human weakness he was disobedient to the first call, but when the call was extended again at the following meeting he yielded. We have the record in his own words: "At the next First-day meeting, the heavenly power overshadowed me in a wonderful manner, in which it was required of me to kneel down in supplication to the Lord in a few words. I gave way thereto in the dread of his power with fear and trembling. After which my soul was filled with peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, and I could sing and make sweet melody in my heart to the Lord. As near as I remember, I was twenty-one years of age, the very day I first entered into this great and awful work of the ministry."

Thus was John Griffith preserved from falling into the pitfall of mistaking the day of his call; but now another danger awaited him. This is set forth in his journal:

"As I was enabled to wait on my ministry, I experienced a considerable growth and enlargement; and in a faithful discharge of duty therein, great peace and heavenly consolation like a pleasant refreshing stream, flowed into my soul. I also found that it was a means of engaging the minds of Friends in a sweet and comfortable nearness of unity with me, which I had never before so largely and lively felt. Many well-minded young people, and some others of little experience seemed to admire my gift, and would sometimes speak highly of it, which they did not always forbear in my hearing. . . . My judgment was against it; yet I found something in me that seemed to have no aversion thereto, but rather inclined to hearken to it, yet not with full approbation. The same thing in me would want to know what such-and-such (who were in most esteem for experience and wisdom) thought of me. I sometimes imagined such looked shy upon me, which would cast me down—all which, being from a rof of self, I found was for judgment and must die upon the cross before I was fit to be trusted with any great store of Gospel treasure.

"I began also to take rather too much delight myself in the gift; and had not Divine goodness in mercy, by a deep and distressing baptism, kindly prevented, this might have opened a door for spiritual pride, which is the worst kind of pride, to enter in, to my ruin. . . . In the midst of my high career, the Lord was pleased to take away from me for a time the gift of the ministry, and with all sensible comforts of the Spirit; so that I was, as I thought, in total darkness, even in the region and shadow of death.

"In this deplorable state of mind, I was grievously beset and tempted by the false prophet, the transformer, to keep up my credit in the ministry, by continuing my public appearances. It might well be said of him that he would 'cause fire to come down from heaven in the sight of men, to deceive them;' and so I found it." Sometimes the young man would be almost persuaded to rise and speak, but as he waited patiently he would find it was but his own imagination that moved him—like sparks that go out in the darkness—and he would keep silence. Thus for four or five months he continued in great distress. His friends, like Job's, had much to say, some conjecturing one thing and some another. But a better day was coming. "When my gracious Helper," says the journal, "saw my suffering was enough, He restored [my gift] again, and appeared to my soul as a clear morning without clouds; everlasting praises to his holy name! My mind was deeply bowed in humble thankfulness under a sense of the great favor of being again counted worthy to be intrusted with so precious a gift; therefore I was careful to exercise it in a great fear and awfulness, and more in a cross to my own will than before."

An especial purpose of this account has been to call the attention to two points which are characteristic of the views held by Friends touching Gospel ministry. First, that the inward opening of heavenly things, which are from time to time vouchsafed to every faithful follower of Christ who abides in Him, are not in themselves a call to the ministry. And secondly, after the real call has been received and known, it must not be assumed that this call is once for all, but that in the right exercise of the ministry a fresh baptism must attend each appearance, and be waited for.

John Griffith grew in his gift and in time became an instrument of power in the Lord's hands for the spread of his everlasting truth. That his subsequent service was blessed, was, we cannot but believe, largely due to his having learned these deep lessons at the very beginning of his Christian course, and faithfully observed them.

PEACE.—Henry VII. prefaced all his treaties with the words, "When Christ came into the world peace was sung, and when He went out of the world peace was bequeathed." Jesus said, "Blessed are the peace-makers, for they shall be called the children of God."

"If there is in the affairs of mortal men any one thing which is proper uniformly to explode, and incumbent on every man, by every lawful means, to avoid, to deprecate, to oppose, that one thing is, doubtless, war. There is nothing more unnaturally wicked, more productive of misery, more extensively destructive, more obstinate in mischief, more unworthy of man as formed by nature, much more of man professing Christianity."—Erasmus on War.

DIVINE LOVE.

BY THE LATE JOHN L. KITE, M. D.

There is a love that childhood knows,
While nestling on its mother's breast;
Increasing as love's fountain flows,
Replete with life, while thus caressed.

There is a love the mother feels,
While yearning o'er her precious child;
Which grows and strengthens as she seals
That love on lips which sweetly smiled.

This is a pure, parental love,
Which glows like summer's noontide hour;
An emanation from above,
Melling the heart beneath its power.

Love is a flower that women hide,
Yet nourish in their inmost breast;
In men it is an ocean tide,
Which bears them to earth's sweetest rest.

A love there is, that lengthens years
Of toil and sorrow learns to brave;
That sweetly dries the mutual tears
Of friendship, tottering to the grave.

There is a love true patriots feel,
Embracing all their fatherland;
Which seeks to bless the common weal;
Knits heart to heart, and hand to hand.

But what is childhood's lovely bud?
What woman's full, expanded flower?
Parent's warm glow, or husband's flood?
What friendship's tie? What patriots' power?

Compared with that Eternal Love,
That flows in one unvarying course;
The mercate Fountain above,
Supplying its unfailing source.

That Love, whose boundless breathing fills Creation's measureless expanse;
Beneath whose smile each creature thrills,
Warmed into being by its glance.

That Love which brought Immanuel down
To save from death a dying world;
To gather to his Father's crown,
What satan had to ruin hurled.

'Twas revelation's star that shined
In Bethlehem's Babe the Incarnate Word;
From heavenly hosts the anthem flowed,
Which hailed the birth of Christ the Lord.

In that still hour, when all was calm,
Night bidding earthly passions cease,
The watching shepherds heard the psalm,
Which ushered in the Prince of Peace.

Behold, on this auspicious morn,
Good tidings of great joy were heard;
For unto you this day is born
A Saviour, which is Christ, the Lord.

You'll find this Healer of man's woes,
His refuge from the power of sin,
Wrapped in an infant's swaddling clothes,
Laid in the manger of an inn.

Oh, matchless love! The blind, the lame,
To heal whose wounds that lady blest,
Physician, Saviour, Jesus came,
Without a place to lay his head.

Love's sympathetic garb He wore
Beside the grave where Lazarus slept;
The Jews this witness for Him bore,
"See how He loved!" when Jesus wept.

Again, when o'er Jerusalem
He grieved because He failed to bring
Her erring children home to Him,
Like birds beneath a parent's wing.

'Twas Love Divine that bore Him up,
Through years of ballasting and pain;
That made Him drain each bitter cup,
That man, lost Eden might regain.

No grander scene could earth afford,
Nor heaven diviner Love display,
Than was revealed when Christ the Lord
Gave for our sins his life away.

While foes their bitter scorn declare,
They found Him to love's mission true;
"Father, forgive them," was his prayer,
"For oh, they know not what they do."

The contrite malefactor's plea
Accepted was in sacrifice;
For Jesus answered "Thou shalt be To-day with me in Paradise."

"My God! My God! Oh, why hast thou Forsaken me," the Saviour cried;
These cruel nails, this bleeding brow,
The gushing waters from his side.

All these the Paschal Lamb endured;
For us a full atonement made;
Our pardon thus his blood secured,
He for our sins the ransom paid.

When stretched upon that bloody cross,
Immanuel yielded up his breath;
Earth trembly confessed its loss,
And open threw the gates of death.

For us He died that darkened day,
For us his precious blood was shed;
Love could alone such ransom pay—
A Saviour dying in our stead.

Dying, He triumphed o'er the grave;
"Thou'ld'st e'en from death his bitter sting;
And to his ransomed followers gave Salvation's hallowed song to sing.

"Praise to the Lord!" the anthem rung;
"The Lamb's redeemed us by his blood,
From every nation, kindred, tongue,
Made kings and priests unto our God."

Glory to God for sinners slain!
His are all riches, honor, might;
And his the power to rule and reign;
Let every creature own his right.

A vesture dip't in blood He wore,
And on his thigh the imprinted words;
His name and title thus He bears,
"The King of kings and Lord of lords.

Then to his gathered church He gave
A name descriptive of his love;
Bride of the Lamb, 'twas his to save,
That she might reign with Him above.

Bride of the Lamb, thy glories shine
Like jasper and like crystal clear;
On Zion's mountain it is thine,
In spotless garments to appear.

Thy wall heaven's jewelry displays;
Salvation was its name of old;
The pearly gates are gates of praise;
Thy streets are paved with burnished gold.

Tears can no more thy vision dim,
Nor sin thy happiness alloy;
God is in New Jerusalem,
The Fountain of eternal joy.

Forever clothed in linen white,
Around the throne each bears a palm;
Nor temple needs; no other light
Than God Almighty and the Lamb.

Proceeding from Jehovah's throne,
Flows out that pure and crystal river,
Whose living waters can alone
Preserve in health the soul forever.

The tree of life beside it seeth,
Casting its fruit each month around,
Its leaves a heavenly recipe
Are healing to the nations found.

The Spirit and the Bride say "Come,"
Let him who is thirsty repair;
The lame, the blind, the deaf, the dumb,
And life's sweet waters freely share.

Sheep among empty farms that roam,
On barren mountains, bleak and cold,
Will find when safely gathered home,
One Shepherd and one heavenly fold.

Then will all evil passions cease,
And e'en as in the realms above,
On earth will reign the Prince of Peace,
O'er one great family of love.

A Reminiscence.

In the course of my epistolary intercourse with Joseph Scattergood, one day, at the close of our week-day meeting, a friend put into my hand two letters. On reaching home, the one indorsed by an unknown scribe was opened and read. It proved to be from a man that had once lived neighbor to me, but was then on the frontiers, in the State of Kansas, and, in common with others, was suffering great destitution on account of failure of crops. He said he thought of me as being in a more favored place, and that, perhaps, I could collect and send them some aid. Wife and I thought the case a trying one, for our community had just been so thoroughly canvassed for a similar purpose, it was not likely that much, if any, could be raised, but concluded we must try.

The letter from Joseph Scattergood was opened and read, in which he asked me to inform him if I knew of any needing aid. Gentle reader, imagine our feelings when we realized that the hand of the Lord was in this thing, and we knew it not. I took from my Kansas letter suitable extracts, including a note expressive of my confidence in the honesty of the applicant, and forwarded them to J. Scattergood. In a few days I received in response a few lines, accompanied by his check for fifty dollars, to be forwarded to the suffering parties. My collections were not so much, but it did me good to have so kind and sympathizing a friend. The whole amount was forwarded, and in due time I received from Reuben Miller an account of its reception, and of the distribution of it among his needy neighbors, accompanied by their heartfelt gratitude to their unknown benefactors, a statement of which was forwarded Joseph Scattergood. But, as a personal friend of his once told me that he was very precise in his correspondence and business transactions, keeping a transcript of all, so, if any discrepancy should appear betwixt his account and this, I only can beg the clemency of the critic, having nothing to guide my pen but memory. As the name indicates, so tradition put it, that the family were inclined to do good, for my mother used to tell her children that when she was a very little girl, one Thomas Scattergood sometimes attended the meeting where she belonged, and his preaching so impressed her mind that she thought him well named—Scattergood. A mother's story is long remembered by her children, for she told us, too, that when she was a lass, and one day, standing before a glass, crimping and curling her hair, preparatory to going to meeting, her elder sister, with whom she lived, spoke advisory to her on the subject. Mother said her answer was, "Sister, unless He forbids it, I intend to wear my curls to-day just to my own mind." "And to meeting I went, completely suited with myself. But there was that nan, Scattergood. Presently he began to preach on the subject of decking and adorning, and finally spoke pointedly on the prevailing custom of curling the hair. My head," she said, "dropped pretty low, my fingers were moistened with the tears that flowed from my eyes, my curls were reached and straightened out as best I could get them, and I, left to realize that once I wore my curls to my mind, but I never wanted them more."

It is related of the late Daniel Millhouse, of Ponsville Monthly Meeting, Morgan County, Ohio, that many years ago, when engaged in farming, he had gone to the field and commenced ploughing, but had made but a few rounds when an impression was made on his mind that his proper business for the time was to go and take a quantity of flour to the home of a certain fatherless family some miles distant. The impression increasing in weight, he loosed his team from the plough, prepared the flour, and set off on his errand of mercy. On reaching the home of the family, the poor, disconsolate mother, overcome with gratitude, informed him that she had sent her children to school, and their scanty lunch basket contained all the available bread-stuff in her possession, and she knew not how to provide supper for them on their return. A friend in need is a friend indeed.

The Journal of the late Joseph Hoag is copious with evidence that he was remarkably gifted with a sense or sight of circumstances likely to happen. Of such the writer is cognizant of one not set down in the book. In the year 1841, as he and a companion were making the canvass of the Society of Friends in Eastern Ohio, on returning from a meeting which they had attended, several carriages being in company, some changing of places had been made to accommodate the inclination of the travellers for social and religious conversation. My mother was in the carriage with Joseph Hoag, seated on the back seat pleasantly engaged in conversation, when, of a sudden, Joseph desired the driver to stop, and let him and Debbie get out, for he apprehended danger near at hand. The lines-man, seeing nothing of the kind, continued to move on, till Joseph laid his hand on him, and, with almost commanding tone, said, "Job, thou must stop and let Debbie and me out of here," as if he felt it to be a dangerous place for them. The request was granted. The team had moved forward but a few steps, when the king-bolt of the carriage came apart, letting the front end of the box drop, with violence, to the ground, bruising the driver some, and it looked likely, had the old couple remained where they were, the consequence to them might have been serious. My mother frequently related this remarkable event with feelings of emotion. "The steps of a good man are ordered by the Lord."

[To the printed minutes of Kansas Yearly Meeting of Conservative Friends is appended the following epistle from our aged Friend, Huldah M. Beede.]

Penned for the Friends of Kansas Yearly Meeting, held at Emporia, Kansas.—Feeling, as to personal acquaintance an entire stranger, which does not prevent a living interest, an earnest solicitude on your behalf and for your prosperity in every way. Trusting it is in pure Gospel love you are brought near in my best feelings, in most tender sympathy.

A little portion of believers, earnestly desirous of living answerable to your high and holy profession, often feeling stripped and lonely—Oh, that it may drive closer to the Eternal Fountain, the Rock of Ages, that your abiding may be by the Saviour's side, low and humbly listening to hear his blessed words of reproof or teaching. It does call for much inwardness of mind to know the will of our blessed Lord; to be taught of Him; be guided by his unerring hand. Great indeed is the mystery of true godliness, and yet made clear to the seeking heart; as they are led into it, step by step, in dedicated obedience, the beauty of it cannot be told in words. With close adherence to the still, small voice, which teacheth as man never taught, it will lead to know and partake of that which satisfies the longings of an immortal soul—the excellence thereof felt and appreciated.

Despise not the day of fresh visitation. Dear young Friends, particularly would I beseech you to make a full surrender of the whole heart, Shriek not at the cross; despise not the day of small things; count nothing small that is manifest in the silence of all flesh, in the silent chamber of the inner part. To be faithful in little things is something great. It is a great advantage, dear Friends, crucifying that which ever stands opposed to entire dedication of heart—strengthening that which maketh for peace and righteousness.

Under a sense of unworthiness, dear Friends, it is a desire to extend a word of encouragement, realizing without the sure seal it will be valueless, or of no weight in your hearing. Deeply realizing the daily warfare that must be maintained against all hindering and besetting things, by which all are surrounded and have to war against in our daily walk. Dear Friends, you that have continued to love the ancient landmarks, have mourned the broken down walls, our lovely order and precious testimonies trampled upon as of no account, most deeply my tenderest sympathy greet you. Stand firm, remembering the eyes of the dear youth are watching your steps. Let circum-pection mark them in every particular; and, dear young Friends, the call hath been sounded within you again and again. Have you listened, being obedient to the heavenly call? Remember, precious chosen children, this call is all of unmerited mercy and love. Dear lambs, chosen for the fold, I beseech you, keep not the Beloved out until his head is wet with the dew and his glorious locks wet with the drops of the night. Your beloved fathers and mothers, bowed with weight, responsibility and care, are watching you with anxious hearts, needing your help to hold up, steadying their weary hands and comfort their drooping spirits.

Dear children, close in with offered mercy—defer no longer—deep regrets in the future, let me tell you, cannot make amends for present slighted favors. All hope better things of you—things pertaining to and accompanying your salvation. Oh, could I take each one of you by the hand and speak words that would stimulate and encourage to perseverance, and doubling of diligence to make your calling and election sure! I can do nothing of ourselves. I can only commend you unto God, who can give all things according to individual needs. Let brotherly love continue, and charity abound among you. Let your lights so shine that others, beholding, may come and glorify our blessed Lord. A day of mingled sadness, with discouraging appearances. Live to-day with the mind centered to the alone Head and Helper of his people. Do what is presented, leaving what is past, not attempting to scan the future; leaving all with the great I Am, who knoweth the end from the beginning—will turn and overturn, eventually bringing to pass his own gracious designs, causing the wrath of man to praise Him, who is ever alone worthy of all adoration and praise.

Trusting the foregoing lines have been penned in Gospel love and fellowship, that due allowance for age—ten years laid by with infirmities; hoping a charitable mantle may be over many mistakes covering all; while feeling this effort falls far short of justly conveying feelings of interest and earnest solicitude for your individual growth in the ever-blessed Truth—will feelingly bid you an affectionate farewell.

Your friend,

HULDAH M. BEEDE.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Friends' Freedmen's Association of Philadelphia.

The Board of Managers are glad to state that the present appointments at Christiansburg School, Va., have been wisely made, and the work there is meeting the expectations of Friends, as outlined at the last annual meeting of the Association. We hope during the present month of which due notice will be given to have the opportunity of hearing direct from Booker T. Washington, who then expects to be in Philadelphia, relative to the school now under his oversight, and the especial management of Charles L. Marshall, one of Hampton's graduates, who, also, has promised to be with us at our annual meeting in Fourth Month next, when he will state what has been accomplished during the past year under his charge, and his plans and hopes for the school's future. Our immediate anxiety is that the funds (two thousand dollars) promised him at the last annual meeting should be promptly subscribed. Thus far we have received only one-half that amount, and the salaries of the teachers are now due. Any contributions, large or small, will be gladly received by the treasurer, David A. Alsop, 409 Chestnut street.

The Industrial Department is getting in good working order, and will undoubtedly prove of great value to the people. We add a few extracts from letters lately received from Charles L. Marshall. "I want to thank you for having made it possible for our Blacksmithing Department to have such a rich donation as 1,000 pounds of iron and steel." Under date of Tenth Month 15th, 1890, "I find myself almost borne down by your kindness in sending to us such an excellent sewing machine and form for our sewing room. The girls of that department wish me to say to you that they are very thankful for your having made their chance here so rich." Eleventh Month 4th, 1890, "We are very much pleased with our Champion Forge, No. 14." Twelfth Month 10th, 1890, "We are moving on nicely, both in industrial and class room work, and I think the day is not far distant when our school will be, like Tuskegee, a blessing to the land." First Month 30th, 1891, "I am constantly in receipt of letters from people throughout this part of the State, rejoicing in the chance given colored boys and girls in the field of mechanical science." And again, "We have yet many urgent needs in order to make a good, fully developed industrial school, but we believe these will be forthcoming as soon as we are able to prove our needs real." Second Month 25th, 1891, "I have never witnessed, in all my life, such a growing interest in industry as is now true of the teachers and students of our school."

MARY PEILEY when in America on a religious visit, was led to labor with a young man at Boston, on his being likely to marry one of another Society. She says, "It arose in my heart, while we talked with him, that he was deeply tainted with deism, a disbeliever in the Scriptures, of the coming of Christ in the flesh, and his second appearance by his Spirit. I told him my opinion of his state, which he acknowledged to be true; he spoke in defense of his opinions. I told him the ground whence his unbelief sprung was leaning to his own understanding, and departing from the Light, which alone can convince of God and godliness."

There is much instruction in the remark of this deeply experienced Friend, that unbelief springs from dependence on one's own understanding, and departing from that spiritual Light which alone can unfold spiritual mysteries.

Letter from Germany.

ROSDORFERWE: Göttingen, Second Mo. 4th, '91.

At Goslar we visited the chapel, and saw the iron box containing the heart of Henry the IV., and from here descended into the semi-subterranean parts of the castle, which remain exactly in the same condition in which they were built, and where the retinue of the Kaisers were accommodated. Coming again into the open air, I took my seat on a stone bench in a remote corner of the grounds, and let my fancy have free play with the shades of the past all around, and the same sun, sinking to rest behind the mountains, that had shone on the comings out and goings in of those imperial heads so long ago. The twilight lasts so long in this northern latitude that I had still time to take an indirect course back to the hotel, hunting up more narrow streets and quaint, nodding houses.

At half-past seven the next morning I had finished my coffee and rolls, and spent the intervening hour and a half between this time and the hour when the Rathaus would be open, to take a long, last look at the most interesting objects that had attracted me the day before. Having climbed the Rathaus steps, and opened a massive door, I found myself in a low, old-fashioned room, with wooden benches ranged along the sides. Having secured a ticket by applying in an adjoining room, I seated myself upon one of the benches, until at last a man appeared and beckoned me to follow him. This I did, passing through a narrow entrance, and up a short flight of steps, and we came soon into the famous "Huhligung-zimmer," the wonder of the place. The decorations of this room date back to the fifteenth century to the time of Goslar's greatest glory as a member of the Hansa. The room is not large, but the walls and ceiling are a mass of paintings in bright colors, representing mostly Bible scenes. There is here a large collection of curiosities—wonderful silver work belonging to a very remote period, various manuscripts and objects belonging to Kaisers, priests and burgomasters that have figured in the history of Goslar. There was a sort of wooden cage there, which held exactly two persons, into which quarreling women used to be put, who, not able to endure one another's proximity at home, were forced to learn to do so in the public market place. Then there was a corner devoted to instruments of torture, but I could not look at them long.

I had, however, but little time to tarry. Hastening back to the hotel, I paid my bill, and, as the town clock struck half-past ten, I had just emerged from the shadow of the great gateway, and had set my face towards the south. Goslar lies on the northeastern side of the Harz, directly at the foot of the mountains, and Andreasberg at the top of almost the last range, to the south. It was over a nine-hours' steady walk, and the day was well in advance. At first the way skirted along the edge of the mountain, then turned into a valley that rapidly narrowed and ascended, becoming soon charmingly picturesque. There was much driving and much walking along the road up this beautiful Okertal ("thal" always means valley, Oker is the name of the stream, as it is one of the most visited regions in the Harz. Every short space was provided with a restaurant and garden, where one could quench thirst, and all such places were simply swarming with humanity. At Romkerhalle I made a little halt for at this place a very pretty water-fall came tumbling down some two hundred feet, and though to seat one's self at one of the many tables, temptingly placed at a proper distance to have a good view of the falls, meant to indulge in a drink, I was quite ready to partake of another glass of milk, and did so in the German fashion, sipping a little from time to time and taking my ease, as though that were the only thing I intended to do that day. When the glass was finally emptied, I started forward at this point leaving the main road, and following a narrow path that brought me at last, after constantly following the white arrows painted on the trees, to the Forsterei, situated at the top of the Ahrendsberg, about two thousand feet above the valley. Here I was to have dinner. It was served to me, under a tree, by the side of the road, but it did not hold me long. I took again my wanderer's staff, and, having inquired of the Forsterei the way to Torfhaus, my next halting-place, and having been told, I set off. For two hours the way was merely a sort of trail, with very little to mark it, so that more than once I was quite at a loss whether I was right or wrong, but I always came, in time, to something definite enough and, by regarding my map and the lay of the land, I arrived at last in the Chausee. How I enjoyed that walk over this unused path. It led along a high ridge, often through the woods, but with frequent views or all sides, and always the Brocken straight ahead.

It gives a veritable shock, after an hour or two of such wandering, to come back to an ordinary, dusty road, the sight of weary pedestrians, and, above all, to one's own prosaic self. On taking a turn in the road, I found myself at Torfhaus, the starting-point for the ascent of the Brocken on this side. It was a charming little hotel, with the mountain right in front, and a glimpse, through a valley, of the misty plain beyond, in the distance.

For a long while I had been thinking about this hotel, and when the waiter asked me "Grosse oder kleine tasse?" "Grosse," I said with emphasis. It was brought to me in a little summer-house overlooking this charming view.

Of course you have heard of the "Spectre of the Brocken." The story of that rock, casting shadow like a man, formed a very vivid picture on my youthful mind. The mountain made no impression upon me. I do not even think I knew it was a mountain, but I saw there always that giant, casting his shadow, whichever way the sun happened to be, on all sides of him. I need not tell you that the top looks just as round and smooth, from a little distance, as though there were no stones on his fat old sides. I believe there is, however, some foundation for the story. When the sun is just setting and then happens to be clouds in the right position in the valley—of course it must be a certain time of year, as well, when the sun is in the proper part of the heavens—then there is a rock, whose shadow, caught on the clouds, is like that of a giant head. I don't know who ever got all those proper conditions together, and saw the specter there, but I suppose some one has. But in Germany no one seems to know much about it.

From Torfhaus there was quite a stretch to the reservoir which supplies the mines of Andreasberg, which are worked by hydraulic power, with water. On the other side of this artificial lake, I left the main road again, and allowed the course of the "Raybergergraben," which is a most romantic stone-formed ditch, which carries the water along the side of the mountain, at a good elevation, with charming views through a valley, whose sides are almost steep enough to form a cañon of the plains that is south of the Harz. This two or three miles roadway is the most picturesque of anything I have seen in the Harz. At last the ditch disappeared in a mountain, and I, not being able to follow, climbed the steep side, and came, at last, where I could look down upon Andreasburg. It was already past sunset, but still quite bright. The rest of the way, being all down grade, made at a very rapid pace, and arrived about nine o'clock at the Osterer.

What One New England Girl Did.

BY HELEN MARSHALL NORTH.

In a tiny farm-house on one of the brightest and holdest hills of western Massachusetts there was born, one hundred years ago last month, a little New England girl, whose name is known in all parts of the world where Christian education is honored, and whose influence will cease only with eternity itself.

I think that no New England girl of that day had fewer external advantages to help her on to fame and influence than had the little Mary Lyon. The farm on this story hill-side in Buckland, and the very small house that sheltered her parents and seven children, were the sole patrimony of good Aaron Lyon, the father. They lived miles away from the churches and schools of Buckland and Ashfield. There was little money to spend on anything but the necessities of life, though always a portion for a poorer neighbor.

"The children of that household never thought of being dependent or depressed, they felt that their father had laid up for them rich store in grateful hearts and among the treasures which will never decay; and that their mother, who was considered in that neighborhood a sort of presiding angel of good works, as continually adding to those stores. I can now remember just the appearance of that neighbor who had a numerous household to clothe, as he said, one day. 'How is it that Mrs. Lyon can do more for me than anyone else?'"

There was, indeed, great store of health, of right spirits, of affection for each other, and of love and reverence for the highest things of life that little mountain home—a godly heritage.

Mary grew up, a sweet, healthy girl, with real masses of reddish gold hair, cheeks like roses, and enough energy and perseverance to fit out two or three girls. She walked patiently, sometimes a mile, sometimes two or three, one or another of the district school-houses in the vicinity, situated in the loveliest woods of all New England. The site of one of these, which must, I think, have been the very first that she attended, reminds one of the "Drum-chy" school-house in which "Domie" taught Georgie Howe."

Very near the picturesque little farm-house began the ascent of "Put's Hill," from which glorious view of all the country for miles and miles around was to be obtained. Even the tops of the Berkshires seemed at its feet. Here Mary loved to come to gaze on the lovely mountain tops, and dream of what lay beyond the hills. And to me it has always seemed that this road outlook may have inspired, or at least quickened, that feeling of good-will to all the world which was the dominating trait in her character in after years.

After a time, the mother was left a widow, and Mary had gathered all the learning offered in the little district, and was ardently longing for Latin and the higher English branches. A generous old gentleman of Ashfield, Esquire White, discovered her wonderful ability, and opened for her a way, though not by charity, to the Sanderson Academy, in his own town, and later to the then famous seminary at Byfield, near Newburyport.

The story of how Mary Lyon studied at these schools is so fascinating that one longs for a fuller record of these years. Like Napoleon, she often allowed herself only four hours of sleep out of the twenty-four, and the least possible time at table, in order that she might improve every minute in study. "Mary is gathering knowledge by handfuls," wrote her room-mate.

When she first entered Sanderson Academy, she was unusually shy and awkward, and the principal expressed a fear that the students would laugh at her appearance. "They will not laugh long," replied her staunch friend, Esquire White.

The students did notice, with some amusement, the eager, absent-minded girl, whose fine head was crowned by a great mass of bright hair, and whose plain dress of indigo-blue was not bluer than her eyes. But she seemed to see no one, and to think only of the great pile of books under her arm.

When she first took her place in the Latin class the scholars wondered what she would do. And when she recited, first, all the declensions of nouns, then of adjectives and of pronouns, and, to the amazement of her teacher, Elisha Burritt, began on the verbs, every scholar in the room ceased studying to listen, and no one laughed again. Within a week (some accounts say within three days) Mary Lyon had committed to memory and recited the entire Latin grammar (Adams'). When, in later years, some one asked her if it was really true that she had done this, she said, "I traced out the likenesses and differences among the declensions and conjugations, and could commit anything to memory quickly when I was young; and as to the rules of syntax, they are so much like those in English grammar that it did not take long to learn them. So, you see, it was no great feat after all."

In these schools she was much loved for her thoughtfulness and unselfishness. When it was suggested to her that another wished the seat that she was occupying, she hastened to her at once, and said, "Do take my place if you like it better than your own. It does not matter where I sit."

Mary Lyon's life was only fifty-two years long. After she left the Byfield Seminary, and even before this, she taught in district and "select" schools in western Massachusetts, always giving of her best, and so impressing the highest principles of intellectual and spiritual life upon her pupils that they never forgot it them. School committees waited to get her pupils for teachers, and every one recognized the value of her instructions. All along the years she snatched opportunities for study. One winter she had a delightful season of study in geology in the family of an Amherst professor whose wife taught her drawing and painting. A term at the Troy Polytechnic was a rare treat to her, but the college course for which she longed was not at that time open to women.

In Londonderry, N. H., and at Ipswich, Mass.,

Mary Lyon taught in academies for women, and here, as elsewhere, it was her ardent desire to make of each pupil a strong, noble worker in the world's great field. Children's children will not forget the influence of her example. But Mary Lyon longed to establish a permanent school for girls, at moderate cost, in which the highest intellectual culture should be matched by the highest spiritual culture. And in 1834, being almost without means or social influence, and with the public sentiment strongly opposed to the higher education of women, she gave up teaching in order to complete and bring to fulfillment her plans for that ideal institution which found its embodiment in Mount Holyoke Seminary—now, and for some years, Mount Holyoke College—in South Hadley, Mass.

With few who had faith in her ideas, and only here and there a friendly hand to aid her, Mary Lyon, now thirty-seven years old, went throughout the State of Massachusetts, seeking means and friends for the enterprise on which she believed the future welfare of hundreds of young women depended. She longed to establish a college with a course like that of Yale and Harvard and Amherst, and from her experience in teaching young women, she saw no reason why the higher branches were not possible for them. But no trustees could be found to sanction so bold a plan, and she had to be content with a seminary course. Even then, one trustee, of honored name, withdrew his influence, we are told, because connection with the project threatened to make him unpopular.

At length, after long struggles, many prayers and many tears, the money was collected for the first building, and on a fine October day in 1835 was laid the cornerstone of that building, known for years, after other buildings had grown up about it, as the Main Building, and in the fall of 1836 destroyed by fire. Twice the wall-fell, and there were many discouragements to meet. Mary Lyon lived nearby, and personally superintended the building.

The school was to open Eleventh Month 8th, 1837. Miss Lyon wrote to a friend, "When I look through to November 8th, it seems like looking down a precipice of many hundred feet, which I must descend. I can only avoid looking at the bottom, and fix my eye on the nearest stone till I have safely reached it."

The story of the success, immediate and lasting, of Mount Holyoke Seminary is well known. For twelve years, Mary Lyon's bright spirit upheld its interests. Many graduates went out as missionaries, with her loving counsels ringing in their ears. Many went out as teachers under the spell of her advice to seek those places which were considered undesirable by others, and there find their mission. Many found homes of their own, and taught to sons and daughters those principles of high living and pure thinking which they had learned of Mary Lyon.

So it came about that this little New England girl from the tiny farm house on the Massachusetts hills became a guiding power in the world. And to-day, as one looks out from the bold hill-top which she loved, strays by the wild little brook which was dear to her, and listens to the bird song in the romantic spot of her birth, he feels quite sure that nothing in the world brings a sweeter reward than a life spent in loving care for others.—Christian Advocate.

My eye is for humility and wisdom, that I may be mercifully preserved from falling, and that I may not be tempted to exceed the life and authority of Truth. I know of nothing more excellent, nor more desirable, than the living virtue of it, qualifying our spirits and enabling us to move in the Lord's work. I wish it, above all things, for ourselves. I wish it, above all things, for our children, that they, as well as we, may surrender themselves at the Great Captain's discretion, make no terms of capitulation in yielding up the citadel of their hearts, only that life, spiritual life, may be granted them, that they may be taken into the service of the Lord. There is no other service which is attended with such advantages. There is safety and protection in it from the usurpation of other lords, which have had dominion. There is maintenance, clothing and pay. There is honor, dignity and immortal glory. All these blessed privileges and rewards are involved in this important cause. I heartily desire that our children's obedience in all things may keep pace with the knowledge communicated to them. "Hear and obey, and your souls shall live," is worthy of all acceptance. First, to be diligent in waiting, in order to hear the still, small voice, which is of private interpretation to our several states individually. Next to obey, in submission and faithfulness, the discoveries of the Divine will in the jobs and titles, as well as the weightier parts of the law.—Richard Shaubleton, 1784.

A postal card from our friend Thomas C. Battey, informs that the name of the young Indian, a nephew of Black Beaver, who, as mentioned in the article on "The Penn Parchment," in THE FRIEND of First Month 30th, perished in the flames of the Wichita school-house was "Soldier," not an uncommon name among the Indians. He was not a soldier, but a student in the school.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Fifty-fourth Congress expired by limitation at noon on the 4th inst. The two Houses could not agree on the General Deficiency Bill, and the measure was not passed. The President did not approve the Sundry Civil, Indian and Agricultural Appropriation bills, which thus failed. The Arbitration Treaty failed to pass the Senate.

In vetoing the Immigration bill, President Cleveland says: "In my opinion it is infinitely more safe to admit a hundred thousand immigrants who, though unable to read and write, seek among us only a home and opportunity to work, than to admit one of those voracious agitators and enemies of governmental control who cannot only read and write, but delight in arguing by inflammatory speech the illiterate and peacefully inclined to discount and tumult. Violence and disorder do not originate with illiterate laborers. They are rather the victims of the educated agitator."

William McKinley, of Ohio, was inaugurated as President of the United States at 12 o'clock M. on the 4th inst. The oath of office was administered to him by Chief Justice Fuller, of the United States Supreme Court, on the east terrace of the Capitol, in the presence of a great multitude. A few minutes later President McKinley, with bare head, read his inaugural address from manuscript. Vice President Hobart took the oath of office in the Senate Chamber, and delivered an introductory address.

President McKinley urges monetary reforms; economy in public expenditures at present; the provision of more revenue by a conservative tariff bill, and strongly indorses the Arbitration Treaty.

Those desiring to resign offices were promptly examined by the Senate: Secretary of State, John Sherman, of Ohio; Secretary of the Treasury, Lyman J. Gage, of Illinois; Secretary of War, Russell A. Alger, of Michigan; Attorney General, Joseph McKenna, of California; Postmaster General, James A. Gary, of Maryland; Secretary of the Navy, John D. Long, of Massachusetts; Secretary of the Interior, Coville N. Bliss, of New York; Secretary of Agriculture, James Wilson, of Iowa.

The Governor of Kentucky has appointed Major A. T. Wood, of Mount Sterling, United States Senator, to succeed Blackburn. The Governor also issued a proclamation calling an extra session of the Legislature Third Month 15th, to elect a Senator for the full term. John A. Henderson, of Tallahassee, Vice President of the Florida Central and Peninsular Railroad, has been appointed an interim United States Senator by Governor Bloxham, to fill the vacancy caused by the expiration of Senator Call's term.

The Governor has also ordered by appointment H. W. Corbett to the United States Senate, to succeed Senator Mitchell. Corbett was Senator from Oregon from 1866 to 1872.

The President issued a proclamation on the 6th inst. calling an extra session of Congress on Third Month 15th, "to receive such communications as may be made by the Executive."

The enormous strength of the gold reserve of the country is shown in the fact that in New York the banks hold nearly $51,000,000 gold, and the Treasury "free gold balance" over all obligations now reaches almost $15,000,000.

A cotton mill company, to be operated entirely by colored labor, has been organized at Concord, North Carolina.

The Council of the American Geographical Society at New York has approved the project of Polar exploration laid before it by Civil Engineer R. E. Peary, U. S. N., and will subscribe toward the expense.

A severe shock of earthquake occurred in the vicinity of Niagara Falls on the night of the 6th inst.

An Indianapolis dispatch says that, as a result of last week's rain in Central Ohio and Southern Indiana, 113 bridges and trestles over rivers and creeks were washed away.

On the 2d instant the large power-house of the Union Traction Company, at Third and Mount Vernon Streets, was destroyed by a fire that was started, it is thought, by the chain of a travelling crane touching the armature of a generator. The roar of steam escaping from a bursted supply pipe caused a stampede of spectators and frightened the horses attached to a chemical engine, which knocked down and injured a number of persons. About a dozen lines of street cars were blocked for almost four hours. The loss on buildings and machinery is placed at $400,000.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 537, which is 17 less than the previous week, and 3 less than the corresponding week of 1896. (Of the foregoing, 208 females and 269 males; 109 died of pneumonia; 63 of diphtheria; 22 of old age; 17 of convulsions; 13 of scarlet fever; 15 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of inanition; 11 of bronchitis; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of whooping cough, and 9 of peritonitis.)

HOGS.—A terrific anthracite gale prevailed last week about the coasts and in the interior of England. The damage to vessels and harbor works has been great.

The collective note presented to the Porte by the Powers mentions the gradual withdrawal of the Turkish troops from Crete, and suggests a military convention between the Powers and the Porte for the settlement of details. The reply of the Porte to the collective note of the Powers regarding the granting of autonomy to Crete has been received by the diplomats in Constantinople. The Porte assents to the terms of the Powers.

Greece is prepared to recognize the temporary suzerainty of the Sultan, to withdraw her fleet completely, and to place the Greek army in command of any military representative of the Powers senior in rank to Colonel Vassos, for restoring order in the island, if the Powers agree with ultimately to leave the decision as to the fate of Crete in the hands of the people. The reply of Greece to the demands of the Powers is not satisfactory, and Germany and Russia have signified their approval of an immediate blockade of the Greek and Cretan coasts.

The English Anti-Tobacco League, after an existence of twenty-six years, during which it has published books and pamphlets and a million leaflets, all setting forth the evils of tobacco, have been distrusted, if forced to admit that the use of tobacco is increasing, and the Vice-President of the League concludes that it is impossible to cure an adult smoker.

The reports of the health authorities show that since the beginning of the bubonic plague in Bombay, the present time there have been 8,283 cases and 6,973 deaths from the disease.

The authorities in Cairo, Egypt, have given a permit for a horse-car line to the Pyramids.

The schooner Vine has arrived at San Francisco from the South Sea, bringing news of the massacre of a dozen or more of a party of Japanese traders by natives of the Bok Islands, a part of the Caroline group. The surviving Japanese traders have asked their Government to send a war vessel to subjugate the islands, although the latter are Spanish possessions.

A despatch of the 2d instant from Toronto to the N. Y. Voice says, "Notwithstanding the government promised to respect the wishes of the people, and grant a prohibition plebiscite, a license bill outrageously favorable to the liquor men has been introduced in Parliament. An emergency Prohibition convention has been called, to meet in this city March 11th to protest against the pending bill. Indignation meetings are being held throughout the province of Ontario."

1878.—Third Month 28th.—She writes, "Yesterday, as I sat sewing, I found for the last ten minutes or so, I had been in-sensibly saying,

"My soul, 'e'en as an infant keep,
That knows its parent's voice," and it seems so sweet and led me to think more about it. Is it not just what we would expect—just that child-like trust and leading and allowing—so quiet, so restful, knowing the Father is watching over all evil and will avert it from his tender little ones. . . . I dined with

W. K. last First-day, and she read me one of her sermons of Elizabeth Evans, Sr., in which she spoke of Micah and his altar and his hired rest, and how the enemy came and took them all away, and he benoaned himself, comparing it with Habakuk where he says, "Although the fig-tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines; the labor of the olive shall fail, and the field shall yield no meat; the flock shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stalls; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my salvation," he thought there was a striking difference between the two men. One had hired outward ministry; the other had the living spring in himself."

Eleventh Month 28th.—She writes, "Immediately after our Quarterly Meeting on Third-day morning I went to Trenton, where I met S. A., and we attended Monthly Meeting. This was not so lively as I had expected. Dear S.—was much favored, I think. H. Wood said a little. His brother George and wife were here from Western New York and seemed like very solid Friends, elders, and sat with us in Select Meeting in the afternoon. . . . John

S. Comfort came next morning.—Fourth-day—prepared with two horses and comfortable carriage to take us to Mansfield Meeting—twelve miles—and we were off by half-past seven o'clock, finding pretty cold riding. How often I thought of our ancient Friends, having no other means of conveyance than carriages on those long journeys; how much they must have suffered. We, in these times, have everything so comfortable, that I fear we slacken our zeal, and are not the lively people the Lord once sav-us to be. If Trenton disappointed us with the feeling that the people allowed the ministers to dig and beg for them and earn their daily bread, sitting listless in measure, Mansfield gave us surprise in the other direction. R—was here, greatly favored, I thought, in Monthly Meeting, and in the Select Meeting held in an invalid's house, we seemed brought into one bundle of life. . . . We took tea, both at Trenton and Columbus, with young people. Oh, how I love to gather them in! We went to Burlington; stopped at Robert Thomas'. What a sweet spirited, redeemed man he seemed to be. Here we attended Monthly and Select Meetings, very small.

"Last Second-day morning I started again for Burlington alone, A. Hutchinson being sick. She was my proper companion, but being poorly, I wrote for R. S. A., and would have written again had I realized how lonely I should feel. Select Meeting on Second-day morning—nothing very weighty, only our poverty to boast of. In the Quarter, E. Sharpless and E. S. were good, and D. Thomas in supplication.

"Thy poor friend spoke in second meeting; referred to the language, 'Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou Son of Jesse,' and too, the belief there were those present who were pressing to his feet with this feeling—encouraging to faithfulness, to sitting alone and keeping silence, putting the mouth in the dust, if so be, there may be hope; closing with the words given to me at the moment, 'So will He get to himself, honor to his own great Name, and others through our faithfulness be brought to serve Him also.'"

1879.—Third Month 1st.—On the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth (of last year), I visited Burlington Meeting with R. S. A. At our last Select Quarterly Meeting a committee was appointed to visit the Select Preparative and Select Quarterly Meetings. I have been to Bucks, Salem and Burlington, and we have now about completed the work. Faint, yet persevering, seems applicable in some places and a great want of zeal in others.

Letter dated Fourth Month 1st, 1879, after speaking of the health of a friend, she says, "Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication, with thanksgiving let your request be made known unto God. "And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall keep your hearts and minds through Christ Jesus"—my precious favorite text! Ah, this quiet, secret, fervent, real prayer is what is wanted amongst us a people, to make us fruit-bearing branches. We are too easy, willing in many places to slip along and let the heritage of God be waste, not only in our own hearts, but in the hearts of others. I hope, after this baptism, to be filled with more zeal. Dear Clarkson Sheppard was so earnest with us at one of our Select Committee Meetings, and it seemed as though I could hear his voice ringing through that piece in THE FRIEND last week, viz: 'Thoughts and Feelings,' 'Days of Famine,' Did he write it? Do you know? Again and again the sound of his voice seemed fading away on my ear through it. How could we part with such a bright and shining light? But in Burlington the absence of our valued Robert Thomas brought again to mind these two verses:

"What! when a Paul has run his course,
Or when Apollus dies,
Is Israel left without resource?
And have we no supplies?"

Yes, while the dear Redeemer lives,
We have a bountiful store;
And shall be fed with what He gives,
Who lives forever more!

"This was repeated, I believe, by E. Evans, Sr., at the funeral of Esther Collins."

Alluding to the death of a little son of M. and W. McCallin, she writes:

"We are all bending to our affliction, and endeavoring to feel the pure language, 'Thy will be done.' This dear little boy was interred last Seventh-day afternoon—a large funeral. His sweet little spirit will be long remembered and we hope it (the affliction), will be sanctified to us all, and that we shall all learn our lesson from it."

From a letter dated Fifth Month 22nd, 1879: "These bright days are so invigorating. The flowers were very much admired and continued opening (some of them), for two or three days. What beautiful gifts are they to us by a gracious Creator, who might have made all the fruitfulness without any of these bright colors and lovely arrangement of shades, and He has given us an eye, too, and taste to enjoy them, all showing his goodness to man, for none of the brute creation seem to appreciate their beauty—they only seek the field for their food. Surely man was created a little lower than the angels on purpose for his glory. How pleasant it is to think of your meeting now; there seems such a change to have come over it. I trust you have some more precious plants ripening into maturity, and that nursing fathers and mothers in the church in your parish will see of the travail of their soul and be satisfied 'er they go hence.

"Is it not such a mercy that the Lord has called us out of the world and spirit to be separate unto Him and gives unto us foretastes of his goodness even now, in heavenly places, in Christ Jesus."

Sixth Mo. 15th, 1879, she writes to a friend who has long been an invalid:

"Sometimes in looking back over thy life, it seems wonderful to me to think of how much suffering thou hast had. It is not one thing it has been another to call forth the sympathies of those who love thee. Did thou ever think that it might in measure be intended for our help and instruction too, that we might see how puny are all our powers, and how dependent upon his will and blessing. It seems so much thy mind to look upon all the chastenings for thyself alone, that I am afraid it may depress thee at times. 'His ways are not our ways, nor his thoughts our thoughts,' and if we endeavor to dwell in the sweetness of 'Thy will be done,' committing all unto Him as little children, we shall catch some of the peace promised to those who are 'not weary in well doing.' So, my dear, be not weary, for though the basket has suffered here, yet I trust the pure pearl of life-Divine is bright within and will shine with everlasting lustre. 'He knoweth them that are his.'

Tenth Mo. 12th.—[Letter:]—"How much we could find to 'joy about' if we are only seeking a thankful heart, and living in that state that refers everything to the will of our Divine Master, we know He will do the best for us.

"We do have some such good meetings! Last First-day S. F. Balderston spoke on conscience, referring to Wm. Penn's letter, saying, 'Son William, never do anything to wrong your conscience.' It was just the kind of sermon to make deep impression on the young. He spoke of William Penn's writing: 'No Cross, No Crown,' in prison at the age of twenty-four years, recommending its perusal with other Friends' writings to the young.

"I have such a delightful little school—about seventeen at present and more to come in, and we are getting along so nicely, but I rejoice with trembling, knowing that safety consists in being on the watch, therefore with hearts lifted up, let us pursue our daily course, taking heed while we think we stand."

Again, "Oh, my dear, I feel as if I had been in the Master's hand; had been passing through so much, but want to be kept very humble. He is Light, and in Him is no darkness at all. This is a comfort, and He will give us of his blessed Light in his own good time. I trust the closed heavens to thee have resulted in soul refreshing dew ever this. He is good. The Lord is good, and his tender mercies are over all his works. 'We can glorify Him, even in the fires' (Isaiah xxiv: 13). He would have us steady and confident, watchful and prayerful."

WHAT CAME OF ONE WOMAN'S PRAYERS.

—Sometime in the last century, a poor woman in England, of whom the world knows but little, had a son, and she poured out her prayers and her tears for his conversion. But he grew up reckless and dissipated and profane. He engaged in the slave trade on the coast of Africa, and was perhaps as hopelessly abandoned as any pirate who ever trod the deck of a slave trader. But at last when all hope had nearly expired, his mother's ceaseless prayers were answered. He was converted and finally became one of the most eminent ministers in London. That man was the celebrated John Newton.

John Newton, in turn, was the instrument in opening the eyes of that moralist and skeptic, Thomas Scott, afterwards the distinguished author of the commentary of the Bible. Thus, Scott had in his parish a young man of the most delicate sensibilities, and whose soul was "touched with the finest issues," but he was dyspeptic, and sorrowful, and despairing. At times he believed there was no hope for him. After long and repeated efforts Dr. Scott persuaded him to change the course of his life. That young man was William Cowper, the household Christian poet.

Among others whom he influenced to turn from the "broad road" was Wm. Willerforce, a distinguished member of the British Parliament, the great philanthropist who gave the death blow to the slave trade in Great Britain. Willerforce brought Leigh Richmond to see the "better way," who wrote the "Dairyman's Daughter," which has been read with the devoutest gratitude through blinding tears in many languages all over the earth. All this indescribable amount of good, can be traced back to the fidelity of the prayers of John Newton's mother, that humble, unheralded woman, whose history is almost unknown.—Selected.

Boy's Brigades.

"Almost a Tragedy—Boy Soldier's Bad Shot in Mimic War—Just Missed a Lady—Bullet Crashed Through a Window Where She Sat."

Above are the head-lines of a news article in a recent daily paper. The incident to which they refer occurred at Bayonne, N. J., and is reported under date of Second Month 23rd, 1897. The article says:

"The members of the Brigade are the sons of members of the First Reformed Church, and range in age from fourteen to eighteen years.

"They have been organized several years, wear a military uniform, and are drilled in military tactics in the basement of the First Reformed Church or at the club rooms of the Bayonne Boat Club, on Thirty-fourth Street, by Captain Van Buskirk, a war veteran.

"At first the lads drilled with wooden guns, but these were not sufficiently real, and, after some hesitation, the church officials secured old-fashioned, muzzle-loading Springfield rifles.

"Some member or members whose names are not known, chanced one day to find some cartridges that would fit the guns, and, on the night of the shooting, after a drill, the lads started out with their guns to see how much noise they would make.

"Most of them had been fired with a burning desire to be called to their country's defence in a war with Spain, and that night it was decided to pepper away at a certain mark on Thirty-fourth Street, and pretend it was General Weyler and their intrepid patriots of Gomez's army. They first awoke the neighborhood with some random shots that did no damage, and then Private Hamilton squared off and banged away at the wretched and craven Spanish commander, whom they had condemned to death for his atrocities.

"Hamilton took careful aim, pulled the trigger, and the bullet went clear through the walls of a residence being erected by Edward Smith, on Thirty-fourth Street, and lodged in the Is-bell's house. There was a scattering of Brigade boys that looked like a very undisciplined retreat."

Although one narrowly escaped, fortunately no life was lost nor body maimed by these young soldiers, who were being trained for the army of the "Prince of Peace." That the "Boys' Brigades" foster in the boys a military spirit, has been one of the strongest objections urged against them, but the defenders of the movement have often denied the fact. This news-clipping ought to be sufficient to convince any unprejudiced mind of the correctness of the charge. Most of these boys (one of whom came near taking a human life) "had been fired with a burning desire to be called to their country's defence in a war with Spain," and pretended that the object at which they were firing "was General Weyler, and their intrepid patriots of Gomez's army."

That a degree, although an imperfect one, of physical culture and development, may be obtained in the exercise of the military drill, is not denied, but it is contended that a more perfect development may be obtained in other equally entertaining exercises, which have no connection with the deadly arts of war, and will not suggest the taking of human lives.

The principal object sought to be obtained in the Boys' Brigades, after that of arousing an interest in Bible study, is discipline—teaching the boy obedience and submission to authority. It is freely admitted that this should be learned by every child—but long before reaching an age at which muskets or rifles can be handled. It is the infant, before reason asserts itself, and no the youth, who needs to be taught unquestioning obedience. Military obedience can only be right in children. To those who have become conscious of the obligations imposed by the moral sense—the sense of right and wrong—unquestioning obedience to a mortal is wrong. A youth who is old enough to handle a rifle, should long ago have learned the lesson of obedience to having a moral right to command him; and if he has not done so, we may well question the ability of a military school, like the Boys' Brigade, to teach him this lesson.

Would not He who said to one of his disciples, "Put up again thy sword into his place for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword," say to the Boys' Brigade "Put up your rifles. Seek physical development in the arts of peace, not those of war."

William Penn's Appeal.

In compliance with the suggestion of a Friend in Ohio, we have concluded to republish THE FRIEND a portion of the preface to George Fox's Journal, written by William Penn. Very instructive is his concern, that those who have been furnished with a gift in the ministry should be careful to exercise it in the ability which God giveth, and that they should be earnestly performing whatever duties are Divinely required. How lively is the concern expressed for the children of God's people, "Often are my knees bowed to the God of your fathers for you, that you may come to be partakers of the same Divine life and power that has been thine glory of this day," etc.

May the reading of the concern of our honored Friend be instrumental in awakening or reviving a similar feeling in the minds of many so that Friends of this age may not only rejoice in the worthiness of their forefathers, but in the evidence that the same living zeal animate many of their successors.

"And now, Friends, you that profess to walk in the way this blessed man was sent of God to turn us into, suffer I beseech you the word of exhortation, as well fathers as children, as elders as young men. The glory of this day and foundation of the hope that has not mad us ashamed since we were a people, you know is that blessed principle of light and life of Christ, which we profess, and direct all people to, as the great instrument and agent of man's conversion to God; it was by this we were first touched, and effectually enlightened, as to our inward state; which put us upon the consideration of our latter end, causing us to set before the Lord before our eyes, and to number our days that we might apply our hearts to wisdom. It that day we judged not after the sight of the eye, or after the hearing of the ear, but according to the light and sense this blessed principle gave us; we judged and acted in reference to ings and persons, ourselves and others, ye, towards God our Maker. For being quickened y in our inward man, we could easily discern the difference of things, and feel what was right, and what was wrong, and what was fit, and what not, both in reference to religion and vil concerns. That being the ground of the blessing of all saints, it was in that our fellowship stood. In this we desired to have a use one of another, acted towards one another ad all men in love, faithfulness, and fear.

"In the feeling of the motions of this principle we drew near to the Lord, and waited to a prepared by it, that we might feel those rawings and movings, before we approached the Lord in prayer, or opened our mouths in ministry. And in our beginning and ending ith this, stood our comfort, service and edification. And as we ran faster, or fell short, we ade burthens for ourselves to bear; our services finding in ourselves a rebuke, instead of a acceptance; and in lieu of 'Well done, 'ho hath required this at your hands?' In at day we were an exercised people, our very unpenances and deportment declared it.

"Care for others was then much upon us, as all as for ourselves, especially the young coniced. Often had we the burthen of the word 'the Lord to our neighbors, relations, acquaintance, and sometimes strangers also; we were ; travail for one another's preservation; not eking, but shunning occasions of any coldness ; misunderstanding, treating one another as ose that believed and felt God present; which ept our conversation innocent, serious and ightly, guarding ourselves against the cares nd friendships of the world. We held the uth in the Spirit of it, and not in our own irits, or after our own will and affections. hey were bowed and brought into subjection, asomuch that it was visible to them that knew s, we did not think ourselves at our own disal to go where we list, or say or do what we st, or when we list. Our liberty stood in the erty of the Spirit of Truth; and no pleasure, o profit, no fear, no favor could draw us from is retired, strict and watchful frame. We ere so far from seeking occasions of company at we avoided them what we could, pursuing ur own business with moderation, instead of eddling with other people's unnecessarily.

"Our words were few and savory, our looks mposed and weighty, and our whole deportment very observable. True it is, that this stired and strict sort of life from the liberty f the conversation of the world, exposed us to ce censures of many, as humorists, conceited, nd self-righteous persons, etc. But it was our reservation from many snares to which others ere continually exposed by the prevalency of he lust of the eye, the lust of the flesh, and the ride of life, that wanted no occasions or temptations to excite them abroad in the converse f the world.

"I cannot forget the humility and chaste eal of that day. O how constant at meetings, ow retired in them, how firm to truth's life, s well as truth's principles, and how entire nd united in our communion, as indeed became ose that profess one head, even Christ Jesus he Lord!

"This being the testimony and example the nan of God before mentioned was sent to de- clare and leave amongst us, and we having mbraced the same as the merciful visitation f God to us, the word of exhortation at this me is, that we continue to be found in the ray of this testimony with all zeal and integriety, and so much the more by how much the day draweth near.

"And first, as to you, my beloved and much honored brethren in Christ that are in the exercise of the ministry, O feel life in the ministry! Let life be your commission, your well-spring and treasury in all such occasions; else you well know there can be no begetting to God, since nothing can quicken or make people alive to God, but the life of God; and it must be a ministry in and from life that enlivens any people to God. We have seen the fruit of all other ministries by the few that are turned from the evil of their ways. It is not our prais or memory, the repetition of former openings in our own will and time, that will do God's work. A dry doctrinal ministry, however sound in words, can reach but the ear, and is but a dream at the best; there is another soundness that is soundest of all, viz: Christ the power of God: This is the key of David, that opens and none shuts, and shuts and none can open; as the oil to the lamp and the soul to the body, so is that to the best of words. Which made Christ to say, 'My words they are spirit, and they are life;' that is, they are from life, and therefore they make you alive that receive them. If the disciples that had lived with Jesus, were to stay at Jerusalem till they received it, so must we wait to receive before we minister, if we will turn people from darkness to light, and from Satan's power to God.

"I fervently bow my knees to the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, that you may always be like minded, that you may ever wait reverently for the coming and opening of the word of life, and attend upon it in your ministry and service, that you may serve God in his Spirit. And be it little, or be it much, it is well; for much is not too much, and the least is enough, if from the motion of God's spirit; and without it, verily, never so little is too much because to no profit.

"For it is the Spirit of the Lord immediately or through the ministry of his servants, that teacheth his people to profit, and to be sure, so far as we take him along with us in our services, so far as we are profitable, and no farther. For if it be the Lord that must work all things in us, and for ourselves, much more is it the Lord that must work in us for the conversion of others. If therefore it was once a cross to us to speak, though the Lord required it at our hands, let it never be so to silent when He does not.

"It is one of the most dreadful sayings in the Revelations, That he that adds to the words of the prophecy of this book, God will add the plagues written in this book. To keep back the counsel of God is as terrible; for he that takes away from the words of the prophecy of this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life. And truly it has great caution in it to those that use the name of the Lord, to be well assured the Lord speaks, that they may not be found of the number of those that add to the words of the testimony of prophecy which the Lord giveth them to bear; nor yet to mince or diminish the same, both being so very offensive to God.

"Wherefore, brethren, let us be careful neither to out-go our guide nor yet loiter behind him; since he that makes haste may miss his way, and he that stays behind lose his guide; for even those that have received the word of the Lord had need wait for wisdom that they may see how to divide the word aright; which plainly implieth that it is possible for one that bath received the word of the Lord to miss in the division and application of it, which must come from an imagination of spirit, and a self-working; which makes an un-sound and dangerous mixture, and will hardly beget a right-minded living people to God.

"I am earnest in this, above all other considerations, as to public brethren, w'll knowing how much it concerns the present and future state and preservation of the church of Christ Jesus, that has been gathered and built up by a living and powerful ministry, that the ministry be held, preserved and continued in the manifestations, motions and supplies of the same life and power from time to time.

"And wherever it is observed that any one does minister more from gifts and parts than life and power, though they have an enlightened and doctrinal understanding, let them in time be alive! and admonished for their preservation; because insensibly such will come to depend upon self-sufficiency, to forsake Christ the living Fountain, and to hew out unto themselves cisterns that will hold no living waters, and by degrees draw others from waiting upon the gift of God in themselves, and to feel it in others, in order to their strength and refreshment, to wait upon them, and to turn from God to man again, and so to make shipwreck of the faith once delivered to the Saints, and of a good conscience towards God, which are only kept by that Divine gift of life that begeth the one and weakened and sanctified the other in the beginning.

"Nor is it enough that we have known the Divine gift, and in it have reached to the spirits in prison, and been the instruments of the convincing of others of the way of God, if we keep not as low and poor in ourselves, and as depending upon the Lord as erer; since no memory, no repetitions of former openings, revelations or enjoyments will bring a soul to God, or afford bread to the hungry, or water to the thirsty, unless life go with what we say, and that must be waited for.

"O, that we may have no other fountain, treasury or dependence! that none may presume at any rate to act of themselves for God, because they have long acted from God; that we may not supply want of waiting with our own wisdom, or think that we may take less care and more liberty in speaking than formerly, and that where we do not feel the Lord by his power to open us and enlarge us, whatever be the expectation of the people or has been our customary supply and character, we may not exceed or fill up the time with our own.

"I hope we shall ever remember who it was that said, 'Of yourselves ye can do nothing'; our sufficiency is in Him, and if we are not to speak our own words, or take thought what we should say to men in our defence when exposed for our testimony, surely we ought to speak none of our own words, or take thought what we shall say in our testimony and ministry in the name of the Lord to the souls of the people, for then of all times, and of all other occasions, should it be fulfilled in us, 'for it is not you that speak, but the Spirit of my Father that speaketh in you.'

THE ceremony of the blessing of a portrait of Charles I. of England, the king who was beheaded for persistent treason to his country and its laws, was performed lately in an Episcopal church in Philadelphia, and two bishops were found foolish enough to take part in this imitation of a practice which has grown up among the silliest of English saint-makers. We do not see how any American lover of national freedom and popular rights can consent to worship in a church where they would be compelled to sit under the picture, set up as that of a saint, dedicated by a prayer which began:

"Bless, we beseech thee, our work in setting up to thy glory in this thy house, a likeness of thy servant and martyr Charles: and grant that all they that visit this temple may be moved by the sight thereof to a faithful copying of his constancy, even unto death."

What he had been "constant" in was his falsehood and his tyranny. "He was a martyr," not to any Christian faith, but to his assertion that kings had the born and sole right to rule, and that the people had no rights. We are glad that no Pennsylvania bishop could be found to take part in the ceremony, and that bishops had to be imported from Delaware and Iowa for the service.—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Letter from Germany.

ROSDORFERWEG, Göttingen, Second Mo. 11th, '67.

To-day in my lesson I asked the French professor a great many questions about Switzerland. He has tramped it pretty well over on foot and knows it very thoroughly, and of course like all Swiss he loves it devotedly. He tells me that the Sixth Month is the most beautiful month of the year there, as far as the flowers go and the water falls. That is just the time I will be there. He invited me most cordially when I came to Geneva to let him know and he would introduce me to his family, and he would also arrange for a tour; that will be delightful. One learns so much more and understands so much better when one has a native to show one around. By that time I shall be able to rattle French as fluently as German I hope. I have also written to Paris and hope soon to receive an answer.

I took a terrible cold this week, it was no ordinary one but a real, real severe affair. I felt it all third day and was so stiff and sore and miserable. So as I have no voice to lose I concluded to take heroic treatment. I drank hot lemonade and ginger tea until I was in a most profuse perspiration, and frailein Feishkom piled a feather bed on top of me; I did not get up until the middle of the next afternoon. Since then I have been careful and it seems almost entirely over, for which I do feel grateful,—really, I thought I should be miserable for a week or two.

This is early Sixth-day morning. If all goes well I will be at this time in three weeks from to-day, getting out of the coupe, that is the cars, at Paris, at the "Gare du Nord," which is the name of the station at which I will arrive. There I will probably take a cab and all my things direct to No. 62 rue Lemoine, and after a cup of coffee and a few directions from the hostess, start out with my guide book. I shall expect to do an immense amount of sight-seeing while in Paris. I know just where the house is on the plan of Paris and shall feel quite as much at home when I get there as I would in Boston.

This is another lovely morning; I am going to visit the school to-day—Frailein Myers' French classes. I will begin in the lowest to-day, and from time to time take in the others. Of course I cannot apply German methods in our schools, but I can and have already, learned a great deal from them. Such thoroughness is not to be found in any other part of the world.

Oh, this sunshine fairly makes me dance for joy—inwardly at least. I can already fancy myself running around over the hills by the lake of Neuchâtel, with Mt. Blanc and other snow-covered peaks in view; and the flowers, I know they will be lovely.

But I must get to work. I haven't written up the lecture on the Prophets from yesterday and it was the most inspiring one which we have had yet. Oh, I shall miss lots of things when I leave Göttingen.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Found among the papers of Philip Price, of Darby, and contributed by one of his great-grandsons.

The following is a copy of verses sent to Mary Peisley and Ann Ashby, when they were visiting Friends in England, in the year 1750.

Farwell! my friends, whom tender love constrains
To build up Zion, with unweary pains;
Who march, accompanied from the great I AM,
To spread the triumphs of the coming Lamb.
The great the perils that the cause attend,
Greater is He who will that cause defend.
To boldly on—and may th' eternal Power
Support your minds in ev'ry trying hour.

He onwards now, my different fate conveys
To spend all days in ev'ry day's employ;
Yet not uncheer'd, if Heaven vouchsafe to give Those pure supplies by which the virtuous live;
That heav'nly bread, which gives Divine increase,
Refreshing love, and consoling Grace.

May I be guided by the word of Truth,
Safely to pass the slippery paths of youth;
And in that holy way forever to abide,
Where the chaste minds with God Divinely tread.
From such communion with the souls upright
Flow joys sublime, and most refin'd delight.
'Tis here, tho' distant, we each other greet,
And here the memory of our friends is sweet.

While this I write sincere desires I find,
And earnest wishes prompt my fervent mind,
And whilst with the Burden of the Gospel pressed Safe may you pass the mountains of the West,
From ev'ry danger find a sure defense
Beneath the shield of shield'g Providence.

I wish success your labors may attend
Of good diluvius—glorious in their end
With heav'nly aid may your good works be stored
To deal with stillful hand the various Word
Loud may the trumpet out of Zion sound
And pierce with awful voice the Churches' round.

To wake the dead, disturb the crystal ease,
And rouse Professors settling on their lees.
But, oh! when terrors and temptations roll
Their ev'ry power on th' afflicted soul
May your soft accents, like the gentlest rain,
Descend—or dew upon the sultry plain.
May the poor mind, which no composure knows
But pants beneath the pressure of her woes,
A lonely wanderer in the gloomy shade

Seeking, alas! the living with the dead,
And oh! how strong the power of friendship binds!
And to the standard of your King repair.
Whose hand will gently close the wounds of sin
And pour the healing balm of G'lad's in.
How welcome is the messenger that brings
The news of Mercy from the King of kings!

What mutual joy here glows in kindred minds!
And oh! how strong the power of friendship binds!
While the bright strains of heav'nly life you give
And sweet returns, in kindling warmth receive.
Be this your work—and now my friends excuse
The zealous freedom I have dar'd to use,

And, oh! permit my wishes to attend
Your safe arrival at your journey's end;
Your conscious breasts with sheaves of gladness fraught
And solid Peace the robe of ev'ry thought!

(Author unknown.)

The Independent in an editorial note makes the following remark—"What surprises us is that anybody should imagine that any question of the machinery of the Church and the functions of bishops or elders is worth fighting about in an organization which claims to be spiritual."

Spirituality of Divine Worship.

In the fall of the year 1806, Charles H. Spurgeon, a distinguished Baptist preacher, delivered to Friends in London an address or lecture on George Fox—His object appears to have been to stir up the Society of Friends to renewed zeal in upholding some of the Christian principles held by that worthy elder—especially the fundamental testimony to the spiritual nature of vital religion. From this lecture, the following paragraphs are taken.

"Looking through George Fox's life, and viewing him as the great champion of purely spiritual worship, one is inclined to say, will William Penn, that his epitaph might well be 'Many sons have done virtuously, but thou excellest them all; for though in his own age and in his own time there were many bright stars, yet there were some points in which George Fox outshone them all. There were some particular truths which it was given to him to feel more intensely and to set forth more vehemently and constantly than any other man of his own time, or than any other man since his time more especially the great truth that religion is of the spirit, that it is an inward thing, and is not to be judged, and weighed and accounted of according to the externals of a man but according to his inmost soul."

"Now it so happened that the Puritans, who had been like the spring buds and had blossomed, were getting into the sere and yellow leaf; and the Independents, and Baptists, another set, who were at one time thoroughly and even remarkably spiritual, were growing worldly, political, and vain-glorious; the evangelical professors had come to feel that the were numerous and powerful; they had an opportunity of grasping the carnal sword; they embraced that opportunity, and from that moment very many of them lost the spirituality for which they had been eminent. The danger was lest the evangelical sects should quiet, settle down in one State Church, make a scramble for the good things of the Ecclesiastical Establishment, and preach each one after its own fashion, in the numbness of death rather than in the power of life. It did not quite come to that, but it did seem as if it would do so. The very men who were once most vehement for liberty when they were down-trodden, were ready to put down others when they had the opportunity, and those who had vindicated the spirituality of Christ's religion were about to fall into formalism as soon as they had the opportunity of escaping from the galling yoke of oppression and persecution. At that very moment God sent into the world George Fox, who must have been the most noblest of men; those good easy souls who counted upon a quiet season of sleep. They had said, 'Soul, take time ease; thou hast much goods laid up for many years.' It was by the mouth of George Fox that God said to each one of them, 'Thou fool!' Very soon declining professors found that another people would spring up to take their place, and that if they left the separate path and began to mingle with the world as to war with carnal weapons, God would find another people who should stand alone and vindicate his truth against all comers. George Fox, it seems to me, was a blessing, not to you alone, but to the whole of Christendom. He was sent of God, not only with a view to the Society in after years, but to the Christian church at large of that time, and to the church of God in all times. I do believe that unde od, directly and indirectly, perhaps more indirectly than directly, George Fox was the means "driving out from their nests those who were very willing to have feathered those nests well, and to have taken their rest. He stood up in the face of the Christian Church, and said to it, No, thou shalt not do this! Thou shalt not inform thyself to the world; thou shalt not go to an unholy alliance with the State; there shall still be in the midst of thee a spiritual people who shall bear their protest that Christ's kingdom is not of this world, and that religion and truth not in forms and ceremonies, but is a matter connected with the inner man, and is the work of God's Spirit in the heart." You will judge, therefore, what my idea of Fox is when I have said that I look upon him as having been sent from our Heavenly Father upon an important mission of saving the Christian church at a particular juncture, when, through having obtained the possession of State power, and being much exercised with the brawls of rival creeds and contentions upon outward ceremonies, the inward power was declining, and the church was likely to become absorbed into the world, or to set up a dead formalism which neither acceptable to God nor serviceable to man.

"Now I beg your attention while I speak upon some of the legacies which Fox left to succeeding ages. He did not leave so much in gold and silver as I suppose most of my brethren around me are likely to leave to their dependants. I should suppose that his wealth in his world was exceedingly small. When John Wesley was asked how much plate he had, he answered that he had one silver spoon with him and one at Bristol, and that was all; and while there were so many poor people in the world he should not increase the stock. George Fox, I should think, did not even come up to that, but he bequeathed to us in his last will and testament more than as if he had given us the mines of Peru, for he has left to the Christian church in the clearest and most unmistakable utterances a testimony for the spirituality of via religionis. It is wonderful how full the testimony is. If you were to read through the lives of all the eminent saints, I believe you would come to the conclusion that of all others George Fox is the most distinct upon the one point, that 'God is a Spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in Spirit and in truth.' I delight to hear him talking about his 'steeples-houses.' Quite right, George Fox! 'that is what they are, and nothing better!' A church! said he; 'did Christ shed his blood for the steeple-house, and purchase and sanctify the steeple-house with his blood? And seeing the church is Christ's bride and wife, and that He is the head of the church, dost thou think that the steeple-house is Christ's bride, and that He is the head of that old house?' Some of our dissenting friends are coming to call their buildings for public worship 'Churches,' because church meets in them. Why do not they call them 'Suns' or 'Moons,' because the light shines in them? The title would be quite as appropriate. I fear that we shall go back to superstition by slow degrees through the misuse of terms; for though such misuse may appear to have but little harm in it at the first, yet here very soon comes to be mischief in it, and therefore it is as wise as it is right to be cautious from the very first. Buildings used for ecclesiastical worship were merely buildings and nothing more to this great Elijah. He often testified that the so-called churches were not one whit more consecrated than the moors and commons, and were more like Jerusalem's calves' houses than the true temples of God which are the bodies of his own people. He believed in no consecration flowing from prelates' hands. He had discovered long before the hymn was written, that

"Where'er we seek Him He is found,
And every place is hallow'd ground."

This is a truth which the church needed to be taught then, and which the church needs to be taught still.

"Fox had no sort of respect either for consecrated persons. Priests had no quarter at his hands. By a little imagination I think I hear George Fox addressing one of those 'green and gilded' gentlemen of the Church of England who now-a-days dress themselves up to such a splendor of absurdity. The highly-decorated creature would win small favor from the honest Friend; and if he proceeded to perform in his mass-house, George would be as plain with him as Elijah with the priests of Baal, and mock him with as grim a scorn as did the prophet when he said, 'Cry aloud, for he is God!' It would be worth any price to hear George Fox pour contempt upon the rubbishy paraphernalia of the modern Popery which is spreading around us. He had a very copious and forcible vocabulary when he came to talk of priests, and little cared he to what sect they belonged; if they set up for priests, he was very much at home in pulling them down. Fox believed that any man who preached the truth in the power of the Holy Spirit was God's minister, but he would not have it that a man was a minister merely because he was educated at Oxford or Cambridge, or any other University, and he obtained the family living, and had the hands of a bishop put upon his head. Although the ordained pretender may be recognized by the State, and give himself all the airs in the world, he is not God's minister for all that. Fox believed that the poorest person whom God moved to speak was God's voice to the people, but that the most learned and the best educated man who was a stranger to the new birth, and had never received the incorruptible seed which liveth and abideth for ever, was a mere impostor when he rose up to speak in the name of the Lord. Fox left us his testimony in this matter very clearly and unmistakably. Nay, so valiant is his testimony for spiritual religion that he tramples the outward form under the feet of the inward life in matters where others have not been clear; I allude to the use of verbal utterances in worship. He sat still for two hours while the people were expecting to hear him preach, and he did not give them a word, because he would banish them from words, and teach them to worship God in the spirit. Is it not the fault of many of us who do try as much as possible to preserve and cultivate the simplicity of worship, that we are so everlastingly talking? I find it a very blessed thing at the Tabernacle to say, 'Now let us sit still for a few minutes.' It is often the very best part of the meeting when the soul can masticate and digest the truth; and if this were done oftener when we meet together for worship, if more frequently solemn silence were proclaimed, I believe the very best results would follow from it. It is as much formality for people to think that they cannot worship God without the voice of the preacher as it is for others to fancy that they cannot worship God without an altar and a priest. It is ceremonialism to imagine that we must sing, or pray or read in a certain order; or must sit still so many minutes; how much better while all things are done decently and in order to conduct worship as the Divine Spirit may direct! The Spirit of God is free, and sometimes the best worship will be with words, but at other times the best worship will be without words. Fox tells us this very unmistakably.

"Would that the spirituality of worship were known throughout England! Would that it were recognized in every place of worship, that we most worship God who is a Spirit in spirit and in truth! Let it never be forgotten, my brethren, in your meetings, for it is to be feared that even your peaceful silence may be regarded as if it were necessarily worship, whereas the silence of your meetings, without the Spirit, is no better than silence in your beds, nay, it is no better than talk and babble unless the Spirit of God hold high communion with your souls. We must keep this in mind constantly. Preachers cannot preach about it too often, for the rising race need to be told of it incessantly. You who become members of Society by birth-right must take especial care lest you imagine yourselves to be members of Christ's church because you happen to be members of Society. Do not conclude that you are necessarily children of God because you wear the garb and use the peculiarities of the Society. Alas! we know that it is one thing to talk about spiritual things, but quite another thing to feel them: one thing to make a profession of them, and even to live in outward error-pollence with that profession to a degree, but quite another thing to have the inward and spiritual grace. The world, of course, turns away with a sneer, and says, 'What do we care for this spiritual fanaticism? and we can reply to the world, 'Thou knowest nothing about it! How canst thou know it, for it is spiritually discerned.' But you and I must see to it that every act of worship which we perform is done in the Spirit. We must pray in the Spirit, and preach in the Spirit. When I have sometimes heard the clerk say, 'Let us sing to the praise and glory of God,' I have wondered whether it was not far more to the praise and glory of the organ or of the singing-pew, and when this is the case what a mockery it is! Only that music is sweet in God's ear which comes from the heart, and only that praise is accepted which is the work of his Spirit in the soul. George Fox, dear friends, has bequeathed these principles to you. I pray you guard them with your lives, and hand them down with undimmed lustre to your sons. Let nothing beguile you from your steadfastness in the spirituality of your worship, and press it upon others everywhere, wherever you have an opportunity, that the Father seeketh such to worship Him as worship Him in spirit and in truth."

[The following article, signed E. R., refers to a group of facts which has often awakened the interest of observers. One of the most reliable methods of raising crops of any particular plant is to sow in properly prepared ground the seeds which produce it, or the cuttings which possess the power of growth. So generally can we trace the crop to these antecedents, that the almost universal belief among scientific men is, that they are the essential requisites, and that, in such cases as that mentioned in THE FRIEND of Second Month 13th, the true explanation of the presence of plants before unknown in the vicinity, is the existence of germs or seeds in the soil, to which their spreading on the surface has given the opportunity of growth.

While still holding to this opinion ourselves, we felt willing to give our friend E. R. the opportunity of expressing the reasons (as he does interestingly, which have led him to the conclusion that, in the ordering of Providence, there are other sources of vegetable life than those usually acknowledged by scientists.—Ed.)

Among the news items of THE FRIEND of Second Month 13th, we find the interesting statement that, when P. A. Spicer settled in Kansas, many years ago, a neighbor, in digging a well, found a fine, rich surface soil at the depth of one hundred feet. Digging through this, the workmen found gravel, clay and water.

This earth which was thrown out, was found covered, in the course of a few weeks, with a rich growth of tropical vegetation. There were little date trees and other varieties of palms, beside shrubs, plants, weeds and grasses in great numbers, all totally unlike anything which grew or could grow in the open air, throughout the year, in that climate.

In course of some decades of years, in conversation with persons of scientific attainment, Friends, educators and others, the writer has met with opinions in reference to the many cases kindred to this of the Kansas well, and the outgrowth from the earth that had been thrown out of it—opinions that such outgrowth of vegetation could not be, without the seeds of the plants respectively.

We know that, if we wish to propagate flower or fruit, we must procure the seed or slip. But in what way and manner has the Creator given us the numberless primeval adornments of his vegetable kingdom? There are cases of very great interest, apart from our experiences of planting and producing, which may well claim our thoughtful attention. The cause of true education, the cause of truthful science, and, the cause of Truth itself, may, possibly, be served by the upholding of clear views on the subject here intended to be briefly brought to view.

He who created the colorless light of his universe, caused it to be divisible into the bright colors of the bow which He set in the cloud, and an equally interesting characteristic of his creation is found in his preparation of soil for the production of the infinite and invaluable variety which his prescience had designed as blessings for mankind and for the other living creatures who were to dwell upon the world He was bringing into existence.

Regarding the Kansas well and the outcome of it as an object lesson, what does it teach?

The bed of soil had great depth. The surrounding prairie lands spread far and wide. The earth from the deepest part was, probably, the loamiest part of the pile thrown out of the well, and it was this that was sown overgrown with the variety of vegetation. From what did the trees and plants begin to grow? From whatever germinating cause the outgrowth was due, a very great mass of earth or soil of the world is probably pervaded, and to the mind of the writer there is light and information to be drawn from our knowledge of kindred matters that are worthy of consideration, for the goodness manifested by the Creator in preparing blessings for those who, through the ages, are dwellers in the beautiful world.

A connection of the writer, a teacher in a Western college, situated in a prairie country, with other interesting matters characteristic of that region, spoke of the oft-demonstrated fact that, in places where the strong prairie soil was removed or the roots destroyed, that forest trees, if allowed the opportunity, would grow from the unclotted soil, and that, in one locality, a prairie fire, in a very dry time, burnt even the roots of the grass, and that, where the grass roots were destroyed, the common variety of timber grew but, in one part, the growth was especially abundant, and all of one variety, hickory; that he observed the growth of the stems of several years. Some had become little saplings, while others continued to come up. That he could, and did, thrust his hand into the mellow soil, and took up a soil containing several of the little shoots, to learn, if possible, what they were growing from, and could discover nothing but the formation of very fine little roots, starting in the fertile ground.

It is a matter very commonly known, that trees grow along the water-courses of prairie countries. Having witnessed this to be so in Iowa, there is reason to believe that, in many cases, if not in all, that growth of trees was occasioned by the action of high water, and probably ice, uncovering virgin soil. Where the soil is removed trees grow.

Another interesting object lesson is found on the farms of our Elkland Friends. Many other farms, the country over, have been observed to bear the same testimony.

The Elklands were found by the pioneer settlers to be densely covered with timber. The writer, on his earliest visit to that country, found portions of the primeval forest still attached to some of the farms. So dense was the woods, so luxuriant the foliage which fell annually from the trees, there was no general undergrowth, as is common in many woodlands. The ground was thickly carpeted with the accumulation of russet leaves, so that no grass was visible under the towering trees of the forest. Such was the character of those beautiful hills. On clearing the land, however, opening the ground to sunshine, without the use of plough or sowing of seed, those fields of the dairy farms were evenly and richly clothed with the verdure of "green grass"—a pasturage more nutritious and valuable than that which is produced by plowing and seeding. As pasture, it is very similar to the "blue grass" of Kentucky, which also is found, the writer believes, to clothe the ground on the removal of the original forest.

A large portion of the Elkland farms, perhaps half, is still in the virgin soil, pastured from season to season, but never ploughed or sowed. For how many ages and generations, the fertile hills of our country were so covered with forest as to hold back the growth of the grasses and smaller fruits of divers varieties of the opened fields which here and there spring up with the grasses on removal of the forest, we know not, but the idea that grass seeds, strawberry, raspberry and blackberry seeds, existed among the leaves or under the leaves of the forest where no grass or berry had been, is fairly inadmissible, and the Creator's claim upon us is good for our admiration and gratitude, in view of the power and benevolence manifested in these particulars of his glorious works.

The elevated region about the town of Kane, Pa., tells the same beautiful story. The forests were lofty and dense, and the clearings, perhaps a hundred acres of suburbs about the town, most richly abounding in pasturage of many cows of laboring people. During a visit of four weeks, a few years ago, the writer carefully pondered and examined the forest and field. Parts of Northern New Hampshire, Eastern Ohio and Eastern Indiana, on carefully consulting them, joined in the praiseful testimony. All fertile lands erst clad with trees appear to tell the same story when the trees are taken off. The untold ages of forest shade has but enriched the soil for the seedless growth Divinely ordained for man and beast.

Skeptical Science oft disdains
But ne'er disproves God's laws.
True Science ever leads us up
To reverence the great "First Cause," Plants which here we value most
Were windlings once on foreign coast.
To grow them here we have the need
Of branch or root or tiny seed.

But, virgin soil, from any whither,
Give it sun-shine and the weather,
In due season it will show us
Just what that soil inclines to grow us.
Where microse peat nor coral had a seed,
The ground will bring us flower or weed.
"The harp, at Nature's advent strong,
Has never ceased to play;
The song the morning angels sing
Has never died away."

Only South-Sea Islanders.

CHARLES H. SHINN.

A very sad episode has just come to an end, as far as visible events are concerned; but its evil influence will long affect the Gilbert Islanders and work of missionaries among them. The story, though perhaps not unknown to general readers, through telegrams and newspaper items is one that justifies re-statement. Briefly, it is a story of modern contract-slavery which American law-makers have not been sufficiently careful to legislate against.

About six years ago a firm of Guatemalan coffee planters became anxious to obtain even cheaper labor than the very cheap native Indian labor of that country; and it is also fair to presume, from subsequent events, that they desired more complete control of their laborers than the laws of Guatemala gave them over the natives. What the coffee planters wanted was very cheap contract labor, free from even the lightest responsibilities which are attached to complete slavery.

Two American sea captains, Blackburn and Ferguson, hearing of the coffee-planter's scheme agreed to persuade, deceive or kidnap the islanders and take them to Guatemala. All the principals in the transaction seem to have been the kind of men who would have made fortunes in the African slave trade of forty and fifty years ago. The expedition which followed is known as the "Montserrat Blackbirding Expedition," from the name of one of the vessels which took part. In 1890, Captain Blackburn sailed the "Montserrat" to Butaritari in the Gilbert Islands, and was joined by Ferguson with the brig "Tabiti." A third ship was also hired, and nearly a thousand men and women were beguiled from their peaceful island homes under the promise of light work, good treatment, an excellent climate, many presents, and wages of six dollars a month for the men and four dollars for the women. Both Blackburn and Ferguson were typical "beach-combers," cruel as tigers, and looked upon the islanders as mere animals to be bought and sold, worked to death, and replaced by others.

The first hint of these events reached the civilized world by way of San Francisco; for in September, 1891, the brig "Tabiti," having suffered in a storm, anchored in Drake's Bay on the Marin coast, with two hundred and seventy Gilbert Islanders on board. Her captain rowed down to San Francisco and secured a Swede named Ericsson to take the vessel to Guatemala. The authorities were almost criminally negligent and made no effort to examine her brig and ascertain what papers she carried; what treatment the islanders were receiving; at a sailor, deserting while the "Tahiti" lay in Drake's Bay, told shocking stories of brutality and violence practised toward the poor "black-ids," especially the women. Nothing more known of this voyage, for the "Tahiti" encountered another storm off the Mexican coast, and went down with all on board.

The "Montserrat" and her consort landed her slave cargoes in Central America, and the landers were set at work clearing the mountain sides for coffee plantations. They had cruel overseers, and a system of fines and brutal punishments kept them in subjection. High charges for clothing and provisions practically balanced their wages. They died from malarial fevers, consumption, exposure and overwork. Meahile Blackburn and Ferguson, making contacts with other coffee planters, were planning to secure more cargoes of islanders, when a lucky newspaper reporter, shipping before the fact, made public the whole story. The owners of the vessels were frightened, and gave up the theme. Ferguson disappeared; the "Montserrat" finally went down with Blackburn in 394.

When the four years of service were ended, to coffee planters, finding that the islanders had become valueless, decided to return them, and chartered the bark "Helen Almy" for this purpose. This vessel took, one account says, one hundred and twenty-seven, and another account says "only five score" natives, all who are left alive, and carried them back to their homes. Even these were broken down in health and spirits, with the marks of lash and iron on their bodies. Pathetic accounts are given of their joy in reaching their island homes and of the sorrow of those who assembled and met this forlorn remnant of the deceived and maltreated islanders. Thus closes the sad story of a nineteenth century slave expedition.

England and America could put a stop to blackbirding, and to every form of iniquitous private labor contracts with these ignorant South-Sea Islanders. Secret expeditions could be made illegal by treaty with Mexico, the Central American States and other countries. Officials could be appointed to revise and enforce contracts, protecting the interests of laborers, securing them from abuse, and maintaining their interests in the courts. Steps could certainly be taken to prevent the conspiracy of American citizens in such crimes against civilization.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

I felt good unity with the article in THE FRIEND of Second Month 27th, by William Test, it may say I kept hoping he would speak of "the sweetness which comes from hearing the cross," as a dear friend, who, I doubt not, has entered into everlasting rest, testified to me many years ago.

Let us strive earnestly to bring all tithes into the Lord's store-house, both great and small, and we shall know, again and again, that the Father will pour us out a blessing, so that our hearts will overflow with his love and the peace that passeth understanding. I find this tract in a letter from Abraham Shackleton to his granddaughter Margaret, "Let Him be thy chiefest joy, my dear; then thou wilt steplesly in thy pilgrimage, little minding what people think of thee, if thou hast but the smile of his countenance." Some writer has truly said, "The closest walk with God is the sweetest heaven that can be enjoyed upon earth." O, to know more and more of these blessed things day by day and hour by hour.

Third Month end, 1897.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Soliloquy on a Tree of Peculiar Growth.

The writer's attention was frequently drawn to a tree of peculiar growth near the roadside as he would pass it mostly several times a week. The lower part of it for several feet is remarkably crooked and also so gnarled that it would be almost impossible to work it up even into fire-wood, so that part is conspicuous for its worthlessness, then as if attracted by the light and warmth of the sun a new growth starts out of that, shooting upward, and from this crooked unsightly beginning it towers upward a tall comely tree, almost straight in its upward growth reaching out its branches towards the other trees and like them attracted upward by the one great source of light and life. I passed and re-passed this peculiar tree often, noticing its peculiar growth, but that was all, until one morning on noticing it my mind was secretly impressed with the feeling that was more than curiosity. As the feeling was of that sort that is profitable and comfortable to dwell under, I gave it a place in my thoughts. Then I was led to reflect upon how much the lives of so many that came to be good and useful men and women in our Society as well as others who have passed away and their lives left upon record, as well as many who are yet upon the stage of action, are typified in that tree that made such a crooked and gnarled beginning. A great forest of such trees, which seemed unbounded, passed before the mind's view, and I saw they represented the great army of those who had been victorious, and useful in their day and generation as well as worthy ones now upon the stage of action, who at the outset in life and perhaps for years seemed to turn one way then another and many ways except straight upward, knotty and gnarled in their dispositions so that there seemed no prospect of future usefulness. But after a time of this kind of growth, their faces would be turned towards the light of the Sun of Righteousness and as the warming, enlivening rays thereof were felt upon their souls they are drawn to look upward and lo, a new growth starts up, as from the heart of the crooked gnarled trunk, that is comely and desirable, reaching out loving arms like the branches of this second growth of the tree. Seeming to hold out the invitation to their fellows—Come with us we have found the Light and it invites us upward. Some sturdy oaks there were in this great forest that had braved many a storm, that seemed to have never varied from the perpendicular in their growth yet they were few compared with the others, but they stood as monuments of the persevering power of that Grace which keeps from youth up, until they stood "as pillars in the Lord's house, to go no more out."

But as "there is more joy in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over the ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance," so there seemed to be more pleasure in beholding the great change brought about in the growth of those poplars that had made such a crooked growth at the start, than in viewing those few scattered oaks that stood as noble testimony bearers of a power that can preserve from a divergence from a straight upward course; for though that Power which keeps is the same as that which changes, yet I saw there was a greater manifestation of it, in bringing forth an upright useful growth from the crooked gnarled beginning, than in the preservation of the mighty oaks in their perpendicular growth. Whilst admiring the new growth on the poplar at the roadside I realize that the first and crooked growth can never be made straight, no power of nature can ever do this, there it stands its crookedness exposed to the view of every beholder; but not so with those whose characters are so strikingly depicted in the growth of this tree. The pleasure in viewing the new and useful growth from such an unlikely beginning seems in a measure marred by the crooked part being brought to view and no wisdom or power of man can ever straighten this; but again I look and wonderful to behold; it is done, and I query with Nicodemus "How can these things be?" I turn to the prophecy of Isaiah and find the answer. "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God. Every valley shall be exalted, and every mountain and hill shall be made low; and the crooked shall be made straight, and the rough places plain. And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together; for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it" (chapter lv: 3, 4, 5).

That Almighty power which has brought forth an upright growth, in the thousands "which no man can number," where the beginning was exceeding crooked, remains to be the same it ever was. Dear Friends, let us bear in mind our own beginnings and God's mercies and it may make us the more patient with and hopeful of others. All are equally dependant for salvation upon Him who not only brings forth the new growth to his own praise but yielded up his life upon the cross that the sins which are past the crooked gnarled growth may be made straight, and we be able to stand before Him with acceptance. "Then shall the trees of the wood sing out at the presence of the Lord." T. H. W.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Arbitration Treaty.

Our valued friend, Josiah Morris, of Carlington, Ohio, now in his ninety third year, expresses his thankfulness that his life has been prolonged to see this step taken in the interests of justice and mercy. He anticipates good results from it to civilization and moral influences over the heathen nations, and entertains the hope that it may hasten the coming of the time when "swords shall be beaten into ploughshares and spears into pruning-hooks; when nation shall not lift up sword against nation; neither shall they learn war any more. The two great Christian nations appear to be ready to ratify this important treaty of morality and justice. The very thought is noble and dignifying. The wonderful discoveries in the arts and sciences of recent times will make this a period in history perhaps in advance of any former opening of advancing civilization since the introduction of Christianity, and the features of the times favor the hope that, in coming years, a brotherhood of nations may harmonize in universal righteousness and peace."

When Benjamin Paterson was dying, a friend asked him, "How are you to-day?" He answered, "My head is resting very sweetly on three pillars: Infinite Power, Infinite Love, and Infinite Wisdom."

THE FRIEND.

THIRD MONTH 20, 1897.

We have received a criticism on the recent Life of George Fox, written by Thomas Hodgkin. As the book has already been noticed in our columns, it does not seem needful to do much more at this time than to notice the reception of this review, written by Edward Pickard and Edwin Tregelles, and to express the pleasure we have felt in reading this vigorous defence of George Fox from the slurs cast upon him by his recent biographer.

We have received from Wilson Edgerton, of Columbiana, Ohio, a copy of Joseph Hugh's vision, taken from his Journal. Finding a local demand for the pamphlet, he was induced to print an edition. Prices, post-paid, 10 cents per dozen, 65 cents per hundred.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—Both Houses of Congress met in Washington on the 15th instant. Speaker Reed was re-elected in the lower House. The House passed a bill for the purpose of providing ample revenues, which, it contends, should be derived from foreign products. The tariff should be the first business transacted. During the last three years the deficit has been $137,511,000, while the interest on the public debt has increased $14,093,000.

The Tingley bill will be returned to the committee on Ways and Means. Estimated increase in revenue is placed at $75,000,000 of the first year. There are provisions for reciprocity, those of 1890 being fully restored and extended.

It is understood that the Cuban question was discussed at the Cabinet meeting on the 12th instant, and that the discussion will continue, and extending that the policy hitherto pursued, of strict neutrality and enforcement of our neutrality laws, would be adhered to so long as the conditions remained as at present.

An increase of $85,219,017 in the value of exports of domestic products for the eight months of the current fiscal year over the corresponding eight months of the fiscal year 1896, was announced by the Secretary of the Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department.

Loans to the amount of about $4,000,000 were obtained from New York banks last week to pay duties on goods held in bond in anticipation of higher duties under the new tariff. On the 16th instant more than $2,500,000 were obtained for the same object.

The Lady's New York correspondent, under date of the 11th instant, writes, "The meeting in Cooper Union tonight to appeal for the ratification of the Arbitration Treaty, was, in every respect a successful demonstration. The meeting was called by more than two hundred of the leading citizens of New York, without regard to politics, religion or business differences, and the response to the call was an assembly which completely filled the hall and enthusiastically cheered the speakers. Mayor Strong presided, and short but strong addresses were made by Saml. Lowe, Bishop Potter, ex-Secretary Fairchild, Sumner Tompkins and others. There were a few 'Jingoes' present, but they were not lost in the overwhelming sentiment for peace. It has been years since a public meeting has been held in this city on a public question to which the Archbishop of the Roman Catholic Church has sent a strong letter of commendation, as Archbishop Corrigan did to-night; to which the Jewish ministers have sent their formal benediction, and at which a Bishop of the Protestant Episcopal Church has spoken. It is not often also when a legal representative of corporate wealth and the president of the leading labor organization can meet, as they did to-night, in advocacy of a common interest. From this point of view the meeting was one of the most important of the year, and of a character that have been held in that noted forum of the people, Cooper Union."

The North Carolina House of Representatives has passed a bill requiring all teachers in the public schools to read aloud to their pupils, at least twice each year, the constitution of the United States of the State.

All negroes of the counties in North Carolina, such as the asylums for the insane, the blind, and the deaf mutes, and the normal schools, will hereafter be managed exclusively by negroes.

Papils in the St. Louis schools are prohibited from using tobacco in any form, or cigarettes, or having either in their possession on the school grounds or elsewhere during school hours. The Board of Education will open any pupil who dares do this. "The New York Tribune says, "Warren E. Burton has just sold the Burton House, Hurley, Wis., for $30,000, of which $7,000 was paid in cash and the balance in postage stamps, the number being eight million. This is probably one of the most remarkable business transactions ever recorded in the West, and will undoubtedly attract attention to the widespread interest in philately."

The Press of this city says, "A remarkable session of court was held in Lawson County, Ga., last week. Court convened Monday and adjourned at noon on Tuesday. No State cases were tried, and not a single bill of indictment was returned by the Grand Jury. One man was in jail ready for trial, but the witnesses against him failed to appear, and he was released." Dawson County has no a saloon, and never has had. It is always voted no-license. Why, then, should the Press speak of the "deplorable effects of prohibition?"

Isaac Wilbur, of Little Compton, R. I., is said to have raised 100,000 turkeys in the world this year. He says that from 120,000 to 150,000 dozen of eggs a year. He keeps his fowls on the colony plan, housing about forty in a house eight by ten or eight by twelve feet in size, these houses being about one hundred and fifty feet apart, set out in long rows over the gently-sloping fields. He has one hundred of these houses, scattered over three or four acres of land, and the fowls are fed by a system which is driven about to each house in turn, the attendant feeding as he goes. At the afternoon feeding the eggs are collected. The fowls are fed twice a day. The morning food is a mash of cooked vegetables and mixed meals. This mash is made up the afternoon of the day before. The afternoon feed is whole corn the very next day.

On the 15th instant the "worst snow-storm and blizzard of the season" raged at Kalamazoo, Mich.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 521, which is 16 less than the previous week, and 7 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 288 were male, and 133 female, in the world; 105 died of pneumonia; 55 of influenza; 35 of heart disease; 10 of typhoid fever; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 16 of apoplexy; 15 of mania; 15 of influenza; 14 of a fever; 14 of convulsions; 14 of bronchitis; 14 of nephritis; 13 of marasmus; 12 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; and 10 of cancer.

MARKS.—No. 25, 95, 97, 4's, 98, 111 1/4, 111 1/2, 111 3/4, 112 1/4, 114, 116, 4's, 121 1/2, 124, 5's, 114, 114 1/2; currency 6's, 103 a 100.

COTTON.—Middling uplands ruled steady at 71c, but demand from spinners was light.

FEED.—Spot bran ranged from $13.50 to $14.00 per ton for winter in bulk, and $12.75 to $13.50 for spring in sacks.

WHEAT.—Winter super, $2.50 a $2.75; do, extras, $2.75 a $3.10; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $1.80 a $4.05; do, do, straight, $4.10 a $4.25; Western winter, clear, $3.90 a $4.05; do, do, straight, $4.15 a $4.25; do, do, patent, $4.40 a $4.60; spring, clear, $3.50 a $3.75; do, straight, $3.35 a $4.15; do, patent, $4.25 a $4.40; do, do, fancy brands, higher; 103 1/2 mills, extra, $2.90 a $3.15; do, clear, $4.00 a $4.30; do, straight, $4.25 a $4.50; do, patent, $4.40 a $4.60. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 a $2.60 per bbl. as to quality. BUCKWHEAT FLOUR.—$1.10 a $1.15 per 100 pounds, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 33 a 33 1/2; No. 2 mixed extra, 29 1/2 a 30; No. 3 white out, 27 1/2 a 29 1/2.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 4 1/2 a 5c; good, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2c; medium, 4 1/4 a 4c; common, 4 a 4 1/2c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/4 a 4c; good, 4 a 4 1/2c; medium, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4c; common, 3 a 3 1/2c; 4 a 5 1/2c.

PORKS.—The leading London bankers now express their belief that there will be no war in the East, and a general feeling of confidence is returning.

Greece has informed France and Great Britain that she is willing to place the Greek troops in Crete under the command of the Powers, and also to abandon her proposal for a Cretan plebiscite. The Cretan Chamber of Deputies to pronounce in favor of autonomy or union with Greece as that which may elect.

Spain has decided to send 15,000 additional troops to the Philippine Islands. It is reported that General Polanco de Rivera will succeed General Polanco as Governor.

When the Siberian Railroad is completed, the journey from London to Shanghai will take only twenty-two days instead of the thirty-nine needed now by way of Beirut and the thirty-four by the American route. The first class fare will be $247 instead of $604 1/2 Beirut and $225 across America.—New York Ass'n.

Oreich farming is now successfully carried on in South Russia.

Japan has a practically inexhaustible supply of coal but it is not liked because its combustion produces dense volumes of smoke that make it disagreeable to factories and to steamers.

Chateaufort, France, says that Rana Valor III., Queen of Madagascar, who has been only 10 nominal ruler of the island since it was made a French colony last Sixth Month, has been exiled to the island of Reunion, and started for that place on Third Mo., 7.

Another expedition to gain the summit of Aconcagua, organized by the German Athletic Club, Santiago, Chile, arrived at the top of the summit of Fitzgerald on First Month 26th, which was found at height of 19,000 feet. They kept on until a height of 19,500 feet was reached, at which elevation they remained all night. The cold was so intense that the party did not attempt to go to sleep, but remained awake, moving about all night, but themselves were less than a few feet above the snow. It is said, however, something like $3,000,000 in trying to kill the locust yet at the present time great clouds of them are to be found walking through the crops.

It is reported that the crops in Uruguay will be poorer this season, nothing having escaped the ravage of the locusts, apparently, but fruit. There will be less than a third of the normal amount in the wheat crop and probably more in the maize crop.

The Government of Sweden has notified the Canadian Government that Andrew will start from Stockholm about the end of Sixth Month for Spitzbergen attempt his balloon voyage to the North Pole, and requests that instructions be given to Canadian officials in the event of his arrival in the northern territories at Hudson Bay region to report the balloon if it is sighted.

DIED, on the twentieth of Twelfth Month, 1897, at Philadelphia, Pa., J. H. EVANS, son of Jonathan B. and Hannah C. Evans, a member of the monthly Meeting of Friends, at the residence of his father, at 404 N. 4th street, at 11 A. M. (L. k. xii: 40.)

On the twenty-fifth of Third Month, 1897, F. WOOD O. HINSHAW, in the forty-third year of his age, a member of the Philadelphia Monthly Meeting of Conservative Friends, Indiana. This dear Friend manifested a strong attachment to the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends as they have been held and maintained by all sound Friends. He leaves a widow with five minor children, and many sympathizing Friends to mourn their loss; but it was his wish that they should be comforted by the assurance that rest remained unto the people of God.

—, at a residence in Coal Creek, Iowa, Second Month 10th, 1897, after a short but severe illness. JONATHAN BRIGGS, in the ninety-second year of age; a valued member of Coal Creek Monthly Meeting of Particular Meeting of Friends. He had long and firmly established in his heart and testimony as a Friend, as set forth by our early predecessors in Truth, and was earnestly concerned for the faithful support of our Christian discipline, and also in watchful guardianship of the Society from the introduction of hurtful modern innovations. He was vored with his mental faculties until near the last of the calm and peaceful state of his mind at this time was a comforting evidence to his relatives and friends that he was prepared for the solemn change.

1880.—Second Month 29th.—What a relief he able to move! What a relief even to stir hands and arms! I think it must be dis-easing to be motionless. How God has tem- pered the body together so that the whole is complete. We are fearfully and wonderfully made, and all his works shall praise Him.

On the fourth of Eighth Month, 1879, a com- mittee was appointed to consider the condition of Friends in Reading in regard to a meeting, there being several children there who need the care of Society. In allusion to this, she says in the same letter:

"The next First-day, after being with you, I went to Reading. We arrived at the meeting- place, and were taking off our cloaks as the clock struck eleven. That was the hour for meeting, and they were all assembled in the arlor. My heart feels so tenderly for them, children especially. Some seem lukewarm, unwilling to exert themselves to get spiritual strength, but ability was mercifully given to her, and near access permitted at the throne of mercy. The meeting was closed rather sud- denly. I think after a supplication, there needs little more time than after a testimony, for, O, the spirit seems so absorbed in Omnipotence at it is hard to come back to earth again."

"Alluding to the death of Rebecca Scattergood, she says, 'The dear woman has since passed away, and her last words were, 'Bless the Lord, O, my soul, and all that is within me, bless his holy name,' and these were uttered during ex- citing pain. How the dear Master enables us to triumph, even though seemingly in the times. His love is so marvellous, poured forth into the soul, as to absorb all other feelings at mes. Is He not 'altogether lovely,' unto us."

"Last First-day afternoon, I took out two little girls in to see our precious E. Pearson. She could not seem to see us, unless close to her face, and en- dued. She commenced her eighty-eighth year on the twenty-third. So one generation issues after another, and what would be, with- out our hope of a glorious immortality? Bless- ings, my dear, blessings be upon you, and riches, heavenly riches in your souls as ye follow the Lord in the regeneration and daily newness of life."

Fourth Mo. 25th.—Just returned from the funeral of my beloved sister, Elizabeth B. Federlin, in Boston, Mass. She was taken with pneu- monia on the eighth, and after a week's sickness, passed away sweetly on the fifteenth. Shortly before, she queried, "Is this the peace felt by those who are dying?" Her life had been full of sweet Christian sympathies.

In a letter dated Fifth Month 3rd, 1880, to an invalid friend, she alludes to this sister— "Deep calleth unto deep, saith the Psalmist, at the noise of thy water spouts, all thy waves and thy billows have gone over me.' Surely, my precious one, if any on earth can adopt this language, I think thy life, almost full of varied sufferings, might cause thee to do so at times. But I trust it would be said reverently and submissively, and the comforting word also at- tended, 'Yet the Lord will command his loving- kindness in the daytime, and in the night his song shall be with me, and my prayer unto the God of my life.' Be not cast down, then; he not desponded, for thou shalt yet praise Him for the help of his countenance. . . . O, you remember my fiftieth birthday is rather the completion of my semi-centennial year. Just think—half a hundred. Oh, I wish I could do more for his holy Name; but if I do just what He tells me, that will do just as well as much. He has been so good all my life long, creating such a hunger, for years and years, after him- self, and then when wholly given up to all his will, satisfying—yes, fully satisfying with his presence time after time, never leaving nor for- saking. Oh, I do love the great I Am and the Redeemer of men, but rejoice with trembling, needing, I know, to take heed lest a fall come. Has He not been merciful to our transgression; has He not passed by our iniquities many a time? Therefore will my soul bless Him and praise Him forever more. My precious sister, who has just passed away from earth, was a deep Christian, loving her Redeemer, seeking to serve Him daily, so generous and gentle to all around her that they could but see where her source of joy was."

In a letter dated Tenth Month 7th, 1881, she says: "We had solemn meetings yesterday. S. F. Balderston spoke on the parable of the ten virgins so interestingly. He dwelt on their lamps being gone out, which showed that they had been lighted. He said the simple teachings of our Saviour by parable were superior to all the combined learning of the wise men of the earth; that the Holy Spirit was the holy oil for us to have in our vessels, urging the point that in my spirit the First-day morning before, 'Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of.' How often we find our spirits swerving a little from that of our Saviour's. We become too much engrossed in the world's affairs, and our spirits wander and we find them soiled. The application was very different from the place and manner in which our Saviour used the expression. Ministry is peculiar, and blessed indeed it is to be pre-erved dwelling at the Fountain head only. I often fear for myself, but know we must trust Him, our Lord."

The year 1881 was spent much as of other years of late, and the Lord has been good in all his word unto me. During vacation, I spent one month in Reading at Rose Valley Park, a nice shady place. My object was to become more acquainted with the members of that little meeting, and to draw the children to the knowl- edge of the Truth.

1882.—Sixth Month.—I have now recovered from a serious attack of pneumonia. On First- day morning, the fifth of Third Month, I was taken alarmingly ill. I longed to go to my heavenly home, but my dear Master did not come for me, and now I want to live pure, pure, so as to be ready at any time. Friends were ex- ceedingly kind, and two of my nieces came in to nurse me, so outwardly the Lord provided, and inwardly my cup of consolation was full, so that I wanted to depart and be with Christ, but did not dare to ask for it, fearing He might not see me quite ready. But oh, the longings as the dark river flowed by. Now may I do all my hands find to do, but no more.

[Letter] Eighth Month 23rd, 1882: "How interesting it was to hear about E. K. P. It is so good to realize the truth, 'that this is life eter- nal, that they might know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent.' If the dear old man has learned this, and has experienced it in the silence of our meetings, he is indeed in possession of the pearl of great price, and will not be disappointed when the Beloved maketh up his jewels. 'Not disap- pointed,' no dear, and neither will you, I fully believe; for many a baptism of suffering has been your portion. Yet, 'I have refined thee, but not with silver; I have chosen thee in the furnace of affliction,' remains true of G-d's dealings with us; so at last the dear Saviour will present us faultless in his own righteous- ness. Nothing of our own—all, all his."

Ninth Month 17th.—Been visiting nearly all my vacation. This day have been to the West Philadelphia Meeting, which is increasing in size—lined at the Shelter.

My chest seems tender, and I know not whether it will be my last school year or not. I love to be with the dear children, and hope for the Divine blessing.

1883.—Eighth Month.—An eventful year. In the Sixth Month my resignation from school duties was given in to the committee, and my prospect now is of marriage with my friend Stephen A. Webb, of Parkerville. Oh, my Lord and God, thou who hast never failed me, be pleased that thy hand may continue with me and make me a blessing. Give me meekness and wisdom to enable me to perform all my duties aright in holy fear.

During 8 seventh Month had a visit with my choice friends in Salem and West Chester. We had good meetings, and I trust the work was the Lord's work. Thankfulness covers my spirit.

Under date of Twelfth Month 1st, 1883, she writes to her friend, R. S. A., "There is nothing so sweet as peace flowing as a river. Is not that a sweet passage, 'For there is now no condemnation,' etc., and how quick the witness is to warn of the approach of any degree of evil, and if we are directly obedient to it, how the peace flows, and the union and the oneness of the Father and Son seems sealed. Yes, dear, He, our Lord is so good to send the visitations of his Spirit into the souls of men. I was impressed in the morning reading with, 'For our light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory.' Now, we see through a glass darkly, but the full fruition lies before his faithful children because He said so. Yes, dear, let us travel on with a trusting heart."

1884.—Third Month 30th.—Parkerville. It is now a little over six months since my union in marriage with S. A. Webb—and a happy wedded life it is, and my Heavenly Father is so good to me. On the fourth of Ninth Month we were married at the Sixth and Noble Streets Meeting-house, where it had been my lot to teach over twenty years. We had a good, deep-feeling meeting, for which I was so thankful. S. Mason and W. McCollin let me have a repast at their house for my friends; in the afternoon we went to Bethlehem, remained all night and proceeded to Mauch Chunk in the morning. The scenery there is worth a visit to enjoy. Seventh-day evening we reached our home here. It seems so strange still to remain from the city, more like a visit than a home. At the last Quarterly Meeting at London Grove my name was mentioned on a committee to visit the Monthly Meetings. Some of the committee were here, but the weather is so inclement and the roads so deep with mud since the thaw that it did not seem quite prudent for me to go out until the next Monthly Meeting. Oh, Father, thou hast never failed me, fail me not now, in home trials, or in outward work for thy cause. For thy Son's sake, my Redeemer, oh, be with me and make me quick of understanding in thy fear. I long to be endued with the Holy Ghost.

A FRENCH TESTIMONY RESPECTING THE CONSCRIPTION.—Lord Wolsley has recently given an interesting and clever lecture on the advantages of military service to the despotism of a nation. Monsieur le D<sup>eu</sup>puté Jules Delatoise gives another view of the question; he says:—

"I consider obligatory military service, such as we have conceived and practised (in France), the most pernicious agent of social demoralization and national dissolution that exists in the world. I have the well-considered conviction that if we permit it to continue for twenty years longer the ravages it has already commenced, there will be no longer either society or army, there will only be a disintegrated mass of people without bond of union, without discipline, and without cohesion.

"Military service as at present constituted, separates thousands of young men from the centre where they have grown up, the careers they have commenced, and the simple and upright lives which they ought to follow, and when, after three years of this alienation, it gives them back to civil life, they turn to it no longer. Many of them have become accustomed to the life of towns, and many wish to remain in the cities, and do remain, becoming workmen without work, needy without employment, discontented and unclassified. The destruction of equilibrium appears to me a great danger of the present day, and I do not hesitate to say that I consider obligatory military service as one of the most powerful agents for recruiting the ranks of revolutionary Socialism."—Herald of Peace.

General Garfield on "Margins."

[Some time ago the president of a leading Ohio college asked me if I could help him to a copy of General Garfield's speech on "Margins." I could not even recall the speech, although I remembered that the idea was a favorite one with Garfield. The president said that the speech was one that should be sent the rounds of the newspapers every two or three years for the special benefit of students. Some time after a well-known educator of Massachusetts mentioned the same speech, and, in replying to my question, said that he could furnish me a copy and promised to do so. The following is printed from the copy thus furnished. When this speech was made and by whom it was reported I am unable to tell. I print it as it comes to me.

—B. A. HINSDALE.

The following is a little speech made many years ago by President Garfield to the students at Hiram College. It was given as a familiar talk, but no one can read it without seeing the elements of true greatness and power on the part of its author:

"I was thinking, young ladies and gentlemen, as I sat here this morning, that life is almost wholly made up of margins. The bulk itself of almost anything is not what tells; that exists anyway. That is expected. That is not what gives the profit or makes the distinguishing difference. The grocer cares little for the great bulk of the price of his tea. It is the few cents between the cost and the selling price, which he calls the 'margin,' that particularly interests him. 'Is this to be great or small?' is the thing of importance. Millions of dollars change hands in our great marts of trade just on the question of margins. This same thing is all-important in the subject of thought. One mind is not greater than another, perhaps, in the great bulk of its contents; but its margin is greater, that's all. I may know just as much as you do about the general details of a subject, but you can go just a little farther than I can. You have a greater margin than I. You can tell me of some single thought just beyond where I have gone. Your margin has got me. I must succumb to your superiority.

"A good way to carry out the same idea, and better illustrate it, is by globes. Did you ever see globes whose only difference was that one had half an inch larger diameter than the other? This larger one, although there is so little difference, will entirely inclose the other, and have a quarter of an inch in every direction to spare besides. Let these globes be minds, with a living principle of some kind at their centers, which throws out its little tentacle-like arms in every direction as radii to explore for knowledge. The one goes a certain distance and stops. It can reach no farther. It has come to a standstill. It has reached its maximum of knowledge in that direction. The other sends its arms out, and can reach just a quarter of an inch farther. So far as the first mind is able to tell, the other has gone infinitely farther than it can reach. It goes out to its farthest limit and must stop; the other tells him things he did not know before. Many minds you may consider wonderful in their capacity. They may be able to go only a quarter of an inch beyond you. What an incentive this should be for any young man to work to make this margin as great a if not greater, than the margin of his fellows.

"I recall a good illustration of this when I was in college. A certain young man was leaving the class in Latin. I thought I was studying hard. I couldn't see how he got the start of us all so. To us he seemed to have an infinite knowledge. He knew more than we did. Finally, one day, I asked him when he learned his lesson. 'At night,' he replied. I learned mine at the same time. His window was not fit from mine, and I could see him from my own.

"I had finished my lesson the next night as well as usual, and, feeling sleepy, was about to go to bed. I happened to saunter to my window, and there I saw my class mate still bending diligently over his book. 'There's where he gets the margin on me,' I thought. 'But I shall not have it for once,' I resolved. 'I will study just a little longer than he does to-night. So I took my books again, and opening to it I lessened went to work with renewed vigor, watched for the light to go out in my class mate's room. In fifteen minutes it was all dark. 'There is his margin,' I thought. It was fifteen minutes more time. It was hunting out fifteen minutes more of rules and root derivative. How often, when a lesson is well prepared, just five minutes spent in perfecting it will make one best in the class. The margin in such a case as that is very small, but it is all-important. The world is made up of little things.'—The Christian Standard.

"And, brethren, as to you is committed the dispensation of the oracles of God, which give you frequent opportunities and great place with the people among whom you travel, I beseech you that you would not think it sufficient to declare the word of life in their assembly however edifying and comfortable such opportunities may be to you and them; but as we the practice of the man of God before mentioned in great measure, when among us, inquire the state of the several churches you visit, who among them are afflicted or sick, who are tempted; any are unfaithful or obstinate, and endeavor to issue those things in the wisdom and power of God, which will be a glorious crown upon your ministry. As that prepares your way to the hearts of the people to receive you as men of God, so it gives you credit with them to do them good by your advice in other respects. The afflicted will be comforted by you, the tempted strengthened, the sick refreshed, the unfaithful convicted and restored, and such are obstinate softened and fitted for reconciliation, which is clenching the nail, and applying and fastening the general testimony by the particular care of the several branches of it, I refer to them more immediately concerned in it.

"For though good and wise men and elders too may reside in such places, who are of worth and importance in the general and in other places, yet it does not always follow that they may have the room they deserve in the heart of the people they live among, or some particular occasion may make it unfit for him or her to use that authority; but you that travel a God's messengers, if they receive you in that greater, shall they refuse you in the less? And if they own the general testimony, can they withstand the particular application of it if their own cases? Thus ye will show yourselves workmen indeed, and carry your business before on to the praise of his name that hath called us from darkness to light, that you might join others from Satan's power unto God and a kingdom which is within. And oh! that at there were more of such faithful laborers in the vineyard of the Lord! never more need we the day of God!

"Wherefore I cannot but cry and call aloud to you, that have been long professors of the truth, and know the truth in the convincing power of it, and have had a sober conversation among men, yet content yourselves only to now truth for yourselves; to go to meetings, and exercise an ordinary charity in the church, and an honest behavior in the world, and limit yourselves within those bounds, feeling little or to concern upon your spirits for the glory of the Lord in the prosperity of his truth in the earth, more than to be glad that others succeed in such service; arise ye in the name and power of the Lord Jesus! behold how white the fields are unto harvest in this and other nations, and how few able and faithful laborers here are to work therein! your country folks, neighbors and kindred want to know the Lord and his truth, and to walk in it. Does nothing lie at your door upon their account? Search and see, and lose no time, I beseech you, for the Lord is at hand. I do not judge you, there is one that judgeth all men, and his judgment is true; you have nightly increased in your outward substance, may you equally increase in your inward riches, and do good with both while you have a day to do good. Your enemies would once have taken what you had from us for his Name's sake in whom you have believed, wherefore He has given you much of the world in the face of your enemies. But oh! it is to be your servant and not your master, your diversion rather than your business! let the Lord be chiefly in your eye, and ponder your ways, and see if God has nothing more for you to do; and if you find yourselves short in your account with Him, then wait for his preparation, and be ready to receive the word of command, and be not weary of well-doing when you have put your hand to the plough; and assuredly you shall reap, if you faint not, the fruit of your heavenly labor in God's everlasting kingdom.

"And you, young convinced ones, be you attracted and exhorted to a diligent and chaste waiting upon God in the way of his blessed manifestation and appearance of himself to you. Look not out but within; let not another's liberty be your snare; neither act by imitation, out sense and feeling of God's power in yourselves; crush not the tender budlings of it in your souls, nor overrun in your desires and your warmth of affections the holy and gentle notions of it. Remember it is a still voice that speaks to us in this day, and that it is not to be heard in the noises and hurries of the mind, but is distinctly understood in a retired frame. Jesus loved and chose out solitudes, often going to mountains, to gardens and sea-sides, to avoid crowds and hurries, to show his disciples it was good to be solitary and sit loose to the world. Two enemies lie near your state. Imagination and Liberty; but the plain, practical, living, holy truth, that has convinced you will preserve you, if you mind it in yourselves, and bring all thoughts, imaginations and affections to the test of it, to see if they are wrought in God, or of the enemy, or your own selves; so will a true taste, discerning and judgment be preserved to you, of what you should do and leave undone; and in your diligence and faithfulness in this way you will come to inherit substance, and Christ, the eternal wisdom, will fill your treasury. And when you are converted, as well as convinced, then confirm your brethren, and be ready to every good word and work that the Lord shall call you to, that you may be to his praise who has chosen you to be partakers with the Saints in light of a kingdom that cannot be shaken, an inheritance incorruptible, in eternal habitations.

"And now, as for you that are the children of God's people, a great concern is upon my spirit for your good, and often are my knees bowed to the God of your fathers for you, that you may come to be partakers of the same Divine life and power, that has been the glory of this day, that a generation you may be to God, a holy nation and a peculiar people, zealous of good works, when all our hearts are laid in the dust. Oh! you young men and women, let it not suffice you that you are the children of the people of the Lord! you must also be born again if you will inherit the kingdom of God! Your fathers are but such after the flesh, and could but beget you into the likeness of the first Adam; but you must be begotten into the likeness of the second Adam by a spiritual generation. And therefore look carefully about you, O ye children of the children of God, consider your standing, and see what you are in relation to this Divine kindred, family and birth! Have you obeyed the light, and received and walked in the Spirit, that is the incorruptible seed of the word and kingdom of God, of which you must be born again? God is no respecter of persons, the father cannot save or answer for the child, the child for the father, but in the sin thou sinnest thou shalt die, and in the righteousness thou doest through Christ Jesus thou shalt live; for it is the willing and obedient that shall eat the good of the land.

"Be not deceived, God is not mocked, such as all nations and people sow, such shall they reap at the hand of the just God. And then your many and great privileges above the children of other people will add weight in the scale against you, if you choose not the way of the Lord; for you have had line upon line, and precept upon precept, and not only good doctrine but good example; and which is more, you have been turned to and acquainted with a principle in yourselves which others have been ignorant of, and you know you may be as good as you please, without the fear of frowns and blows, or being turned out of doors, and forsaken of father and mother for God's sake and his holy religion, as has been the case of some of your fathers in the day they first entered into this holy path; and if you, after hearing and seeing the wonders that God has wrought in the deliverance and preservation of them through a sea of troubles, and the manifold temporal as well as spiritual blessings that He has filled them with in the sight of their enemies, should neglect or turn your backs upon so great and so near a salvation, you would not only be most ungrateful children to God and them, but must expect that God will call the children of those that knew Him not to take the crown out of your hands, and that your lot will be a dreadful judgment at the hand of the Lord. But oh! that it may never be so with any of you! The Lord forbid, saith my soul.

"Wherefore, O ye young men and women, look to the rock of your fathers; choose the God of your fathers; there is no other God but Him, no other light but his, no other grace but his, nor Spirit but his; convince you, quicken and comfort you, to lead, guide and preserve you to God's everlasting kingdom; so will you be possessors as well as professors of the truth, embracing it not only by conviction but judgment and conviction, from a sense begotten in your souls through the operation of the eternal Spirit and power of God in your hearts by which you may come to be the seed of Abraham through faith, and the circumcision not made with hands, and so heirs of the promise made to the fathers of an incorruptible crown; that, as I said before, a generation you may be to God, holding up the profession of the blessed truth in the life and power of it. For formality in religion is nauseous to God and good men; and the more so, where any form or appearance has been new and peculiar, and began and practised upon a principle with an uncommon zeal and strictness. Therefore, I say, for you to fulfil and formal, and continue the profession without that salt and savor by which it is come to obtain a good report among men, is not to answer God's love, nor your parents' care, nor the mind of truth in yourselves, nor in those that are without; who though they will not obey the truth, have sight and sense enough to see if they do that make a profession of it. For where the Divine virtue of it is not felt in the soul, and waited for, and lived in, imperfections will quickly break out and show themselves, and detect the unfaithfulness of such persons, and that their insides are not seasoned with the nature of that holy principle which they profess.

"Wherefore, dear children, let me entreat you to shut your eyes at the temptations and allurements of this low and perishing world, and not suffer your affections to be captivated by those lusts and vanities that your fathers, for truth's sake, long since turned their backs upon; but as you believe it to be the truth, receive it into your hearts, that you may become the children of God; so that it may never be said of you as the evangelist writes of the Jews of his time, that Christ the true light came to his own, but his own received Him not; but to as many as received Him, to them He gave power to become the children of God, which were born, not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God.

A most close and comprehensive passage to this occasion; you exactly and peculiarly answer to those professing Jews, in that you bear the name of God's people, by being the children and wearing the form of God's people; so that He by his light in you may be said to come to his own, and if you obey it not, but turn your back upon it, and walk after the vanities of your minds, you will be of those that receive Him not, which I pray God may never be your case and judgment; but that you may be thoroughly sensible of the many and great obligations you lie under to the Lord for his love, and your parents for their care; and with all your heart, and all your soul, and all your strength, turn to the Lord, to his gift and Spirit in you, and hear his voice and obey it, that you may seal to the testimony of your fathers by the truth and evidence of your own experience; that your children's children may bless you, and the Lord for you, as those that delivered a faithful example, as well as record of the truth of God unto them. So will the grey hairs of your dear parents yet alive go down to the grave with joy, to see you the posterity of truth, as well as theirs, and that not only their natures but Spirit shall live in you when they are gone.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

To Be Spiritually-Minded Is Life and Peace.

[We sympathize with the concern of our friend, C. H., for the increase of spiritual-mindedness amongst our members, and that they should be on their guard against becoming too much absorbed in worldly matters. Yet a proper attention to business is right in itself, and, we believe, consistent with a growth in grace; nor do we see that there is anything necessarily wrong in making suitable provision for the needs which a family may require after the decease of its head and outward care-taker. Indeed, we believe many have felt this to be a duty, and have had abundant cause to bless the Lord for his help in its performance. In most communities there appears to be more danger of devoting too much of our time and thoughts to the pursuit of business; but those who live sufficiently in communion with the Lord, will be so guided as to avoid errors on the right hand and on the left.—Ed.]

"Who goeth a warfare entangleth not himself with the affairs of this life," has by many of the Lord's servants, since it was first penned by the "great Apostle," been acknowledged, both in their lives and precepts; and I believe, when once the heart is wholly given up to follow, in the ways of holiness, Him who said, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light," that we will feel concerned that in "whatsoever we do" that "we may be enabled to 'do all to the glory of God,'" not looking for or expecting great things in this world, either for ourselves or our children, but, having "food and raiment, learn therewith to be content," not to the neglect of "providing things lawful in the sight of all men," but as becometh a people professing godliness," that we show by our walk that we press with more earnestness for the things of eternal concern than those of temporal interest.

It has seemed to me that pursuit of the world and things of the world, is to-day working more hindrance to growth in the spiritual life than those more gross immoralities, although both are but branches of the same corrupt tree.

The ever pressing passion with those more morally inclined seems to be after property, even to the full measure of time and strength, and often even further beyond the safe limit in the use of the capital of others.

Thus laying a claim against their future time and strength, it seems to me grossly inconsistent with that admonition to "Take no thought for the morrow," etc., and many not satisfied yet with the making of a home for their families during their lifetime, even lay a further tribute on the present by settling portions, by "life insurance," etc., on their families after it has pleased the "Judge of all the earth" to remove them from the care of wives and children to "the world beyond," instead of commending them to the care of "Israel's unslumbering Shepherd," whose are "the cattle on a thousand hills," who feedeth the ravens and clothes the lilies with more gorgeous robes than those of Solomon, and who has assured us that we are of more value than many sparrows, and that not a sparrow falls to the ground without his notice.

I have also noticed with sorrow how many have let the pursuit of some moral or civil reform so engross their time and thought as to exclude almost other equally important and vital questions, standing in judgment on those who could not go the same lengths in pushing their worthy questions, often to the hurt of those thus censured in many ways. I believe most of us will find, if enlisted under the banner of Truth, that, as formerly it leads not into the strifes and kingdoms of this world, but, like Matthew formerly, will feel called "from the receipt of custom." ## STRENGTH IN WEAKNESS.

MARIANNE FARNINGHAM.

"He giveth power to the faint, and to them that have no might He increaseth strength."

It is no dream, Great Comforter,
But very truth to me,
That all earth's strengthless, fainting ones,
May be made strong in Thee.

The years have taught me many things,
But none so sure as this:
That shelter, solace, joy and strength
Are always where God is.

God is my refuge and my strength—
I will not be afraid;
And though the night be wild and dark,
I meet it undismayed.

The strength to bear, or work, or wait,
Is thine, O God, to give;
And who shall weak and strengthless be
That learns in Thee to live?

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

For our dear ones safe on the other side,
We give thee praise, O Lord!
Though our hearts are sore for prayers denied,
And our songs have a broken chord,
Never the stain of shame or sin,
Never the blight of pain,
Shall come to the best who have entered in Where only love doth reign.

Entered in to the hall of the feast,
Through the gates of Jasper clear,
Where the dear Lord's hand shall lead the least,
And himself shall to all be near,
Entered in where the deathless life
Into every soul is poured;
Entered, when never told or strife
Is seen in the light of the Lord.

Some whom we lost in the long ago
Are waiting to greet us there;
Forgotten the burden of mortal woe,
Urtasted the earth's despair.
Oh, well, when we kneel at the Master's feet,
May we thank his tender love,
That saved the bitter and gave the sweet
In the cup they quaff above.

But thanks and praise for the dear ones gone
To dwell in the peace of God;
No longer weary, or spent, or lone,
No longer under the rod;
Learning and growing day by day,
Where they count not life by days,
Treading forever the upward way—
For these let us offer praise.

Swiftly and surely the hour will come
When, dropping the load of care,
We, too, shall win to the better home,
And be found of the loved ones there,
For the family life, and the family love,
Are safe in the Father's thought;
And one and all to the house above,
Shall his ransomed at last be brought.

In one town of Michigan, The Woman's Journal says, "The women seem to have everything their own way. In Decatur, with a population of one thousand five hundred, all the town officers are women, with the exception of the dog-catcher—no woman wanted that office.

The leading physician is a woman; two women conduct the principal restaurant; the proprietor of the largest dry-goods store is a woman; there are women shoemakers, painters, harness-makers and florists, and a woman postmistress. Of course the saloons have all been shut up."

Truthfulness and Sincerity.

In C. H. Spurgeon's lecture on George Fox he calls attention to his care to be truthful in his language—He says:—

"He had learned the noble habit of veiling plain speaking. I do not suppose that man beyond your Society will acquire the habit using the 'thee' and 'thou' in conversation, but that practice was a significant part of a precious whole. It was a portion of a general principle, namely, the use of words in their proper signification, and not wresting the from their right etymological position. O. admires that incident in Fox's journal where one of his persecutors says to him, 'Mr. Fox your obedient servant.' 'Beware of hypocrisy and of a rotten heart,' replies Fox: 'when I ever thy master? and when wast thou ever my servant? Do servants put their masters prison?' What a blow for poor compliment! Possibly you never had a writ, or a notice in county court action, addressed to you and signed 'your obedient, humble servant,' but that the style of things with the world. 'Oh you know,' says somebody, 'everybody knows what it means.' If a man writes a letter full of abuse he begins, 'My dear sir.' No matter how much animosity may be in a man's heart, he will be sure to address you as 'my dear sir,' and use the usual false compliments of the fashion. This might not be so bad, if it were not a part of the most terrible and crying mischief which is a parent everywhere, of persons using words in non-natural sense, or in a sense not general allowed.

"Many of the terms of business are so corrupted from their meaning that they convey false idea to the common observer, even in such plain matters as numbers and quality; but it replies, 'Well, everybody knows what it means.' It is the custom you know, and therefore you may do it.' I ask why is it the custom to speak in words which are not true? Every religion is thus tainted now. I do not know whether you will approve of what I am about to say; but I cannot refuse to say it. I feel that when a clergyman takes a child in his hands, sprinkles it, thanks God that it is regenerate, an teachers that child afterwards to say, 'In my baptism, wherein I was made a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven'—if that clergyman do not believe that such baptism made the child a member of Christ, a child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven, he is guilty of a dishonest utterance. It is a hard thing to say, but I cannot help saying it; the words are very distinct and plain. If he really is such a fool as to believe that those few drops of water have made the infant a member of Christ, child of God, and an inheritor of the kingdom of heaven, why then we cannot find fault with his so saying; but we must leave him there and pray that he may be enlightened; but I saying that, he really does not believe it, and in his preaching tells his people that they must be born again in quite another way than that of baptism, then, brethren, I cannot say otherwise than that such a course of action is dishonest. 'But nobody understands those words as they stand,' says some one. This, however is not true, for we find a numerous body who boldly advocate Baptismal Regeneration, and quote these words as the foundation of their faith. The highest Tractarianism defends itself by the plain and evident meaning of declarations which good evangelical Christian men have solemnly assented to. Now is this justifiable? Ought we not above all other things to be plain, simple and straight-forward in matters which concern the eternal interests of men's souls? What wonder is it if tricks played with language by the professed ministers of Christ should lead on to trickery in the commercial world?

"The practice of cooking accounts, issuing fictitious reports, and creating imaginary capital, is but another phase of shiftness in the use of terms, and there are some found to defend it upon the principle that everybody knows it's always done; and one is not to judge high financing by the same rule as small transactions.

"The commercial morality of this nation to a fearful extent is corrupted. If I make any allusion to this melancholy fact, people say, 'Ah! you do not understand business.' Now, if business were a correct thing I think I could understand it, if it were conducted upon perfectly honest and straight-forward principles. I am not such a simpleton as not to be able to see when a thing is honest or dishonest; and if there be a mode of conducting business which is so intricate, shuffling, and complex that I cannot understand it, and that no other minister can understand whether it is honest or not, then I say it is something which needs looking into, and requires alteration. When a common-sense Christian man cannot understand business, it is time that business should know that it has no business to be such business as it is. Should not a Christian man—I am sure the disciples of George Fox should—be transparent in his business transactions? He should be such a man that if any one should pop in and look at his accounts, he should have no need to lock up his books because of improper entries. He ought never to manipulate accounts so as to confess, 'Well, that is a very awkward piece of business; but if so and so turns up it will never be heard of, and we shall net a handsome sum, although, if another event occurs, we shall be shown up, and most men will call it a piece of roguery.' Is it so, after all, that success makes a doubtful transaction right, and that failure makes it wrong? Really, friends, this will not do. This common fabrication of wealth out of mere paper, the making of affairs to appear as they are not, the conjuring and legerdemain by which capital is created, and shares thrust upon the public; this lying and stealing on a large scale—for that is the English of it—will undermine the position of England amongst the nations, unless something be done to stay it. We had better go back to 'thee' and 'thou' with George Fox, and tell them that they are hypocrites and have rotten hearts, if we believe they have, rather than keep on complimenting each other, and uniting to maintain a fictitious state of society. The old Scotch proverb is, 'Ca me and I'll ca thee.' 'Thou treat me a man of wealth, and I will treat thee the same and as we both are men of straw, we shall keep each other up.' Thus holding hands together in a confederacy of untruthfulness they hope to be believed, and come to believe in themselves; but when the great Heart searcher comes to deal with us, he will do so upon very plain and simple moral principles, and not at all in the fashion in which some men have dealt with their fellows. I thought it necessary to say this, and if it should be a cap to fit the head of anybody here, I hope he will wear it.

"There is another respect in which we greatly need to return to the example of George Fox, to whom with all due deference to your manners and customs, I would most surely take off my hat if I met him, and excuse myself by declaring, 'George Fox, I must and will pay you more respect than I do most men, and I will for once even venture on a compliment that is distasteful to you, for I so honor your character; George Fox is to be admired for the sway which conscience had over him in little things. Take that hat matter as an instance. It is not a matter of wonderful consequence after all whether a man takes his hat off or keeps it on, excepting as it may be with him, as it was with Fox, a matter of conscience. If I believe it to be a matter of conscience and principle with me, I am not to ask questions as to how far I shall be obedient to the inward monitor, but must follow it at once in the smallest things, for if I get in the habit of violating conscience in small things I shall go on to something greater, and so on again till I have no conscience left, or only a conscience that is scared. A child may have an unfortunate propensity to steal some little thing, it may be only an apple; but still, if the parent shall wink at that fault, the child will grow up to be a thief. Your child may tell a story a little differently from the way in which it occurred, and if you do not correct it at once he may turn aside from the truth, till the habit of truth-speaking may be lost. So then, it is not the wearing of the hat or the cutting of the coat in itself that matters; it is not the importance of the thing itself intrinsically; but it involves the whole of obedience to the higher law, or willful rebellion. If an action is right let it be done; if it be not right let it be avoided, however little and contemptible others may think the case to be. The sway of Fox's conscience is to be seen in the fact of his never inquiring what other people would think of him, but resting in the liberty of the Divine presence. . . . It is my firm belief that the question never once entered George Fox's mind, as to what anybody would say about him. 'What does God think of me?' was his ruling thought. Am I acting according to the voice of God within my heart? If I am, the unicorn may hiss at me, or thrust me into prison, or call me what they will, but it matters not, I shall rest in peace, because my conscience is void of offence; but if all men speak well of me, then shall it be unto me as if the still small voice within shall tell me that I have not acted rightly in the sight of God."

Reminiscences of Mahlon Hackett.

This worthy Friend and able minister of the Gospel lived in the State of North Carolina. The meeting within whose limits he resided had greatly gone down, so that, for a time, no one attended it but himself, which he was concerned to do regularly. On a certain occasion he felt an engagement to arise and speak by way of ministry. This, doubtless, was a trial of his faith, there appearing to be nothing but the empty benches for him to address. However, yielding to this apprehension of duty, a man finally came crawling out from under a one of them, who sat down by Mahlon, and the influence of Divine god was so sensibly felt by him that he continued to come and attend on meeting days. Doubtless they verified the truth of the Saviour's promise to the "two or three gathered in his name," others being drawn to attend, it became, in time, a considerable meeting. One of the members became neglectful of the duty of assembling in the middle of the week, and Mahlon resolved to arouse him to a sense of his duty. Not being expected, he felt constrained to send him a message to the following effect. The man had sent one of his children to borrow of him something he wanted! Said Mahlon to the lad, "Is thy father going to meeting to-day?" "No; he cannot go, for he is going to move to his new house." "Tell thy father that Mahlon Hackett says that if he does not go to meeting he will have no house to move to." I can scarcely conceive how, knowing, as he must have done, the character of his admonisher, he could have disregarded it. But being determined to follow out his original plan, he took his children, with a load of goods, to the new house, and, returning for another, came in sight of the new house only to find it in flames.

Some time prior to the Separation of 1828, Mahlon paid a religious visit to the Northern States, during which the following incidents occurred. It was a peculiarity with Mahlon to be ready for service early in a meeting, and sometimes before it was fully gathered. Accordingly, once having arisen before all had gathered in, his companion could not forbear reminding him of that fact. "They are all in that I am going to preach to," and he went on with his discourse. My informant said that it was probably so, that he felt all he had a message for were then assembled.

While visiting families, he found them at a certain house, all seated, awaiting his arrival. He went around, taking each one by the hand, stood a moment, and then, saying, "Live in love and die in peace," walked out without sitting down. It was a large family, all in apparent health, yet in a few months nearly all were taken away by death.

Attending the meeting at New Garden, Columbiana County, Ohio, then a large and flourishing one, he told them that it would not be long before that house would be a habitation for owls and bats. This was literally fulfilled at the time of the Separation. Those called Orthodox built a new house, the others disagreeing, the meeting was soon lost. And I have heard my father say that often, when riding by of evenings, he had seen the bats flying in and out of the broken windows.

The next meeting was Sandy Spring. An old man of my acquaintance gave me the following relation concerning that meeting, he being then a boy and in attendance. He said Mahlon jumped up rather suddenly, saying, "I guess I've come in on you at the back door! You are a nice-looking company of Friends. Why, you look as if butter wouldn't melt in your mouths; but when you are behind the door out of sight, a great chunk of cheese as big as my fist would 't choke you."

My informant said that when this came he saw a smile pass over the faces of nearly all assembled, and that Mahlon then went to portray them as to use my informant's words "a set of hypocrites," nor did he judge him much out of the way therein. Something of an amusing tendency is at times useful.

Jos. Hoag, attending a meeting somewhere in the Southern States, apprehending, I suppose, that his remarks were not making much impression, made a full stop, and pointing upwards, said, "I wish you would stop that hole in the roof, for everything I have said for the last half hour has gone out at it."

An elderly woman with whom I was well acquainted in Ohio, told me she remembered well that eccentric minister, G. Withy, being at their meeting; that he began by giving them a lecture on the careless and unruly manner in which they were sitting—then, pausing, said, "I think I could get along better if you didn't stare at me so!" Proceeding, he remarked what an unseemly thing it was to see people gazing in a religious meeting. Pointing with his finger, "There is one gaping now!" he said. But when he had got through this, got them settled down into a state to hear, oh, how he did preach to us.

The late Thomas B. Gould related that when M. Hackett was at Newport, and desired a public meeting, he, in giving notice, fell into conversation with one who was a Baptist in profession. The man did not give any promise of attending. But Mahlon, as he so often did, was speaking, early in the meeting, when Thomas saw this man come to the door, but finding how things were, drew back as not wishing to make any disturbance. Mahlon, however, noticed him, and said, "Come in!" The stranger offering to sit down near the door, Mahlon said, "Come forward!" and, pointing to a seat, said, "Sit down there," and, immediately leaving the subject he was engaged upon, he took up baptism, and Thomas said he had never heard the subject opened as Mahlon was favored to do it that day.

From the sublime to the ridiculous is said to be but one step. Accordingly, it being at the time those called New Lights were making much disturbance and speaking often to the exercise of the right-minded, not only in meetings but private houses, one evening, as there seemed to be a drawing into silence where he was staying, not wishing to take part, he was going out, when an old woman, sitting near the door, supposing him ignorant of what was in progress, undertook kindly to enlighten him by saying, "They are going to have a settin'!" "Let them set till they hatch; I ain't going to have anything to do with it," and strode on. This, it is to be feared, broke up their intended service.

When that valiant minister, Hineman Haines, was in New England, about that time, one of this class fastened himself upon him as a companion, nor could he rid himself of the incubus. It was one of the prime articles of their creed, that there was no evil spirit separate from man's natural propensities. Where they were staying one evening, the host was relating some evil doings in the neighborhood. "This is the work of the devil," said the companion.

"What is he risen again?" said Hineman. "I thought you had killed the devil and buried him."

"This was too much for the weak-limbed companion, who thereupon took himself off, leaving Hineman to go on his way rejoicing.

A minister of another denomination, familiarly known as Father Mills, was taking a solitary walk, when he met several graceless youths, who, desiring some amusement, one of them, speaking for the rest, said, "We have just heard some news, Father Mills, that will be bad for you." "Ah! what is it?" "Why, the devil is dead." "Bad for him, as his occupation would seem to be gone." He raised both his hands, "Poor, fatherless children? What will become of you?"

I conclude these reminiscences of M. Hackett with the following incident:

A certain young woman, upon whom two suitors were waiting and who was desirous of knowing which of them would be the most suitable companion, went to a meeting at which Mahlon was, hoping, I believe, that some guidance might be vouchsafed. Mahlon was speaking as she entered, whereupon, pointing with his hand, he said, "Thou that art hesitating which of two to choose, choose neither," and immediately resumed his discourse.

I find that, in writing of John Salkeld, I omitted one incident so characteristic, I submit it.

Being in company with some military officers who were pretending they were running him upon being a Quaker and for his peace principles, they having glasses before them, he asked them what they were drinking. "It is stewed Quaker. Would not you take some?" "I don't care if I do." Taking a little sip from the glass they handed him, he said, "This is very good." Another sip. "Stewed Quaker is very good. I think you would have to stew a Presbyterian a great while to get it as good as this." J. K.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Letter from Germany.

I remember having promised to write you an account of my last and most delightful trip in the Harz, which was made two days before leaving. I had not the time then to do it, and once put off, the right opportunity never seemed to offer itself. I can scarcely realize, as I count back and find that it was five months ago, how rapidly time has flown. Five months, as one looks on ahead, seem such a length of time—but to look back upon it, it is only a breath!

It is all very clear in my mind, however, the events of those three delightful days through which the trip lasted. I can feel the fresh, clear air that came up the valley that morning, and see the rosy glow in the sky behind the mountain to the east, that showed the day was breaking, although it would be a long time yet before his rays penetrated to where we were. It was thus in the coolness and freshness of the early morning that we started out, my small companion and I, from the Forsterei, at the foot of the mountain, along whose sides rambles the quaint old town, St. Andreasberg. We had had an invitation to spend a day and a night with relatives of a friend, the former living in Clausthal, another town of the Harz, situated, as the Germans count distances, something over five hours from Andreasberg. One can reach this town by train in about as many hours by changing cars several times and travelling half-way around the outer border of the Harz. Then, too, there is a stage line going direct over the mountains. But who, when one could walk, would think of taking a stage, even with the privilege of sitting up by the driver. Oh, no; that would not be half so delightful. And a train! But that was not even to be dreamed of! So we started fresh and early, climbed the steep road to the town, and there took the regular chaussee leading to Clausthal. I have told you before that the roads in the Harz are everywhere perfect—really you can hardly believe how perfect—the foot-paths, in their way, quite as well as the chaussees. Of course, the latter are always more interesting for pedestrians. But in this particular case, we had no choice, as we wished to take the nearest road. Wherever there was a view to be had, there one would find a rustic seat, and often, also, where there was no view, as the way led mostly through tall timber.

There was comparatively little climbing to be done, as both towns lay at about the same level, namely, a little over two thousand feet, and the road we took went along a ridge that, later, broadens out into a plateau. One must comforting fact, as one tramps about in the Harz is the certainty of finding the roads marked in the most accurate manner at every possible point where one might be in doubt. If it is a narrow path one is on, then the trees are marked every few hundred feet with certain colors, sometimes quite a string of them, and as one comes to where the ways divide, each color goes off in its own proper direction, and one can easily find what each color means, for, in the maps of the region given out by the "Harz Club" all this is clearly explained.

On the chaussees there is a stone post about foot high, placed every hundred meters, with the number in kilometers large, and the hundred meters small, as a decimal, so, "9.—9.1—9.2—9.3," &c. But, as the markings began from Clausthal in this particular case, we came to them all backwards. At first we were very light-hearted, as we met no one, we entertained ourselves by repeating all the poems which the small companion had learned in school, and which I had been forced to learn from her in our various walks, so as to keep the peace. When these were exhausted, we repeated those she had learned from me, by way of retaliation, and which were rather more to my taste. But even this, after a while lost its charm, and we had to resort to new expedients to make the way seem short. We came finally upon a scheme which lasted all the rest of the trip. First, after not having paid attention for some time, we would guess what number would be on the next stone (I confess that, as a rule, I would be wrong on the small companion's right), and then we would try to walk the hundred meters in a minute and the kilo-meter in ten, or else we would run races from stone to stone. By variations of this simple method we managed to have a great deal of fun (at least, one would have judged so from the laughing one might have heard), and when we came into Clausthal, about half-past twelve we were neither tired nor able to tell how the time had gone so quickly. As we reached the centre of the town, we found the "Market Platz" filled with peasants sitting behind their wares mostly eatables, exposed for sale, for we had happened on a market-day. It presented a very pleasing, lively spectacle.

The family whom we were to visit lived in a large house facing the market. Having sought it out, we were made at once very comfortable by a cordial welcome, and remained there until the next noon, when the small companion returned by stage to Andreasberg, and I continue my way, on foot to G. star, the place of all other that I had most wanted to see in the Harz.

It was a hot, dusty walk fully half of the way and I met so many people that I did not enjoy it especially—the walk over, I mean—and at tired, quite overcome with the heat, in Goslar about half-past four. But the sight of the old town revived me. I wasted no time, however in finding the Hanover Hotel—which, by the way, is the best, and, in fact, only hotel in the place to which a woman could well go alone.

Having secured a room, I rested for half an hour. I ordered a cup of coffee in the pleasant garden back of the hotel, and at the same time a small guide of the town, both of which were soon brought to me. Here in the coolness and freshness of the garden, I could study the plan of the town, take my bearings, and decide upon my course.

Judging from my own state of ignorance before coming to Germany, I take it for granted that you do not know exactly why Goslar is a well worth a visit. Well, I will tell you. Buirst, let me ask you a question. Did you ever undertake to straighten out the history of Germany way back in those centuries following the breaking up of the Empire, under the sons of Charlemagne? If you have never straightened his out, I will not undertake to do it for you—only this I will say, that the last ruler of the line of Charlemagne died A. D. 911, and was followed by a certain Konrad, after whose death, eight years later, Germany became an Electorate—I mean, elected her emperors. As a general thing, however, when the emperor gave satisfaction, the crown passed from father to son. Following Konrad, came a list of Henrys and Ottos, who belonged to the Saxton dynasty, and, after some interval, followed the Hohenstauffen line, foremost among whom was the famous Barbarossa. It is supposed to have been Heinrich . . . , who, sometime in the early part of the tenth century, founded Goslar. About this time silver mines were discovered in the mountains just back of the site of the town. They were found so rich that the attention of the Emperors was soon and more delectable this way, and finally, Heinrich II., or "de Heilige" (the Holy), made Goslar the imperial residence. This was about A. D. 1000, and, for well on to two hundred and fifty years the town remained warmly favored by its successors, who made it, from time to time, their residence also. Heinrich VI. was born in the old "Kaiser-haus," and his heart is buried there. Following A. D. 1250 came a time when Goslar no longer rejoiced in the imperial smile and her importance declined when, during the fifteenth century, as a member of the powerful Hausa, she reached a state of prosperity never equalled either before or afterwards in the course of her history.

But enough of this. Feeling, at last, thoroughly refreshed, I started on my tour of exploration. The hotel was just outside the wall, and in entering the town I must pass through a old gateway with high towers, in places quite overgrown with vines, which softened a little their massive, formidable appearance. But how can I give you any idea of Goslar? I stand simply appalled at the thought! Those winding, narrow streets, where one could shake hands cross from window to window; those houses covered with quaint, and often grotesque, carvings and mottoes; the old churches and towers and cloisters; the brook that came down through the quaintest part, with its old mills and funny bridges, and the still funnier old women, washing clothes along its banks and chattering to each other. Oh, this all means so little! If you could only see it! It was so delightful to turn upon some narrow lane between high walls and come out on some tower or house or square more surprisingly quaint than anything yet, and to ask questions of some dirty-faced urchin, or to laugh at, and then to laugh back in return, for it was not information that one wanted, but simply some means of giving vent to one's overwrought sensations. But, after all, the most deliciously fascinating thing about Goslar is the roofs. Oh, those roofs! You have noticed that roofs have a peculiar effect upon one, have you not? I cannot analyze the sensation, and do not profess to understand it, but it is at all events real. But the roofs of Goslar! they are nearly all covered with slate taken from the mountains near by, and often the whole one is covered with them. But the charm does not lay in the slate, for there are houses there, of wood, or else old ones remodelled, covered in the same way—but oh, so ugly—and simply because the owner had taken the pains to have the tiles all cut in definite shape, and arranged in straight lines or figures. And then to have a house that stands solid and erect on all fours! It is so much more fascinating to be a little tipsy, and rub one's head against one's neighbor. Not it is only the tipsy, rambling, jolly old houses that are so delicious. There goes a roof higher than the rest of the house itself, cutting the sky like the blade of a knife. Then comes one unpretentious, simply low and flat, then another half as high, and so on and so on—and always one roof, rambling down the street with its wild, impossible lines and tiles of different shapes and sizes. Younder is a little broad-based, smiling house snugged up against a big one, like a little child inside its mother's sun-bonnet, and by the side of that a half-grown youngster taking refuge under the eape.

After one has looked a while one begins to wonder whether the houses, after all, may not be straight, and one's self tipsy, and one seeks about for a post or something to hold on to. But it is no matter, the effect is delicious, all the same. The two things that every one must see in Goslar are the "Kaiser-haus" and the "Rath-haus." It was too late to visit the latter that evening, though I walked around it a good deal, but I succeeded in joining the last group that was admitted into the former, for which I was very grateful. On the way to this latter building, I stopped at an old convent dating back to the thirteenth century. It is now used as a home for old widows of the poorer classes. On entering, one comes into a long, narrow hall, very dark, which, in the old days, was the dining-room of the monks. On both sides were ranged the cells, each of which was now inhabited by an old woman. One of the inmates advanced as I entered, and offered to show me around. There were also many other visitors looking about. The most interesting thing there was an old chapel, with an altar-piece decorated with a very rude carving in wood of the crucifixion, which, though in itself unpretentious in the extreme, is of great interest owing to its antiquity. There is not much more to be seen, except the kitchen, where each and every one did her own cooking, and the court-yard, where a number of crippled and wrinkled old grandmothers sat chattering together, and who answered my greeting with a friendly nod and smile.

On request, my conductress showed me her room, still exactly in the same condition, so far as the walls are concerned, as it was when built, so many centuries ago. What touched my imagination was the window-seat, built in the thick walls, so that when one sat there, one's head came just up to the little window that looked out on the street. At the sight of this the old woman, with her furniture, vanished like a dream. The cell stood empty, except for the one solemn figure of a cowed monk straining his neck to get a glimpse into that world from which his vows separated him forever, but to which his heart ever and anon turned, a sin for which he would make amends by and by with the scourge that hung on the wall yonder. If I had left the cold shade of the damp old building, the vision still clung to me, and yet, whenever my thoughts wander thitherward, I see the same monk sitting there, stretching his neck, and he is very much more real than anything which I did in reality see.

Most impressive is the sight of the old "Kaiser-haus," as one comes to the imposing stone terrace, with its hand-some grounds. It has been recently restored to as nearly its early condition as is possible. The only trouble with it is that it is too new, for nearly all its restoration, as very little of the old walls had been left standing. It is a great attraction is the immense "Reichs-saal," forty-six metres long and fifteen broad, with the throne in the centre, at one side. It is at present being decorated—is, in fact, nearly finished—with magnificent paintings by ——. At this point I stopped to refresh my memory by a look into the guide-book, but I failed in finding the name. I do not believe, however, that you have lost much. These pictures illustrate scenes of importance in the history of Germany. E. S. KILL.

Is a discussion at the Nineteenth Century Club, in this city, lately, on "The Future of Man in the Light of Evolution," Prof. John Fiske, said:

"It is an era of skepticism, when all things in Heaven and earth are called upon for their credentials; but it is a mistake to think that the end of religious belief is at hand. So far from religion and the churches coming to an end, we shall see a revival surpassing that of the thirteenth century, which built the great cathedrals of Europe. We cannot prophesy anything; but it is logical to believe from deduction in a future world, because the progress of development as shown is opposed to a doctrine of extinction. The doctrine of evolution is distinctly in favor of the doctrine of a future life."—The Independent.

THIRD MONTH 27, 1897.

HADDONFIELD QUARTERLY MEETING.

This body convened at Haddonfield, N. J., on the eleventh of Third Month. The weather was fine, the road in good condition and the attendance large.

After a time of silent waiting, several of those present seemed to feel their minds impressed with concerns for the good of the people, and sought to find relief by expressing them. Christ was held up to view as the foundation of religion, and the importance of the doctrine of Divine revelation was enforced. Warning and entreaty were offered to those who had not fully yielded to Divine visitations, no longer to keep out of their hearts the Saviour of men who was seeking to enter and bless them.

We were reminded that the right movement to all religious work must come from the Spirit of Christ in each individual heart, and that the advice or the example of others, was not a sufficient authority.

Yet it must be borne in mind that such advice may, and often does, come from the operation of that holy Spirit on the hearts of others, and therefore, if rejected, we are in danger of going counter to the Divine will. We have our treasure in earthen vessels, and ought to be willing thankfully to accept whatever help the Lord is pleased to afford us, either immediately or through the aid of instruments.

How edifying is the advice of that wise elder, Isaac Pennington, to Friends of Christ! "Friends, you that are weak, bless God for the strength. You that have need of a pillar to lean upon, bless God that He hath provided pillars in his house, and in tear and the guidance of his Spirit, make use of these pillars, who are faithful and have ability from God, in his power and glorious presence with them, to help to sustain his building, even as they had ability from the Lord to gather unto Him. He that despiseth Him that is sent despiseth Him that sent Him; and he that undervalues any gift, office or work that God hath bestowed upon any person, despiseth the wisdom and disposal of the Giver. Are all fathers? Have all overcome the enemy? Are all given up in the life? Are all stars in the firmament of God's power? Hath God made all equal? Are there not different states, different degrees, different growths, different places, etc.?

"Then, if God hath made a difference, and given degrees of life and gifts different, according to his pleasure, what wisdom and spirit is that which doth not acknowledge this, but would make all equal? O my friends, fear before the Lord! Honor the Lord in his appearances, and in the differences which He hath made among the children of men and among his people. He gave prophets of old, and the rest of the people were not equal with them. He gave evangelists, apostles, pastors, teachers, etc., and the other members of the churches were not equal with them. He hath given fathers and elders now, and the babes and young men are not equal with them."

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President has sent to the Senate the nominations of John Hay, of the District of Columbia, to be Ambassador to Great Britain; Horace Porter, of New York, to be Ambassador to France; Henry White, of Rhode Island, to be Secretary of the Embassy to Great Britain; and Powell Clayton, of Arkansas, to be Minister to Mexico. All the above nominations have been confirmed by the Senate.

Representatives of the Powers have notified Secretary Sherman of the beginning of the blockade of Cuba, and of the vessels of neutral Powers, including those of the United States, while subject to overhaul, in their ordinary commercial operations, if they carry a merchandise for the Greeks or insurgents. It is a question whether our Government will give its assent to this form of blockade, which involves a grave departure in international law, and would establish a precedent.

The Topeka Capital publishes a statement claiming that the mortgage indebtedness of Kansas has been reduced fifty-five per cent. in seven years. About $10,000,000 of Kansas mortgage debt is held by people out of State.

The State of Nevada, having legalized prize-fighting, two notorious pugilists engaged in this brutal sport last week. One New York paper announced that it had engaged the services of John J. Ingalls, ex-United States Senator, of Kansas, and at one time presiding officer in the United States Senate; also the Governor of Nevada, as reporters for its columns. On the other hand, the Christian Arbitration and Peace Society adopted a resolution recording "its sorrow at the very general interest taken throughout in the personal contest between two noted prize-fighters," and protesting against "this exhibition of brutality." The Lehigh, of Philadelphia, editorially condemned and deplored the disgraceful and demoralizing occurrence. This action of the Lehigh has been commended by the Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian Ministerial Associations of this city, and the latter has received numerous letters of approval from many private citizens, including Friends, both of our own and the Race Street organizations.

According to the Galeston News, "In spite of a continuous multiplication of courts and authorities, we have gone up from 1,100 murders in 1886 to 14,000 murders in 1896. In many instances the courts have continued to dilate, and the juries have yielded justice, and by mechanically neglecting to convict every citizen who depended upon the law. And this is not all. Many a criminal has been given his liberty as the price of campaign help rendered by his influential relatives and friends. Many a candidate has been elected to office under the expectation of his considerate forbearance toward certain classes in their regular business of violating the law.

In consequence of the work in the Mississippi River and its tributaries, thousands of families in Arkansas and other States have been driven from their homes. A number of lives have been lost, and breaks in the levees are reported at several points. Many square miles were under water.

According to the Electrical World, Philadelphia has a greater mileage of electric railways than the whole of Germany.

Waltham, Mass., had 336 less arrests for drunkenness last year than in 1895. During the past year it has been under no-license.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 543, which is 22 more than the previous week, and 24 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 293 were males and 250 females; 102 died of pneumonia; 50 of consumption; 34 of heart disease; 27 of old age; 21 of influenza; 20 of apoplexy; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of typhoid fever; 14 of convulsions; 14 of nephritis; 13 of brain disease; 12 of Broca's disease; 11 of scarlet fever; 11 of whooping cough; 10 of influenza; 10 of marasmus; 10 of typhoid fever; 10 of croup, and 9 from casualties.

LOTION was quiet and unchanged, at 7 1/2c per pound for Middleling oils.

FEED.—Spot bran ranged from $13.50 to $14.00 per ton for winter in bulk, and $12.75 a $13.25 for spring in sacks.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.50 a $2.75; do., extras, $2.75 a $3.10; Pennsylvania, extra, $3.00 a $4.10; do., do., straight, $2.90 a $3.90; Western winter, extra, $3.90 a $4.10; do., do., straight, $4.20 a $4.35; do., do., patent, $4.90 a $4.60; spring, clear, $3.50 a $3.75; do., straight, $3.90 a $4.15; do., patent, $4.25 a $4.40; do., favorite brands, higher. City mills, extra, $2.90 a $3.15; do., clear, $4.00 a $4.20; do., straight, $4.25 a $4.40; do., patent, $4.80 a $5.00. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 a $2.50; do., well, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 84 1/2 a 85; No. 2 mixed corn, 27 1/2 a 28; No. 3 white oats, 22 1/2 a 23c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 a 5 1/2; good, 3 1/2 a 4 1/2; medium, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4; common, 4 a 4 1/2; 2000, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4; medium, 4 a 4 1/2; common, 3 1/2; lamb's, 3 a 3 1/2.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5 1/2 a 6; other, Western, 5 a 5 1/2; State, 5 a 5 1/2.

FOREIGN.—During last year no less a quantity than 67,551,959 pounds of tobacco was smoked in the United Kingdom, an increase of over 2,000,000 pounds, as compared with the preceding twelve months. While the population has increased by one per cent., the increase in the consumption of tobacco is three per cent.

A proclamation issued by the foreign Admirals, announcing the conditions under which autonomy will be granted to Crete, promises the adoption of measures to insure the workings of complete autonomy for the island, and guarantees to every one, of whatever race or religion, perfect liberty and security of property. The proclamation concludes by saying: "A new era is opening for Crete. Let all persons lay down their arms. The Powers count upon the co-operation of Christians and Moslems alike to aid in the task with which we are entrusted, and to persevere."

Great Britain insists upon the Powers giving Greece two weeks' notice before the foreign warships blockade the Pirææ, the port of Athens, and the port of Volo in Thessaly, and is not in favor of Russia's project that the foreign troops in Crete attack the Greek army's occupation and compel their withdrawal.

It is reported that the Trans-Atlantic Cable has been severed by the Orange Free State has been divided upon. Among the recent discoveries made by means of the Roentgen rays, reported from Berlin, are several relating to diseases of the heart. It has been observed in cases of asthma that the right half of the diaphragm contracts in a spasmodic way, and the left half is compelled to bear all the exertion.

A company has been formed which made an offer to the municipality of St. Petersburg to light all the streets of the city with electric lights for the same price that it now pays for the very unsatisfactory gas-lighting of the city.

The Waltham reports says: "The annual report of the Society for the Protection of Birds contains many two or three interesting statements to which attention may be directed. With regard to the use of birds and feathers in personal adornment, it is stated that the 'rigger and more repulsive forms of this mode' are undoubtedly less often seen now than in ancient years. It must now be generally known that the wearing of stuffed birds on hats is regarded with feelings of extreme disgust by a large and constantly increasing portion of the public, and that knowledge has no effect without effect. The trade in stuffed birds has declined enormously. Those who continue to offer for exhibition market at the enormous price of $10 per ounce per pair of propolis, and various other stuffed birds in their hats, can but excite surprise rather than admiration. In the 'lamentable passion' for wearing 'opseys' or 'sigarettes' of white herons' feathers, there is, however, little change. The fact that a few of the finest sample of the plumage have been secured in the Louisiana market at the enormous price of $10 per ounce per pair of such evidence that the white egret is still being pursued to extermination."

The Consul General of the United States at Honolulu has given out the results of the census lately taken in Hawaii. This shows the total population of the islands to be 108,210, the native Hawaiian number being 31,019, the Japanese 4,407, the Chinese 21,616, the Portuguese 15,191, half-breed Hawaiians 8185 with a few thousand Americans, British, Germans, etc.

A preparatory Antarctic expedition will start from Melbourne during the summer, and will pass the winter on Victoria Land. The main expedition, with two ships, will set out in the latter part of the first expedition, and will proceed southward along the meridian of Kerguelen Islands. One of the ships is to remain there while the other will attempt to reach the magnetic pole and the South Pole.

The French Line Steamship Ville de St. Nazaire, which sailed from New York on Third Month 6th bound for the West Indies, was foundered at sea. Of eighty-two passengers and crew only four are known to be saved. These arrived on the 17th instant on the schooner Hilda, after a week's drifting about the Atlantic in an open boat, during which twenty-four of the twenty-eight occupants went mad or died of starvation.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS FREEDMEN'S ASSOCIATION, of Philadelphia.—A public meeting in the interests of our school at Christiansburg, Va., will be held at Twelfth Street Meeting-house, on the evening of Second-Lay, Third Month 26th, at 8 o'clock. BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, of Tuskegee, Ark., will be present, and an address by the same friend, a memorial by one interested, are cordially invited to attend. By order of the Association, ELLISTON P. MORRIS, President.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—The General committee meet in Philadelphia, Sixth Day, Third Mo. 26th, at 11 A. M. The Committee on Instruction meet the same day, at 9 A. M. WM. EVANS, Clerk.

1884.—On the twenty-sixth of Third Month, my dear husband was taken ill with acute bronchitis, and it soon developed into pneumonia. He was very patient and the doctor gave us encouragement, but on the morning of the sixth of Fourth Month, he passed away from us about our o'clock, and I am a widow. The interment took place on the ninth of Fourth Month. I have a humble hope that he is accepted of the Father, for our cry has been great to Him for many days and weeks. We had lived together a much sweetness for seven months and four days. I can thank thee, oh, Father that thou avest him to me. My own health seems poor, at any time I serve thee all thou wouldst. Thou hast promised to be a God of the widow. Oh, be pleased in mercy to give me wisdom and meekness for every emergency.

In allusion to this event, she writes to a friend under date of Fourth Month 12th, 1884:

"Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." How often I used to read that promise, and wonder if it would ever be mine; or in my short life there have been so many tribulations to be endured, and I would query, did He not see me? Well, He has seen, has heard and worked marvelously indeed to bring about all, all this. How I can adore his mercy now, but miss my dear one so much. Nightly we had our good little time together in secret, and if not expressed before, my yearning cry as if I left his side that he might be fitted for entrance into the pearl gates, little thinking it would be so soon. . . . So that it is all oddness and mercy, and I have my quiet assurance, too, that he, my dear S——, is safe."

In another letter dated Sixth Month 8th, alluding to some thought of leaving Parkerville, he writes, "As it seems that our Heavenly Father performed almost a miracle in bringing me here, I can scarcely see how it should be as well to take me from the place so soon. I could not see my way to West Chester Meeting."

. . . May He give us heavenly wisdom, so good to guide poor, frail man. I feel much better than before our little round to our Monthly meetings. Sister H. Savery was so kind, and dear Master helped, so that I hope his own work will be revived and renewed in the hearts of some. Our mid-week meetings so small, but First-days larger."

Ninth Mo. 30th.—The Quarterly Meeting's Committee have been attending the Monthly Meetings as they came in course. On the fourth of this month I felt as if I must offer to visit in Gospel love the families of New Garden Monthly Meeting, D. E. C.— offered to accompany me, and we proceeded in much unity of spirit. Our exercises were often very great, and the work weighty. We wanted the pure hidden life, reached and raised up. We need elders that will keep their spirits down, often with their mouths in the dust before the Lord, for the arming of his power to help the poor ministers at such times as well as at others.* There are those here to whom we are nearly united. We finished this service on the twenty-eighth, with the feeling that the Lord himself had been good to us. Praises and thanksgiving be unto his Holy Name."

In allusion to this visit, she writes Tenth Month 5th, to her friend, R. S. A. —:

"We have nearly finished (the families of New Garden), only two more visits remaining. Dear D—— was such a help to me, and now we return, feeling that the dear Master has been so good to us. Thy dear letter reached me—I just wanted a word of cheer from thee and thou gave it. We wanted to reach the sweet, pure life in the hearts of the people, and truly our Shepherd went before, often helping with his 'resurrection power' to bring the feeling. Day after day it seemed just so, and we had to be encouraged. . . . Now my spirit gives thanks and power in the anthem, 'Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty! Just and true are all thy ways, thou King of saints.'"

Twelfth Month.—At our last Monthly Meeting at Parkerville, Z. H. — and D. E. C. — opened a concern to visit families in this meeting. I felt that I must accompany them. We passed through it, to the peace and satisfaction of our minds, the blessed Presence going with us, we humbly believe. Oh, our Father, give the fruits, and the increase we beg of thee. Raise up thy life in these parts, and give us more faithful, concerned members.

The following is from a letter to her friend R. S. A. —, of Eighth Month 30th, 1885:

"To go through our daily duties, with a spirit a little to be from them, lifting up our hearts on high; communing at times and breathing for preservation. Ah, this makes us feel that heaven is beautiful, and we long to be there."

1885.—First Month 7th.—To another friend: "There were many at meeting to-day, on the men's side, but my dear Heavenly Father let me remain silent. This silent worship, when a whole congregation is baptized into it, is very solemn. I long for a deeper baptism of his Spirit for our assemblies. I long for his hand to be laid upon sons and daughters, to raise them up in the ministry, throughout our Quarterly Meeting. 'If two of you shall agree concerning a thing, and shall ask,' etc., cannot we be the two or three to plead for these good things according to his command to pray for laborers? Yes, dear heart, the Lord's cause is worth being spent for?"

* That truly anointed elders, when sent on religious service as companions to ministers, will be brought into a feeling of sympathy with them there is no doubt. It is understood that our late beloved friend, Clarkson Sheppard, remarked that upon more than one occasion, when under exercise in a religious meeting as a minister, he was conscious of his friend and companion, James Emelen's mind being similarly engaged for his support and right direction.

Parkerville, Third Month 19th, 1885.

"The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year"—yes, on the twenty-sixth of this month, last year, my S——, my dear S——, was taken ill, and now I am looking back over it all, and can truly say that the Lord gave and the Lord has taken away; blessed be his Holy Name—yes, blessed for all his mercies.

. . . The ministry is often a mystery to me, for in a moment of time and unexpectedly to the poor, empty vessel, a whole vision of service may be mapped out. This remark brought to mind at the time, when the word was brought, of my recommendation to the ministry, how tears would come and in the secrecy of my room the living comfort came. 'Fear not, the lion of the tribe of Judah hath prevailed to open the book and to unloose the seven seals thereof.' If it was only He, and not myself, then I was content to be the clay. But the humiliation of the creature is so great, we have to feel deeply for any one called in that line; and poor L——, if she is to be an instrument, has much to go through; but child-like simplicity sweetens it all.

"But, dear, that morning* is so marked in my memory by the crown that seemed to be almost as a halo just above us, and you, my endeared Friend, were to be partakers of it. Marvellous are his doings in our midst. He does not fail me, and let us trust all in his dear hands."

In her diary she writes, "In the Sixth Month it seemed laid upon me to offer a visit to the families of London Grove Monthly Meeting. My dear friend D. E. C. — obtained permission to go with me—both of us members of the quarterly Meeting's Committee— which precluded the necessity of asking for a minute from home. This service was very humbling. We were baptized into the state of things at Kennet Square for the members who are so far from meeting they cannot all attend. Some of us thought it would be well to have an indulged meeting there."

Under date of Eighth Month 27th, 1885, she wrote to her friend R. S. A. — "At the quarterly Meeting (Western) on the presentation of a requirement sometime previously, the poor friend had felt like Jonah, but the dear Master strengthened, and I had to ask for the shutters to be opened, for a joint select session. Friends feelingly agreed, and my helpmeet D— joined me afterwards in labor for the sleepers. The case of Elisha, where the young prophet brought of the wild vine and knew it not, and threw it into the pot. The sleeping and worldly spirit brought death into the meeting particularly our smaller meetings. Elisha said, Bringing in a handful of meal; it was put in and healing experienced. Our Saviour was the bread of life, so it He comes with us into our meetings, we are healed."

Eighth Month.—Our Committee still continued in the Quarterly Meeting. The Friends of Coloma, Md., asked for an indulged meeting. Eleventh Month.—The dear Master is working wonderfully for the Colara Friends, and I have a humble hope that one at least will be raised up as a Samson of old to carry on the Lord's work in that place. The preparation for the ministry is indeed a humbling work, we must lay down our wills, that we may follow his will, and speak the word of the Lord only."

In allusion to the visit to families of London Grove Monthly Meeting, she writes to her friend, R. S. A.—, "I must tell thee how it has been faring with me. Thou knew of the Quarterly Meeting's D. E. C. and myself had visited all the families but London Grove and that loomed up before me in uncertainty and shrinkfulness at times, but the seal was set in the Select Yearly Meeting, sitting by thy side, J. E. R.'s deep, sweet supplication reached to the witness, probably in many hearts, and I guess the Master answered.

"We asked permission of the London Grove Monthly Meeting and obtained consent. G. and Amy Sharpless accompanied us, and we were helped, helped. Oh, my dear, I could almost sing aloud of his mercy and goodness in answering the humble petition of my soul for mercy. Have mercy upon me! Have mercy upon me, for thy dear Son's sake, and touch my lips with a live coal from off thy holy altar, that the words I speak may be living words. This, at every sitting was the almost agonizing cry, and blessed be his holy Name forever. He heard and my soul adores in humble prostration. My precious companion was helped, too, and we feel peaceful.

ARABIAN NIGHTS' FANCIES AND LATTER-DAY FACTS.—The Germans imagine that they have fairy kobolds, sprites, and gnomes which play under ground and haunt mines. I know a real one. I will give you his name. It is called "gravitation." The name does not sound any more fairy-like than a sledge-hammer. But its nature and work are as fairy like as a spider's web. I will give an-other sample of his helpful work for man.

In the mountains about Salzburg, south of Munich, are great thick beds of solid salt. How can they get it down to the cities where it is needed? Instead of digging it out and packing it on the backs of mules for forty miles, they turn in a stream of water, make a little lake, which absorbs very much salt—all it can carry. Then they lay a pipe, like a fairy railroad, and gravitation carries the salt water gently and swiftly forty miles to where the railroads can take it everywhere. O, it goes so easily. There is no railroad to build, no cars to haul back, only to stand still and see gravitation do the work.

How do they get the salt and water apart? O, just as easily. They ask the wind to help them. They cut brush about four feet long, and pile it up twenty feet high and as long as they please. Then a pipe with holes in it is laid along the top, the water trickles down all over the loose brush, and the thirsty wind blows through and drinks out most of the water. They might let on the water so slowly that all of it would be drunk out by the wind, leaving the solid salt on the bushes. But they do not want it there. So they turn on so much water that the thirsty wind can drink only the most of it, and the rest drops down into great pans, needing only a little evaporation by boiling to become beautiful salt again, white as the snows of winter.

There are other minerals besides salt in the beds in the mountains, and, being soluble in water, they also come down the tiny railroad with musical laughter. How can we separate them so that the salt shall be pure for our tables?

The other minerals are less avaricious of water than salt, so they are precipitated, or become solid sooner than salt does. Hence with nice care the other minerals can be left solid on the bushes, while the salt brine falls off. Afterward pure water can be turned on and these other minerals can be washed off in a solution of their own. No fairies could work better than those of solution and crystallization.

Life Term Confession of "Bruises and Putrefying Sores."

JOSIAH W. LEEDS.

When George Fox, in the year 1650, being but twenty-four years of age, was thrust into Derby jail for the testimony of Jesus, although miserably charged with being a "blasphemer," he says of the occasion:

"While I was here in prison, divers professors came to discourse with me. I had a sense before they spoke that they came to plead for sin and imperfection. I asked them whether they were believers and had faith? They said, yes. I asked them in whom? They said, in Christ. I replied, If ye are believers in Christ, you are passed from death to life; and if passed from death, then from sin that bringeth death: and if your faith be true, it will give you victory over sin and the devil, purify your hearts and consciences (for the true faith is held in a pure conscience), and bring you to please God, and give you access to Him again. But they could not endure to hear of purity, and of victory over sin and the devil.

When George C. Grubb, the "low church" Episcopalian evangelist, with Edward C. Millard and several others, were at Dunedin, New Zealand, in the course of their mission tour, in 1802, they stood in behalf of and against the foregoing Scripture truths which Fox had maintained before the professors of the Established Church, in the common jail at Derby, two centuries and a half ago. When Millard, being accosted on the street by a citizen, expressed his belief in "holiness, without which no man shall see the Lord," the other called out with uncontrollable indignation, "Damnable doctrine!" Laying his hand gently on the arm of the stranger, Millard reminded him that "the Lord distinctly teaches in the Scripture that He came to redeem us from all iniquity, and that He does not want us to go on sinning after we are born again. If I sin," he continued, "it is not God's fault; He has provided a way so that we may be kept from sin. 'These things write

I unto you, that ye sin not, and if any man sin we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous.' 'Tell the Lord, indeed Nonsense!' and he shook me off like a viper and made away as fast as he could go without another word. 'Able to keep you from falling and to present you faultless before the presence of his glory.'" (Jude xxiv).

At Wanganui, also in New Zealand, a missionary to the Maoris, of the Church Missionary Society, was so impressed by the simplicity of service of the visiting brethren, and the evidence of God's blessing upon their labors, that having had a season of silent waiting before the Lord his heart was so cleansed and filled that he became a changed man. Laying aside his old manuscripts, he trusted the Lord to give him a message that would come straight from the heart. In an extended letter written eight months later to George C. Grubb, in which were no evidences of a pleading for imperfection and sin, but, rather, the language of great joy for the soul's purification that had been vouchsafed him, he says: "Oh what glories times the dear Lord has given me since we parted at Napier, the night you left for Gisborne! 'Joy unspeakable and full of glory,' just expresses it. Over and over again I have prayed to the Lord not to give me any more joy, because flesh and blood could not endure it; but He taught me to pray for a bigger heart and now there is room for all. I used to sing 'I've reached the land of corn and wine,' etc. but I did not know anything about it then and now the Lord has stationed me on the highest mount of Beulah Land, and it is all glory. 'Praise the Lord, O my soul.' 'My soul doth magnify the Lord.'"

I will now go back in the narrative to refer to an incident happening at a town not far from Melbourne. A woman from a distance, coming up to the wife of E. C. Millard, at the close of an afternoon meeting appointed for her, said in great distress, "that the real hindrance to be definitely receiving the blessings brought forth was so prominently in the mission was, that the clergyman in the parish where she lived had told her that every blessing was received in baptism and confirmation, viz: regeneration a baptism, and the power of the Spirit at confirmation. The lady told him that Mr. Grubb preached quite differently, and she had heard him say that many needed forgiveness of sin and the power of the Spirit, although they had been both baptized and confirmed." "Oh, said the clergyman, "that is easily accounted for by the fact that Mr. Grubb belongs to the Church of Ireland, and their prayer book is totally different to the Church of England." The narrator, however, adds, "There is no material difference."

The writer of this article, a member of the Society of Friends, is not conversant with the differences, large or small, of the two forms, again, just how these differ, from the book in use in the Reformed Episcopal Church.

About a century and a half ago, Thomas Chalkley, of Philadelphia, wrote an epistle entitled, "Some truly tender scruples of conscience about that form of prayer called the Common Prayer, as used by members of the Church of England," in which he considers chiefly the four following self-confessions, which he believes lead to much sorrowful perversion in their practical applications, namely: "We are miserable sinners," "We are full of bruises and putrefying sores," "From the crown of the head to the sole of the foot, there is no soundness in us," "We have left undone the things which we ought to do, and do those things which we ought not to do"—all these to be repented for life. I quote a single paragraph of Chalkley's comment:

"If a congregation of such people as these say truly—and if they do not say truly, what will be the consequences be, let the wise in heart judge—can such a people be the church of Christ, or his spouse, or beautiful bride? Christ saith: 'If he inside be clean, the outside will be clean also;' and He came to cleanse the souls of poor mortals, and to heal them, and wash them from in, and He doth it by his spiritual baptism and the fire of his word. The above-said people doth Promise and vow that they will forsake the devil and all his works, the pomp and vanity of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh, and walk in God's holy will and commandments all the days of their lives," which is the very highest pitch of perfection any man or Christian can attain in this life; and yet, contrary to those vows and solemn exhortations, they tell the Almighty, from time to time, that they are ungodly, nay, that there is no soundness in them; but that they are putted from head to foot, and by their common practice intend to till Him so as long as they live in this life; this is ungodly work indeed! And truly those who are tenderly conscientious may well scruple to join with it, or with those who are in such ways, words and works."

In the ranks of fashionable society, among those who figure as its leaders and devotees, delighting in its card playing, its theatres, its balls and dances, we find a large proportion who rebound to the forms and ceremonies of religion, taking it for granted that the soul's normal condition in this life must be one of bruises and putrefying sores," and that in some way, through the self-confession of the lips in the use of a form of words, this sadly diseased spiritual state must be more or less healed. The testimony of Grubb and Millard agrees with that of Fox and Chalkley, that the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ from heaven was not to save the people in their sins, but from their sins, and that or those really concerned to follow Him in the way of holiness, it was folly to ask God "to fill with the Holy Ghost till He had been allowed to make empty by cleansing from all sin."

Reminiscences.

It is, I believe, generally known, that there was quite an awakening—mainly through the labors of S. Grubb and I. Pemberton—both at Vermont, in Germany, and Minden, in Prussia, century ago, and that meetings were settled in both places. A neighbor of mine in Ohio, who used to reside in the latter place, often poked of the almost primitive simplicity, zeal and integrity which characterized the members twenty years ago.

Prominent among their ministers was Henry Ieyer, a man, as my friend said, "of a discerning spirit." One instance he gave of such discerning was the following:

"Having appointed a meeting in a place where he was a stranger, after it was over, several who had been at it were in the room where Henry was staying, and as one of them went out, Henry said to the master of the house, 'There will be a great judgment befall that man afore long.' 'Oh, said the other, 'you must be mistaken, for he is a very religious man.' I care nothing for his religion," said Henry. There will a great judgment befall him before long." A few days after, this man, going into a smith shop, a piece being struck off from a bar of red-hot iron, it lodged in his shoe, making a deep burn, which inflamed, and, in spite of all effort, extended up the limb until it took the man's life. Before he died, however, he told those about him, that when a young man, being employed on the farm he then occupied, an attachment having sprung up between himself and his master's young wife, he had promised to marry him if he would put the old man out of the way. That he had followed his master up into the mow, struck him with an axe, and thrown him down the mow-hole, being fondly lying on the barn-floor, it seemed so natural to suppose that he had accidentally fallen, and been killed thereby; that no suspicion had arisen of foul play; that he had continued to work for the widow, and at length, when it would cause no remark, they were married. He, it appears, had lived all his life with the reputation of being not only a moral, but a religious, man, and yet he could not die without making this confession."

A worthy Friend in Ohio gave me this very remarkable account of Ann, wife of Jonathan Taylor, who died in Ireland, while on a religious visit: "That she, in company with a man friend, was travelling, on horseback, on religious service; that a violent storm coming on towards evening, and it seeming almost impossible to get to the quarters they aimed at, they stopped to ask shelter for the night, at a house near by, the master of which, after some demur, and in consideration of the inclement weather, allowed them to stay. Ann took her seat in a rocking-chair, near the open fire place, but seemed greatly distressed, and, upon the woman of the house asking her to take off her bonnet, etc., replied, 'Oh, no! I cannot stay here.' Rocking backward and forward, she wrung her hands, saying, 'Oh! I cannot stay here. I cannot stay here!' The woman, in amazement, knew not what to make of her doing so. At length, the two men, having got the horses attended to, came in and drew up to the fire to warm, the man of the house taking his seat next to Ann, who was still wringing her hands and saying, 'I can't stay here! I can't stay here!' She immediately stopped, and looking him full in the face, said, 'Ahah, Ahah killed Naboth, and so there is going to kill thy wife to-night!'"

"The man replied, 'No such thing. It is altogether a mistake. 'No mistake at all,' said Ann. 'There is going to kill thy wife to night,' and she went on preaching to him until he broke down and confessed that such was his purpose, and that he had made preparations to commit the crime. Whereupon Ann took off her bonnet, and staid quietly. But how must the intended victim have felt? It would seem probable from the allusion to Naboth, that a desire to obtain money was at the bottom of the design. How clear must have been the sense of duty to have enabled Ann to address a stranger, in his own house, in such language!"

Returning now to Henry Meyer, my friend said he had what he called "a gift of healing." As he was remarkably successful in his practice, and would take no pay for it—as viewing it to be a gift—he was naturally popular as a practitioner. But it being contrary to law in Prussia for any one destitute of a diploma to do, and a physician, living near, being watchful lest any should trespass on his reserved rights, Henry was so often fined for his well-meant efforts, as to be forced to decline going when called on, until his enlargement was effected in the following manner:

A neighbor, having two children very ill, came beseeching him to try to save them, saying they were sinking in spite of the doctor's efforts for their relief. But Henry told him that he could not come, as he would be sure to be fined, which he was unable to pay. At length, in his distress, the father said, "Come and do what you can, and I will pay the fine." "Well," said Henry, "tell the doctor to be there, and I will meet him."

They found the children very low, indeed, and Henry made this proposition, "I take either one thee chooses, and do thy best for it, and I will try the other." The one left under Henry's care seemed so hopeless a case that the doctor said, "If you can raise that child I shall never interfere with your practicing again." In the event, the doctor's patient died, while Henry's recovered. The doctor keeping his word, way was thus opened for Henry to exercise his gift.

My friend said that it was usual to have the building enclosed by a wall or fence, and that large, fierce dogs, chained in the day-time, were turned loose for protection at night, and that Henry, being in a neighbor's enclosure after the dog was unchained, it came at him, as if it would devour him; but, upon Henry's saying, "What, will thou bite the Lord's servant?" dropping his head, went quietly away. It was only evil-disposed persons he was commissioned to bite, not the Lord's servants.

One, convinced of Friends' principles, and who had joined the Society at Minden, had suffered greatly for his testimony against war, refusing to drill when drafted. The sergeant having him in charge, at length, through weariness of inflicting punishment, seized the musket he was in vain endeavoring to make him carry, and struck him a severe blow over the shins, saying, "B-gone!" He said it did hurt him exceedingly, yet he dared make no complaint, but managed to hobble off.

Coming, later, to America, he took up or purchased new, uncleared land. There was much hard work to be done, but he was well satisfied with his entertainment, saying, "I expected to have not time to crack, before I got the kernel." Being industrious and economical, he prospered, and, when I knew him, was what is called "well-to-do," his children settled around him.

He now went on a visit to his fatherland, and finding the old sergeant at whose hands he had suffered so much still living, he went to see him, and asking him if he remembered how he had used him, told of his coming to America, etc., adding, "And now I am able to buy a dozen just such men as thee!"

Had he been as humble as when under suffering in his youth, he would have been little likely to have made this boast; rather to have felt reverently thankful to Him who had blessed him. "When Jeshurun waxed fat, then he kicked." J. K.

HIS IDEA OF REST.—A business man accustomed to hard work for many years usually finds idleness irksome. Men who have been actively in the harness, as a rule, do not like to retire, although retirement in old age is the goal of the average worker. A successful Chicagoan, who has reached sixty years, said to me the other day: "I am going to quit. I have worked for thirty years without a week's vacation; now I am going to rest for thirty years. I have earned every dollar I possess; now I intend to spend money and stop worrying about accumulating it."

I applauded this determination and inquired how he intended to spend his leisure.

"I have bought a home-stead in Blank," he said, naming a small Michigan town, "and I shall remove there with my family and simply wallow in idleness and contentment."

"But how will you pass your spare time?" I inquired.

"Well, I'll hunt and fish," he said.

"Good—but that will not keep you busy the year round," I ventured.

"No; but I shall read. I'll take all the papers. I will get together a little library, too."

"Will that occupy all your extra time?"

"Oh, I shall walk about a good deal, I dare say. Exercise—you know—great thing for an old man."

"Is that your entire programme?"

"N-no; not exactly," he said, hesitatingly "I'm going to organize a private bank down there and manage it."—Chicago Times-Herald.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

The Atonement.

FRIENDS' VIEWS RESPECTING IT.

THE IMPORTANCE OF BELIEVING IN ITS EFFICACY.

A denial that there was any benefit derived by mankind from the Saviour's offering in his miraculously prepared body, has been generally accompanied with a disparagement of the Scriptures, and also with a denial of the Divinity of our Saviour; even a denial of the Divinity of Him who declared, before "Abraham was I am"—of Him who declared, "I beheld Satan as lightning falling from Heaven"—of Him of whom the Scriptures declare that without Him nothing has been made that was made—of Him who could forgive sins—raise the dead—heal diseases. Some also have doubted there being any hereafter, any evil spirit, any Heaven, any hell.

In contrast to these doctrines, and in measure because of them, the religious world drifted in the opposite direction, to a less objectionable doctrine, but yet beyond the limitations of the Gospel.

Reversing the disparagement of the Scriptures, the Scriptures were declared to be the only rule for conduct, etc., thus setting them above and in measure dispensing with the Spirit which wrote them.

Instead of denying the value of the atoning sacrifice, the reverence for it culminated too nearly in the doctrine that salvation ensued from a literal belief in the history of it. This evangelical belief, as it has been termed, for awhile somewhat displaced the unitarian doctrine; but the latter in turn are again coming to the front, perhaps as a reflex from the too superficial "only believe" faith.

Friends believe that all who are saved, are saved by virtue of the atoning sacrifice, but that the benefit of it only comes by co-operation with the Spirit of Grace in the heart, and that this may be realized by those who never heard of the history.

Avoiding the harsher views of unbelief, the tendency of the present age seeks refuge in a modified, or as it is called, a reasonable faith. It speaks of Christ's death upon the cross in the terms "at-onement" and "reconciliation," and as to himself adopts a quotation—"The highest possible manifestation of God in man," terms which may be sincerely used respecting the sacrifice and Divinity of Jesus, without intending to convey equivocal meanings; but they may also be subtly used, so as apparently not to contradict the direct terms of Scripture as to his propitiatory offering and Divinity, and yet be intended to deny both in effect.

Refuge is also sought in the doctrine that all that is needed is a correct life, in obedience to the Grace in the heart, even though with a denial of what the Saviour has done for us without us—a doctrine expressed in another way, but closely resembling that which Thomas Evans designated as "false and anti-Christian doctrine."

The great plan of Redemption is a mystery, the reason for which no mortal is called upon to give.

"For God hath not designed,

To shed his great omniscience on the lowly finite mind."

No preliminary explanations are given as to why Abel and Cain were required to bring their offerings to the Lord, but it was afterwards written that Cain's were evil, and his brother's were righteous and more excellent, but natural sacrifices were required from man to his Creator till all were done away in the great offering on Calvary.

The idea that "we are not to believe that which we do not understand" does not apply to matters spiritual and Divine; for "through faith we understand that the worlds were formed by the word of God," and many other things we cannot explain; and we have the words of the Saviour himself which we must accept unless we deny the Scriptures, that He came to "give his life a ransom for many."

The doctrine that "belief is no virtue and unbelief no crime" is also a flimsy covering as to Scripture declarations, and avails nothing as to Divine things which ought to be believed.

There are those who profess to believe there is no God, but the Psalmist designated such a one, who has said it in his heart, as "The fool."

It is not for mortal man to decide the question whether those of exemplary lives who do not believe in the efficacy of the death of Christ upon the cross, are accepted into the company of the "Lamb slain from the foundation of the world."

"We must all appear before the judgment seat of Christ," and it is of His mercy and not by works of righteousness which we have done He saved us—and with Him alone rests the question of the necessity of a belief in the value of his offering.

It is true that a saving belief, a realization of the truth and virtue of what is to be believed, is something far deeper than an intellectual assent to its verity, and it cannot be had with a spirit of indifference.

The promise of coming into the heart and supping, was coupled with the condition "if any man will open the door," and so of the capacity for belief, there must be an openness for it before there can be the enjoyment of it.

Those who have never heard of the sacred History cannot be held responsible for a want of belief in it, but for all who have heard, and yet doubt, and waver, and are not fully persuaded, can there be a more appealing attitude than that of the father, who, agonized on his child's account, cried out with tears, "Lord, I believe, help Thou my unbelief." Whether a want of belief brings any to the awful position of a denial before the Father and the holy angels our Saviour alone will decide, but the doctrine of the Society of Friends is this, "The remission of sins which any partake of is only by virtue of that most satisfactory sacrifice and no otherwise." Should any believe differently, they have no right to the name of Friends.

(To be concluded.)

ODE TO SPRING.

Spring comes dancing o'er the mountains
Rustling with joy and bloom,
Kissing into life the fountains,
Freeing Nature's heart from gloom;
Gaily down the misty meadow
In its vernal robes arrayed,
Followed by a train of beauty
Trips the merry-hearted maid.

See her as she stoops to mingle
With the grasses here and there
Violets of blue and purple
Taken from her golden hair!
See her as she lightly dances
By the brooklet wild and free,
Planting on its dimpled borders
Lily-bells for you and me.

To the distant, dreaming woodland,
Now she quickly flies away,
Clothing it with leaf and blossom,
Changing Winter's night to day;
Flowers in her pathway gather,
While the hills, in glad surprise,
Warble notes of love and welcome
To the queen of sunny skies.

Now beside a fount she lingers,
And the while she gently sips—
In return the conscious waters
Drink the nectar from her lips.
Gratefully they praise the giver,
Gladdening her heart with song,
As, to kiss the winding river,
Fair-like they glide along.

Streams and birds and blooming flowers
All their grateful homage pay;
And shall Men—for chance or wheedling—
Fail to land her white life many?
Can there be a heart so selfish
That it may not gladly sing
Once again the songs of childhood
At the coming in of Spring?

Blessed Spring! How pure and holy
Are the joys thou bringest here,
How delightful are thy footsteps,
To my soul, thy form how dear!
'Tis unknown how much I love thee;
Feel thy wealth of golden hair,
And thy face of angel beauty,
With the gems that sparkle there.

O, if thou could'st linger with me
With thy witching smiles and flowers,
Many an earthly ill would vanish
And a brighter life to ours!
Glowing Summer, Autumn, Winter,
Each their priceless treasures bring;
But to me there's none can equal
Those that gild thy path, O Spring!

THE SHEPHERD'S CHARGE.

MARY B. SLEIGHT.

"Feed thy my lambs." The loving charge
The Lord to Peter gave,
He feeds to thee, and bids thee haste,
His scattered flocks to save.

Lead them where Truth's pure fountains flow,
And life's green pastures spread;
And let no longing, hungering one
Go from the fold unfed.

Feed them with manna from the Word,
Fresh gathered for the day;
And bring them where love's banner broad
Shuts out the noontide ray.

To those that err, the sweet reproof,
With tender pity speak;
And guide with patient, loving hand,
The wayward and the weak.

Remember, too, the souls that stray
Afar on sin's dark world;
Nor rest where'er the toil, until Then win'st them to the fold.

Be zealous for thy sacred trust,
Nor falter, faithful one;
And thou at eventide shalt hear
The Master say, "Well done."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Day at Matherton, Beaufort, S. C.

Our northern Friends, from time to time in so packages of second hand clothes and adding, often express a wish to know how we dispose of them. Will kind editor please insert record of a cold day given below, as it will show them how we appropriate their gifts. It will also convince them that most of their beneficiaries are needy little children, or the prosed followers of Him who has said to them at feel, cloth or befriended such, "has-much as ye have done it to one of the least of these, y brethren, ye have done it unto me."

Early on a cold, bright morning, crisp and ear, when the ground was white with frost, id every pool glistened with ice, a colored an appeared at my door. In a beseeching ne, he said, "Please, misses, let me cut wood r you; we's nuffin at home for eat." We gave m hot coffee and corn bread; then he cut vay at the wood-pile, and was paid in grid meat. Presently a little girl on the piazza gged for shoes for her brother. "Ma says - can't go to school barefoot, it's so cold, and I wants to come bad." Shoes were put into r hand, and the happy child hastened home. When school had convened, I invited each acher to send me her barefoot puppis; in they me, and the scantily clad, shoeless group od around my warm hearth fire.

With the help of two older puppis, we put oes and stockings on these shivering boys, od warm jackets, too, over their pitiable rags, od I had exclaimed, "I see too glad for this nice at!" Said another with a broad grin on his uthetic face, "Won't ma laugh when she sees a running home with this warm jacket on l?" on the ebony faces of these sad-eyed little on glowed with delight as they turned and isted each other around before the fire in otal admiration. I wish the donors of these othes could have witnessed the scene.

No sooner had the happy children returned their school-rooms, and a class was sent in to e, than a knock at the door was answered, Come in auntie; it's too cold to stop on the izza; but you must wait till I've heard this as read before I can attend to you." Then I quired, "What brings you here, Aunt Jane, is cold morning?" "Distress, Misses, I hasn't a ig in de house for eat; de draught ruined my ters; de storm blowed away my cotton; my rn is all done gone. I hab nuffin at all 'help myself with." O. Mrs. Mather, I needs 'erything, and has no way to get any ting. I tes to worry you, my nouse is all wrackified 't broken up by de las' cyclone. I almost oes perish wid 'de cold. Please give me a anket." Knowing her to be an honest widow, igital and industrious, I helped her freely as I is able. We gave her hot tea and biscuit, put warm cloak over her thin garments, a thick anket into her basket, also a few quarts of 'rs and peas. A glad, grateful smile lit up 'r sad, wan face, as she withdrew with many lessings on me and mine and our northern lppers.

A lad waiting beside me then handed me a te from a sufferer who had not stepped for thirteen years, but with the aid of crutches; 'ous it read, "I am sick; the thick bed-quilt 'u gave me last year is stolen, my underclothes is worn out, my pants are patched till they ut hold together. Please send me what you o to make me comfortable." This cripple I ew to be a good intelligent man, in deep dists, and so proceeded at once to fill a large basket with food, clothing and bedding, which I sent him after school. His response was an overwhelming benediction on us all.

In the meantime another note had come from an aged and destitute widow, imploring me for food. Having nothing to eat, she had fasted since noon on the previous day. I sent her tea and biscuit, as she is too feeble to cook, and almost helpless.

The door being open in came another old auntie, gaunt and weary, and thus accosted me, "You knowed me once, Mrs. Mather, when you done give me dese clothes three years ago, jes' after de great storm. I patch um well," she said, shaking her skirts, which was quite evident, as the original fabric could scarcely be discovered. "I trahed a long way, misses, about, till a kine man trick me up an' bring me in his cart. I mos' done perish last night wid de cold. Please give me sumpin to kiver me, so de folks won't fine me dead on my bed, as we sic' neighbor Susan dis morning." "Was she sick, auntie?" "Only old and feeble, misses— she had no one to make her fire or bring her hot tea. She's better off, now, we think, wher dey linger no more." "But the neighbors should look after these old aunties, and not let them die of neglect," I said. "Dat true, misses, but dey has a heap of chillun, dey had to turn 'round sharp not to freeze dem-selves. My son-in-law done trow a stick down at her door and cut it up, but he neber go in to see her; 'dis yer mornin' dere she lay, peaceful as if she done fall asleep on Jesus' bosom." Poor old auntie! how she blessed me in return for the good things put into her basket.

While at dinner the piazza gradually filled up with needy importunes. I inquired of two sorry looking little sisters, "What made you come here to-day?" "We's nuffin to eat, misses." "Where are your parents, my poor children?" "Pa is dead, and Ma is in jail." After giving me their names, I knew it was so, and gave the poor things clothes and grits. Two more little girls then made bold to ask me for shoes; their mother was dead and their father had gone away and left them to the tender mercy of an aunt, herself in need. How glad I was that two barrels of clothes from northern friends, coming the day before, contained just the garments most needed for the present emergency, having been sent as it were, for these sad-eyed little ones, by Him who says, "When thy father and thy mother forsake thee, then the Lord will take thee up."

Evening drew on, and still they came, one by one. A young man shot through the band in a quarrel asked me to aid him, as he could not work. I referred him to the supervisor of the poor, as I had nothing for him or his ilk. A feeble grandmother then came to see her two worthy granddaughters in our home; also with the hope of something to replenish her scanty wardrobe. A woollen shawl we threw over her shoulders, warmed her body, and gladdened her heart as she departed.

Most of the days, when the cold waves are upon us, bear a similar record, with some variations.

BEAUFORT, S. C., Feb., 1897.

Gladly would I give the readers of the above glimpses of our four school rooms and the work done there; would show them our large, airy sewing room, with its univalued outlook, and introduce them to the accomplished teacher, so skillful in all manner of needlework; would also open our kitchen and dining-rooms to their inspection, and best of all, invite them into our mid-stair evening devotions to listen to the Bible readings and sweet singing of the home pupils; to be present at the interesting lesson afterwards—all of which would weary them to peruse, so I refrain, and invite their attention simply to the electro-mary feature of the day's labor.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Winter Investigations.

The lover of nature can find much to interest him in the productions and operations of nature, even during the winter. This truth was impressed on the mind of the writer, during the season which has just ended, by a few walks in the lanes and fields. In the early part of the First Month, on a comparatively mild day, I sauntered down a lane that lead-out of our village. In some of the yards, that barby plant, the common Chickweed (Stellaria media), was already in bloom. Its white star like flowers contrast very prettily with the bright green foliage, so that it is quite an ornamental plant, especially in the winter, when it adheres pretty closely to the ground.

On the side of the lane stood a good sized Osage Orange (Morhena aurantiaca), which in its infancy had received a twist in its stem. The bark was shredly, and looked as if the outer layers had been torn asunder by the pressure caused by the growth within, and yet remained fastened together by fibres. The wood and the inside layers of the bark are orange-colored. The tree is a native of the south-western part of the United States, and has been quite extensively used as a hedge plant, but seems now to be less in favor than formerly.

In our ordinary trees, which live for several years, a deposit of woody tissue is made on the inside of the bark every season. This assumes an unusual development in the cork of the Cork Oak, and in those other expansions so conspicuous in the branches of some of the gums.

The outer layers of the bark become inactive and finally die; and no longer accommodating themselves to the enlarging stem, are at length torn into strips, and fall away by gradual decay, as we see in the trunks of large trees.

A short distance from this osage orange stood a Hackberry (Celtis), in which the outer bark showed nothing of the fibrous texture displayed by the Morhena, but seemed to form small, irregular detached cubes.

A former owner of the premises had planted some Spanish Chestnut near by. The trees did not attain a very great height, but produced numerous branches, partially horizontal. The fallen leaves of this interesting plant were numerous on the ground, and sufficiently perfect to show their shape and structure.

Leaves are the portion of the plant, in which under the agency of the sun light, the sap is digested and converted into the proper nourishment of the plant. They are contrivances for increasing the green surface of the plant, exposed to light and air. They may be regarded as expansions of the bark of the stem, pushed outwards, expanded laterally into a thin lamina, and stiffened by tough, woody fibres, which form their framework, ribs or veins. These woody fibres not only give support to the green, cellular tissue, but also serve for the conveyance and distribution of the sap.

The distribution of the nerves of the leaves, like those of the Chestnut, Oak, etc., is an interesting subject of study. In the Chestnut, the leaf stalk extends as a strong midrib, through the whole length of the leaf, and on each side of this smaller veins go to the outer margins. On the length and position of these veins depend the size and shape of the leaves.

Not far removed from the chestnut trees stood a large Honey Locust (which furnished an interesting example of the production of thorns or spines. These are undeveloped branchlets, terminating in a sharp point. On Honey Locusts they are often so much branched as to form very curious and interesting specimens, and until they are removed must present an almost insuperable obstacle to climbing such a tree. The fruit of the Honey Locust is a large flat pod like a bean, each containing several seeds. The ground was nearly covered with these, so that there was ample opportunity for studying both thorns and fruits.

As early in the season as it was, it was interesting to notice the progress made by several plants of the Cress family, especially those furnished with clusters of radical leaves. Apparently these plants are uninjured by cold, and when the ground is hard frozen, merely suspend their growth, to be resumed with the first ad- vance of a mild day. Such were the little Shad Blossom (Inula verna), which shows its flowers about the First of the Third Month; and the beautiful rosettes of the Sheppard's Pursue. The larger green leaves of the Winter Cress (Barbarea vulgaris), were also observable.

A little later in the season two of us visited a large oak tree located in a low-lying field. While gathering leaves and acorns from beneath it, one of us picked up a small branchlet or twig which had fallen from above, and was much interested to find that a colony of Lady Bugs had taken refuge there for the winter. They were somewhat torpid, yet able to move slowly.

In the same neighborhood we found several of those curious vegetable productions, the Puff Balls. They were rounded or pear-shaped brown bags, with an opening on the top, from which when they were slightly pressed, a puff of fine powder issued, consisting of the spores, which in this low order of plants takes the place of seeds. The spores are quite inflammable, and are sometimes used to stupefy bees, when it is desired to remove their honey.

About the middle of the Second Month, two of our "Moorestown Natural History Society" accepted a kind invitation to visit our botanical friend Benjamin Heritage, at Mickleton, below Woodbury, N. J. On the way from the railroad station to his house he drove us to a little clump of woodland, where two chestnut trees, growing side by side, had, by a process of natural grafting, grown together, some ten feet above the ground, and from that point upward had formed but one tree. We also visited a noble beech tree, standing alone in a field, remarkable for the multitude of its branches and its symmetrical shape. Dr. Rothrock, Forest Commissioner of Pennsylvania, says it is the finest beech tree of which he has any knowledge. It owes its continued existence to our friend B. Heritage, who interceded with the owner for its life.

LOUISA BUTTERS.—The railroad bridge over the Danube at Czernavoda, opened on Sept. 25, 1865, with great festivities, is among the most noteworthy engineering works of the kind in the whole world, and must be classed as the largest railroad bridge in Europe on account of its length. The longest railroad bridge hitherto erected: the Tay bridge (10,800 feet), the Mis-issippi bridge at Memphis (10,700 feet), the North Bridge (7,800 feet), the Morody bridge (4,800 feet), the bridge over the Volga at Syzrau 4,700 feet. The stretch of road in which the Czernavoda bridge lies passes for 15 kilometers (9½ miles) over the flood-plain of the Danube, and the bridge has over the Boreca branch three spans of 40 feet and 11 flood-openings of 164 feet; over Balta Island there are 34 arches 141 feet wide, and finally over the Danube itself 15 spans of 200 feet, 4 of 400 feet, and the greatest of 623 feet. This makes the whole 13,441 feet, reckoning only the width of the spans, and not the separating piers. The height of the roadway above the water surface is 105 feet, so that three-masted ships can pass beneath. The caissons for the foundations of the bridge were sunk 115 feet below the level of the stream.—Literary Digest.

Famine Children.

BY J. C. LAWSON.

"Do you want one hundred children for your mission?" was the question asked us from Jabal-pore, the center of the greatest famine distress. The question set us all thinking. We had children already on hand for whom we had no money. How could we take more, and yet how could we let them starve to death? At once letters were sent out to various places, and petitions to the throne of Him who possesses all things. In this way about four hundred rupees, or one hundred and thirty dollars, have been sent in or promised. It was decided that we would bring from Jabal-pore poor-house twenty girls and twenty boys. No one but a woman could undertake such a task, so it fell to me to bring them. The whole trip took nearly a week.

Stopping off at Allahabad, I was able to secure a reduction in the fare by half, also a through carriage for the return journey. At Jabal-pore one of our missionaries had selected a number of boys and girls for me. My first business on my arrival was to proceed to the poor-house, which had been opened specially for famine times. The doctor, a Bengalee gentleman (a gentleman in every way), told me he had full power to give away orphans under twelve years of age: all over that were in the hands of the deputy commissioner, but he had died that morning. As I did not want any over twelve years old, we were able to proceed with the business; and a business it was, indeed. It took us fully three hours to select the children, have them fed, and sent to the mission premises, where they could go through a process of cleaning.

Some very touching and amusing things occurred. All were eager to go. Some boys whose names were on the list to go had to be rejected because they were rather big. They felt very bad, and so did I. I did not want to take very small boys either, but one weak little fellow begged to go with his brother, who was on our list. I did not want to separate them. They had only each other, and so he was counted in. Another little fellow a mere skeleton, begged and cried to go with me, but I felt I must leave him. My numbers were getting too high, but the little one gave us no peace. He crowded in before all the others. He chattered so constantly and interrupted us so often that he had to be sent away to one side. Boys were more numerous than girls. I wanted twenty-four girls, but could find only twenty-two at first. I was asked to bring two or three little girls about three years of age, but they were not to be had. We sent around to the mothers: knowing if they were willing to give away the starving little ones, but their mother-love was strong, and they said, "No, we will die together. Finally a little one stepped forward and said "I am a little girl; take me." The manager began to write the name down, when a servant exclaimed, "That is a boy; don't take him. We then discovered that he was the little boy that has troubled us so. He saw girls were in demand, and hoped to gain his point this way. I did admire his persistence. He won the day and was counted in. A happy boy was he but he seemed to have used up all his strength in the effort, and I was very anxious about him all the way home, but now he seems to be gaining slowly.

Another boy anxious to go had placed him self among the group of girls that had been chosen. No one was able to tell by the look who were boys or who girls. The boys, to had long hair and were a wild-looking set. A one, either boy or girl, had more than a yard of clothing. Other little ones had to be left behind because of their awful condition. Some could not expect to live more than a few days. I thought I would reject some of the older boys, but they refused to be left, so I was overcome by their entreaties, and all came.

I took all the orphan girls. I wanted twenty-four, and just that many were available that day. A tiny girl of about four years begged to come, but a woman ran forward and claimed her. A servant declared that she was not the mother, but kept the child as an excuse to get more food. This seemed the truth, since the woman was by no means thin, and the child nothing but a skeleton. It turned out that the child had a father in jail, so we could not take her, but the manager promised that he would separate the child from the woman.

A man brought me his baby boy of nine months, a frightful looking object, and begged me to take it, but I was helpless. Another man gave me his three girls, but we felt it was best to care for the orphans first. I saw some dreadful sights in that poor-house.

How I did wish that I could help every man and woman fell at my feet and begged help. As long as they stay in the poor-house they are comparatively well off. I thought this arrangement there was as good as could be under the circumstances, but at best they are only temporary. That day there were two hundred and five inmates. I brought about fifty-four. No doubt as many more came in next day. There is a demand for girls by various school but many girls do not come to the poor-house. I have heard that many are sold before they can reach the poor-house, and sent away to live a life far worse than death. I asked who took the boys, as a rule, and the reply was, "The Roman Catholics." Pundita Ramabai, whose noble work every true Christian indorses, is asking that everywhere high-caste women and girls be rescued and sent to her.

But to return to my wife. They were sent to the mission premises, where a barber and sweepress (a low-caste woman) were in waiting. At noon the work began, and by five o'clock wonderful change had taken place in these children. Dr. Felt took a picture of them as they came from the poor-house. I should have had one afterward. Dr. Felt's wife and I spent the entire day in service for these little ones. My train was to leave at midnight, but it was thought best to settle the children early, and this we ble to do, as our through carriage was in waiting. Dr. Johnson took us to the station. I topped the children would sleep well, but there was no sleep in them. They had never been in a train before. I hoped that when we started they would settle down. They did, and I covered them up and lay down myself, but at the first stop they were all up again; and so they were at every stop. The boys chattered more than the girls, which may go to prove that girls at least have no part in Darwin's plan; and it also proves that—but that is another story, as Sipling would say.

I now know what it means to live two nights and a day in a railway carriage with fifty-four wild heathen children. I was somewhat "seawick" a great part of the time. I consider that I have made a trip on the ocean, and shall not apply to go home soon. Some one will say that it was foolish to be shut in with them, but what could I do? I could not afford a servant, for I was with our own salary, for the most part, but I was bringing them. I had to do the work of a servant myself, open and shut windows, give them water to drink, warm up milk for the delicate ones, give out all their food each time, over them up from the cold, etc. It isn't to be supposed that all these children from twenty different castes and as many villages could live conceivably thirty-six hours in a railway carriage, packed in as closely as they had to be, so I had many little fights to settle; but at last we arrived in Aligarh.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Water Plants as Landmarkers.—One of the earliest surprises of the writer, on a botanical collecting trip, was to enter a wildwood on a beaten path, and on returning find a stream of one twenty feet wide and of unknown depth light across that path. It was his first experience with a floating island. The wind had hanged, and blew the island to the opposite shore! When sand enough would be collected from the winds, possibly the island would sink, and then logs would be found beneath the surface, as White Cedar logs are now found below the surface in the bogs of New Jersey. How lants prepare the way for such growths, we are often had illustrated. "Captain W. A. Haw," says a Jacksonville (Florida) paper of recent date, "of the St. Johns river steamer Berglade, says that he has never seen anything like the quantity of hyacinths that now float in the river between Palatka and Aster, and he has been in command of a steamer on the river more than a quarter of a century.

"Palatka is the worst choked up point on the river, as acres of the water vegetable cover the surface of the river, and to get through it with the steamer is a hard job. The wheels become clogged, the bow banks against, and is going ahead and backing for hours at a time to make a passage.

"Not only is the river obstructed, but also the creeks between Jacksonville and Palatka."

But for the river traffic, these water plants could be undisturbed, and in the end, dust and mud would grow moss and similar low orders of vegetation. On these, seeds of grasses and other plants would be borne by birds and by wind, and, rotting, form a thick, peaty surface. Then come tree seeds, and the young rest, in time, sinking by its own weight. But the process again renewed from time to time, and would be filled up, and a deep peat bed formed, and real land appear in due time. Yes, water plants as well as all things have an appointed mission to fulfill.—Mechanics' Monthly.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 3, 1897.

WE have good authority for believing that whatever has been written by Divine inspiration is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness; and that the Holy Scriptures are able to make us unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Hence the Society of Friends has been concerned to encourage its members in the frequent perusal of these sacred writings, and in the effort to make their children acquainted with them.

But it is very important that we should not lose sight of the condition attached, "through faith in Christ Jesus."

The Bible student who trusts mainly in his own intellect may spend years in study, and may become learned in the history of the nations mentioned in the Bible, and in their customs and peculiarities, and yet remain in ignorance of the spiritual truths of Christianity. For "the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God; for they are foolishness unto him; neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned."

The truth of this is manifested by experience. For we see many of the most highly educated and learned men, who reject or explain away the plain declarations of Scripture, deny the miracles recorded therein, and build up an edifice of doctrinal belief founded on their own reasoning powers, and not on that Divine revelation which is the only immovable foundation on which we can rest securely.

We believe the most profit is derived from the Bible by those who read it reverently, with a mind turned inward to the revealings of the Light of Christ, and freed from dependence on their own intellectual powers.

The advice on reading the Scriptures given by some of our early Friends, men of deep religious experience, who spoke of what their own hands had handled of the word of life, is so instructive, that we commend it to the notice of our readers.

Isaac Pennington, writing to a friend, says: "I know thy sure; there is a building in the earthly wisdom, a knowledge which thou holdest in the comprehension, out of the living feeling of that light, from which the true knowledge springs, and in which alone it is held. Thou must know the razing of this building, the confounding and scattering of this knowledge, that the true heir of the true knowledge may spring, and thou mayst feel the babe raised, to whom God reveals the mysteries of his kingdom, which He hides from the wise professors and teachers in this age, as He hath done in all ages. Thou art very wise, but thou must sell all that and become a very fool, if thou wilt have the riches and everlasting treasure of the kingdom."

Again in another letter we find the following, "Friend, God, who caused light to shine in this outward world, hath judged it necessary to cause the light of his spirit to shine inwardly in the heart; and this gives the knowledge of the Scriptures, and the true sense and discerning of inward and spiritual things. O, take heed how thou readest, and how thou under- standst the Scriptures,—in what light, in what spirit! for it is easy erring; and without the presence and guidance of God's spirit herein, thou canst not walk safely."

MANY of our newspapers have disgraced themselves by publishing the particulars of a recent prize fight, which took place in one of our western States. We are glad to state that the Public Ledger of this city had too much self-respect to follow their example, but has consistently refrained from spreading the demoralizing details before its readers. For this it deserves the thanks of all respectable people. We are pleased to notice in the number of that paper for Third Month 20th, that it has received a large number of letters commending its course and among them several from members of the religious Society of Friends.

We sincerely wish its encouragement in the exercise of such a censorship over the matter offered for publication in its columns, as will render it more and more a practical advocate for sound morals and civilization.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 29th ult., the following nominations were sent to the United States Senate by the President: Charltonne Tower, of Philadelphia, for the Austrian Mission; William S. Shalvenger, of Pennsylvania, to be Secy of Assistant Postmaster General; Henry Clay Evans of Tennessee, to be Commissioner of Pensions; Thomas Ryan, of Kansas, to be First Assistant Secretary of the Interior.

The Governor of Colorado has approved a bill abolishing capital punishment in that State.

A Toledo dispatch says that labor leaders in Kansas are greatly excited over a ruling by Attorney General Boshe that the Anti-Trust law just passed by the Legislature is applicable to labor organizations.

General Rosecrans, now living in retirement in California, at the age of seventy-eight, writes this concerning the Arbitration Treaty: "I had as the rainbow of promise the noble inspiration of arbitration in place of war. Hampered by illness and age, I can do little, but were I able I would devote pen and voice to inculcate in the minds of our youth in the schools and universities a realization of the horrors of war, and impress the great uplifting of humanity above mere brute force to the higher plane of a nobler civilization, which shall calmly settle all vexing international differences by a court of reason, and not by the crash of artillery."

It is said that more than seventy-six per cent. of those who people New York today were born of foreign mothers, while more than forty per cent. were themselves born on foreign soil. Peter Stuyvesant ruled in his day over fourteen hundred New Yorkers who consisted in eighteen different tongues.

Thousands of head of antelope are to be seen along the Short Line track near Lackwith, Idaho. They have been in that section all winter and are little hunted. One band is believed to contain fifty five thousand head.

While endeavoring through the swamp-infested lowlands of Spanish Columbia, about 500 miles from the sea-coast, found a heavy white nugget, which a few days later, he gave to the nearest trader for a little of rum. The nugget, which passes as native correnze, was sent, as a draft, to an exporting merchant of New York City. It is said to be the largest and best platinum ever found in a corner seal. The nugget is the little cube measures approximately only 3/8 by 2/8 inches; it weighs nearly two pounds. It is of bluish-white lustre, and contains fully 50 per cent. of pure platinum. The additional ingredients of the nugget are rhodium, gold and palladium. What enhances the importance of the find is that the ordinary platinum nugget is about the size of a corner seal. The intrinsic value of the big nugget is $250, but as a specimen it is worth much more. C. O. Baker, the platinum refiner, has sent it for inspection to H. T. Day, chief of the Geological Survey in Washington. "We are trying to learn the exact locality where the nugget was found," said He. "Reports from that part of Spanish Columbia are very contradictory and unreliable. It was found near a river, the name of which we do not know. The objective point of that part of the country is Buena Ventura. Although gold, platinum and other valuable metals seem to abound there, the mica-stamps are so readily as to render simple the process of obtaining platinum in South America and the United States. We hope this find will be brought to the attention of miners on the Pacific Coast. We know that a good deal of platinum goes to waste in California. The great platinum country is in the tall mountains of Russia.

A crossing of 12 miles in length by the masters of the various vessels that arrived in New York on the 25th ult., the route of westward bound trans-Atlantic steamships is plentifully strewn with bergs. The largest of these were sighted by the steamship H. H. M. R., which arrived in New York on the 25th ult. One of the masses, towed by the tug, estimates the length of the Arctic wanderer as being at least one thousand feet. Quite a swell was running when the vessel drew near the giant berg, and the boom of the seas, as they rolled against the masses, echoing in its cavernous, rounded, the officers say, like the roar of heavy artillery.

The ice-formation in the Gulf of Mexico reported the day of the 14th ult. week. The total deaths exceeded number nineteen, and at least two hundred persons were more or less hurt. The property loss will be very large. That part of Florida west of Tallahassee, Northwest Georgia and Southwestern Alabama, through which the storm raged, has sustained the most serious damage, but the extent of the damage has not yet been learned.

Three serious breaks in the Mississippi levees are causing the inundation of the great Delta, the most valuable of the farming lands of Mississippi. Greenville is in an extremely critical position, and business there is entirely suspended, the people working at the levees in a desperate fight for their lives.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 470, which is less than the previous week, and 55 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 241 were males and 229 females; 78 died of pneumonia; 43 of consumption; 34 of heart disease; 27 of diphtheria; 17 of cancer; 16 of old age; 13 of apoplexy; 13 of influenza; 12 of the stomach and bowels; 12 of scarlet fever; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of Bright's disease; 12 of convulsions; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of crop; 11 of marasmus; 11 of leprosy; 11 of meningitis; 9 of inflammation, and 9 from casualties.

Onions were quiet and unchanged at  $7\frac{1}{2}$  cts. per pound for Midling uplands, but demand from spinners was light.

FEEDS.—Spot bran ranged from $14.00 to $14.50 per ton for winter in bulk, and $13.25 to $13.75 for spring in bulk.

Flour.—Winter super, $2.50 to $2.75; do., extra, $2.75 to $3.00. Pennsylvania roller, clear, $3.75 to $4.10; do., do., straight, $4.15 to $4.29; Western winter, $4.10; do., $3.90 to $4.10; do., do., straight, $4.20 to $4.35; do., do., patent, $4.40 to $4.60; spring, clear, $5.00 to $5.75; do., do., straight, $5.75 to $6.00; do., patent, $6.00 to $6.75; do., do., straight, $6.75 to $7.00; do., do., extra, $7.00 to $7.50; do., do., clear, $4.00 to $4.20; do., straight, $4.25 to $4.40; do., patent, $4.60 to $4.90. Flour.—$2.25 to $2.50 per bushel as quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, $1.45 to $1.60; No. 2 mixed, com., $1.25 to $1.50; No. 3, 75 to 80 cents.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, $5.75 to $6.00; good, 4.5 to 5.00; medium, 4.25 to 4.50; common, 4.10 to 4.25.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, $5.00 to $5.40; 4, 4.00; 3, 3.50 to 4.00; common, 3.50 to 3.90; good lambs, 4.50; wool lambs, 3.50 to 4.00.

HOGS.—Best Western, $6.00 to $6.50; other Western, $5.75 to $6.00.

Foreign.—In the thirty-three years since its establishment the Bible and Foreign Bible Society has distributed 4,177,000 Bibles, testaments and books of extracts from the Scriptures. In a leading editorial article in the London Standard the British Senate in adopting the amendments to the Arbitration Treaty reported by the Foreign Relations Committee, says: "The unanimous vote of the Senate has worked the Arbitration Treaty, and this should be a warning to the promulgators of similar projects in this case. The Senate are aware that the proposed amendments to the proposed Convention would be a serious step in the progress of arbitration while they are the treaties with amendments which make it ridiculous."

The British steamer Yankee, which arrived at Greenock Third Month 27th, 1897, on board station of the survivors of the lost French steamer, St. Nazaire,

When rescued they had been without food and water for three days. When they left the St. Nazaire there were twenty-nine persons in the boat, but thirteen died of exposure, hunger and thirst. Of the sixteen rescued, two had lost their reason.

Some quiet and curious tows, 1,500 years old, were recently found in a child's grave in course of some excavations in an old Roman cemetery near the city of Ravenna, Italy. Most of them were made of glass.

A Polish chemist named Eisenberg is said to have invented an anesthetic which volatilizes rapidly on exposure to the air, rendering the persons near unconscious for a long time. A pellet broken under a man's nose put him to sleep for four hours in an asphyxiated manner. The material charged with this material will make large bodies of an enemy incapable of resistance.

The proclamation announcing the blockade of the ports of Crete declares that any Greek vessel coming within the limits of the blockade will be fired upon. The Greek Government has sent to the Powers a note protesting against the blockade of Crete. On the 25th ult., the Cretan insurgents captured Malaxa, driving out and killing all but nineteen of the Turkish troops that composed the garrison. Part of the town was blown up with dynamite. The international forces in Crete now occupy the town of Malaxa.

It is stated that thirty Armenians were massacred recently at Tokat, Anatolia. They were killed while in a place of worship. During and after the massacre the Armenian quarter of the city was given over to pillage.

The treaties between the South African Republic and the Orange Free State give the Burgheers of each State the franchise in either Republic, and bind each Republic to support the other in event of an attack.

Spain, according to the War Office statistics, has sent, up to the end of 1896, 198,074 men and forty generals to Cuba. The deaths in the field and from yellow fever and other diseases were four generals and 22,771 men and officers. No account is given of the number of men sent to the Philippines, but 22,000 have returned, many of whom have since died.

Major-General Rios Rivera and his chief of staff, Colonel Ballao, were captured by the Spaniards under General Velasco, in a night at Catalezas, in Pinar del Rio, on the 28th of last month.

Reports received by Superintending Inspector General W. G. French in his regular service show that small-pox is raging in Havana, and is increasing in extent of diminishing. During the last week for which returns have been received, 850 new cases were reported with 91 deaths. Yellow fever is also prevalent in Cuba.

The Canadian Department of Agriculture estimates the population of the Dominion to be 8,125,438, a gain of over 500,000 since the census of 1891. In 1890 there were two States of the Union that exceeded Canada in population—New York, with 5,997,853 inhabitants, and Pennsylvania with 5,258,914.

A Winnipeg dispatch says that gold prospectors who have just returned from the north report the discovery of carbon Lake from Winnipeg.

NOTICES.

FRIENDS' INSTITUTE LYONEN.—The next meeting will be held at 140 N. Sixteenth St., Sixth-day, Fourth Month 26th, 1897, at 8 P. M.

CORRECTION.—In the last number of THE FRIEND, pages 285 and 286, where the name occurs, instead of "Mallon Hackett," read "Mallon Hackett."

REDUCED RATES TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETINGS.—The usual arrangements have been made with the Pennsylvania R. R. Company, by which Friends attending our approaching Yearly Meeting can obtain excursion tickets to Philadelphia and return, from any station on the following railroads, at the rate of two cents per mile travelled, going and returning; except that no such tickets will be issued at a less rate than 2 cents; viz., Pennsylvania Railroad main line, as far west as Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Erie Railroad Division, Northern Central Railway, United Railroads of New Jersey Division, West Jersey Railroad, and Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, on any day from Fourth Month 16th to 27th, inclusive, and on the Pennsylvania R. R. main line from Philadelphia, inclusive, to Fourth Month 27th, inclusive, 1897.

The Baltimore and Ohio Company, and the Philadelphia and Reading Railroads have kindly offered Friends the same rates and for the same dates as above specified.

Application should be made either personally or by mail, to Joseph Hall, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia; or to Thomas G. Hoque, West Chester, Pa., for order on the Ticket Agents—one of which must be delivered to the Agent whenever a ticket is obtained. These orders inform the Ticket Agent at whatever station they are when they are to be forwarded by mail; the holder is entitled to a ticket to Philadelphia, and to return, at the above rate of two cents per mile travelled. If a Friend in each neighborhood would ascertain the number of card orders likely to be needed and obtain them, and distribute among Friends, would make less work for those having the care of them when they are to be forwarded by mail; two-cent stamp should be sent to pay the postage.

NOTE.—Tickets issued on this order will not go to order but at way stations, going or returning.

WESTWOOD BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters of regard to instruction and discipline should be addressed to WILLIAM F. WICKESITHAM, Principal, at the residence of one of his sons, at the following communications in regard to business should be forwarded to EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent, Address, Westwood P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

DIED.—On the twenty-second of Second Month, 1897, in the seventy-sixth year of his age, JAMES R. COOPER, a member of New Garden Meeting, Pa.; and on the second of Third Month his widow, ELIZABETH I. COOPER, in her seventy-sixth year. Closely united by the ties both of conjugal affection and of spiritual communion with their Lord, they were separated for short time separated by death. They had from early life looked towards a city of eternal habitation; as James R. Cooper could say on his death bed he had long endeavored to be prepared for such a time that he then felt no condemnation and was ready to go. When asked if he wanted anything, he replied, "I want to be in the hands of my Father, and in the superintending care of Divine Providence, and realize the fulfillment of the Saviour's promise to the one who seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, that all things needful we be added. Such being the ground of his confidence, he was a supply to his friends, and was made a pillar in the church by his abiding the doctrine of Christ. As a married life of these beloved parents and Friends extended over a period of fifty-three years. Free from the pang of a guilty conscience, so were their labors, relieved from much physical suffering, expiring away with a brief sickness, soothed by the diligent attention of their children, whose testimony now given to their Lord, was a joyful assurance of early and life-long dedication to the service of religion, their example is commended to the imitators of their acquaintances and successors, and as a proof of that faithful saying, "Godliness is profitable in all things, having the promise of the life that now and in that which is to come."

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1885.—In the autumn of this year, in company with her friends G. and R. S. A.—, she attended, with a minute, Ohio Yearly Meeting, a relation to which she writes to a friend: "Yes, dear, it is done, and the kind unity and sympathy expressed in this small meeting is encouraging to the anxious traveller. R. and G. were released, and now for the deep exercises. I find myself comparing them to 'sitting in yard, whole nights.' It will not be easy work to attend the Yearly Meeting through its sittings, but our trust must be in the Omnipotent One, who has never yet failed me. Blessed forever be his Holy Name."

From Friends' Boarding School, Barnesville, Ohio, she writes Ninth Month 23rd: "It seems so solemn to be here, with the Yearly Meeting before us, and I hope we shall be favored with dy help, and do nothing to hurt the cause in my. Mercy encompasses our path, but I feel a little. The Lord's power can break forth."

Again, Tenth Month 2nd.—"Meeting closed and Friends scattered. We have had a wonderful meeting. You would have enjoyed it so much, and they would have enjoyed you, but I to Master ordered otherwise."

"On Seventh-day was Select Meeting; our minutes were read and thought suitable to be forwarded to the Yearly Meeting. This is a good way, then any improper ones can be suppressed. They read the queries and summaries the adjourned meeting on Third-day morning eight o'clock. There are dear weighty Friends here. On First-day a wonderful concourse of souls met on the ground—quite as many as would get into the house. How I longed for some messengers to reach them, and my prayer was to the Master. In the afternoon, Ellwood Brad held those in the house almost spell-bound in the account of our belief. I was thankful, indeed. Nothing for those outside. I tell them it is so important to distribute tracts—probably they will in future. They have a committee on 'Scattered Remnants'—so interesting to me—and they have opened correspondence with Iowa, Kansas and Western Yearly Meetings, and sent a minute of concurrence this year to Canada and New England. I compared it to Ohio Yearly Meeting, gathering the little crafts all around it, and then in turn the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting (the great ship of the line), would come sailing up alongside of it, and there would be a fleet again. They would have need of great care in some cases.

"We feel as if we had been so helped all through, and I think your prayers and exercises of spirit have been with us and helped us, too. The Lord bless you and strengthen you under all circumstances."

On Fifth Month 9th she wrote to a friend, "Do we not long for his kingdom to come upon this earth, and now especially when we are hearing of wars and rumors of wars, do we wonder if the peaceable kingdom will ever be entirely set up? Yes, sometime, most surely, because the Most High says so. Oh, that we may be gathered among the redeemed—that word redeemed means so much."

1886.—Sixth Month 14th.—She wrote to her friend, R. S. A., "We are getting older, and though nature shrinks a little, yet we long for the gateway, 'golden, pearly, ample.' The heart to comprehend and feel another's woes, is a gift from Him, who has made us social beings. . . . Our young people must be willing to be still; be as fools to the world, that the great Master Builder may know what to do with them. Some of us were led so, were we not? Oh, how I long that He would take unto him his great power and prevail, that we may see sons and daughters here and there coming forth in the ministry."

During the remainder of 1886 her health was so poor that she does not appear to have written much.

1887.—Third Month 9th.—She writes to a friend who had also been sick: "It was so nice to receive thy dear letter, it was so fraught with heavenly good. Pencil sketch though it was, even that told of how much exertion it was for thee to write. And now, I can think of thee as down-stairs and gaining a little in strength every day. I have been out several times, and to-day was spent with S. F. S., who kindly invited me for an outing after sickness. How it elevates our spirits to contemplate the power of our Heavenly Father! He can draw his children into tender sympathy with each other when no outward word is spoken."

"I do not think the age of miracles has passed all that, but that our God is performing great things for his children all the time. We must be a more wrestling, praying people, and then He will 'open the windows of heaven and pour us out a blessing.' I am asking in my little measure, and was greatly encouraged by reading the last chapter of Isaiah, where it said, 'As soon as Zion travailed, she brought forth her children.' Our meetings want reviving, and only God can give the increase. The beautiful flood of moonlight last eve pouring into the windows made me think of his power, and that He can pour such an irresistible flood of his Holy Spirit upon souls as to constrain them to dedicate their lives to Him. Let us ask when hearts are full; when two agree touching a thing to ask He has promised to hear. . . . I am so much better, and am able to do little things for myself. As thou art better, W— will improve too. Be sure and try to commit all your way unto the Lord. He is the wonderful counsellor, the mighty God? Strong is his arm and blessed are they that put their trust in Him."

Alluding to the Yearly Meeting of 1887, she writes in her diary: "We had an exercising week, but the dear Lord helped me through. My health gave out and I came home with bronchitis, and was sick a long time. Next rheumatism came on in my hands, arms and limbs. I was sick most of the summer."

In a letter to a friend confined at home by illness, dated Fourth Month 30th, 1887, she writes, "For a couple of weeks before Yearly Meeting, I felt weaker, and wondered if my Heavenly Father intended me to go, yea or nay? It all seemed right at the last, but it was cooler than common, and I commenced a cold which seemed to increase on every touch of the outside air."

"By Seventh-day morning I was too poorly to sit up, but able to go home in the afternoon. The next morning a severe bronchial cold developed, and by Second-day had to send for a doctor."

"My spirit has been much with thee, confined at home, while we could go up to the annual feast and sacrifice, but no doubt the dear Master was near thee."

"The minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were so interesting to me, especially that part where the Committee visited the President, with an address against the retaliation act. I did want some one at the time to warn them, to labor with them not to be so unchristian, and to show them the evil thereof."

"On Fourth-day dear ——— spoke of the (importance of Friends, young Friends, being more careful to read our own writings, just as she can do it, so nicely, and I was constrained to unite with her, for my own exercise thereon is great, and also to advise the lifting up the heart for light to Him, who knows the hunger and thirst of his children. Soon (two Friends), said we ought to recommend the Bible to them, that so little was said about the Bible. No one seemed to answer the attack, and I so dreaded anything like answering back, so there this seemed to demand something, so the dear Heavenly Comforter, near at hand, gave me words, and I said them—so frightened all the time. I have been trying to remember them, and thou would like to know, viz: 'I am inclined to believe that there is not a Friend now present, to whom the Scriptures are not dear, and that they are in the habit of reading them daily in secret and many in their family circle, and if there had been any seeming neglect, it was unintentional. When I am sojourning where they are read in the family circle, it is the joy of my heart, and if they are not read, the desire before my Heavenly Father is, What shall I say, or how shall I conduct in regard to it. 'So, if there has seemed to be an omission, it is only because the message seemed sent to some other point.' It comforted me to find that it had not grieved Friends. So many messages of gladness and thanks that I just sink into our Great Center of thanksgiving."

On Ninth Month 25th she writes to the same Friend in regard to a meeting appointed by Joseph Scattergood, at Parkerville, which she was prevented from attending by illness:

"Just to think of your being so close to me and dear C. Sheppard and Joseph S., with my being able to see you. Well, you had a good meeting, and that made up for all. It was my heart's desire, while you were in meeting. I remembered how it was with Israel when in the Sinaitic Peninsula and Amelek attacked them, how Moses went up on a hill and sat on a stone and held up his hands. While they were up, Israel prevailed, but when through weariness they fell, Amelek prevailed; so Aaron and Hur stayed up by his hands, and the Lord conquered. Just so it came in my heart to hold up my hands to the God of heaven and earth for a blessing on the meeting and for dear Joseph. The Lord does seem to bless him, and that a comfort to him to have the company of Clarkson Sheppard and J. W., and your company, too—Iron sharpeneth iron,' etc. The meeting seemed to be satisfactory."

The Down Grade.

SELECTED.

A few years ago, an agent of a fire company in Newark had a downfall. Possibly the place was not Newark, and we recall the name neither of agent nor company. This man had been pursuing that phantom pursued by so many since civilization began, and never yet caught, nor to be caught, when pursued, to wit: "Pleasure," and he had been pursuing it in unlawful ways. He had procured funds by writing special hazards, at probably a little under the usual rate for such lines, and then he had reported them to the company as risks of the every-day desirable sort. His case is recalled to mind by a paragraph in the Standard, of Boston, about George H. Binney, who, in 1889, was an insurance agent, and had an office in Kilby Street of that city, and was going at a rapid pace. He had a city house, and a fine summer one at a suburb. His private coach, imported to order, was lighted by electricity. In a single year he had a bill of $1,570 with a fashionable jewelry firm, one of the items being a repenting watch valued at $125, with a $222 diamond monogram additional. He married a woman of high social standing, whom he heavily embarrassed by getting her name on notes. He paid $125 to $250 per thousand for cigars, and his dinner-table was garnished with flowers repeatedly, at a charge of nearly sixty dollars, just before the close of his career in Boston. He escaped from the city just in time, a warrant for him having been issued.

A few weeks ago, his history during the interval being unknown, he was sentenced, in a town in England, to six months' imprisonment for obtaining seventy-seven pounds on credit without disclosing the fact that he was bankrupt.

One of the tricks of memory is that, while failing to take hold of many things desired for keeping, it persistently preserves others not of special value. For instance, residence in New York during the term of active life has noted the career of many defaulters who are readily recalled, one after another, like ghosts of the past, rising to mutely and pathetically point a warning moral. There was Jenkins, a teller in the Phoenix Bank many years ago, who cut his throat with a knife, in a cell in Jefferson Market Police Station. There was John Bonner, once editor of Harper's Weekly, who, as a stock broker, embezzled, rehypothecating securities in his hands as collateral. He fled to Canada and disappeared from view. There was the president of the Atlantic Bank of Brooklyn, an old and esteemed man, suddenly killed on the railroad. His death disclosed an embezzlement, which, perhaps, he could have covered had he lived. There was Sanford, cashier of the Central National, a man who never went near "the Street," and dressed so plainly as even to elicit remonstrance from his superior. He was found to have converted securities belonging to correspondent banks, but no visible blow fell on him. One of the most tragic cases was that of the teller of one of the largest banks in New York. Suddenly the president died; plainly, the cashier would be promoted; plainly, the teller would become cashier; but he was a defaulter, and the change meant discovery. He fled to Canada instead, and has probably died there in miserable exile.

A recent case of sin in another line is also startlingly tragic. A year ago, a young man of some twenty-six years was vice-president of a manufacturing corporation in this city, and practically manager. One morning a man strode into the building, pushed his way past the attendants into the private office, thrust a letter before the young man, and demanded whether he had written it. He admitted that he had, whereupon the intruder struck him, pounded and throttled him, drew a pistol, and was in the act of using it when others interfered.

Like a bolt from a clear sky, vengeance fell upon him. Within an hour he was disgraced, his official position was gone, his prospects were blighted, and he passed out of sight—only, in some manner, the story was kept out of reach of the scent of the purveyors of the daily press. There is a long list of such stories, all true and all sad. The unfortunates whose names are given are dead, and the incidents are so odd that probably there is no one living whose feelings can be wounded by publication. The moral is as stern and as terrible as it is odd. Happiness can never be found by seeking it—it comes, unobtrusively, of itself, to those who, not thinking of it, are engaged in lives of activity, which it rewards. What is called pleasure is not even a form of happiness, but a mocking image of it. And to all who violate law—whether the laws of numbers and of sociology by bad insurance schemes, or of morals and the body by vicious living—the reckoning comes and exacts the penalty.

At an infidel meeting in Boston a richly dressed woman in the audience, who had listened to half a dozen speeches, rose and said: "Mr. President, when I give up my religion and my children, it will be for something very much better than you have offered to-day." We judge from published reports that her words threw a sudden coldness over the meeting. And well it might, and should. Infidelity has no sweetness, no hope, no comfort, no life to offer. It is mere negation, declamation, criticism, repudiation. It would rob humanity of cheer, solace and inspiration through a Redeemer. It is a poor exchange for the Christian's hope and life. —Exchange.

The Atonement.

FRIENDS' VIEWS RESPECTING IT.
THE IMPORTANCE OF BELIEVING IN ITS EFFICACY.

GEORGE FOX.

"Christ gave himself, his body, for the life of the whole world; He was the offering for the sins of the whole world; and paid the debt, and made satisfaction; and doth enlighten every man that comes into the world, that all through Him might believe, and he that doth not believe in the offering is condemned already." Great Mystery, 1659.

ROBERT BARCLAY.

"We do not hereby intend any ways to lessen or derogate from the atonement and sacrifice of Jesus Christ; but on the contrary do magnify and exalt it. For as we believe all those things to have been certainly transacted which are recorded in the holy Scriptures concerning the birth, life, miracles, sufferings, resurrection and ascension of Christ; so we do also believe that it is the duty of every one to believe it to whom it pleases God to reveal the same, and to bring to them the knowledge of it; yea we believe it were damnable unbelief not to believe it, who so declared; but to resist that holy seed, which as minded would lead and incline every one to believe it as it is offered unto them, though it revealeth not in every one the outward and explicit knowledge of it, nevertheless it always assenteth to it, ubi declaratur, where it is declared. Nevertheless as we firmly believe it was necessary that Christ should come, that by his death and sufferings He might offer up him self a sacrifice to God for our sins, who his own self "bare our sins in his own body on the tree;" so we believe that the remission of sins which any partake of, is only in and by virtue of the most satisfactory sacrifice, and no otherwise." —Apology, Prop. V., ¶1, Sec. 15.

WILLIAM PENN.

"We cannot say God could not have taken another way to have saved sinners, than by the death and sufferings of his Son, to satisfy his justice; or that Christ's death and suffering were a strict and rigid satisfaction for the eternal death and misery due to man for sin and transgression; for such a notion were to make God's mercy little concerned in man's salvation; and indeed, we are at too great a distance from his infinite wisdom and power to judge of the liberty or necessity of his actings."

"We cannot believe that Christ's death and sufferings so satisfies God, or justifies men, as that they are thereby accepted of God. They are indeed, thereby put into a state capable of being accepted of God; and through the obedience of faith and sanctification of the Spirit, are in a state of acceptance. For we can never think a man justified before God while self-condemned; or that any man can be in Christ who is not a new creature; or that God looks upon men otherwise than as they are. We think it a state of presumption and not of salvation, to call Jesus Lord, and not by the work of the Holy Ghost; Master, and He not yet maste of their affections; Saviour, and they not saved by Him from their sins; Redeemer, and yet they not redeemed by Him from their passion pride, covetousness, wantonness, vanity, vain honors, friendships and glory of this world. Which were to deceive themselves, for God will not be mocked; such as men sow, see, they must reap. And though Christ did die for us, yet we must, by the assistance of his grace, work out our salvation with fear and trembling. As He died for sin, so we must die to sin, or we cannot be said to be saved by the death and sufferings of Christ, or thoroughly justified and accepted with God."

"The first part of justification (from the guilt of sin), we do reverently and humbly acknowledge, is only for the sake of the death and sufferings of Christ; nothing we can do, though by the operation of the Holy Spirit, being able to cancel old debts, or wipe out old scores. It is the power and efficacy of that propitiatory offering, upon faith and repentance, that justifies us from the sins that are past; and it is the power of Christ's Spirit in our hearts that purifies and makes us acceptable before God. For till the heart of man is purged from sin, God will never accept of it. He reproves, rebukes and condemns those that entertain sin there, and therefore such cannot be said to be in a justified state—condemnation and justification being contraries; so that they that hold themselves in a justified state by the active and passive obedience of Christ, while they are not actively and passively obedient to the Spirit of Jesus Christ, are under a strong and dangerous delusion."—From Primitive Christianity Revived.

*.*

"Because in some cases we have said the Lord Jesus was our great example, and that his obedience to his father doth not excuse ours; but by keeping his commandments, He abode in his Father's love, so must we follow his example of obedience to abide in his love. Some have been so ignorant (or that which is worse) as to venture to say for us, or in our name, that we believe our Lord Jesus Christ was in all things but an example; whereas we confess Him to be so much more an example, that we believe Him to be our most acceptable sacrifice to God his father, who for his sake will look upon fallen man that hath justly merited the wrath of God, upon his return by repentance, faith and obedience, as if he had never sinned at all."—From a Testimony to the Truth.

GEORGE WHITEHEAD.

"I believe Christ's mediation, suffering and death for mankind took effect from the beginning, ever since man fell, and the blessed effects and fruit thereof for man's redemption shall continue to the end of the world. And the eminent love and respect God had from the beginning and ever will have, to his own promised seed, Christ Jesus, and to all that He did and suffered for the redemption and salvation of the whole Adam, or all mankind, the excellent virtue, merits, or deservings of Christ, in all his obedience, works and sufferings for mankind, did reach to the beginning of the world, and shall to the end thereof.

For He who was as a lamb slain from the foundation of the world and by the grace of God tasted death for every man, ever liveth to make intercession for man, according to the will of God."—From Truth Prevailing.

In reply to one who accused him of esteeming the blood of Christ no more than a common thing, George Whitehead says, "I positively affirm thus: That Christ did offer up the flesh and blood of that body, though not only so, for He poured out his soul, He poured out his life, a sacrifice unto the Father; and in it tasted death for every man; and that it is upon consideration, and through God's acceptance of this sacrifice for sin, that the sins of believers are pardoned, that God might be just, and the justifier of him who believeth in Jesus or who is of the faith of Jesus. Is this common flesh and blood? Can this be affirmed of common flesh and blood?"

GEORGE BISHOP.

To one who accused the Society of Friends of being socinians, viz: "Tis a doctrine of the socinians that our Lord Jesus Christ did not by his death and bloodshed, satisfy for our sins, and so purchase redemption for us, but that He was a perfect pattern of righteousness, holiness, obedience and sufferings."

George Bishop replies, "That He is the latter, viz: a perfect pattern, etc., hath been proved out of Christ's own mouth, and the Apostle Peter's, and the Quakers own it. But that He did not by his death and bloodshed satisfy for our sins, and so purchase redemption for us, is a wicked lie."—From the Throne of Truth Exalted over the Powers of Darkness.

MARY DUDLEY.

The following extract from a sermon of Mary Dudley, as reported and published by one not a Friend, beautifully portrays her conception of the value of the atonement for those "who were servants of God before his sufferings, as well as those who have lived since his coming," and is an exemplification of the depth and scope of meaning in the terms, "slain from the foundation of the world."

"But if He manifested his mercy in our creation, oh, how stupendous was his love, when man fell from that happy state in which He had formed him, to find a remedy, to provide the means of salvation, not for fallen Adam only, but for all who should spring from him, even unto the end of time, by the propitiatory sacrifice of Christ on the cross, by the blood of the just for the unjust, reconciling God to the world and saving all the children of his Father, both in ages to come and in all former generations."

"By his means, we obtain knowledge of the truth; by Him we come to the Father; and him that draweth near to Him, He will in no wise cast out."

"So that the love of God in Christ hath remained in all generations; the Light of Israel, the redeemer of the world hath saved the just of every age; the same blessed means has always produced the same glorious effect; his atonement hath made satisfaction for the transgression of those who were servants of God before his suffering, as well as those who have lived since his coming; for those dying in faith and living in holiness, although they received not the Gospel, were accepted through the precious blood of the future sacrifice of God. He saved all that ever were or will be redeemed. There is no other name under Heaven whereby salvation is offered unto man."

STEPHEN GRELLET.

Stephen Grellet in 1822, when travelling in Long Island, where a spirit of infidelity and openly denying the Divinity of Christ was prevailing, wrote as follows:

"In all these meetings, I felt myself imperatively called upon to preach the Lord Jesus Christ as the only Saviour; to expose the awfulness of the sin of unbelief, and the fearful condition of those 'who have trodden under foot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the covenant, wherewith we were sanctified, an unholy thing, and done despite unto the 'Spirit of Grace.'"

"1827, at Wilmington there were many 'who deny the only Saviour and reject the only hope of salvation.' The burden of the word given to preach was Christ and Him crucified, who was delivered for our offences and raised again for our justification. I set forth the heinousness of the sin of unbelief in Christ, and earnestly besought them to return unto Him whom they had denied, that they might have hope to obtain eternal life through Him.

"At London Grove it was laid upon me loudly to proclaim that hope of redemption which the believer has through our Lord Jesus Christ."

THOMAS EVANS.

Thomas Evans, on page 126 (first edition) of his Exposition, refers to one who "adopted and promulgated the false and anti-Christiana notion, that the gift of Divine Grace in the soul, superseded the necessity and cancelled the benefits of the coming and sufferings of our blessed Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ."

For a fuller and more detailed account of the views of the Society of Friends on the all-important subject of the atoning sacrifice on Calvary, the reader is referred to the valuable work of Thomas Evans, entitled, "An Exposition of the Faith of the Religious Society of Friends, commonly called Quakers, in the Fundamental Doctrines of the Christian Religion."

SECRECY AND PRIVACY.—Let me ask you to discriminate between mere privacy and well-defined secrecy. Mere privacy includes the private acts of the individual, the family, business committee, insurance company, even a session of Congress; either and all of these are natural and right, and afford no facility for extended conspiracy against the life, liberty or character of individuals, or the well-being of the community, state or nation. But the secrecy referred to, including as it does associations of men extended over the community, state or nation, and bound together by grips, passwords and fearful oaths, to "hail, to conceal and never reveal the secrets of a brother;" the "rites, ceremonies or future laws and acts of this society"—even those "unseen and unknown"—such societies, existing as they do in time of peace, and organized, not for public good but for personal interest, awaken just suspicion and alarm, for they may be used for selfish and dangerous purposes. History reveals scores of just such injurious associations.

It was in reference to such societies that John Quincy Adams said: "I am prepared to complete the demonstration before God and man, that the Masonic oaths, obligations and penalties cannot by any possibility be reconciled to the laws of morality, of Christianity, or of the land."

Daniel Webster said: "All secret associations, the members of which take upon themselves extraordinary obligations to one another, and are bound together by secret oaths, are naturally sources of jealousy and just alarm to others; are especially unfavorable to harmony and mutual confidence among men living together under popular institutions, and are dangerous to the general cause of liberty and just government."—*By ex-president John Q. FOR "THE FRIEND," SOMETIME, SOMEWHERE.

Unanswered yet? the prayer from lips love pleaded
In agony of heart these many years.
Does faith begin to fail? Is hope departing,
And think you are in vain these falling tears?
So urgent was your heart to make it known,
Say not the Father has not heard you pray—
You shall have your desire sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? though when you first presented
This one petition at the Father's throne.
It seemed you could not wait the time of asking,
So urgent was your heart to make it known.
Though years have passed since then, do not despair—
The Lord will answer you sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Nay, do not say ungranted,
Perhaps your part is not yet wholly done;
The work began when first your prayer was uttered,
And God will finish what He has begun.
If you will keep your intense burning there,
His glory you shall see sometime, somewhere.

Unanswered yet? Faith cannot be unanswered
Her feet were firmly planted on the Rock.
Amid the wildest storms she stands undaunted
Nor falls before the loudest thunder-shock.
She knows Omnipotence has heard her prayer,
And cries, "It shall be done sometime, somewhere."

THE WEB OF LIFE.

O, strange web of life! I would loose thee to-night,
And lay down the shuttle, and rest for awhile,
For the threads I weave in make the shadows too dark,
And the warp and the woof shrink with tears all the while.

I cannot do this, but the web of the past,
I loose from the beam with a tremendous hand,
There's a quiver and thrill at my heart as I gaze
And note how uneven each figure is planned.

O, strange web of life! in childhood so bright;
So filled with the promise of glorious things,
So evenly woven while guarded by love,
Ere time hurried childhood away on its wings.

How memory's doors are unlocking to-night!
The past with its joys and its sorrows appears,
Where mingled and prayers and hopes are com-mingled,
And threads that were golden are cankered with tears.

What beautiful hopes are woven in here,
What holy resolves are clustering there;
How even again is the ground-work I view,
Ere long overlapped by the leaves of despair.

O, hand ere so tired, thou canst not lay down
The shuttle that fillet thy life web yet fast;
It seemeth not well to grow weary at noon
So willing aside thy life-work to cast.

Weave in good resolves with beautiful hope,
With faith in God's promise toil in thy prime.
With love in thy heart, thy fingers may yet
Weave a glorious web ere the evening time.

A COLONIAL BISHOP.—Bishop Newnham thus writes of travel through his hyperborean diocese of Moosejaw, in Canada:—"For a large part of the way I only had two Indian lads, which means that I paddled myself for many hours in the day, besides helping to carry over the portages, to haul at the 'tracking-line,' or tow-ropes, and to make camp at night. I have been travelling in canoe and open boat for over three months, sleeping in a tent, or in open boat without even that shelter, for the whole of that time, except for three weeks altogether at the different Hudson's Bay Company's posts, in almost tropical heat of midsummer and the frosty nights of the autumn, sometimes plagued with myriads of mosquitoes and other venomous flies; at other times, on the Bay, surrounded by vast ice-floes from arctic regions, much of the time wet through from incessant rain, or from wading in rivers and through swamps; exposed sometimes to the risks of swift rapids; at others to gales and tides; rising daily at four or half past four in the morning, and retiring to my bed on the ground at ten at night."—Herald of Peace.

Striving for the Strait Gate.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER.

Jesus Christ when He was on earth pointed out two gateways; and they remain to this day. One of them is "the gate which leadeth unto life"; the other is the "gate which leadeth to destruction." The first gate he described as "strait" or narrow; the second is a "wide" gate, and opening out into an exceedingly broad road that was, and is, thickly travelled. This latter gate is very easily found; it is the popular road of self-gratification and self-indulgence; it allows a wide berth for "free thinking" and free living, and those who travel there are not required to give much thought about God, or the Day of Judgment, or a coming eternity. There is no need to rear pulpits or to employ preachers to point out this wide entrance; one has only to obey his sinful inclinations and run with the crowd; "many there be who go in thereat."

The great object of Christ's coming into this world was to open the "strait gate," to lay out the road, to guide all those who tread it, and to secure their full and final salvation. On one occasion, by a very bold metaphor, he declared, "I am the door; by Me if any man enter in he shall be saved." Why is this gateway to the Christian life called "narrow"? Did Christ mean to say that his power, or his pity, or his love, were limited? No indeed; for nothing under heaven could be more unlimited than his gracious, loving invitation, "whosoever will, let him come!" He simply meant that his gate was "strait" or narrow because it did not allow perfect latitude of opinion, or utter laxity of conduct. No one is permitted to say—henceforth I am my own master; I shall do as I like. Favorite sins and self-indulgences are contraband at that strait gateway. Pride cannot drive through its coach and four; sensuality cannot smuggle in its harlots, or its hampers of strong drink; the worldling cannot bring in his worship of Mammon, or the covetous man his greed of lucre; and no self-righteous sinner is permitted to stalk in and assert that he has no need of the righteousness of Jesus Christ. To every one who approaches this blessed gateway of salvation, the loving Saviour gives the firm command: "If any man will come after Me, let him deny himself!"

Hallelujahs and endless thanksgivings to God that the entrance to the true Christian life is just what it is! At the gate we are to give up, and ever afterward we are to take up. At that gate we are commanded to crucify that accursed house-devil self, that we may have room in our hearts for Christ, and for our fellow-men. While the broad road leads down to death, the narrow gate leadeth unto life—to largeness of life and loftiness of aim, and genuine joys. It brings pardon and peace of mind; and secures fellowship with Jesus Christ. If the gate be narrow by excluding what is base and selfish and sinful, the man who enters it is broadened. Noble old Norman Macleod, of Scotland, phrased it very finely in the last speech that ever fell from his eloquent lips. He said:

"I desire to be broad as the charity of Almighty God, who maketh his sun to shine on the evil and the good, who hateth no man, and who loveth the poorest Hindu more than all our committees or all our churches. But while I long for that breadth of charity, I desire to be narrow—narrow as God's righteousness, which, as a sharp sword, can separate between eternal right and eternal wrong."

Such a life as this—the only life that is "eternal"—is not to be had for the mere wishing. It is not enough to sigh for it and to say, "How I wish I was a better man—how I wish I was a Christian!" Such sighings cost nothing and come to nothing. There may be millions in hell who once promised themselves that they would at some time become Christians. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate!" said Jesus Christ. It was to be no child's play. It is no holiday business to deny self, to put the knife to wicked appetites, to break from dangerous associations, to face possible ridicule, to cut loose from entangling sins. If there be one person reading this article who honestly desires this new and noble life, I would say to him or her—there are many things to hold you back. The Evil One does not go out of human hearts in these days any more willingly than he did in the olden Bible-times, and only at the bidding of Christ. Pray earnestly to Christ for deliverance. The world has got its grip on you. Perhaps your intimate associates are unfriendly to religion—they may stare at you, or sneer at your exchanging a frolic for a prayer-meeting. Moral cowardice has cheated millions out of heaven. Good resolutions made in your own strength are mere pipe-clay.

You have never striven to enter the open gateway to the new and the eternal life. You have had the divided mind that accomplishes nothing. It has been only half-and-half work, spending itself on a few serious thoughts soon dissipated, or on a few formal prayers. No man, having put his hand to the plough and looking back, is fit" (i. e., is well put) "for the kingdom of God." If you take hold of the plough spiritually, with the help of the Holy Ghost push it through. Trust it down deep into the subsoil of your affections and your hitherto stubborn will. If that plough tears up some beds that have only borne flowering weeds, all the better. You are not a Christian until you have given your heart to Jesus Christ. You must begin to keep his commandments, to resist sin because He hates it, and to do right because He loves it. Quench not the Spirit! Just begin to serve Christ by doing the first duty that comes to your hand. Refuse to do the first wrong thing to which you are tempted, and do this with fervent prayer for Divine help. "Strive to enter in at the strait gate; for many will seek to enter in, and shall not be able when once the master of the house is risen up and hath shut the door!" That gateway of life may soon be shut!

During a revival of religion in one of our great universities two students were awakened who were intimate friends. One evening they agreed to go and call upon one of the professors and ask for his advice. They came to his door, when one of the two stopped and said, "I believe I won't go in." His companion replied, "You can do as you please; but I need all the help that a man of experience can give. I am resolved to go in." They there parted—and for eternity! The one went in, opened his difficulties to the professor, received good counsel, and decided for Christ. He became an eminently useful minister of Christ. The other threw off all serious thought, drifted into "fast" associations, and ended his career as a sot. The one co-operated with the loving Spirit, the other quenched the Spirit, and shut the gateway of life against himself! My friend, your Bible is full of glorious encouragement to you. A pure life, a useful life, a happy life and an eternal life in the Father's house is now within your reach. The only time you are sure of is the present. There are two gates, and the two opposite roads into eternity! You must take one or the other! Beside that strait gate stands the Infinite love, saying to you, "I set before you death and life. Choose life!"

Letter From Germany.

The time goes so swiftly that I do not know what to make of it sometimes. Think of it! Three weeks from to-day I will probably be in Cologne, from whence I take the train to Paris, and will reach there, if all goes well, by three o'clock in the morning. Then can imagine how I will fly around, when I reach there! These last three weeks I am not working so hard. I have only a few pages more of the grammar, and Fraulein Meyer seems quite pleased with me. Since I began, the first of Ninth Month, I have covered the work done by the pupils here in six years. Of course, in going over it so rapidly, I have not retained it all, but I have done the work, and understand it, and know just where to look for any rule or manner of expression that I wish—and that is of great value.

To-day, in my lesson with M. Mercier, I could talk very well. Some days I can do better than others. I shall have no difficulty, on reaching Paris. I feel sure of that. I told thee I intended to stay only one month there.

Board and everything in Europe is paid by the month, not by the week. If I arrive on the twelfth I will expect to leave on the twelfth. Paris is the most beautiful in the Fifth Month, every one says. But I don't mind. It will be much lovelier in Switzerland. Oh, I simply pine for the country and the mountains and the freedom.

Yesterday I received an invitation to an evening company next week, given to celebrate Washington's Birthday by the Americans here in Gottingen. It will be a simple, social gathering, with only refreshments, and no regular dinner or supper, but I wrote a refusal, because I don't feel very social just now, and, knowing the Americans so little, I don't think I would specially enjoy it. I don't go anywhere this winter, except to lessons and lectures and walking. I have had several invitations to large "coffeees" (though I know very few people here), but have managed every time to have a good excuse, so that I need not go. In France and Switzerland I will do as I did in Germany last winter, accept everything that comes along, and spend my time hearing and talking, more than so much studying. I have the hard part behind me now, and what I want is fluency. Besides, I shall come home more rested, and in every way in better condition by not working so much at the desk and burning the midnight oil, which I have done this winter.

I am glad when anything I write pleases others. But I generally write so hurriedly, and saving spoken almost no English for so long, I feel notice afterwards that I have worded my letters very badly.

I told thee that Ida my friend from the Harz, ad been here. I was with her a great deal. I wish thee could know her. I have told thee very often how lovely she is. Her mother was so grateful that I could be with her and help her, that she sent me a very nice book, ad Albanan an album for the colored postal cards, of which I have already spoken in earlier letters. Albanan was delighted. She had already several cards that had been written to her, but she had never cared for them. But now her chief desire is to get the book full. I will write her on one, now and then, from the places I stop at in my trip. Some of them are really quite pretty, and for a child it is very nice. She learns also the names of cities and resorts in this way. One of her friends gave her a lot the other day. E. S. K.

How I Built the First Road in Northern Newfoundland.

One of the strangest lacks of the many I perceived when I first went to my lonely missionary quarters in the north of Newfoundland, was that of a road. Look where one would, there was nothing like a road. All along the coast there were either barrens or forests, but, save a narrow footpath, no roads. Of course, there were no horses, except one, and her nearest neighbor in kind lived more than two hundred miles away. There were, therefore, no carts or carriages. The only mode of travel besides walking was by dog-sleigh in winter, over from three to six feet of hard snow, or boat in summer. I soon grew to the want of roads when I found that there was no demand for them.

But "want or no want," I reflected one day, "it looks so uncivilized to be without roads," and I wished, for the sake of civilization merely, to have a "bit of a road," as an Irishman would say. Near to my headquarters—that is, three and seven miles distant, respectively—there stood two little frame churches, in which I used to minister at regular intervals. Now both these churches were about a half a mile from the landing-stage to which we used to tie our boats when we went to church in the summer. "Now," thought I, "what a great thing it would be if I could build a road to each of the churches from the landing-stage!" The more I thought of this little plan of mine, the more I admired it, and I determined to carry it out some day. But how could I do it? That was the question. The good folk among whom I lived had, for the large part, never seen a road in their lives, and I suspected that those who had had forgotten what it was like. But I was set on getting the glory of projecting and completing the first road in the north of Newfoundland. The idea came to me during the first winter of my residence. The summer followed, and my plan existed only in my own mind. All through the long summer days the people were all engaged in the cod-fishery and other fisheries. Nobody had a moment to spare, specially to discuss the providing of that for which no need existed.

The fisheries promised a rich harvest at the beginning of the season, and great hopes filled the breasts of the fisher-folk, who had struggled hard to live under the stress of three successive failures in their only business and means of livelihood. Heads were bent, heavy sighs and dejected looks told the tale of sorrow that lurked under the tawny, weather-beaten brow of the fisherman. The season ended, and the catch was only as the people expressed it, "half a voyage." The traders arrived, in their well-equipped and well-stocked ships, ready to barter with the people for their fish and oil, but there was so little fish and oil, and the families were very large, and the winter was long. Only half a supply of salt beef and pork, and molasses and flour could be procured. "Must trust in God for the rest," they would say, and turn longingly away from plenty to face scarcity.

Now there would seem to be no connection between this sad condition of affairs and my plan of building two half-miles of road on the Newfoundland coast. But it was just this crisis that furnished me with the power to carry it out to my complete satisfaction. Realizing what the long winter would be for the poorest of the people all along the coast, who had only been able to obtain a very small supply of food from the trader, the leader-of-the people came to me and urged me, before the ice formed, to lay the matter before the government of the island, and ask for flour and molasses. To this request I assented, and sent a hasty letter by the last trading-vessel to the government, with a statement of the destitution that was impending, and concluding by begging for assistance. Ten days later, the letter was answered by the appearance of a schooner, which soon landed two hundred barrels of flour and two puncheons of molasses. They were consigned to me, with a letter of instructions, which the captain of the schooner handed to me when all the provisions had been safely stored in a large shed near to my headquarters. The letter stated that the shipment had been given gratis to those who were likely to want during the long winter; that I was to use my own discretion in giving it out, but that it might be good for the people themselves to do some work in return for it, of which I was also to be the judge.

So my road began to come within measurable distance of being built. However, before doing anything (and I was very anxious to get at it), I called the men around me and told them of my plan. They agreed very cordially to assist me, and it was understood that all men who received assistance from the government shipment were to work on the "passon's road." Of course, nothing could be done in the way of road-making during the winter, and so the second winter passed away. But with the first signs of spring, I summoned my forces, gave them my plans, and set them to work at the building of the first road in the north of the colony. I superintended the work day after day, giving orders like a general, showing the men how to work, and deporting myself with very great importance. The workmen were true to their word, and though they did not (could not) work at the roads every day, yet when autumn came they were finished, well ballasted and graded, and fit for a king to walk on.—Friedrich E. J. Lloyd in Sunday School Times.

The editor of the Christian Advocate has a column in his paper delegated to answering questions from his correspondents mainly referring to the doctrines and discipline of the Methodist Church.

In a recent number of the paper in replying to a query involving the idea of infant accountability, the editor states: "The Methodist Episcopal Church has thus far had sufficient common sense not to promulgate a doctrine concerning a subject upon which the Scriptures are absolutely silent."

Is so dry a region as Central Australia, frogs are found in fair numbers, creeks and clay-pans "swarming" with them. As the waters dry up the frogs disappear in their burrows, remaining till the rains come again. "Certain species of them," says Spencer, "gorge themselves with water before they go into their retreats, and in times of drouth the natives dig them out and obtain enough water from their bodies to satisfy their thirst.—Selects."

An Estimate of Friends.

In the Lafayette Avenue Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., on the evening of Eleventh Month 20th, the Pastor, Dr. David Gregg, delivered a discourse on "The Quakers as Makers of America."

"The Quakers, when seen at their best, stand in American history for ideal civilization; and this civilization is their contribution to the American republic. As historic characters the Quakers are a marked and influential people in the midst of the most marked and influential types of mankind. They have put their stamp indelibly on national and international life. If we enter into the courts of justice we can see that they have been there; the substitution of affirmation in place of the oath is their work. The jails of humanity show the results of their reform; it was they who changed our prisons from sties to sanatoriums. The dream of that beautiful prison angel, Elizabeth Fry, is being worked out into reality in criminal law, and the remedial element in punishment is being pushed to the forefront in the administration of justice. They have put their mark even on the pages of our Holy Bible and have made it a book of greater power. They have taken some of its grandest prophecies and statements and commands and beatitudes, and by believing them, living them, translating them into reigning forces in the home and in the church and in the State, they have so made these their own that in reading the Book we instinctively associate their names with these scriptures.

"The Quakers arose in an age of dogmas and creeds and persecutions and reforms and religious revolutions and quarrelling ecclesiastics. They took their place among the ranks of reformers, and were the most advanced of all. Their reforms were the most sweeping of all. They were the liberals and radicals of that age; they were the reformers of the reformed; they undertook to reform Calvin, and Luther, and Knox. The Episcopalians and Puritans and Presbyterians protested against the Romanists, but the Quakers protested against the Episcopalians, and Puritans and Presbyterians. In the language of Milton to them, 'presbyter was only old priest writ large.' The Quakers were the Episcopalians and Puritans and Presbyterians of the seventeenth century, sweetened and modified, and made over with a new and a large admixture of love. They denied all ecclesiastical authority, and threw aside all the prevailing ecclesiastical rites; they went to God directly for their instructions and worshipped before God in stillness and silence without prescribed forms. As the complement of a State without a king, they offered mankind a church without a bishop. Sweeping aside creeds, and councils, and rituals, and synods, they held that God and the individual man, living in loving fellowship, were sufficient.

"They were a people of great moral purpose. Their ideals were their inspiration, and the realization of these ideals was their goal. They got their strength from ideals and convictions and visions of which the senses take no cognizance. James Freeman (Clarke calls them the 'English mystics'). If they were mystics they were exceedingly practical mystics. They were one of the most independent people among all the races. They differed from all the sects around them in that they renounced the use of all force in the propagation of their principles. They inculcated and practised religious toleration. They have the honor of being one of the few divisions of Christendom against which the charges of cruelty and selfishness and love of power cannot be brought. Their gun was a protest, their bullet a principle. They served the Church and State by what they were. When violence was used against them their principle of action was, Never retaliate. Their method of growth was by patience and perseverance and quiet suffering, and their method was effective. For example, they carried their religion into the Massachusetts colony and planted it right in the midst of the hard-headed Puritans. The Puritans persecuted them, whipped them, robbed them, hung them, but they kept right on asserting themselves and suffering until, by their patience, they wore out the cruelty of the Puritans and brought the Puritan scourge and scaffold into public disgrace. The public, won over to them by their beautiful spirit, rose and demanded the cessation of persecution. Thus they purchased and established for us by their sufferings the religious toleration which now exists in our republic.

"The Quaker power in America reached its height in the coming of William Penn and in the establishment and life of the colony of Pennsylvania. William Penn was second only to George Fox as a Quaker influence. There was no man better fitted to establish such a commonwealth than William Penn. He had paid a large price for the privilege of being a Quaker and this made him a man to be trusted. He had ability, he was educated at Oxford. He was democratic in spirit; his definition of a free government shows this. 'Any government,' he said, 'is free where the people are a party to the laws enacted.' He was a kindred spirit to John Bright, the Quaker statesman of Great Britain, who for a whole generation was a leading spirit in the great movements of his country, and who was always on the right side. John Bright got his principles from William Penn. An analysis of his public life will show the Quaker principle of civil life to be this: Political power is rightly exercised only when it is possessed by the consent of the governed and is used for the welfare of the community according to the permissions of the moral law.

"This principle guided William Penn when he organized his colony. He gave it a constitution and laws full of the genius of humanity and full of equal justice. He allowed all reforms to be pushed within its territory. There was not one good Quaker thing which did not flourish in it. Here the Indians were treated as brothers and here they acted brotherly in return. The colony was a temperance colony; it was an anti-war colony; it was a colony noted for its religious toleration.

"The part the Quakers have taken in building the American republic makes clear this two-fold way in which patriots can effectively serve their country:

"1.—By uttering an emphatic protest against all destructive evils.

"History can ask no grander illustration of the power of protest than Quaker life on American soil. Why is it that there is no African slavery to-day within our borders? It is because the Quakers as early as 1688 issued their protest against African slavery, and kept it issued until the nation was educated up to the emancipation proclamation. But mark this: They invested their all in their protest. They meant it, and they made the American people feel that they meant it. Their protest was strong with the moral strength of a splendid personality and a consistent life; its power was moral.

"2.—By keeping before one's country uplifting and inspiring ideas.

"We call guns, swords, powder, forts, iron clads and armies national powers; the Quaker have taught us that there are powers beyond these. The powers beyond these are right thoughts, high ideals, holy visions, righteous principles, burning aspirations. These make a strong manhood and a pure womanhood, and such manhood and womanhood make a strong and pure State. The men and women who have these thoughts, ideals, visions, principles, aspirations, go straight to God for them; they are exponents of God. The ideal civilization exists only in the plan of God.

"This is the message of the Quaker father to the patriotic sons of America: If you would render your country the highest service, lead it forward to the millennial age, be an intellect to your country, make moral decision for it; and think and decide within the lines of God's holy law. If you would render your country the highest service, be the Lord's prophet to your country; dream dreams for it and see visions for it."

Natural History, Science, etc.

Novel Sulphur Mining is now being carried on in South-Western Louisiana. The deposits lay underneath over four hundred feet of quicksand. Previous attempts to get through this by steel cylinders, and later by freezing, has failed disastrously. The new system resembles the double tube method of getting brine. But here three tubes, one inside the other, are used. The outer has water heated to three hundred and thirty-five degrees F., that is, subjected to a pressure of two hundred pounds per square inch. Through the middle one the mixed water and melted sulphur are caused to ascend. The core tube is filled with hot air to help keep this sulphur liquid. The hot water, issuing from the outer tube, melts the sulphur from the deposits, and the intense pressure forces it up the innermost tube. This goes on for a few hours to a few days, when the steam generated blows off. Operations are stopped a few hours, and the tubes possibly shifted further down. The molten sulphur is run into large vats, allowed to cool, and sawn up into convenient blocks for transport.

Special Polar Candles would be necessary for out-door work. A person named Moss has found that the ordinary candle, at thirty degrees below zero, only melts the central part, thus encasing itself in a cylinder of wax or paraffin as it burns.

Gold from Sea Water.—Every ton of sea water contains on the average some three-quarters of a grain of gold. This means over four hundred tons of gold beneath each square mile of sea for it comes to about two hundred tons per cubic mile, and the oceans average a depth of fully two miles. It was suggested that at present no one was likely to search for gold in this way. It makes itself most apparent in natural ways by being deposited electrolytically upon Muntz metal sheathing, along with silver. At a late meeting of the Chemical Society, however, E. Sonstadt announced that he had detected the gold in half a gallon of sea water by shaking it up with twenty grains of mercury. The question suggests itself whether such shaking could be accomplished by tidal action so that to collect gold quickly enough to pay a working per cent, upon the cost of the mercury. Obviously the "bittern" left after various las have been crystallized out by evaporation might be sufficiently concentrated to repay the further labor. But this would be only upon a small scale.—London Friend.

Waste Water in Irrigation.—The portions of our country under irrigation are having new experiences. As we know, when it rains a very small portion is used by vegetation; the surplus goes into the earth to feed springs, or seeps at once to add to the volume of rivers, or in locations where irrigation is practised, the larger portion of water used passes into our channels. A remarkable result, but one to be naturally expected is, that the underlying water level is often changed. Wells which at one time had the water level twenty-five or thirty feet from the surface, have it now ten or twenty. In other cases, springs of water will appear in places where water never appeared before. I saw an owner with a dry and worthless piece of ground becomes suddenly wealthy by water appearing on his property in this peculiar way. At here the lawyer turns up,—and suits arise as to whose property the water is. Here in the East, or in the West, we have to return a runaway horse when he is found on our premises,—and there the runaway water is as much of a pestion. Every condition in life has troubles of its own.—Mechanics' Monthly.

It is worth some trouble to see a heron eat a snail. As a spearman he is the best of his family, or of any other that I know of. His stroke is lightning quick, and as sure as if foreordained; I have never seen it miss. No cat has a stealthier step or a more steadfast eye than a heron when slipping along to take a victim unawares. Not long ago I approached to within forty yards of a magnificent specimen, and with a strong binocular glass observed it closely for more than an hour, while it wrought its strategies against a school of minnows.

I was on a bluff fifteen feet higher than the bed of the little stream in which my bird was fishing. The water was shallow and not very still, but it rippled prettily around some large granite bowlders between which the glinting scales shone and fro in silvery swarms. In order to surprise his victims the heron had to creep from place to place under cover of those bowlders; and it was wonderful how nimbly, and warily and how swiftly he made his moves. Always when he struck he got a fish, a mere outfall and swallowed instantly; then the school scattered, as wild as hares, flashing away in every direction. Pretty soon however, they came together again in some one of the dimpling eddies on the sunny side of a bowlder. For awhile the heron would not move. Standing like a statue he appeared to take no notice of his surroundings. He was waiting for a puff of wind to stir up little waves on the water, and when it came he shot around the bowlder as if sent from a bow. The little fish did not see his eye while the surface of the water was agitated; and next came his beak-thrust, certain death to one more minnow.—The Independent.

WILLIAM R. TAFFER was a worthy Friend to deceased within a few years in Western New York. On his eightieth birth-day, while seated with his family quietly around the table for dinner, he expressed with great tenderness a deep feeling of his heart.

"Let us praise the Lord for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men, for He hath dealt bountifully with us. He hath given us bread to eat and raiment to put on, but let us praise Him most of all in that He hath in the riches of his love and mercy given us of his grace and good spirit that our souls may praise Him forever."

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 10, 1897.

A letter recently received from an Elder in one of the Conservative Yearly Meetings in the Western States, gives an encouraging view of the condition of things in that part of our religious Society. It says, "Our meeting is well attended. Our young people are showing by their example that they are concerned in best things. I believe this is real."

He mentions that one of their ministers had been paying a religious visit to the meetings of Western Yearly Meeting, and appointed some meetings in going and returning, and that he had accompanied him in this service, and adds, "We were very much encouraged to see so many of our young and middle-aged Friends becoming interested in the welfare of our beloved Society. This feeling is general throughout our Society in the West."

THE EVANGELICAL ALLIANCE FOR THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.—The Annual Report of this body for the past year is mainly occupied with the efforts which it originated to call a great national conference in the interest of a permanent provision for arbitration; and with attempts to prevent further persecution of the Christians in Turkey. In furtherance of this latter object, it addressed an expostulatory letter to the Sultan of Turkey, recalling some of the pledges of religious toleration which had been issued by that Government. To this a reply was received in general, denying the accuracy of the statements made, and otherwise unsatisfactory.

JOHN BANKS, in a letter to his wife, thus alludes to the Yearly Meeting held in London, in 1675:

"For thy comfort I may tell thee that since the time I parted from thee, I have been made so much a witness of the enjoyment of the power and presence of God, among my brethren, that I would not have missed it for all that can be mentioned to me in the world. Oh, the unbreakings of the love and melting power of God, and the shinnings of his glorious light amongst us in this our Yearly Meeting, where Friends in the ministry were from most parts broken through the nation! How were our hearts broken and our souls comforted and consoled! The Lord did certainly evidence unto us that our meetings, and what we there offered to Him were acceptable and well-pleasing before Him. Oh! the sweet harmony of life that was amongst us, the streams whereof flowed, and many living testimonies were borne to the greatness and sufficiency of the power of God that overshadowed us."

In looking over some papers the Editor met with the above, and it reminded him of the near approach of our own Yearly Meeting, and the desire was raised that we might at its conclusion, be able to bear a similar testimony.

Is there not reason to hope that such will in good measure be our experience, if Friends in assembling at this annual gathering, are concerned to dwell under the power of Christ, and seek for his blessing on their efforts to uphold his cause?

Let us remember that of ourselves we can do nothing to promote the cause of religion, and that the servants of Christ must look to Him to lead them in the way they should go, and furnish them with the power to do his will.

If, as William Penn says, to be a true disciple of Jesus, not a word, no, not a thought must slip the watch or escape judgment, do we not have need to beg with David, "Take not thy holy Spirit from me?" For it is this only, ever present, and stimulating the mind, that can enable us to avoid temptation and to experience preservation from evil.

The concerns of the Church that claim the attention of the Yearly Meeting are weighty, and our members ought to be willing to devote to their consideration the full force of their minds, and the exercise of spirit which flows from that Divine communion which the earnest Friend is often made a partaker of. We believe this spiritual exercise is interfered with when the mind is much absorbed by outside matters not immediately connected with the affairs of the Church. Hence it is with regret we have observed that temperance organizations and other associations, have selected the week of Yearly Meeting as one to hold meetings to promote their objects. We believe that whatever good may be effected in this way is done at the expense of the more important objects for which the Yearly Meeting is held; and that its interests are subordinated to those of a very secondary character.

The grand work of true religion is the subjection of the human mind to the government of its Creator—the bringing of every thought into captivity to the obedience of Christ. The more fully our members are brought into this state of mind, the more will the Church flourish and be clothed with her beautiful garments—the righteousness of Christ. We confess we look with uneasiness on the tendency to engage our young people in a variety of philanthropic efforts, lest they be tempted to substitute them for submission to the Divine will and faithful waiting on the Lord in spirit, and gradually come to think they can serve the Lord in their own way and time, and without dependence on the fresh opening and leading of his Spirit, and thus part from the very foundation principle of Quakerism. To those who are submissive and watchful the Lord will open from time to time the services in which He would have them engage, and will bestow on their labors such a blessing as seems meet to Him, and will grant the blessing of preservation to his servants.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The monthly comparative statement of the Government receipts and expenditures shows the usual receipts during Third Month to have been $36,217,692 and the disbursements $27,212,997, leaving a surplus for the month of $9,004,695. This excess is due almost entirely to increased receipts from customs. During Third Month, 1896, there was a deficit of $2,233,000.

On the 31st ult., a vote on the final passage of the Tariff bill in the House stood: Yeas, 205; nays, 122; absent and not voting, 21. A majority of 83. An amendment fixing Fourth Month as the date on which the bill should go into effect was adopted, against the protests of the Democrats, who contended that it was retroactive, and, therefore, unconstitutional.

The President the same day signed the joint resolution making an appropriation of $250,000 for the protection of the title and property from the Illinois Mississippi River.

By a unanimous vote, on the 5th inst., the United States Senate adopted a resolution rectifying the reports that General Ruiz Rivera, the Cuban commander, is about to be tried by a drumhead court-martial and shot and expressing the feeling of the people that, if the courts are true, the President of the United States should protest to the Spanish Government against such a violation of the rules of civilized warfare. The resolution was adopted by a vote of 44 to 0. Senators Hoar and Hale refrained from voting. A joint resolution was introduced, directing the Surgeon-General of the Marine Hospital Service to aid the Mississippi River flood sufferers by the distribution of tents, blankets, food and medicine under the epidemic fund of 1893, and to purchase further supplies under the present epidemic fund for similar distribution.

There were fruitless ballots for United States Senator were taken on the 1st inst. in the Kentucky Legislature. A Kentucky dispatch says that "the deadlock is costing the State, already in bankrupt condition, $1,000 a day."

The New York Voice says: "Indiana's Supreme Court has handed down another decision which contains plenty of discomfort for the liquor traffic. It holds that any city has a right by ordinance to exclude saloons from the residence portions of the city, even though the keepers may already possess licenses. This decision also holds that a license to sell liquor is simply a temporary permit, which will be revoked at any time if the public good would be served by such action. This opinion is entirely in harmony with the position taken by the United States Supreme Court in the case of California vs. Christen, when, in delivering the opinion of the Court, Justice Field said: 'There is no inherent right in a citizen to sell intoxicating liquors by retail. It is not a privilege of a citizen of a State, or of a citizen of the United States.' Manifestly, then, a license is simply the permission for a citizen to do a thing he has no inherent right to do, and such a doubtful and dangerous permit ought to be subject to constant recall, if granting it in the first place was not an act of folly and wickedness."

A medical journal has made some careful investigations into the colleges of New England, which enabled it to state that students who do not use tobacco gain weight, height and girth of chest from ten to twenty-four per cent. faster than those who chew or smoke.

The Governor of Wisconsin has vetoed the McGillivray Anti-Tobacco bill. The bill not only prohibited the formation of trusts in Wisconsin, but authorized, and made it the business of, the Attorney General to proceed against foreign combinations doing business in any way in the State.

The flood situation in Mississippi Delta, above Greenville had improved on the 1st instant, but below that point a continued rise of the waters was reported. In the Delta five counties are, for the most part, under water, and the river is fifty miles wide at Row-land, Mississippi. It is estimated that three hundred towns and cities are now under water.

A Memphis dispatch of the 4th instant says that the four breaks in the Mississippi levees in the Delta are "the largest in the States since 1878." One broke at Cincinnati, or the Hod-on-at Albany." Wind and rain yesterday intensified the danger to the towns protected by the levees.

A tornado which struck Chandler, Oklahoma, on the 31st ult., destroyed nearly every building in the town. Sixty-seven persons were killed and a number of others injured.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 432, which is 35 less than the previous week, and 3 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 238 were males and 194 females; 78 died of pneumonia; 39 of consumption; 36 of heart disease; 24 of diphtheria; 14 of smallpox; 11 of marasmus; 12 of convulsions; 12 of whooping cough; 11 of cholera; 11 of infantile; 10 of bronchitis; and 10 of Bright's disease.

FOREIGN.—Through the energy of a young New Yorker, who spent most of the winter abroad working up the idea, the London and Northwestern Railway, of England, has finally consented to adopt the American system of checking baggage. Other roads have also followed the suggestion. Hereafter all baggage passing through Philadelphia from any point in the United States will be checked through to almost any point in Europe. The traveler who was formerly annoyed by being compelled to pick his trunks out of a pile of baggage and then fee a porter to reseat them for him, may now forget that he has trunks and find them at his hotel.

In his new book on the "Ceylon Cities of Ceylon," H. W. Cavassay, that the "Bayed Cities" of those centuries before the Christian era, and several centuries after it, was a land of great wealth, of splendid cities, of which, explored within the last few years are among the wonders of the world. In a single province of Ceylon there are the remains, in various degrees of preservation, of 5,000 tanks and reservoirs, which in the times of the old Buddhist kings made the land a fruitful garden.

The Ambassadors in Constantinople have drawn up a broad scheme of autonomy for Crete, giving the Assembly power to choose a Governor, who must afterward be approved by the Sultan.

The Powers have ordered a pacific blockade of Athens. The Powers have also representation at the Athens and Constantinople, whereby, it is hoped, the maintenance of peace will be obtained. In case of a conflict on the frontier, the aggressor will be held responsible for all the consequences of a disturbance of the general peace, and whatever the consequences of the struggle, the Powers will not consent to the aggression of either party.

On the 1st instant the blockade of Greece had been decided upon with the consent of all the Powers, and will be enforced at an early date. This decision was hastened by the action of Colonel Vassos, commander of the Greek forces in Crete, in aiding the insurgents to hostilities against the Powers.

The British steamer Major, which arrived at Hamburg, Third Month 31st, had on board four survivors of the lost steamship Ville de St. Nazaire, the captain, chief engineer and two seamen. Their boat, containing nine persons, drifted for six days. The other five occupants of the boat died from the effects of drinking sea water.

The Chilean Cabinet has resigned.

Both Houses of the Venezuelan Congress at Caracas, on the 5th inst., unanimously ratified the treaty with Great Britain for the arbitration of the Guiana boundary dispute.

A NEW JERSEY CORRESPONDENT contradicts a statement in the "Savannah" of Third Month 20th, last, respecting the poultry farm of Isaac C. Wilbur, of Little Compton, R. I. Our friend incorrectly assumes that the 150,000 dozen eggs per year shipped were laid by the 4,000 hens of the poultry farm, which would be "420 eggs for each fowl per year." Isaac C. Wilbur, in a letter which is quite correct and correct in no way takes the credulity of the reader. We have about 4,000 hens kept in one hundred houses, and we handle of our own and our neighbors' production, about 150,000 dozen of eggs yearly."

NOTICES.

REDUCED RATES TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.—The usual arrangements have been made with the Pennsylvania R. R. Company, by which Friends attending our approaching Yearly Meeting can obtain excursion tickets to Philadelphia and return, from two cents per mile travelled, going and returning; except that no such tickets will be issued at a less rate than 25 cents; viz: Pennsylvania Railroad (main line), as far west as Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Erie Railroad Division, Northern Central Railway, United Railroads of New Jersey Division, West Jersey Railroad, and Philadelphia, Wilmington and Baltimore Railroad Company, on any day from Fourth Month 13th to 23rd, inclusive, and make the return coupon good until Fourth Month 27th, inclusive, 1897.

The Baltimore and Ohio Company, and the Philadelphia and Reading Railroad Company, also offer Friends the same rates and for the same dates as above specified.

Application should be made either personally or by mail, to Joseph Hall, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia or to Thomas C. Hoque, West Chester, Pa., for order on the Ticket Agents—one of which must be delivered to the Agent whenever a ticket is obtained. The orders inform the Ticket Agent at whatever station they are presented on the above railroads, that the bearer is entitled to a ticket to Philadelphia, and return, at the above rate of two cents per mile travelled. If a Friend in each neighborhood would ascertain the number of card orders likely to be needed and obtain them, and distribute among Friends, would make less work for those having the care of them. When they are to be forwarded by mail a two-cent stamp should be sent to pay the postage.

NOTE.—Tickets issued on this order will not be good to stop off at any way stations, going or returning.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters to the Agent whenever a ticket is obtained. The orders inform the Ticket Agent at whatever station they are presented on the above railroads, that the bearer is entitled to a ticket to Philadelphia, and return, at the above rate of two cents per mile travelled. If a Friend in each neighborhood would ascertain the number of card orders likely to be needed and obtain them, and distribute among Friends, would make less work for those having the care of them. When they are to be forwarded by mail a two-cent stamp should be sent to pay the postage.

NOTE.—Tickets issued on this order will not be good to stop off at any way stations, going or returning.

A YOUNG woman Friend, college educated, several years experience in teaching and general care of children, with a Bachelor of Arts degree, is now going away with a family for summer. Address "S," Office of THE FRIEND.

FRIENDS attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with meals, both before and after the sitting of the meeting, as heretofore, at moderate charge (if needed), in the second-story parlors, front of the Arch Street Meeting House. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Suffrage and the Select Meeting the previous week.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.46 A. M. and 2.53 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fares on regular trips, fifteen cents on special trips, twenty-five cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, wire West Chester, Phone 88 EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't.

DIED, on the twentieth of Third Month, 1897, at his home, Tacoma, Ohio, J. LINDLEY STANTON, son of William and Jane D. Stanton, in the twentieth year of his age; a member of Stillwater Monthly Meeting of Friends.

Second Month 22nd, 1897, MARY A. GRAY FELL, a Minister of the Galesburg Yearly Meeting and Piney Woods Monthly Meeting of Friends, in her sixty-eighth year of her age. Her bright example as consistent daily walk was a proof of her desire to follow her Master wherever He was pleased to lead. She visited Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in 1896 for the last time. Her illness only five days was on occasion suffering, so that her relatives and friends' attendance. On the third day of her illness she remarked to her only daughter, by her side, that "she had looked around to see if there was anything in her way, and all was clear." On the same day she said, "If the Lord wills, I should like to be spared to my family a little longer, but if this is to be my lot, 'Blessed be the will of our Lord and our Master, as he soon fell asleep, and we believe, awoke with Jesus."

On Second Month 8th, 1897, at the residence of her father, John Benington, Media, Pa., RACHEE B. PRICE, widow of Daniel B. Price, in the sixty-fifth year of her age, a Minister and member of Fall Monthly Meeting of Friends, Bucks County, Pa. "Blessed be the will of our Lord and our Master, as they may have that to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into it" (Rev. xxiii: 14).

1887.—Her sufferings from rheumatism and other infirmities so much reduced her, that her friends thought it unlikely she would ever again be able for much active service, but in this as in all else, she endeavored to bow to the Divine will, saying to a ministering friend who visited her, "If my Heavenly Father has any service for me, He knows I am here." Her health, contrary to expectation, improved so much that she was able to attend meetings and go out among her friends. She remained quietly waiting, feeling there would be some service to render for the Master, but not seeing what or where it was to be. Early one morning she had a dream that she was in a large room, with her windows open on every side, to use her own language, "through which came sounds of praise and swearing." She awoke with the words in her ear, "Will no one speak a word for my Master?" She lay very still, when a whole ed of labor opened before her to visit in Gospel love one hundred families of every class, condition and color around and within a few miles of her own home. Of this visit she writes a her diary: "In the Twelfth Month of this year (1887), I laid before the Monthly Meeting a concern to visit one hundred families in and around Parkerville. Friends united with it, but sared my weak condition. Our dear J. C. came o ground with me some, she being an elder. hen our own friends went with me by turns, ery kindly, as my companions.

"We have reached the number of ninety families, and it is wonderful how kindly we have been received. The dear Master did indeed eem to go before, and now, if God, whose kingdom we have tried to elevate in the hearts of he people, would only press home the truths and give the increase. The kingdom is his, the ower is his, and the glory all his forever."

In reference to this visit she wrote to her friend R. S. A., under date of Twelfth Month 25th, 1887: "Thou may not have heard of the veighty work in which I am engaged, being ersuaded that the dear Master called to it, umberly hoping that He will indeed go before e and open the hearts of the visited; to visit ery family in and around Parkerville, distribute tracts, and wait upon the Lord with them to the number of one hundred.

"We have accomplished eighteen visits now, and are resting awhile until after New Year's. Oh, my dear, I feel so weak for it, sometimes. They have received us very kindly so far, but in the future they may not be so willing. It is such an unusual requiring, but the upholding Power has seemed with us."

In the same letter she says, "My only brother has been laid to rest, rejoicing in the hope of the righteous. So we are gathered, one by one, and if we keep the holy oil burning on the altar of our hearts, the Heavenly Watcher will not find us unprepared."

1888.—Third Month 18th.—She writes in her diary: "One week ago we went to meeting, but it rained in the afternoon, and the five visits intended were not accomplished. On Second-day morning, the twelfth, we awakened with the ground covered with snow, the wind blowing hard, and drifting. The sun shone brightly, but the air was full of whirling snow all day. The thirteenth was cloudy and air full of snow blown about—a real cold Western blizzard. On the fourteenth it rained considerably more, and the wind blew, the roads were drifted full. We could not go to meeting on Fifth-day.

"Our dear Amy Sharpless, an elder of Loudon Grove, died on First-day; the funeral to have taken place on Fourth-day, but deferred until Sixth-day. I could not then go, the roads almost impassable. She was a dear mother in our Israel.

"To-day (the eighteenth), we started to meeting, but did not proceed more than three squares, it was so rough and dangerous. We turned into a field and went home thankful to return without broken limbs for the horse or a broken carriage."

Alluding to this service she writes to a friend Fourth Month 8th, 1888: "Three visits this afternoon, in all which the dear Master was as good as his word. At one place there were fourteen present; others came in, and I felt almost frightened, but was helped along by my humbling admiration, and they expressed much satisfaction. So dear, I am almost through—one sick woman at Locust Grove, two more sometime, then it will be the one hundred.

"Thou wilt rejoice with those that do rejoice, I know."

In her diary she writes Seventh Month 1st, 1888: "The family visits referred to in the last entry were put off on account of almost impassable roads, and the storms. For near two months. At last, all the one hundred visits were accomplished to my joy and rejoicing and much peace. The minute was returned in the Fifth Month.

"Rheumatism again returned with much suffering. We went to the city Yearly Meeting week, but my health gave out, and I could not attend after Second-day."

In a letter to a friend dated Sixth Month 10th, 1889, she says: "My health has been too frail of late to do much work from home, and my spirit shrinks also, and almost fears to let any thoughts come. But in the dear loving Master's own time He can make his own will clear as day. He has been so good to me: never failed yet, and I firmly trust never will. Sometimes I think I am just ripening for the good country, and He gives me a little resting spell to set my house in order. I asked Him for it, for there were some things needed doing that crippled hands could not accomplish. . . . I wanted to tell you how good I felt the Lord was to me during Yearly Meeting week, to come and meet me half way in a heavy exercise which had been with me for about two years. He was indeed to be thanked and praised for helping my shrinking mind, and so unexpectedly, too. There and then He gave me to feel that I could lay it down safely and others could take the work."

1890.—First Month 5th.—I see the whole year has passed without one entry in this journal. It has been a year of suffering and weakness, mostly from rheumatism. Mercy has encompassed my path. Two years since the Yearly Meeting appointed a committee to visit all our meetings, also to appoint some. The Yearly Meeting also appointed some Friends to co-operate; my name was mentioned, but my health has been too frail to do much. An indulgent meeting has been established at Kennet Square, and we feel encouraged to look towards building a meeting-house for them. If we could only see some young people under the mighty power of the Lord! How He leads into self-denial and humiliation awhile, that He may reign. I never expected to live to see 1890, but feel resigned to the Lord's will.

"My life, if Thou preservest my life,
Thy sacrifice shall be;
And death, if death shall be my doom,
Shall join my soul to Thee."

The past year has been one of great rain-storms and cyclones, and the city of Johnstown was almost completely flooded out by the breaking of a dam. From five to ten thousand people perished in one hour. This winter until now has been very open and mild, wild flowers blooming in Twelfth Month. Some peach orchards in New Jersey blooming.

On Fourth Month 6th, 1890, she writes to her friend, R. S. A.—"This is the anniversary of my dear Stephen's departure six years ago. I did not think to live so long without him. I hoped my time would be short, but the great I Am knows why He keeps me here. I feel of no use scarcely, yet am willing to do what He shows me is the Divine will, I think. 'He knoweth our frame, and remembereth that we are dust.' My health is so frail, so precarious, but we get to meetings mostly, and I seem stronger. We mean to go into Yearly Meeting if nothing happens, and be ready for the Select Meeting on the nineteenth. . . . Oh, that we may have a good, heavenly time altogether, the dear Master blessing us with his presence and giving wisdom. How sweet it will be to sit by thy side and in travail of spirit."

"The men's Yearly Meeting will miss Joseph Scattergood so much. A bright and a shining light he has been through the Master's power shining in Him. May the same blessing come up on G. and H., the Master's light shining through. We need not take care upon ourselves, but just run to our Lord, beseeching Him to undertake all, for us. It is wonderful how He works for and in us, when we just give up ourselves to be nothing, nothing! Then He arises in his great power and carries us on with a mighty hand and keeps us low.

"Thou asks if there is any apparent growth in our meeting? I do not know that there is. Several come in from other meetings on First-day mornings, but not all of our own members, sickness of something prevents. Our meetings are deep and sweet, though small, and I believe there is a growth in the pure life in God and the dear Saviour. Our mid-week meetings are exceedingly small. The Master knows what He is doing—all power is with Him; we only serve. What awful and striking warnings we have in the visitation of death and destruction, Oh, that the inhabitants may learn righteousness."

Seventh Month 20th.—On the afternoon of Sixth Month 1st was held an appointed meeting at Red Lion, in the hotel parlors. It was large and good. My dear friends, F. H., D. E. C. and T. W. helped me. The meeting had been on my spirit for a long time, and I seemed to fear to ask for it, and yet feared to desist. It ended well, and I am so thankful.

"Thomas Scattergood while in England, held meetings sometimes in an inn, and one in a "play house." This strengthened my faith. The Yearly Meetings Committee was released in the Fourth Month, but this meeting was provided for beforehand. The Committee were industrious, many appointed meetings were held, two at Parkerville on First-day afternoons, well attended."

The last entry in her diary is First Month 1st, 1891.—"The holiday season is now passed. It has brought many presents from dear friends and kind remembrances. Much good cheer came from this dear family, and my dear elderly friend Mrs. W. Bacon and her daughters, with Judge Gordon's wife, added much to the gifts. I feel very thankful, but want, oh, so much, to go to my heavenly home."

In a letter to her friend R. S., and dated Sixth Mo. 25th, 1891, she writes: "The Kennet Square Committee proposed to the Quarter a new meeting-house for that place, but it was thought best to wait, so we do not know. They have an indulged meeting over a store; from about twenty to thirty usually attend, very few older Friends."

IF YOU ARE IN EARNEST.—Are you looking for some opportunity of doing good? If you are, take to heart these words of William Burleigh's: "There never was a day that did not bring its own opportunity for doing good that never could have been done before, and never can be again."

These are true words. You can prove them if you will. It is often true that those who talk most about wanting to do good "if they could" have no perception of the opportunities given them every day of their lives. The real worker in Christ's earthly kingdom does not wait for opportunities; he creates them. If you are in earnest, you will never be idle for lack of opportunity.—The Standard.

A Brief Memoir of the Life of Aaron K. Owen.

BY ONE OF HIS CHILDREN.

It is not merely from feelings of filial affection or a desire to perpetuate the memory of a beloved parent, that the writer is induced to pen the following lines exemplifying somewhat the life and character of one who has long since passed from works to rewards, but rather to discharge an apprehended duty by endeavoring in this way, as ability is afforded, to illustrate the power and efficacy of Divine Grace in effectually changing the heart of man.

Aaron K. Owen was the youngest of a family of ten children, and was born near Middletown, Orange County, New York, the tenth of the Fifth Month, 1794, of parents who possessed by nature, as I have understood, some noble traits of character, but who had no name to religion, and by whom he was never subjected to much of even ordinary parental restraint, but was allowed from a child very much to follow his own inclination. When about ten years of age with his parents he removed to Tompkins County, where, the country being new, and many of the inhabitants being of the rougher sort, he was exposed to almost every temptation that such circumstances would admit of, and his being preserved from gross evils is cause for admiration, and can hardly be attributed to any other than the unseen hand of Providence.

The period of life usually thought most favorable for the acquisition of literary knowledge was passed with but a very limited opportunity for improvement, but the first essentials of an education being combined with a good natural capacity, tended to make this deficiency less apparent, particularly when a little later in life every natural and acquired endowment was brought under the qualifying influence of the Holy Spirit.

During the excitement that prevailed at the time of the last war between this country and Great Britain, he united himself with a troop of volunteer cavalry, and a little after the middle of the year 1812 joined the army then stationed on the Niagara River, near Lewis-on, where he remained about four months. The company to which he belonged were not however in that time called into action, and when narrating to his children the scenes of his soldier life, it was usual for him to acknowledge this circumstance as a particular favor because it furnished him with a certainty that he had been preserved from his unhalloved purpose of destroying his fellow-men, which, although at that time he supposed to be a duty, would have caused grievous reflections when, through mercy, his mind became so enlightened as to see the sinfulness of war, and in degree became sensible of how fearful a thing it is for rational, accountable beings to hurry one another out of time and beyond the possibility of any further opportunity of repentance, for, in the language of Scripture, "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave."

He was not at the time, however, affected by considerations of this kind, for the better even of his natural feelings were so blinded by martial ardor, that like his companions he thought nothing more desirable than an engagement with the opposing army. This anxiety, according to his own account, was abated by the occurrence of the battle of Queenston, which he witnessed, and the effect produced by being surrounded with such an accumulation of sufferings, a small proportion of which in civil life would be expected to arouse the sympathies of the most unfeeling, tended to make his discharge from Government service more acceptable, an awakened sensations of horror for the practice of war, which were never obliterated, and which doubtless were favorable to the eventual reception of the principles of peace.

Soon after his return home he lost a young wife, to whom he had been married less than year, and the day following her decease his mother also died, but these sudden bereavements as is often observable in others under similar circumstances, appear not to have made an lasting impression on his mind. Those who knew him well at this period described him a young man much given to pleasure, spending his leisure time in the eager pursuit of youthful pastimes and amusements, being, we may conclude, not unlike the character addressed in the sacred penman in this startling text, "Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, and let th heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, at walk in the ways of thine heart, and in th sight of thine eyes, but know thou that for a these things God will bring thee into judgment."

By his second marriage he became connected with a family the heads of which were consistent, exemplary Friends, but their good example seems not to have had at that time an marked influence upon him, and, although he appears not intentionally disrespectful to them, others of the Society whom circumstances occasioned his acquaintance with, yet he was disposed to ridicule their Christian testimony and particularly their manner of worship, although he occasionally gave them his company when assembled forth at purpose, it was evidently without any desire or expectation of receiving benefit therefrom.

The foregoing delineation of his early history, though short, probably includes all of much general interest appertaining to the period in which, to use Apostolic language, he wrought the will of the Gentiles, being like all the human family while in the state of fallen unregenerate nature, "An alien from the commonwealth of Israel and a stranger from the covenants of promise." How sensible he may have been at seasons during this time of his need of a Saviour, how strong his convictions for sin or what offers of Divine love he may have slighted, we cannot know, for he has left no record of his experience of the Lord's dealing with his soul, and while living, rarely more than adverted to his present or former religious exercises, doubtless being sensible of the danger of giving to others what was designed for his own instruction, whereby many have wounded their own spirits, and some, by continuing th practice, have evidently sustained serious loss this differing much from that Gospel freedom which the humble believer enjoys, while careful to keep within the pure limitations of Truth, which will preserve out of all extreme while it hinders none from whatever service they are designed for in the militant church.

Though childhood and youth had thus been passed in much apparent forgetfulness of God yet it now pleased the Lord to favor him with a remarkable visitation of his love, and by th preaching of one of his Gospel messengers, fully to awaken him to a sense of his condition that he was brought to a humble, contrite state of mind, truly resembling that of a little child which condition we have the highest authority for believing, is necessary for us all to have some knowledge of in ourselves. "Except y be converted and become as little children, y shall not enter into the kingdom of Heaven."

The Friend who was made instrumental in his conversion (Thomas Ellison) was travelling through this part of the country in his Master's service, and passed along on his journey, it is believed, without knowing, perhaps he never knew, that his Gospel message in this instance was of such singular service to one so unlikely an appearance to receive it; but however that may have been it matters not, for he undoubtedly received proportionate to his faithfulness the reward of soul-satisfying peace.

Our Saviour instructed the Seventy whom He had sent forth to rejoice not that the spirits were made subject unto them but rather to rejoice that their names were written in Heaven, and this caution to his immediate disciples in that day remains a lively admonition to his followers in every age. That Almighty Power which works immediately or instrumentally according to the will of God, and which had as we have seen "By the foolishness of preaching" made deep impressions upon a mind before verse to seriousness, effecting in his heart the first day's work in the new creation in Christ Jesus, this same power, as he submitted to its amazing, heart-changing influence and became willing to be instructed by it, proved all-sufficient to guide him into the narrow way of the cross. The state of self-abasement before mentioned continuing, he became sensible from time to time, according to his spiritual strength, what he good and acceptable and perfect will of the Lord concerning him was, and found by experience that Zion's children must indeed know judgment to pass upon everything that the Lord by his Holy Spirit in their hearts has a controversy with.

The work of regeneration, which is usually observed to be a gradual work, steadily progressed, of which the increasing solidity of his outward deportment gave evidence.

Letter From Germany.

Every one is so busy and full of preparations or the end of the term. About six of the women students passed their examination yesterday, and Fraulein Oltmanns lives here, of course we were all quite excited, too. She, however, does not pass until next year, but she was so interested in those who did, that it was quite contagious. They all came through very well, and last evening they had a social gathering. Then three of the most popular professors leave the University this spring, and that has caused a great deal of demonstration among the students of both sexes. Last Fourth day, M. Mercier, the French professor, gave a farewell address, as the last of his popular course of lectures. The hall was crowded to overflowing. The address was half amusing, half pathetic. He gave his impressions of the manners, customs, etc., of the Germans in so tactful a way that the audience was again and again convulsed with laughter at their own peculiarities—but before the close quite a number were shedding tears. He is most universally beloved, and every one regrets so much that he is going to leave. He has been here about six years, though he is still scarcely thirty-two. Third-day he comes to me for the last time. I, too, am sorry that the work is over, I have enjoyed it and learned so much. All the other professors have closed their courses already. He gives two more next week, but they are mainly readings, and nothing very weighty.

I am sure that all will go well, for it does seem to be the right thing. Everything has turned up of itself, and I seem to be only following the lead of an invisible Hand. I trust, indeed, that this may be the case, and that all may come out well.

I have already engaged passage for the twenty-fifth of Eighth Month, from Hamburg. It seemed to me that this was the date we should sail. If anything should turn up otherwise, I could easily get the date changed, but when I return it will be too late to engage the room, and I prefer attending to the matter personally rather than trusting to a letter.

I received a letter, or card, rather, from Minnie Davis, from Leipzig, and to-day a letter from her and her mother, in answer to the card with which I had immediately replied. They had just heard of my being here.

I have decided to go second-class all the way to Paris. In France third-class is not respectable—that is, it would be out of the question to travel that way alone and at night. But in Germany, because there is still a fourth-class, nice, respectable people go constantly third—at least for short distances. But from here to Cologne the entire day, and then, on top of that, all night, will be rather too much, and the difference in price is not very great.

I did not tell thee that all the different professors that I have heard this winter have given me certificates simply that I have attended their lectures, of course. But they may be of use to me some time, and it is better to have something real to show, than only to be able to say that I have attended the University.

Will they please have THE FRIEND sent to me in Switzerland, after the first of Fourth Month, until the middle of the Sixth Month, and then again sent here? I don't want to miss them this time. E. S. K.

A Visit to Florida.

In these days of frequent travel, a trip to Florida is not an entire novelty; yet as the same scenes are often viewed in a very different light by different persons, perhaps a narration of our experiences may prove of interest.

It was a bright Second-day afternoon in the First Month, when, all preliminaries having been arranged, my wife and I reached New York, and went on board the Clyde steamer Comanche, bound for Jacksonville, Florida. Although the vessels of this line leave three times a week, there is almost as much bustle and excitement attending their departure as that of a transatlantic liner. At length, however, the time to leave arrived, and we passed swiftly down the harbor and out to sea.

The ocean was very quiet, so that with a good comfortable steamer and pleasant acquaintances, the novelty of this mode of life was thoroughly enjoyed. On Fourth-day morning we reached Charleston, and had an opportunity of looking for a few hours upon this typical Southern city; the large number of colored persons to be seen made us realize that we were really in the South.

Charleston bears evidence of former material prosperity, but has not recovered as much as some places from the effects of the Civil War; the earthquake in 1886, was also a disturbing element, as many people feared to live there longer on that account. The Episcopalian place of worship, "St. Michael's Church," is one of their interesting places; built in 1761, it has survived the Revolutionary and Civil Wars, but was almost destroyed by the earthquake. The visitor is shown the pew in which Washington sat in 1797, and Robert E. Lee, in 1862; and from the historic tower a fine view of the city can be had.

Many of the old residences have their gable ends to the street, and high brick walls protect the inmates of the houses and gardens from the obtrusive gaze of the passers-by; the front door opening unto the end of the porch within.

A night's run of the steamer brought us to Jacksonville, the metropolis and commercial centre of Florida. The city is on the north bank of the St. John's River, twenty-five miles from the ocean. It is a bright busy town, having the aspect of a northern place; indeed, most of the inhabitants have come either from the north or west since the war. As there was comparatively little to see here we did not tarry long, but took train for Ocala, an interior town one hundred miles southwest of Jacksonville.

The first impressions of Florida are not particularly agreeable; for miles and miles the trains run through a flat sandy country, often swampy, sometimes covered with pine forests, and even where cleared the land does not look particularly productive. Occasionally we halted at a hamlet with a pretentious name, with but two or three one-story houses in sight, and the usual station loungers out in force; only here one-half or two-thirds of them were colored. Once or twice our train stopped at a siding in the woods, where the pile of pitch pine for the engine was renewed, for as there is no coal in Florida and plenty of wood, the latter is used everywhere. With all the discouraging things mentioned above, when the sun shines Florida is certainly a very pleasant place, if one desires to escape the rigor of our northern winters; the thermometer rarely goes below forty, and life in the open air is a privilege that can be enjoyed almost uninterruptedly.

Ocala is a thriving town—Florida—and the centre of considerable trade. Up to two years ago it was one of the principal shipping points for oranges, but an unprecedented cold snap killed all the trees in this neighborhood, occasioning much loss to the growers, who had all their means invested in this industry. Many of them fearing a repetition of the cold, are endeavoring to turn their attention to other things which will not be so easily affected.

We spent two very pleasant weeks in Ocala. Through the medium of a business acquaintance, who is an old resident of the place, we were kindly shown everything of interest, and put in the way of enjoying ourselves thoroughly. It is a clean town, well laid out, with good space between the houses, and beautiful shade trees, many of which are covered with the Spanish gray moss. This moss is not particularly attractive of itself, but when taken in combination with a towering live oak, or along a quiet road where the branches of the trees meet, the effect is very fine but hard to describe. It must be seen to be appreciated.

We were much interested in the manner of life of the people, and perhaps had a good opportunity to observe it. The houses, as a rule, have no cellars, but are built upon low foundations. They are seldom over one and a-half or two-stories high, generally of frame, and built in what we would consider a very open style, as the people have practically no cold to contend with. They heat the houses by means of open fire-places, or small wood stoves, and they are much inconvenienced when the thermometer falls below thirty degrees, as it did once while we were there.

The stores generally have their doors open, but when such, for them, extreme cold weather comes, they are compelled to close them; and for fear the public will think they are not ready for business, they put up, at such times, a sign saying, "open, come in." How we can keep warm in what seems to them, our arctic temperature, many of these people can hardly understand. We were also naturally interested in the relations of the colored people and the whites, and while there appears to be a feeling of kindness and tolerance, yet the constant effort of the whites is to keep the colored in what they consider their proper place, and social lines are very tightly drawn, even to having separate waiting rooms at the stations and separate cars on the railroads. Notwithstanding this, the colored people have equal educational advantages with the whites, their public schools being supported by the State, and teachers of their own race instructed in Normal schools of equal efficiency with the ones for the whites. The little opportunity I had for observation led to the conclusion that the race prejudice is equally strong in each section of the country, but that it is developed along different lines.

At Silver Spring, a few miles east of Ocala, is a wonderful freak of nature. A subterranean river—supposed to have its source in the mountains of Georgia—comes suddenly to the surface in an oblong basin six hundred feet across, and from sixty to eighty feet deep. The bottom is mostly a limestone formation, the water of a slightly greenish tinge, but as clear as crystal, and objects at the bottom can be discerned with wonderful exactness, so that it hardly seems possible the pool can be so deep. From this spring a small steamer runs via the Ocklawaha River, to Palatka, and the trip is a very novel and interesting one. We left Silver Spring at two P. M., and for the next hour and a-half steamed along the creek or run which flows away from this wonderful pool. It seemed like floating along through liquid glass; as we could clearly see the fishes, turtles, etc., moving away from the boat, and the grasses waving in the bottom of the stream.

Will You Decide To-day?

When Antiochus Epiphanes, the godless king of Syria, made war upon the Egyptian king Ptolemy Philometer, and penetrated as far as Memphis and besieged Alexandria, B. C., 169, the Roman Ambassador Popilius Lænas brought him orders from Rome to raise the siege at once. Antiochus hesitated, temporized, and wished time to consult his friends in the matter; but Popilius took his staff and drew a circle around Antiochus in the sand, and bade him decide the matter before he went out of that circle. The Syrian king did not dare to disobey the voice of Rome. He raised the siege and went his way to other fields.

There are times when men need to be brought to an instant decision concerning the things which concern our peace. In fact, we are deciding every day, whether we know it or not. God calls man to repent, and He calls him to repent "to-day." If man defers, he refuses. If he says "to-morrow, or next month, or next year," he is making promises which he is not certain of fulfilling; he is undertaking to do what is entirely out of his power; he is not merely offering to do what the Lord has never asked him to do, but he is simply refusing to do what God requires of him. The Lord asks no man to repent to-morrow, or next week, or next year. His only call to man to repent is to-day.

"To-day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts." For a man to say he will repent to-morrow is to say that he will not repent to-day. The Lord has never asked him to repent to-morrow, but "he now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." Just here and just now is the time and the only time that the Lord commands, invites and requires us to repent and obey Him. If we refuse to repent to-day we distinctly and definitely disobey God. If we offer to repent to-morrow we simply insult Him who commands us to repent to-day.

Around the very spot where we stand, around the present moment, the Lord strikes the circle that bounds our opportunity and summons us to instant, unconditional, unqualified surrender. Just here—this very moment—God "now commandeth all men everywhere to repent." And the decision must be made this very hour. If we decide to obey the call it is well. If we decide to disobey it we do it at our peril. But one of the two things we must do. Hesitation is disobedience. Postponement is disobedience. Neglect is disobedience. Making excuses is disobedience. There is just one of two things to do—obey the command, or else refuse God's call and take the consequences. We have nothing to do with future opportunities. We have nothing to do with making promises for time to come. Just here we must meet the Divine demands, or else we must take the risks and consequences of neglect.

My unsaved reader, what is your decision concerning this matter? Time is passing; the moments are flying. The circle of opportunity is drawn around your feet, and you must make your decision, willingly or unwillingly. You must decide what to do. Yielding is deciding, refusing is deciding, but neglecting is also making a decision, and one which will stand on record in the presence of God. Now, in this present, precious, fleeting hour, you must make the decision which may perhaps settle your destiny for all eternity.

If you are to be saved at all you must be saved by the Lord. If you are to be saved by the Lord you must be saved in the Lord's way and in the Lord's time. You are not to expect the King of glory to wait your convenience. You are not the central being of the universe. When Queen Victoria "commands" the attendance of any artist, singer or personage, her majesty's commands cancel every previous engagement. Earthly monarchs demand obedience. You would not think of asking a king or an emperor to await your time, and conform to your convenience. You would expect to be ready when he calls you, and make everything wait upon his convenience. And now while God invites you, while heaven bends in mercy above you, while all blessings are offered in your behalf and for your acceptance, why will you halt, and linger and hesitate, till the opportunity is gone, till the harvest is past, the summer is ended, and you are not saved? To-day if you will hear his voice—if you ever intend to listen to his call—to-day harden not your hearts. Let the voice of God sound through your souls, and let your answer come prompt, and glad, and free. "I delight to do thy will, O my God."—Selected.

DAVID'S crime was sternly rebuked and sorely punished, but still his life, in its main drift and outline, could be presented as a pattern, as being marked by integrity of heart. The moon shines like a disk of silver, though its surface is pitted with extinct volcanoes.

Selected for "THE FRIEND."

"FATHER, TAKE MY HAND."

"The way is dark, my Father; cloud on cloud
Is gathering thickly o'er my head, and loud
The thunders roar above me. See, I stand
Like one bewildered. Father, take my hand,
And through the gloom
Lead safely home
Thy child.

"The day goes fast, my Father; and the night
Is drawing darkly down; my faithless sight,
Sees ghostly visions. Fears, a spectral band,
Encourages me, O Father; take my hand,
And from the night
Lead up to light
Thy child.

"The way is long, my Father; and my soul
Longs for the rest and quiet of the goal;
While yet I journey through this weary land,
Keep me from wandering. Father, take my hand (Quickly and straight
Lead to heaven's gate
Thy child.

"The path is rough, my Father. Many a thorn
Has pierced me; and my weary feet, all torn
And bleeding mark the way; yet thy command
Bids me press forward. Father, take my hand;
Then safe and blest,
Lead up to rest
Thy child.

"The throng is great, my Father. Many a doubt
And fear and danger compass me about;
And foes oppress me sore. I cannot stand
Or go alone, O Father; take my hand
And through the throng
Lead safe along
Thy child.

"The cross is heavy Father, I have borne
It long and still do bear it. Let my worn
And fainting spirit rise to that best land
Where crowns are given. Father, take my hand,
And, reaching down
Lead to the crown
Thy child."

MY ENEMY.

BY ELIZA CALVERT HALL.

I have an enemy. And shall he be
A useless thorn to vex and worry me?
A dominant discord in life's perfect strain,
Marring my dreams, turning my joy to pain,
Molding my life to his malice, whom?
Shall he be lord of me, or of I him?

A bitter stream may turn the mill wheel round;
A thorny tree may burn to heat and light;
And out of shameful wrong may spring the flower
Of perfect right.

So from my enemy I may demand
A priceless tribute of perpetual good;
And lead him captive at my chariot wheels,
In royal mood.

Because my enemy hath cunning ears,
That listen hourly for my idle speech,
My words shall flow in wise and measured way
Beyond his carping reach.

Because my enemy has eyes that watch
With sleepless malice while I come and go,
My days shall own no act I would not wish
The world to know.

Because my enemy doth hourly wield
Some subtle snare to trip me every day,
My feet shall never for an moment leave
The straight and narrow way.

Because my enemy doth hate me sore,
I fix my gaze beyond him and above,
And lift, as shield to all his fiery darts,
A heart of love.

And of my enemy I still shall make
A beacon light to light me to my goal—
A faithful guardian of my house of life—
A spur and whip to urge my laggard soul;
And though our strife may never have an end,
I yet might claim this enemy my friend.

Salvation in its Gospel Aspect.

LETTER OF MARY DUDLEY, FROM FRIENDS' LIBRARY, VOL. IV, PAGE 241, ETC.

The unsoundness of principle, which about his time (1800) was distressingly evinced by many who had filled conspicuous stations in our society, was a source of deep heartfelt sorrow to this true and loyal subject to the King immortal, for the increase of whose dominion she had "long labored and not fainted." The following letter will show how earnestly she desired her preservation and help of her fellow-professors, as well as the clearness and consistency of her own views, with respect to the fundamental truths of Christianity.

SCIENCEVILLE, near Cormel,
Eighth Month 22nd, 1800.

"My Dear Friend:—In returning the manuscript with which thou entrusted me, allow me to observe, that though the system therein laid down is, to the eye of reason, very plausible, it is one my understanding or rather my best judgment, as sensibly revolts from, as that of her writer did at the contrary. It is not written in the lines of my experience; and having from the earliest opening of my understanding in spiritual things, endeavored simply to receive, that in the light which maketh manifest might be revealed, I may add, that according hereto, I conceive it to be an erroneous system, formed more by the strength of the rational or natural acuity, than the clear unfolding of pure wisdom, in that spot where the creaturely judgment is taken away, and adapted by a part not yet fully subjected to the cross of Christ. My spirit still, if happily preserved, ever commemorate had mercy, which restrained from those speculative researches to which my nature strongly inclined, and which, as a temptation likely to prevail, in my first desires for certainty, closely beset me. Many a labyrinth might I have seen involved in; in many a maze enveloped, and the various voices which are in the world, (the religions world) been, in conjunction with these besetments, attended to. Were it needful could tell thee much of the danger to which my best life has been exposed, but the standard I first erected being held steady in my view by Divine power, even (I speak it with humble gratitude) will know nothing but Jesus Christ, and Him crucified, proved a barrier to those wanderings in speculative opinions, which I believe would have to me, and have to many mercifully enlightened minds, been the means of obstruction to a progress in the way of redemption, and introduced into that circuitous path, where the peaceful termination is not to be held.

"Why should we seek to explore, or reconcile our understandings, the work or plan of redemption, formed and carried into effect by Divine unerring wisdom and love? Can our creation, in the first instance or since, be atoned by all the finite powers of man? And shall a more (I was going to say) stupendous work, that of redemption, be arranged, approved or rejected by these powers, and the constituent parts of the wondrous edifice so shaken, that he whole is in danger of being levelled? Oh! hat every attempt of this kind may be mercifully defeated.

"Wherein does our spiritual life consist? Is debate, speculation and reasoning the nourishment of the immortal part? Is it matured by God so inferior to its nature? Rather will it gradually weaken and come to decay, if not replenished from a source equal to its origin; the pure milk of the eternal Word.

"Mayest thou, my beloved friend, partake herewith and be sweetly satisfied; anything contrary to this is dangerous food, strengthening only that part destined by sacred determination for subjection to that power which, if suffered to reign, will reduce into holy order, harmony and love.

"From this state, in the rational and animal creation, there was a departure in the original fall or degeneracy of man; and in succession, as descendants from transgressing man, we partake of a nature or disposition to evil. Notwithstanding, as early as the fall, there was, and in perpetuity has been and is, a pure holy seed or principle to counteract the propensities so produced; and though no guilt attaches where there has not been a joining with the evil, yet, being possessed of a transgressing nature, we individually need redemption from it. Nor are we really so redeemed and delivered from the bondage of corruption, until, through the sanctifying influence of that pure gift vouchsafed as a light, leader and restorer, we experience the crucifixion of the old man (the first nature), with his deeds, and in the gradual process of refinement, a putting on the new man, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness.

"I fully believe that as soon as man was redeemed, after and out of transgression, it was through faith in the promised deliverer and submission to the Divinely operative and efficient means, mercifully provided by matchless love. Yet it pleased the same love and in-cruitable wisdom, in the fulness of time, to open the way more perfectly by the appearance or manifestation of this appointed Saviour in the flesh, therein to fill up that measure of suffering seen meet. It is not our business to inquire why this should be a part of the marvellous plan, but thankfully content with the remedy so graciously provided, and beholding what manner of love the Father has bestowed upon us, humbly to partake of the offered salvation, by receiving and walking in that light leading to immortality, through the glorious dispensation of the Gospel or power of Christ; the pure eternal Word," whereby all things were made. What a convincing testimony to the eternal Godhead of the Son, and thereby proving Him to be an Omnipotent Saviour, as well as holy pattern of all excellence.

"Never was there a more full and plain system than that of the Gospel; never can the strongest powers of the creature add to its clearness and beauty, though the plainest truths may be rendered doubtful and the way complex, by subtle reasonings and eloquent disquisitions. I repeat, let us be content; we have not as a people followed a cunningly devised fable, and there are, I trust, those yet preserved who can go further and say, "it is truth and no lie; having seen with their eyes, heard with their ears, and been permitted to taste of the word of life, and if required, could, through Almighty help, seal their testimony by the surrender of the natural life.

"Little did I expect to enlarge thus, and far is it from me to enter into controversy and debate, a poor employment for one apprehending a more solemn call; but my heart earnestly longs that the Lord's children may stand firm in this day of shaking and great trial. Let none beguile any of their promised reward, through leading into reasonings and perplexing uncertainty. "I am the way, the truth and the life," is a compendious lesson, a holy limit; and "no man cometh unto the Father but by me."

"I quarrel with none about forms, or differing in non-essentials; but this is the one certain direction, the consecrated path to salvation, through the Divine law-giver; and if happily attended to, all will be well here and forever!

"Thou and thine are dear to my best and affectionate feelings; write to me freely if so inclined. I should be glad to hear from, and be remembered by thee, and am

A Night in the House of Commons.

BY JUSTIN McCARTHY.

The first public business in the House of Commons is the asking and the answering of questions. These questions, as everybody knows, are addressed to Secretaries of State and Under Secretaries, to the heads of all departments represented in the house, to the law advisers of the Crown, and to everybody, in fact, who speaks for any of the offices in charge of the Administration. It is needless to say that they range over a vast variety of grievances—for questions generally relate to grievances—and apply to the manner in which the Administration has dealt with a colonial governor, or with an Indian official, or with a village postmistress. The question system in the House of Commons has again and again been made the subject of unsparring ridicule. You cannot, it is said, often expect to get great declarations of domestic or foreign policy out of a Government by putting a question, and why should the time of the House be taken up with an interrogation and a reply as to the manner in which some provincial or village office-holder was treated by the department to which his service was attached? Now just look at the different views taken by different minds. I quite admit the temptation to ridicule which is offered by a question put in the House of Commons concerning the wrong done to the village postmistress who was transferred to some ungenial district. The very dullest among us could, one might think, make fun out of that. Fancy the attention of the great Imperial Parliament being wasted over petty trivialities of that kind! Yes, but I may be allowed to say for myself that I hope there may never be any serious attempt made to restrict the privileges of members to question a Government as to the alleged grievances inflicted on the poorest and the meanest of Her Majesty's subjects. I do not think the Representative Chamber ever looks to better advantage than when it thus shows that its protection can be evoked for the occupant of a pauper's bed in a workhouse, or even for the occupant of a felon's cell, if it can be shown that any wrong has been done in either case which it is in the power of the Government to put right.

Some members of Parliament, of course, have a perfect craze about questions. They live for the putting of questions. They make a name—"Phobus" what a name!" as Milton says—for the putting of questions. A friend of mine, an English Liberal member of the House, long since dead, used to repeat, with great good humor, a story which told against himself. During the course of a recess, he was delivering an address to his constituents, and in order to impress them with a due sense of his public services, he emphasized the fact that, in the last session, he had put to Ministers more than three hundred questions. He passed to study the effect of his statement, and a voice from the furthest part of the gallery called out, "Why, what a bignorant bloke you must be!"

FOR "THE FRIEND."

A Brief Biographical Sketch of William Penn.

William Penn was born near the Tower of London in 1644. At an early age he was sent to a grammar school at Chigwell in Essex, one of the country seats of his father; he gave evidence of promising talents and received some serious impressions by which his youth was preserved in purity, and pious desires were awakened in his mind. It was while in his eleventh year that he experienced the enlightening influence of Divine Grace and the good seed being sown in the soil of a sincere and willing heart, was not lost, but in after years produced a rich harvest of spiritual enjoyment and usefulness. It is related by one of his biographers that being alone in his chamber, he was suddenly surprised with an inward comfort, and as he thought, an external glory in the room which gave rise to religious emotions, during which he had the strongest convictions of there being a God, and that the soul of man was capable of enjoying communion with Him. He believed also that this seat of Divinity had been put upon him at this moment, or that he had been awakened or called to a holy life. For the light that shone in his own spiritual nature was above the brightness of the sun.

At the age of fifteen he went to Oxford, was entered as a student at Christ Church. Here he advanced rapidly in learning, and cultivated the acquaintance of those who were the most distinguished for talents and learning. Among his comrades at this time were John Locke, afterward distinguished for his "Essay on the Human Understanding."

While he was at Oxford a brother of Charles the Second died. He was beloved by the king, was a favorite with the nation on account of his amiable character. Many poetic effusions were written by the students in commemoration of this man; among the rest Wm. Penn produced an elegy written in Latin, which affords evidence of his genius and acquirements. Thomas Lee, who formerly belonged to the University of Oxford on the occasion of his discourse made a deep impression on the mind of Penn. Being dissatisfied with the established form of worship, some of the students with himself, concluded to withdraw from it, and they held religious meetings for Divine worship, in which they were engaged in preaching and prayer. This conduct gave offence to the heads of the college, who fined them for non-conformity; but Penn and his associates believing themselves bound by a sense of duty to continue their meeting, and to absent themselves from the established Church, were expelled from the college. After his return home his exemplary conduct and serious deportment evinced the change that had been wrought in his feelings. He withdrew from the society of the gay and proud, and sought the society of the pious and sedate. His father saw with grief this change in his manners, and began to feel that all the prospects cherished for him would be blasted. The admiral hoping that his mind would be changed—if he was away from his friends he would lose his serious impressions—sent him to Ireland on business. This he conducted with such ability as to give entire satisfaction. But here Divine Providence again interposed to call him to that sphere in life in which he was destined to accomplish so great a work. Being in Cork on business he heard that

Thomas Lee, the instrument of his religious impressions at Oxford, was to attend the meeting of Friends in that city. His affection for this eminent Friend would not allow him to leave the city without seeing him; he therefore attended the meeting. After an interval of silence, Thomas Lee arose and said, "There is a faith which overcomes the world, and there is a faith which is overcome by the world." On this he enlarged in so remarkable a manner that every word went home to the feelings of William Penn. The result was that he was deeply moved, his convictions of religion were revived and he became a constant attender of Friends' Meetings. Many years afterward, when relating an interview he had with some pious persons, he alluded to his religious exercises in early life, saying, "I then know how and when the Lord first appeared unto me, which was about the twelfth year of my age; he went that and the fifteenth the Lord visited me, and the Divine impressions He gave me of himself; of my persecutions at Oxford, and how the Lord sustained me; of my being banished from college; the bitter usage I underwent when I returned to my home, being whipped and beaten and turned out of doors; in 1662, of the Lord's dealing with me in the time of the great plague in London—in fine, the deep sense of the vanities of the world, the irreligiousness of it, and my bitter cries to Him that He would show me his own way of life and salvation, and of my right time to follow Him whatever reports or sufferings should attend me, and that with great reverence and brokenness of spirit; how after all this, the glory of the world overtook me, and I was ready to give up to it, seeing there was no such primitive spirit and church in the world, being ready to faint concerning my hope."

"It was at this time I received the testimony of his eternal Truth, through one of those called by the world Quakers, named Thomas Lee. I related to them the bitter mockings and scornings, the displeasure of my parents, the invectives and cruelty of the priests, the strangeness of all my companions, a sign and a wonder made of me; above all the great cross of resisting and watching against mine own inward and vain affections and thoughts."

William Penn being now drawn into close fellowship with the Friends, was soon to experience some of the persecutions which were so liberally inflicted upon those unoffending people. Being at meeting at Cork, he was with others, eighteen in number, apprehended and committed to prison. The report that he had become a Quaker was soon conveyed to his father, who recalled him: an order which he quickly obeyed by returning home. At first the admiral perceived nothing peculiar in his dress or manners, but his serious and religious deportment continuing to increase, and the usage of taking off the hat being omitted, his father became uneasy and requested an explanation. The scene which followed was deeply painful to both parties. For the son, faithful to his religious principles, respectfully declined to remove it, as he considered his duty to God was paramount to all other obligations, evinced his desire of manifesting his obedience to his father, and his affection for him in everything that did not conflict with his convictions of religious duties. On the other hand, the father had set his heart on advancing his son to a high station of wealth and honor, and could not endure to see him forego the dazzling prize that appeared to be within his reach, and to unite himself to the despised Quakers seemed to be nothing less than an act of madness. He made use of every argument, even condescended to entreat and implore, but all to no purpose—his son stood firm to his principle. Finding that he could not prevail, he desired that he would at least take off his hat in the presence of the king and himself. William asked time to consider this request; he retired to his chamber and sought for Divine aid in fasting and prayer. He considered the uncovering of the head as an act of reverence or worship which was due to the Deity and he could not pay that reverence to mortal man.

In the next interview he apprised his father with expressions of duty and affection that he could not comply with his request. The admiral could not restrain his anger, again expelled him from his house. Accustomed to affluence, without any means to supply or obtain a livelihood, his mother, true to maternal love sent secretly means for his relief. At length his father, softened, perhaps by the entreaties of his wife, so far relented as to allow him to obtain subsistence, though he gave no open countenance. It was the greatest of all crosses and trials that William Penn was called upon to bear in this period of his life, that he was cut off from kindly intercourse with a father whom he tenderly loved, but he firmly adhered to the course he had chosen, counting nothing too near or too dear to be sacrificed for the love of the Gospel and knowing that he that putteth his hand to the plough and looketh back, is not fit for a worthy of the kingdom.

William Penn had been for some years subjected to trials, which under the Divine blessing were made instrumental to his religious progress. Having renounced the world and its fashions he became a constant attender of Friends' Meetings. Although he was convinced of Friends' principles, he did not immediately relinquish his gay apparel. It is said that he wore his sword as was customary among those of rank and fashion. He asked George Fox what his advice would be, whether he should wear it or not. George told him he should wear it as long as he could. Not long after they met again; William had not his sword. George said: "William, where is thy sword?" "Oh," said he "I took thy advice, and wore it as long as I could."

He soon became an eminent minister and author of many religious works. The principal work produced at that time was "No Cross, No Crown," that has been frequently republished and extensively read. This work shows great erudition and research. In conclusion of this excellent work, Penn shows that those who will not take up the cross and self-denial cannot expect the crown of eternal glory, and He calls upon all, but more especially upon all those whose hearts have been awakened, to come away from the vanities of the world. He labored extensively for liberty of conscience, and said when asked to recant, "I will die in prison first."

The more his father saw of his actions, the more he esteemed him for his sincerity, his uniform kindness, and his devotion to his duty; he could not but acknowledge that in his renouncement from the honors of the world and assuming the cross, William had chosen the better part which could not be taken from him. Sensible of his approaching end, he said to his son "William, I am weary of the world; I would not live over my days again if I could command it with a wish—the snares of life are greater than the fear of death. This troubles me that I have offended a gracious God. Let nothing in this world wrong your conscience." At another time, he said, "Son William, if you and your friends keep to your plain way of preaching and living you will make an end of the priests at the end of the world."

In due time he became an eminent minister of the Gospel, and a benefactor to the human family. P. A. ELKINTON.

Capital Punishment.

With the desire of calling public attention to the important measure lately enacted by Congress of giving juries in United States Courts the privilege of bringing in a verdict of murder in the first degree the privilege of adding "without capital punishment," the following interesting letter is here published in the Daily Local News. It is understood that capital punishment is not practised in Michigan, and it is hoped the Intelligible Commonwealth of Pennsylvania will allow so humane an example. The writer of the letter, General Curtis, is known as the "Hero of Fort Fisher," and the enactment was made law by the signature of the President on the anniversary of that engagement:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 31, 1897.

William P. Townsend, West Chester, Pa.—My Dear Sir:—I have the pleasure of acknowledging the receipt of your favor on the 30th inst., and to thank you for the kind expressions it contains.

I am very glad to say that the bill, which I have been laboring for many years to cause to be enacted, has become a law. While it does not go so far as I would like it, at least, is a long step in the direction you and I very ardently desire to see accomplished. It is the greatest change, by way of reducing penalties under the Saxon laws, secured by a single measure in our history. I send under separate cover the report of the Judiciary Committee of the House upon my bill, which contains a compilation of facts I presented to that committee to show that the abolition of capital punishment, in many countries, was beneficial to society by reducing the very offences for which it had been so long held to be necessary for its protection. The reports from the foreign governments are official, as they were obtained in answer to questions sent by me through the Department of State. The only countries that have found difficulty in the abolition of capital punishment are Columbia and Ecuador, South America. The population of these countries consist chiefly of mixed races—the Spanish and Indians. They live nearly under the equator, and are not a people whose experience should be regarded as obstructive in this particular to people of the arctic zone living in temperate latitudes. It will be some satisfaction to you, in your advanced years, who have labored so assiduously, as I understand you have, for the abolition of capital punishment, to know you have reached the time when there is but one offence under the United States laws for which the death penalty must be inflicted upon conviction, unless Executive clemency should intervene. The fifty-seventh article of war prescribes that a person who forces a safeguard shall suffer death, do not believe we have had an execution under that article of war since the formation of the Government. Our articles of war for the Government of the army and navy were derived from the English code. Under my law the penalty of death for eighteen offences is totally abolished; but for treason, murder or rape committed on territory exclusively within the jurisdiction of the United States, the death penalty may be inflicted; yet the provision which allows, in these three crimes, the jury to add to their verdict "without capital punishment," will doubtless lessen the number of legal executions. It will also tend to increase convictions in proper cases, so that those guilty of the gravest offences shall have restraint kept upon them by the certainty of imprisonment, whereas without this provision many would be turned loose upon society. When I first introduced this measure six years ago, its opponents included almost all the prominent men in Congress, and you will be pleased to know that nearly all have been brought to understand the advantages to be derived from a system of milder punishment, and many of the most pronounced opponents of the bill, when first introduced, finally came to its support not only with their votes, but with their voices. The Department of Justice has also warmly indorsed the measure. The subject of the abolition of the death penalty has received the favorable consideration of many men in prominent positions who have heretofore simply acquiesced in an order of things to which they evidently had not given careful consideration.

With good wishes for your health, I am, sincerely,

NEWTON MARTIN CURTIS.

Elephant Stories.

Many stories are told which prove that elephants remember and resent cruel treatment in a way which shows great intelligence, and also that they are equally sure to remember kindness and display intense affection for a human friend. In the old story about the elephant who, when he put his trunk in a tailor's window expecting a piece of cake, received instead a prick from a needle, the insulted animal went at once to a mud puddle, drew up the dirty water, and going back squirted it all over the tailor.

In London lately an elephant named Charley killed a keeper who had been cruel to him. The man was discharged because of his cruelty, and had been away a year, but the elephant had not forgotten, and the moment he heard the man's voice turned and seized him and killed him before anyone could interfere.

The owner of the elephant testified that there was no doubt that the animal was paying an old grudge. Charley was the kindest elephant he ever owned. He had appeared at five lord mayors' shows and many Drury Lane pantomimes. Sanger added:

"Elephants do not forget injuries or kindness. I remember several remarkable instances. On one occasion, when I had been separated from an elephant for two years, the elephant, on seeing me, seized me around the waist with his trunk, and would not let go until he had hugged and caressed me for a long time. Tears of pleasure ran down the brute's cheeks.

"Some years ago a nephew of mine, a child of three, was playing around Charley and climbing up his legs. Charley gently resented this, but the child continued. Charley then took the child up, shook him gently, and put him down some yards away."

Elephants learn very quickly, and are useful workers on that account. Last summer during the terribly hot weather a keeper in Central Park turned the hose which he was using on one of the elephants. The huge animal was much pleased with the bath, and when the keeper dropped the hose picked it up and turned it on himself and then on the other elephants, till all had been comfortably cooled off. After that the keeper gave them the hose every day, and saved himself that much work.—Selected.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 17, 1897.

William Penn, in his admirable treatise entitled "No Cross, No Crown," shows that the true disciple of Jesus must live in such close communion with God, and in such watchfulness over himself, that not only no evil word must escape his lips, but not a thought must escape judgment. This doctrine is in harmony with the teachings of the Bible. Our Saviour told his disciples that out of the heart come those evil things that defile a man. And the Apostle Paul wrote to the Romans that to be carnally minded is death, but to be spiritually minded is life and peace. David, in the 141st Psalm, prays to the Lord, "Set a watch before my mouth; keep the door of my lips."

True religion requires that we should keep ourselves unspotted from the world. But how difficult this is many have experienced. There is a natural tendency in man to follow the path which is congenial to his own inclinations, without reference to the Divine will concerning him. The main object in life with some seems to be to accumulate property; others seek the indulgence of their sensual appetites and lusts; others desire, above all other things, the enjoyment of popularity; some one thing and some another, but too few keep steadily in view the necessity of knowing and doing the will of the Lord concerning them.

And even when the heart has been touched by the visitations of the Holy Spirit, and sincere desires awakened to walk in the way of holiness, how often do we interrupt the holy watch, and find defiling thoughts filling the mind almost before we are aware of it! So that we have abundant cause to acknowledge, that unless the Lord keep the house, the watchman waketh but in vain.

Some of the Lord's servants, who have left records of their religious progress, have spoken of their falling into temptation after they had in earnest commenced to walk in the narrow way that leads to the kingdom of heaven. Such have learned by experience not to trust in themselves, but to look daily to the Lord for his help, and to adopt the petitions in the prayer taught by our Saviour to his disciples, "Lead me not into temptation, but deliver me from evil."

A moral life, a decent respect for religious observances, and a regular attendance at some place of worship, are all commendable in themselves, but are not sufficient, without an experience of that change of heart which Christ declared to be necessary, when He said to Nicodemus, "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God."

These thoughts have been penned with a desire that they may have some effect in stimulating the reader to seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The President, on the 7th inst., sent a special message to Congress, calling the attention of that body to the suffering and needs of the people in the flooded districts in the Mississippi Valley, "in the hope that the legislative branch of the Government will promptly reinforce the work of the local authorities." In the matters of relief, both Sen. and the House are in accord. In the Senate it was decided to leave intact the epidemic fund, and a resolution appropriating $150,000 for purchase and distribution of stores was adopted unanimously. In the meantime the House had adopted a resolution appropriating $200,000, the Kiel River of the North being included in the relief which is to be distributed. This resolution the Senate accepted, and it was sent to the President and signed before 2 P. M. The Secretary of War at once made a detail of army officers to investigate the conditions in the flooded districts and superintend the distribution of relief.

The people of Fargo, North Dakota, have telegraphed the Secretary of War that Federal aid for flood sufferers there is not needed.

Advices from the Morean River country, in South Dakota, are to the effect that the loss of cattle in that section during the past winter has been between forty and fifty per cent.

The President has announced the following appointment for commissioners "for the promotion of an international agreement for bimetallism." Senator Edward O. Wolcott, of Colorado; Charles J. Paine, of Boston, and ex-Vice President Adlai E. Stevenson.

The total value of the slate output in the United States in 1896 was $2,746,250, of which Pennsylvania contributed her share, $1,729,318.

Since 1890 the number of horses in street railway service has decreased 162,000, or about eighty per cent.

The annual report of the Immigration Bureau for the fiscal year 1896 shows the following percentages of illiteracy among immigrants arrived last year: Immigrants from Formosa, 77.6 per cent; illiterate from Italy, 54.39 per cent; from Russia, 41.14; from Austria-Hungary and provinces, 38.92 per cent; from Ireland, 7 per cent; from Germany, 2.96 per cent; from Sweden, 1.16 per cent.

The railroads west of the Missouri have agreed to give free transportation for the fifty cars of grain which are now going to sea, to link up the country. Late shipments are reported by nearly all of the incoming steamships from Europe, some of them fifty to two hundred and fifty feet long and from twenty to seventy feet high.

The South Carolina Supreme Court has ruled that "no man may keep liquor in his house or place of business, or in the bay, school or Florida, and is now being enforced strictly on the Perrine grant, unless the vessel in which it is kept has a certificate on file at the State Liquor Commission." The Court was equally divided, the decision of the lower Court being, therefore, affirmed.

The cinnamon tree has recently been introduced into the Bay region of Florida, and is now being cultivated extensively on the Perrine grant.

The New York Assembly, on the 12th inst., passed the Greater New York charter over Mayor Strong's veto by a vote of 106 to 32.

The citizens of Cambridge, Mass., are talking about celebrating the tenth anniversary of the town's exemption from the Bay school, which is Florida, and is now being cultivated extensively on the Perrine grant.

While workmen were tearing down a part of the old Courthouse of Westmoreland County, on Sunday last, a chest full of old records was unearthed, and found to contain documents signed by George Washington, William Penn, King George III, and other royal men.

John W. States Senator, D. W. Voorhees, of Indiana, died at his residence in Washington on the 10th inst., aged seventy years.

Edward Drinker Cope, Professor of Zoology and Comparative Anatomy in the University of Pennsylvania, widely known as a student of Natural History, died on the 12th inst. in this city. He was in his fifty-seventh year.

A fire, which started in the hotel Knox, in Knoxville, Tenn., on the morning of the 26th inst., spread to a number of adjoining wholesale stores, which were destroyed. Five or six guests of the hotel are missing, and an unknown number perished in the flames. Many of the stores were injured by jumping from the windows and by an explosion of powder in one of the buildings. It became necessary to blow down the walls of one building with artillery to check the spread of the fire. The losses will aggregate over a million dollars.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 187, which is 53 more than the previous week, and 72 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 256 were males and 229 females; 75 died of pneumonia; 55 of consumption; 35 of heart disease; 20 of diphtheria; 19 of cancer; 18 of convulsions; 18 of apoplexy; 16 of marasmus; 15 of old age; 11 of influenza; of the stomach and bowels; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of arthritis; 11 of Bright's disease; 11 from casualties; 11 of inanition; 10 of whooping cough; 9 of scarlet fever, and 9 of bronchitis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 96; 4's, 124, 111 a 111½; coupon, 112½ a 113; new 3's, 4's, 124; 5's, 114 a 114½; currency, 68, 103 a 105.

TORRONS.—Spicers bought sparingly, but official quotations were unchanged at 7½c per pound for middling uplands.

FEEB.—Spot bran ranged from $14.50 to $15.00 per ton for winter in bulk, and $13.50 a $14.00 for spring in sacks.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.40 a $2.50; do, extras, $2.75 a $3.00; do, cream, $3.00 a $3.25; do, extra, $3.25 a $3.50; do, patent, $3.50 a $4.00; Western winter, clear, $3.05 a $3.85; do, do, straight, $3.95 a $4.10; do, do, patent, $4.20 a $4.35; spring, clear, $3.25 a $3.40; do, straight, $3.60 a $3.80; do, patent, $3.85 a $4.00; do, favorite brands, higher. City mills, extra, $2.85 a $3.10; do, clear, $3.75 a $4.00; do, straight, $4.00 a $4.20; do, patent, $4.25 a $4.50. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 a $2.40 per bbl, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 79 a 79½; No. 2 mixed corn, 27½ a 27½; No. 3 white oats, 24 a 24½.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5½ a 5½; good, 4½ a 5c; medium, 4 a 4½; common, 3 a 4c.

STEER AND LAMBS.—Extra, 5 a 5½; good, 4 a 4½; medium, 4 a 4½; common, 3 a 3½; clipped sheep, 3½ a 4½; clipped lambs, 4½ a 5½; wool lands, 5 a 6c.

HOGS.—Best Western, 6 a 6½; other Western, 5½ a 6c; State, 5½c.

FOREIGN.—Replying to a statement in the House of Commons to the effect that the food supply in the United Kingdom was wholly inadequate, and that the country was dependent upon other nations, Arthur Balfour, the Government leader, said that he did not think there was danger of foreign countries refusing to supply Great Britain with food. The United States, he said, could not allow food to be declared contraband in war, as it would be for the benefit of the enemy. He said that the United States, Great Britain, and combined with the United States, could stand any conceivable combination of the Powers.

Although there are nearly 6,000,000 total abstainers in Great Britain and Ireland, the consumption of spirituous liquors in the year ended at £14,972,230, an increase of £2,500,000 over 1895.

It is stated that Great Britain has enclosed Inayak Island, at the entrance to Delagoa Bay, and that a squadron of warships will be sent there to take possession of the island and proclaim it British territory.

The German Government has filed with the State Department a note of protest against the different duties on sugar provided for in the Dingley Tariff Bill. The contents of the note were considered of sufficient importance to be communicated to members of the Senate Finance Committee. There is a threat of retaliation in the event of the duties becoming law.

The anniversary of the declaration of the independence of the United States was celebrated with great enthusiasm in Athens on the 6th inst.

Three thousand Greek insurgents have invaded Macedonia. They are not supported by the regulars. Their object appears to be to cut the Turkish communications between Macedonia and Epirus.

A decree has been issued by the Sultan of Zanzibar, abolishing slavery.

The Peruvian Government has suspended the coinage of silver at the Government Mint, and has issued a prohibition against the importation of silver coins after the 10th of next month.

President Erzerovic has declined to accept the resignation of the Chilean Cabinet.

JOHN'S NEWFOUNDLAND, dispatch says that the coast is once more blockaded by heavy Arctic ice, imprisoning the steamers Caspian and Potia, and preventing the incoming of a whole fleet of sealing steamers, which have been cruising in the south ice pack for a month past. It is estimated that 20,000 fishermen are unable to prosecute their usual industry at Labrador during the coming summer season, because of the inability of the merchants to fit them out, an inability due to the small returns from the disposal of the product.

NOTICES.

REDUCE RATES TO PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.—The usual arrangements have been made by the Pennsylvania R. R. Company, by which Friends attending our approaching Yearly Meeting can obtain excursion tickets to Philadelphia and return, from any station on the following railroads, at the rate of two cents per mile travelled, going and returning; except that no such tickets will be issued at a less rate than 25 cents, viz: Pennsylvania Railroad (main line), as far west as Pittsburgh, Philadelphia and Erie Railroad Division, Northern Central Railway, United Railroads and New Jersey Division, West Jersey Railroad, Philadelphia and Wilmington, Delaware and Maryland Railroad Company, on any day from Fourth Month 13th to 23rd, inclusive, and make the return coupon good until Fourth Month 27th, inclusive, 1897.

The Baltimore and Ohio Company, and the Philadelphia and Reading Railroads have kindly offered Friends the same rates and for the same dates as above specified.

Application should be made either personally or by mail, to Joseph Hall, 304 Arch Street, Philadelphia, or to Thomas C. Hogue, West Chester, Pa., for orders on the Ticket Agents—one of which must be delivered to the Agent whenever a ticket is obtained. These orders inform the Ticket Agent at whatever station they are presented on the above railroads, that the bearer is entitled to a ticket to Philadelphia, and return, at the above rate of two cents per mile travelled. If a Friend in each neighborhood would ascertain the number of card orders likely to be needed, and obtain them, and distribute among Friends, it would make less work for those having the cards to sell.

When they are to be forwarded by mail a two-cent stamp should be sent to pay the postage.

NOTE.—Tickets issued on this order will not be good to stop-off at way stations, going or returning.

WESTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters in regard to instruction and discipline should be addressed to WILLIAM H. PILE'S SONS, Philadelphia. Payments on account of board and tuition, and communications in regard to business should be forwarded to EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent. Address, Westown P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

FRIENDS attending the Yearly Meeting can be furnished with meals, both before and after the sitting of the meeting, as heretofore, at moderate charge (15 cents) in the second story of the central part of the Arch Street Meeting House. Meals will also be furnished for those attending the Meeting for Sufferings and the Select Meeting the previous week.

WESTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westown School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.46 A. M. and 2.53 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare on regular trips, fifteen cents on special trips, twenty-five cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, write West Chester, Pa. EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't.

WESTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—A stated meeting of the Committee will be held in Philadelphia on Seventh-day, the 17th inst., at 2.30 P. M.

at her home in Westery R. I., Tenth Month 29th, 1896, ANNA WILLIAMS FOSTER, widow of Eban F. Foster, and daughter of John Wilbur, in the seventy-seventh year of her age. She was a life-long member and for many years an Elder of the Society of Friends. Of a meek and quiet disposition, she was yet firm in upholding the right, and an able defender in living examples of the principles of the Society. She had a quick and intuitive discernment by which she always unconsciously measured those with whom she came in contact, and was thus enabled to perceive and appreciate the good in all, and to quietly reprove and sin that which was deficient. She was especially charitable and tender towards the erring, and sought the reformation of each by the gentle measures of love and patience. In her old age, she looked toward the sunset of life unmoved by any disturbance, with a perfect faith that there is beyond this life a better state of existence, where "the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be, and where his servants shall serve Him and see his face."

Diary and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1891.—Eleventh Month 8th.—She writes to me friends on the death of a near relative: "Our Father has been visiting him for years, inclining him to virtue and benevolence, and as at last quietly prepared and quietly let him own to the grave. Our spirits know the same change, yet I trust blessed change, awaits us, and joy to contemplate the acknowledgment of us by our Lord, whom we have loved. Let us look forward with joy, doing humbly and meekly whatever our hands find to do now—all for the latter. I wanted to tell you that our Kennet quarry Meeting-house has all the foundation all done, and they are going on with the bricks on—may be ready in the Second Month. My duty in regard to it all seems not to solicit much, but to lie low and beg of the Lord to increase and favor the meeting. Just think, not young Friend opening their mouth in the inquiry in all our Quarter. I think sometimes I must beg."

1892.—First Month 27th.—She writes to R. A., "Dear S. M.'s prospect causes such thankfulness in my heart. That the dear Lord should send his messengers around the world, is my sire. I have no doubt but that he will be apt humble and watchful and prayerful, and then I know he will be preserved."<sup>8</sup>

To her friend, R. S. A., Fourth Month 6th, 1892.—"As our dear ones depart this life, dost thou ever think how grows our store in paradise? Thy beloved husband and dear E., and our beloved Deborah Rhoads. It seemed to me at first we could not spare her from our seats, isolate indeed it will seem without her. Now, a humbly trust, is singing the heavenly annals. How striking the language the sixth day seventh of Revelation. So much of praise, joy and adoration to Him that sitteth upon a throne and to the Lamb which was slain. O how to, through adorable mercy, may be there metime, all of such mercy. I often think of poor old woman spoken of in a poem in THE FRIEND, where she related her vision, and did when the Master cut short her supplies

He would take her, and suddenly, suddenly, she was there. When the dear Master cuts short my strength, how sweet to think, 'Suddenly, suddenly, I shall be there.'

To a friend Sixth Month 5th, 1892, she writes,

"Prayer shall a vast triangle form,
On whose broad base we still shall meet,
And whose high top surmounts each storm,
And joins us at our Saviour's feet."

"When I remember your request to think of your suffering when near access is granted unto the Father of Mercies, you always seem so close there yourselves. I believe you are living close there, and that He is watching you in the furnace to strengthen and support you. How my heart has ached for you since my last visit. . . . But I want to tell you something pleasant. We moved the Kennet Square Meeting into the new house last First-day. All the committee were to be there if they chose, but poor little me! I was the only one accustomed to opening her lips to glorify the Lord in public. A large concourse filled the house. I felt almost frightened to be alone, but supplication presented."

"How glorious, oh, God, must thy temple have been on the day of its first dedication. That as He heard Solomon's prayer He would hear ours, and fill our souls with the cloud and sign of His presence. Then testimony, 'And the little child shall lead them' (Isaiah ii), I felt so helped and the Lord was good."

To R. S. A., Eleventh Month 2nd, 1892: "Thine, with its eighty contents, was received last evening. My spirit salutes thee with 'God speed.' Oh, dear heart, I know it is humbling and baptizing work, but it brings us very near to our source of supply, even Christ, in spirit. How the dwelling of the soul is with supplication before Him, and He condescends to cover us with His presence! Oh, He is sweet and good to the soul that trusts Him. He promises to be mouth and wisdom, and I think He will never leave thee nor forsake thee! It is a favor to have God-bearing companions, and thou wilt have them in this selection. It is well to take the work slowly, and then thou art able to bear it. How pleasant it is to hear of those others travelling with religions concerns. May the Lord send forth more laborers, more laborers into the harvest field. . . . My spirit will travail with thee. Accept my warm aspirations for Holy help for thee."

1893.—8th Month 30th.—To the same: "On glancing at our city paper, I saw accidentally the death of thy sister-in-law, S. A.'s widow. My heart went to thee immediately and to the bereaved family. I knew thou would feel so tenderly for them. These things must be! those in years must pass away, and the homes change, but in our beautiful heavenly home we will not part. Forever with the Lamb! Thy letter disclosed the death of dear Margaret Lightfoot. She was an upright woman, and one that eschewed evil. Last evening I was reading where Moses sent the spies up to see the promised land, and it was very encouraging and strengthening to me. The Lord does not want us to doubt His power to bring us into His beautiful heavenly home. The Apostle says, 'I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded He is able to keep that which I have committed to Him unto that day. Yes dear, the day when He makes up his jewels.'

Twelfth Mo. 10th.—To the same: "Rejoice with them that do rejoice and weep with them that weep. . . . Thy last letter cheered me, for I had wanted to know from my G. A. whether I was really his or not, whether I was really serving Him or not? Blessed be his name forever, but after waiting long and looking for a waking message from heaven, He gave it to me in words so plain, 'I am the Lord thy God. I know thee and thou shalt serve me.' Oh, if I had chosen the words they could not have comforted me more. So, dear, it seemed as if I must tell my R. S. A., though it is not good generally to reveal the King's secrets, thou wilt not expose it where it will spread, please. . . . It just seemed as though I had to tell thee my great joy. So, I go humbly along in soul preserving fear."

Twelfth Month 17th.—To the same: "Thy letters, dear, bring 'the sweet came from far,' and thine eyes see the King in His beauty and behold the land that is far off. 'Bread shall be given to thee, and thy waters shall be sure.' And though tribulations are thine, yet in Jesus peace fills thy soul. What a mercy, and the upholding power of the dear Lord is near thee. We would gather all to this haven, would we not? To-morrow we attend a funeral. These funerals of strangers are a great exercise to me, but I do not refuse, if well. The dear Lord may scatter a little tiny seed in some soul through me. How sad to hear of dear E. Russell's illness. We cannot feel ready to part with her—an upright woman, one who feared God."

Under date of First Mo. 21st, 1894, she writes to S. G. Y.: "We are so comfortable in this lovely home, and I am ever and ever grateful as I walk within my house with a humble soul, sometimes marvelling at His merciful goodness, who brings me here and sustains."

First Month 28th, 1894, to R. S. A., "Thy reference to dear S. F. Babington was so sweet. He is a dear man, only waiting till the shadows are a little larger grown. How often his ministry used to comfort and strengthen me in trying to be obedient to what seemed to be the voice of the Lord, always so gentle, so full and clear. I think there is a heavenly harp waiting for him. . . . Thy last letter did contain some very weighty views, and I can sympathize with all of you who feel any responsibility in regard to the proposed visit over the seas. My natural, instinctive feelings would lead me to say, 'Loose him and let him go, for the Master hath need of him;' but we have to weigh such things in the balance of the sanctuary. Naturally I love to hear of any going forth to extend the dear Redeemer's kingdom, that it is joy to me. Dear Sarah Emilen had to ask twice before she was liberated. She quoted the language, 'If the Lord had not been on my side, my soul had almost dwell in silence." She might do great good, the will of the Lord be done. . . Would that the Lord would raise up more laborers. Much work has been expended in his vineyard heretofore. The leaven may be working and fruit appear later. The cross and an unwillingness to be as a fool for Christ's sake is in the way.

Third Month 11th, 1894, to R. S. A., "I hope thy dear son, having put his hand to the plough, will not look back, nor count any cross too heavy to win that humiliation of our hearts, which is necessary to prepare us to speak the word of the Lord only, not our own. The rest and the sweetness is great afterwards, when we feel that the dear Lord doeth all within us. . . I hope thou will keep well and able to attend our coming assembly. If nothing unforeseen occurs, I may be there. It looks so solemn. Dear Phoebe W. Roberts at rest forever; how we shall miss our mother in Israel."

To the same, Ninth Month 24th, she writes, "That is not true prayer, that does not end in self submission. Our Father knows so much better than we do, what is best for us all, that I fear to say much in my own will. 'Thy will be done,' is the sweetest anthem."

(To be concluded.)

JOHN FOTHERGILL to ————:

— PHILADELPHIA, 1737.

" . . . Let my heretofore strongly pressed caution, which I do not yet get clear from at all times, doubting the danger of its being not enough minded, which is to be aware of that devilish, bewitching, darkening, ruinous, enticing snare of often sipping and dabbling with strong drink, and the company that loves and useth it, and seldom without unprofitable conversation, though craftily, from that twisting, serpentine, adulterating spirit of this world, frequently excused and pleaded for, under artificial disguises, to deceive the unwary. Therefore look at it in time, as an enemy to body and mind, to present and future interest; or else heaven will assuredly turn its back upon thee, and the earth will become as iron, and the bowels of thy true friends will be shut up, and what can follow then?"

"I lay weight upon it, as I am sure it is an infernal, and as much as Satan can make it, a hidden snare; yet I would strongly hope necessity for this may not be much; but my love and true care is a just excuse for me herein. May the love of righteousness and best riches win and guide thy heart and views, and the God of all goodness will be thy God and sure Helper to blessedness indeed."

ANOTHER SIGN OF THE TIMES.—It is reported from St. Petersburg that the Emperor of Russia has decided to create a Supreme Council, which will relieve him of many details of routine work; and the report has been confirmed. Great care is taken, however, to insist that "this change cannot be regarded as of great political significance, or as an indication of a more liberal regime, and that it is a purely administrative reform, decided upon for the reason that the Emperor does not enjoy robust health, and desires to be less burdened with affairs of minor importance." But the fact remains, and is significant. It is described as an "innovation" — and such it is; — a "reform" — and any departure from personal and irresponsible rule, must ultimately prove to be that. It is a concession to modern tendencies and necessities; it is a beginning, and the irresistible force of modern progress will do the rest.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Origin of Vegetation.

The article prepared for THE FRIEND on the subject of the growth of vegetation and published in the issue of Third Month 20th, was first written at considerably greater length, giving greater variety of illustrative facts. The abridgment of the essay may have taken from its value.

The special interest taken in the subject began in the year 1830 '31, and it has furnished to the writer a theme for observation, enhancing the enjoyment of travel through the highways of our beautiful country.

On a westward trip a few years ago, on the Baltimore Central Railroad, having unexpectedly the company from Concord Station of a friend, who in course of conversation, made the remark, in substance, that in travelling he found it ever interesting to observe not only the general beauty of the country, but the form of the hills, many of them, when opened by quarries or railroad cuts, were seen to be largely made up of rock of varied kinds, yet covered over with earth, smoothed and ready for cultivation. The present form and condition of the country was spoken of with especial admiration, in view of the many profs existing of great changes, which, at some remote period had taken place in the shapes of the hills and valleys, and the relative places and position of vast masses of material, since its first formation.

In view of the great changes from lower to higher positions, that the great masses of rock should be found covered and clothed as we see them, is a theme worthy to be spoken of. Hills, chiefly of rock, covered by beautiful farms.

The conversation, though brief, was of memorable interest, and oft has arisen in contrast with that of others, who, while partaking of the manifold blessing, seem to

"Mark not the mighty Hand, which Ever busy, wheels the silent spheres."

The friend here spoken of is, I believe, a botanist, and well read in the sciences, but whether he thought the Creator made use of seeds, year or may, when his fiat went forth, "Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after its kind, whose seed is in itself, and pronounced it good," this consideration did not appear in that communicating by the way.

The simplicity of the Scripture above quoted, that the earth was to bring forth herb yielding seed, etc., the infinite variety of vegetable growth which adorns the world, from the great trees of the West to the willow trees of the Arctic regions, three inches in height, the great variety of luscious fruits and beautiful flowers, the growths of woods for uses so varied, with so much beside, constitute a theme for admiration which is enhanced by the many proofs that the soil as first created, continues ready, on being brought to the surface, to produce vegetation according to the properties given to it at the beginning by Him who was Omnipresent both then and now.

Among these properties of the soil, evidence abundantly appears, amounting to proofs, that when the primeval growth that has occupied the ground forages unnumbered, and is removed or destroyed, a different growth in due course of nature will and does take its place.

The addition of a fertilizing ingredient to a spot or portion of ground, is oft observed to bring forth a growth of vegetation different from that of the ground surrounding it.

In course of a year spent in Eastern Ohio sixty-six years ago, the writer became interested in observing that in the many clearings of th heavy forest, great brush heaps of the tree top and branches were gathered and burned. I became a matter of common observation an remark, that while natural grass clothed th cleared land generally, the plant called Pok grew luxuriantly on the spots where the brus heaps had been burned. Many readers know that in their respective parts of the country th burning of brush heaps is followed by the growth of Poke. All the surrounding circumstance precluded the idea of poke seed being in th ground. The growth of the plant was evident from so near the surface that had there been seed, the fire would have destroyed its power o vegetation. It was clearly apparent that th growth was due simply to the change made in the fire in the constituent ingredients of the soil.

Our late valued Friend Morris Cope, relate to me some years ago that a certain Friend whom he knew, had a strip of waste "bottom land" along a creek which flowed through h farm, too stony to plough, and grew scarce any thing but moss and a viny plant called "five finger." On speaking of his valueless bottom land to a person, he was recommended to sow with plaster of paris, which he did, and a luxuriant crop of white clover was the result.

In the absence of knowledge of the facts, w may reasonably suppose that a strip of lan along a creek would be washed at times by big water, would be left stony and deprived of ingredients of soil that would have produce grass, and that the plaster furnished an ingredient which had been lacking for the growth of clover. The writer has no disposition to speculate upon matters such as these. The single actuating motive is that we who are readers o THE FRIEND may appreciate the Creator's foresight and goodness in his formation of the world.

In the year 1836, having occasion severl times to cross and recross the State of Ne Jersey from Camden to Egg Harbor by privat conveyance, there being no railroads, we traversed extensive pine forests, then being gradually cut down for fuel in the glass works o Waterford and Winslow and for the iron work at Weymouth. Now, in travelling through th same region many times by different railroad the pine forests are chiefly gone, and man thousands of acres of the land are covered mostly by a slow growth of oak bushes and small trees—many acorns on many of them—but that there were any acorns among th stumps of the pine trees is extremely doubtful for the ground had been for many years w carpeted with the fallen foliage of pine.

On the hill road leading from the village o Seneca to Greenwood Meeting, Penna., wher the road circles round the breast of a nobl hill overlooking the western end of beautif Greenwood Valley, a district of country ver familiar to the writer, and in which hickor timber is quite rare, there was observed in th year 1864, on the south side of the road i the second growth of the forest, a little grove perhaps about an acre, of young hickory tree appearing to have grown there on the remov of the original pines and hemlocks. On visit ing the neighborhood and passing several tim along that road in the year of 1895, severl stumps of the hickories were seen while th bright, glossy foliage still adorned many r maining trees of the grove. To bring to vie this primeval preparation of the soil of t world as tribute due to the bounty of the Cre tor, this article and that furnished by me to THE FRIEND of Third Month 20th have been prepared.

If the central idea thus presented were believed by scientific writers on botanic subjects, if proofs from nature were given their rightful place, science could not suffer thereby. A belief in God as the Creator of all, would be fostered by the invaluable aids of science. Scientific pursuits would be enriched and made more attractive by the recognition of the facts and adornments which are due to God's presence only. If science says that nuts and grains and seeds are indispensable to vegetable growth, and facts to the contrary show themselves on a large scale, a gate leading to infidelity is brown open. Think for a moment of those oaks, many pastures, springing up immediately upon the removal of dense, overshadowing forests. Think of "Eden's first bloom," and we may see in the case of the earth thrown up from the Kansas well and similar cases without number, an original preparation in the soil for the growth of vegetation designed and calculated to bring forth herb yielding seed after its kind, and although long deeply buried from the surface, shows when brought to the surface, how the earth was clothed when "God first saw and said that it was good."

Brief Memoir of the Life of Aaron K. Owen.

But now the time of trial came in which he as to manifest his allegiance by sacrifice, and so sacrifice is pleasing to the Lord but that of his own choosing and preparing, so it was necessary for him to evince his fidelity to his God by obedience to his holy requisitions inwardly revealed, which revelation of the Divine will entirely agreed with the terms of discipleship laid down in the New Testament. "If any man will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me." The cross of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, so spoken of, not being an outward sign, but inward and spiritual in its nature, crucifying the evil propensities of the heart, and changing its affections and desires, necessarily produces corresponding exterior alteration in conduct and conversation; and it is nothing new for those who have in good measure come thus far in the experimental knowledge of the work of religion, to feel it required of them to bear a radical testimony against the corrupt customs and fashions of the world, which, however innocently or inconsiderately they may seem to be practised by some, evidently have their origin in pride and self love; and he appears to have faithfully complied with whatever of this nature was disclosed to his understanding, and on found the precious principles and testimonies of that people, whom of all others he had lately despised, were become his own, not by imitation but from conviction.

If he had been hitherto more remarkable for anything more than another, it was for his love of music and passing much of his time in singing, which was so natural and easy to him, that he is said to have been on that account favorite among his companions; but when his mind was brought under religious exercise it became a trouble to him, which he first manifested by remarking to our dear mother, that he should never sing or whistle any more. His resolution was thought to be a rash one, as doubts were expressed of the possibility of his adhering to it, and suddenly discontinuing practices which had become so very habitual;

but he was never again known to be occupied with these diversions, which he ever afterwards considered were calculated to dissipate serious reflection. In this we may observe that although "It is not in man that walketh to direct his steps," yet as he is concerned rightly to seek for strength to overcome whatever is displeasing in the Divine sight, he will find in his comfort that the Lord never requires impossibilities of his finite creatures.

He was received a member of the Society of Friends about the twenty-second year of his age, having previously conformed to their Christian practices in every particular, and become an example of simplicity and plainness, that some, who had the advantages of a guarded religious education, would have done well to have considered. It was now his careful concern to live answerable to his profession, and although he had much in his nature that was opposed to a life of self-denial, and doubtless many secret trials and temptations to contend with, yet, from the testimony of others, and his own knowledge of him, I think it may be safely said that he was preserved from ever bringing a reproach upon the blessed cause which he had espoused, and which became as he advanced in years increasingly dear to him. While clothed with charity for those who differed from him in matters of faith, he viewed the Society of which he was a member as a people whom the Lord had chosen above all the families of the earth to place his name among, and had bestowed upon them an excellent system of church government, a favor which he considered was not to be lightly esteemed, sometimes saying that the beautiful order of our meetings for discipline could not be found in any other religious organization.

Much might be said of the virtues that adorned the remainder of his life, but desiring to avoid anything like eulogy, that not being the object of this little sketch, I shall confine my description of his Christian character to a few such particulars as seem necessary to the present purpose. In word and conversation he was an example of believers, being redeemed from sinful language, and very free from levity or trifling expressions, yet his uniform gravity was so combined with an openness of manner and manifest desire for the well being of others, as made him both a pleasant and instructive companion; so true it is, that God giveth grace to the humble and withholdeth no good thing from them that walk uprightly. He was frequent in perusing the Holy Scriptures, of which he signified his belief that no part of their sacred contents, however unmeaning to the unassisted comprehension of man, was without instruction, when rightly understood. He was a zealous promoter of good order and harmony in his own family and in the church, and so far as his influence extended, in community at large; and having known the subjection of his own spirit, he was the better qualified to feel for the frailties of others; remarkable for his willingness to serve his fellow creatures in any way that did not conflict with his religious principles, and in this showing no respect of persons, for the brother or sister of low degree found in him a sympathizing friend, as well as those deemed more highly favored.

Having had large opportunity of witnessing the demoralizing effect of spirituous liquors as a beverage, he manifested a concern for those who were exposed to this temptation, and was not backward when suitable opportunities offered, in warning such individuals of the danger of acquiring an appetite for strong drink. So conscientiously desirous he was of being clear himself of contributing to this great evil, that he refused to dispose of grain to any agency by whom he believed that it would either directly or indirectly be conveyed to such purposes.

Being one that was disposed to gain instruction from surrounding circumstances, he would not infrequently perceive something providential in such things as the casual observer might consider but common or natural occurrences; and I feel inclined to record one circumstance which he was several times heard to relate, as follows: One First-day, not far from his own home, he found a man engaged by the roadside at mechanical labor, who evidently felt uneasiness with the manner in which he was spending the day, and endeavored to make some apology for it, which is all that can now be distinctly remembered of the conversation that passed between them. It was, however, such an opportunity as our dear parent was likely to improve by counselling others to attend to the reproofs of instruction. About a week after being that way again, he was surprised to observe that a tree had fallen across his neighbor's ill-timed work and destroyed it; and although this might have happened under different circumstances, yet at this time he believed that it was permitted as a mark of Divine displeasure. Here it may be well to mention, for the information of strangers to our religious principles, that these reflections did not arise from a belief that the First-day of the week was better or more holy than the other six; or that it is, as the Seventh-day formerly was, a figure of the Christian's rest, which is a spiritual sabbath, and not to be represented by days and times under the Gospel dispensation; but with his brethren generally in religious profession, he believed it to be a duty incumbent upon all to devote one day in the week more particularly to religious purposes, thus affording a universal opportunity for the public worship of Almighty God, and also for such seasons of retirement for meditation, profitable reading, etc., as are always, when rightly improved, found conducive to a growth in religion; and that nothing but unavoidable or urgent necessity should prevent the reasonable observance of it according to the example of the primitive Christians.

Having thus briefly expressed what was on my mind respecting a parent whose example and counsel in times past, his children have great reason to have in remembrance, I believe that little more need be added, except mentioning his sudden removal from this world, which took place the sixteenth of Fifth Month, 1847, after an illness of eleven days. His conduct during his sickness, which was attended with unfavorable symptoms almost from the first, was such as would be expected of one whose hope and confidence were placed upon that never-failing Arm of power that can support in every time of trial. He spoke of the great peace and quietness that he felt, and at one time repeated, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone and in the stone a new name written which no man knoweth, saying he that reveareth it," adding, "If we are faithful we shall all have an evidence of this white stone in our own breasts." He did not manifest on his own account any concern about his recovery, saying he had no doubt but all would terminate for the best; his great desire seeming to be for patience to bear his sufferings, which was mercifully granted. His age at the time of his death was fifty-three years. He belonged to Hector Monthly Meeting of Friends and had been for sixteen years in the station of an elder.

In conclusion, "If there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things."

How the Ointment was Spoiled.

"Dead flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to send forth a stinking savor; so doth a little folly him that is in reputation for wisdom and honor" (Ecd. x: 1). Very true this. And the more "dead flies," the worse the savor of the ointment, and the more it bespeaks unwatchfulness on the part of the apothecary. If he had cared as he should have done for his own reputation, and for the honor of his calling and the purity of his ointment, he would have kept the flies out of it. And who that saw his ill savored ointment but what might feel disgusted, not only at him, but it would make them appreciate less, or be disposed to doubt the purity of any ointment he might offer to the people; thus a few dead flies might be the means of bringing himself and all of his ointment into disrepute. And so if a "little folly" gives an "ill" savor to one who is in reputation for wisdom and honor, the more folly he displays the worse his savor, and the more his reputation is endangered, and any good cause he may be engaged in suffer loss.

These thoughts have presented to the writer's mind in reflecting upon some of the "Reminiscences" in No. 30 of the present volume of THE FRIEND, as well as some in the last number. I could wish that such reminiscences, of those who in their day were worthy of the esteem in which they were held for the gifts bestowed on them, which are without even a moral in them, much less anything whatever to the credit of the cause of Christ, might be relegated to oblivion. They only show that the individual still had considerable of the dregs of the old corrupt nature in him—dead flies in ointment that ought to have been kept pure.

John Salkeld was no doubt highly favored in the ministry in his day, and tradition tells, I think, of his suffering much remorse at times from letting his jovial nature spoil the savor of the ointment. We may hope that he suffered the ministrations of condemnation to have its due place in his mind for proposing to race his horse with that of his companion as they were returning from a religious visit, and also for adding by his wit to the mirth of the company of "military officers." But why are these things handed down to posterity? True cheerfulness is befitting the Christian life, but the natural levity of our dispositions needs to be kept in check, and not encouraged by the keeping in memory the fallings on that point of some who have gone before us who were honored of the Master, by bestowing on them his precious gifts. Let none of us, who believe we are called to the same great work, or let the calling be what it may, for we all have a calling, if it only be to watch and be sober, think because such favored ones took such liberties in their day, so may we; but let it be our concern at all times, and especially so, after we have been engaged in the exercise of our gifts and our spirits feel light and easy, to heed well the injunction of Him who hath bestowed the gift, "What I say unto one, I say unto all, Watch."

Let no one understand me as wanting to bring any shade upon the memory of those who were no doubt favored instruments in their day, but favored as Mahlon Hockett was with prophetic vision, and enabled under the true anointing to divide the word aright according to the different states of his hearers, yet if the Gospel message to those "hypocrites" at "Sandy Spring Meeting" alluded to in last number of THE FRIEND was, as he delivered it, it was for them, and would it not have been better for the cause of Truth, it had stopped there, and not been handed down to posterity?

"WHERE'S MOTHER?"

Bursting in from school or play,
This is what the children say;
Trooping, crowding, big and small,
On the threshold, in the hall—
Joining in the constant cry,
Ever as the days go by,
"Where's mother?"

From the weary bed of pain
This same question comes again;
From the boy with sparkling eyes,
Bearing home his earliest prize;
From the bearded and bearded son,
Perils past and honors won—
"Where's mother?"

Burdened with a lonely task,
One day we may vainly ask
For the comfort of her face,
For the rest of her embrace
Let us love her while we may,
Well for us that we can say,
"Where's mother?"

Mother with untiring hands
At the post of duty stands,
Patient, seeking not her own,
Anxious for the good alone
Of the children as they cry,
Ever as the days go by,
"Where's mother?"
—Good Housekeeping.

A WORKER'S PRAYER.

FRANCIS RIDLEY HAYVERGAL.

Lord, speak to me, that I may speak
In living echoes of thy tone;
As Thou hast sought, so let me seek Thy erring children, lost and lone.

O lead me, Lord, that I may lead
The wand ring and the way ring feet;
O feed me, Lord, that I may feed
Thy hung'ring ones with manna sweet.

O strengthen me, that while I stand
Firm on the rock and strong in thee,
I may stretch out a loving hand
To wrestlers on the troubled sea.

O teach me, Lord, that I may teach
The precious things Thou dost impart;
And wing my words, that they may reach
The hidden depths of many a heart.

O give Thine own sweet rest to me,
That I may speak with soothing power
A word in season, as from Thee
To weary ones in needful hour.

O, fill me with thy fulness, Lord,
Until my very heart o'erflow
In kindling thought and glowing word
Thy love to tell, thy praise to show.

O, use me, Lord, use even me
Just as Thou wilt, and when and where,
Until Thy blessed face I see
Thy rest, Thy joy, Thy glory share.

It would set all right in England, if, through Divine grace, "Thou God seeest me," were constantly before the eye of every man's mind.—C. H. Spurgeon.

A Visit to Florida.

The Ocklawaha is one of the crookedest of Florida's many crooked rivers, having, by actual count, nine hundred and seventy-six turns on the part traversed by these steamers. Navigation becomes quite an art in such a narrow and crooked stream, full of double curves and with a swift current, and the boat was constantly slowing up and starting ahead again, and brushing the branches of the trees in its endeavor to get around the curves without running aground. So we steamed on hour after hour through the cypress forests and swamps with occasionally a clearing and a few signs of life; and when darkness overtook us, and the pitch pine fire was lighted on top of the pilot house to enable them to see to steer, the scene was weird in the extreme.

Morning found us at Palatka, where we took the East Coast Railway to Rockledge, a pretty point on the Indian River, one hundred and seventy-five miles south of Jacksonville. The Indian River, so called, is really an inlet from the sea, which extends parallel with the ocean for about one hundred and fifty miles, and separated from it by a narrow strip of land. It varies in width from one to six miles, and before the advent of the railway, was an important means of communication between Central and lower Florida. At Rockledge the shore is a rocky formation called coquina, which is a soft stone composed of the shells of small mollusk and sand. It crumbles easily, and while hardy, suitable for building purposes, makes a most excellent roadway. We were now below the region of pines, only a few being seen. The vegetation is largely the cabbage palmetto, so named because the central bud, after the fibrous part is taken off of it, is eaten by the natives, as we eat cabbage. At Rockledge we saw orange groves, with the ripe fruit upon the trees. We also experienced the genial balm of the winter climate, the thermometer several times going a high as eighty in the middle of the day; making it feel as it does here in the Sixth Month and enabling us to spend all our time out of doors.

After a charming week spent here, we retraced our steps along the coast to the ancient city of St. Augustine, which is one of the oldest places in the country, having been founded by the Spaniards in 1565. In walking through the narrow streets, we see many evidences of the old time days when no wheeled vehicles were allowed in them, and the ways were kept so clear that the Spanish maidens need not soil their slippers. The streets in the old parts of the city are not more than fifteen feet wide, mostly without sidewalks and generally paved with coquina blocks. The old fashioned house, with its overhanging balcony, is quite often in evidence. At the southern end of the town, the ancient building used by the monks is now occupied by a detachment of U. S. soldiers; while at the northern end stands the old Fort Marion a relic of the Middle Ages. This was built of coquina stone, which was unusually suitable for this purpose, for the cannon balls would sink into the walls without shattering them. There was also a moat surrounding the fort, and within this enclosure doubtless many dark deeds were done. A short distance west of the fort stood the old city gate, all that is now preserved of the wall which formerly surrounded the city of three sides, the sea being on the other. This gateway looks somewhat shabby and insignificant to our modern eyes; but in those troublous times it was the connection between city and country, and was carefully guarded and closed at sundown for the night. The western half of St. Augustine is laid out with wider streets, and has some fine buildings, including the Ponce de Leon Hotel, which is one of the largest and finest in the United States. It is built in the Spanish style of architecture, facing a square, and with a large courtyard. The interior finish is considered very fine; the pillars that support the rotunda are of quartered oak, and the wainscoting at the approach to the dining room is of numidian marble. We also noticed in the principal parlor, a mantel in Mexican onyx. The furniture and decorations are equally elegant and expensive, but all in good taste, simply showing the power of wealth to provide such things. It is hard to realize that this building is really a hotel, as it seemed more like some palatial private residence, of which the public are allowed to catch a glimpse. Those who have accumulated wealth seem to have various ways of spending it. The Ponce de Leon hotel, with its companions, the Alcazar and the Corova, were erected by Henry M. Flagley, a wealthy New Yorker, who loves fine architecture, and has the means to gratify his tastes. We were told that he did not expect these immense buildings to pay from a money point of view, but that he felt amply repaid for the leisure he got out of them.

The same person has built a railroad from Jacksonville, down along the East coast of the State, as far probably as it is possible to go with it, opening up considerable new country for settlement, and rendering it more attractive to the tourist. He has also erected large hotels at several places.

After a few days pleasantly spent in St. Augustine, enjoying the sights above named, we went north by way of the Southern Railway, which after skirting the coast line of Georgia, runs through the central part of the Carolinas and Virginia.

A twenty-four hours' ride brought us to Washington, where two days were passed in visiting the prominent points of interest; after which we turned home well pleased with our outing, more than ever satisfied that a kindly Providence had placed our lot near the staid Quakery city of Philadelphia and its beautiful surroundings.

E. L. SOUTH.

JULES DELAFOSSE, a member of the French Chamber of Deputies has recently expressed his approval of the system in the most vigorous terms. He says:

"I consider obligatory military service, such as we have conceived and practised (in France), the most pernicious agent of social demoralization and national dissolution that exists in the world. I have the well-considered conviction that if we permit it to continue for twenty years longer the ravages it has already commenced, there will then be no longer either society or country, there will only be a disintegrated mass of people without bond of union, without discipline, and without cohesion.

Military service, as at present constituted, sacrifices thousands of young men from the cities where they have grown up, the careers they have commenced, and the simple and upright lives which they ought to follow, and then, after three years of this alienation, it sends them back to civil life, they turn to it no longer. Many of them have become accustomed to the life of towns, and many wish to remain in the cities, and do remain, becoming workmen without work, needy without employment, disaffected and untaught. The destruction of equilibrium appears to me a great danger of the present day, and I do not hesitate to say that I consider obligatory military service as one of the most powerful agents for re-recruiting the ranks of revolutionary Socialism."—Late Paper.

Waiting Room, Cologne Station.

10 P. M., Third Month 11th, 1897.

On Third-day I had my last lesson and brought all my winter's work to a close, and it was not until Fourth-day morning that I thought about packing. That was no light task, as I left nothing out that A. would not absolutely need, and though it had all along seemed to me that I had very few possessions I soon discovered that in this respect I had made a grand mistake. However, by eight o'clock the last trunk was locked and I was ready to go down and take tea with the director's family as I had been invited to spend the last evening with them. I was rather too tired to feel very sociable and glad though when some one remarked that in view of the trip to morrow I might be excused.

It was 9:10 this a. m. when the train pulled out of Göttingen station. I watched as long as I could see the handkerchiefs that were waving for me on the platform, and then settled back into my seat and meditated upon the mystery of life and the sadness that comes over one at parting. It seemed impossible to realize that my winter at Göttingen was at an end—it had gone like a dream and yet I had at the same time the sensation of scarcely being able to remember when I came—I had become so used to the life and people. Yes, it has been a delightful winter, and though I have lived withdrawn from all social life, I have formed among the few with whom I have been constantly thrown, very warm attachments. Of course I return in the summer, but that will only be as it were for a moment, my life there is at an end. I watched the towers of the town as long as they were visible and felt a real home-sick pang as I realized they were entirely gone out of sight.

The country through which I have passed to-day is very hilly and in summer must be beautiful. I had half an hour's wait at Cassel, which is a most charming little city and possesses many objects of interest. Williams-höhe is the name of a very beautiful castle where the Emperor and his family spend several weeks every summer. From Cassel nearly all the way here I had very agreeable company.

Here I am at last in Paris. I reached the Gare du Nord on Sixth day at 8:30 a. m., and now it is 10, and I have the sensation of being already quite at home; "chez moi" as the French say. I had not a moment's difficulty at the depot, the custom house officer looked about a little in my trunk to see if I had any cigars or cigarettes. On finding none he handed my belongings over to a porter who put me in a cab and in about fifteen minutes I was standing at the door of 62 Rue Le Mercier, wondering what sort of a reception I should find. In a few minutes madame Hamme herself opened the door and in the most charming way in the world made me feel at once at home. My friend had lived with her over a year, and knows her to be good and kind as she is cordial. Though quite advanced in years she flits about as though she might be eighteen, and in less than ten minutes I had been introduced into every corner of the house as well as the garden, and to the serene little maiden Anich, who seems to look after the house in general. I was quite ready for the cup of warm coffee that was served for me as I came from the tour of inspection. While I drank, my new hostess entertained me with all sorts of details, and after I was through the two insisted upon putting me to bed, with a bottle of hot water at my feet, but I resisted. Very nearly every other word is "ma petite mignonne" (my little darling) or "ma chère enfant" (my dear child), after the effusive French manner.

I have a charming room looking out on the garden, and now that I have put my things to rights and set up a few photographs which I brought along, it seems the most natural thing in the world to be in Paris, and to have my feet upon a "chauffrette" (chaffing-dish) and all my things stowed away in the walls. I haven't half discovered the resources of these walls yet, only I see on all sides lines where the paper don't quite match and I know that means a door opening into some mysterious depth. But what pleased me most on coming into the breakfast room this a. m. was to find some letters there, and one from Aunt telling all sorts of news. My intention was the moment I had finished my breakfast to take a walk, getting places somewhat located, but as I passed a very uncomfortable night—almost without sleep—and had succeeded in getting neuralgia in my face, I concluded it would be wiser to write a little now and wait until after "dejeuner," which is served at twelve, for my walk.

Evening.—You will want to know my first impressions of Paris I am very sure, and so I will give them, warning you beforehand that I was in a mental and physical condition this afternoon that permitted only purely physical sensations. Nothing which I saw suggested any thoughts or emotions, but now for the sensations:

Nothing can be conceived that is more gorgeous than the French woman's hat.

That Paris is the cleanest city in the world, and the most beautiful.

That the French cabs and omnibuses are driven very fast, without the slightest regard for the safety of pedestrians and that their name is legion.

That the French language of the shops is different from that of the lecture room and not so easy to understand.

Further than this all other sensations were swallowed up in the one of being intensely tired and sleepy, so that after having walked about for four hours, I put in the two remaining ones before dinner in a sound sleep. To-morrow I hope to have more intelligent impressions to communicate.

Evening of the 13th.—To-day I found myself sufficiently awake to comprehend a little of what I saw, so I will proceed to give you my impressions of the second day in Paris. It was raining this morning as I awoke, and since I am here much more for the language than for sight-seeing, I settled myself very comfortably at my writing table, and as soon as I had finished my dejeuner, which was brought me at half-past seven, I got out my French grammar and went to work as tranquilly as though beautiful Paris was as far away as she was a week ago. About ten, Madame H. appeared to inquire how I had passed the night, and to talk over the lessons that she is to give me. My friend had repeatedly told me that in all her two years of experience in Paris she had never found any one to compare with Madame H. as teacher, and besides, she corrects constantly, which is very rare. There is nothing in the world stupider than to correct, and very few persons have the tact of doing it well. One follows the thought and if that is at all clearly expressed, the form is let go; this is quite natural, and otherwise conversation cannot be carried on. But with Madame H. the case is entirely reversed, she allows nothing to pass, and objects extremely to my "talking fluently," which is my great trouble. She told me yesterday that she had given about ninety thoughts and lessons in her life, which sounds a rather large number, but is probably correct. I shall make the best possible use of her qualities as teacher and only incidentally go sight-seeing. She gave me such an amount of work for my first lesson that it is only by way of a little recreation that I write now.

This afternoon I attended my first lecture at the Collège de France. Madame H. was kind enough to bring me to the lecture room and give me information on various points. Rue Lemerrier is in an entirely different part of Paris than the University, but in three minutes one can reach the omnibus line that brings one very near the latter place, for three sons (a son is five centimes or one cent of our money.) At least it is three sons if one goes up on top on the "impériale" as they call it here, inside the omnibus the price is double. They only stop at definite stations, and between whiles one must get on and off while in motion, although they slacken up. I think this an excellent practice, for the horses are spared the strain of starting, and one learns very quickly to get on and off without trouble.

The collège de France dates back to Francis I., to whom it owes its origin, although it has been rebuilt and enlarged from time to time. The lectures are open to the public entirely free.

I was interested in comparing what I saw to-day with what I had become familiar with in Göttingen. The audience was made up of men and women, many quite advanced in years, and the women, almost without exception, looked to belong to an entirely different class than the gorgeously apparelled specimens of the sex whom I met on the boulevards yesterday, and who did not seem to have any higher ideas than that of making themselves beautiful. The lecture was one in the middle of a course on the literature of the nineteenth century. I will attend this course twice a week, and one on history at the Sorbonne, which is in the same street; more than this I do not think it wise to undertake.

After the lecture was over I made my way to the hotel de Cluny, which is one of the many museums of Paris that one must see. The building is itself of intense interest, being built on the site of an old Roman palace of the fourth century, of which still a good deal is standing. It is one of the best preserved and most elegant gothic structures anywhere to be found. The rooms are all devoted to collections of various objects of interest, useful, religious and artistic, all beautifully arranged. The part of the old Roman palace which still stands is also open to visitors. I entered without any idea of where I was going, and not knowing at the time its historic importance, and it produced upon me all the more a profound and remarkable impression. The walls stand firmly as the everlasting rocks themselves, and the main room has a height of over twenty-five feet and measures sixty by thirty-six feet in length and breadth. One can realize that of the size of the palace when one judges that this immense apartment was simply one of the baths. By means of my Baedeker I found my way without difficulty to the Pantheon, a most magnificent structure built upon the site of the tomb of St. Genevieve, the patroness of Paris who died 512, A. D.

Indescribably imposing and awe inspiring is the interior of this magnificent temple. Upon the walls are beautiful paintings, illustrating scenes in the history of France, and especially from the life of Saint Genevieve. In the vaults repose many of the noted men of France. From the Pantheon it is but a short walk to the Palace of the Luxembourg, which is now used as the place of sitting of the Senate of France. It was by this time too late to visit the gallery of modern painters there, so after a short walk through the "Jardin de Luxembourg" I returned to the point where I could take the omnibus, once more climbing up to the "impériale." I was brought, in about three-quarters of an hour, back to the quiet little street which I now call "chez-moi." I was very glad an hour later when mademoiselle Eline came to tell me dinner was ready.

Third-day.—To-morrow the American mail goes out, so in order to finish several letters which are begun, I have resisted the temptation of going to a lecture this afternoon. Yesterday I started at one o'clock for the Sorbonne, which is, I think I have already mentioned, an hour by omnibus from here. About three minutes before stopping at the palace of the Luxembourg it began to rain very severely, so that in the few minutes walk from that place to the University, I was quite wet. I had very little knowledge of where I was going, but seeing a good many people streaming into a side entrance I followed, glad enough to get shelter from the rain. We soon entered a large hall, which belongs to the old building. I walked down to the front and took my seat very near the chair. The professor is one very popular and the hall was soon crowded. Just before the lecture begins the janitor comes in and places a water bottle and a glass containing sugar and a spoon upon the table, at least this has happened at all lectures which I have attended thus far.

The professor's name is M. de Julliville, and the subject, literature of the fifteenth century. One thing that amused me was that though the hall was half full of women, he addressed the men only, saying "messieurs" instead of "mesdames et messieurs," as the others had done. When I related this at the table in the evening, madame H. laughed, and said he was one who objected to women studying with men. There is, however, no restriction placed upon the women, and M. de Julliville's ignoring of them does not seem to frighten them away.

After the lecture I followed the crowd again and coming round to the front of the building, entered the magnificent new hall, and came soon into a large and beautiful room, where I again took a seat near the professor's chair. I had no idea what the lecture would be upon, so waited in patience to see. I have not yet discovered the name of the course, but the subject of the day was explaining the rules and regulations of the Society of Beggars at Rome. It was highly entertaining and at the same time evoking to think of how the public is imposed upon by these wretches.

From the Sorbonne I made my way by the Rue St. Michael to the Seine. By this time the sun was shining brightly and illuminating with a rich, golden light the glorious front of Notre Dame, which appeared a little to the right. I stood spell-bound for awhile contemplating its marvellous lace-like effect, and then turned to walk up the river. My object in coming this way was to visit the "bouquinistes" of the Seine. All along the south shore of the river the stone wall which borders the quays is surmounted by rows of zinc covered boxes, in which all sorts of trash, principally books, is exposed for sale. I had been told on no account to miss the bouquinistes, as that was something quite Parisian. The price of the books range from five centimes up. In the course of a walk of a mile I succeeded in finding three books that I wanted in sufficiently good condition to buy. The greater part, however were not even inviting to look at much less to touch.

This morning I had a pleasant walk between my lesson and "dejeuner." I looked up the course on the plan of Paris, and then started out for the "Place de l'Etoile," the handsomest part of Paris, visiting on the way the Parc de Monceaux. The latter is an exquisite bit of landscape, surrounded by handsome residence in the midst of the city. La place de l'Etoile is an immense circular space, in the centre of which stands the magnificent Arch de Triomphe of Napoleon, the most stupendous monument of the kind in the world. The Champ Elysees extends from it to the Place de la Concorde, beyond which is the garden of the Tuileries, and still beyond is the Louvres. Standing under the arch one looks down this most wonderful and most beautiful avenue in the world, with the Seine on one side and the tower of Notre Dame in the distance. In the early spring it must present indeed a scene of perfect enchantment. E. S. K.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Animal Toilette.—Birds are very particular about the quality of their toilette-dust, and equally nice as to the water in which they prefer to wash. Some use water only, some water or dust, others dust and no water. Partridges are a good example of the dusting birds, and are most careful in the selection of their dust-bath. Dry loam suits them best. But perhaps their favorite place is a meadow where a few turfs have been removed. There they scratch out the loam, and shuffle backwards under the grass roots till their feathers are full of the coarsh. In wet weather they find, if possible, heap of burnt ashes on the site of a weed fire and dust there. Sparrows, on the contrary, a ways choose road-dust, the driest and finest possible. Larks also are fond of the road dust there in the early morning. But they, they have their fancy, and choose the dry, gritty part, where the horses' hoofs tread.

Wild ducks, though feeding by the salt water prefer to wash in fresh water pools, where the prim and wash themselves in the early morning. But though passing so much time on the water, ducks seem to prefer a shower-bath any other; and in heavy rain they may be seen opening their feathers and allowing the rain to soak in, after which they dress the whole surface with oil from the reservoir which nature has furnished.

Swallows and martins are as nice in the choice of bath water as any professional beau nothing but newly fallen rain water thoroughly pleases them, and if tempted to bathe, it is generally by some shallow pool in the road, which an hour's sun will evaporate.

One small spaniel which we allowed to lie n the house was well aware that if he returned lively, he would not be admitted indoors. About an hour before the close of the day's shooting, he used to strike work and begin to clean himself; and if urged to do more, would slip off alone and present himself neat and clean in the lining-room. One day the dog had been left at home, and his master returned and seated himself wet and with half frozen drops of ice sticking to his gaiters, by the fire. "Pan" ran up and carefully licked off the frozen ice and snow, topping every now and then to give an anxious look, which said as plainly as possible: "Dear me, if I don't get him clean quickly, he will be sent to lie in the stable."

Animals' Beds.—The sight of the prairie-dogs making up their beds on winter afternoons, is the funniest scene in the Zoo. There are several of these gentle little fellows in the gardens, two or three in a cage, each of which is supplied with a sleeping-box in one corner, while every day a few handfuls of fresh straw are put in. In the morning, the prairie-dogs carry every bit of their last night's bed out of the box, and throw it out into the cage. They then eat their breakfast, and spend the day in playing about, driving visitors out of countenance, cramming pieces of straw into their mouths and noses, and nibbling carrots.

About three o'clock, when the days are short, they suddenly discover that they have not made their beds, and at once set to work in a hurry to get it done before dark. As the closing bells ring at dusk, and that is the moment in which the prairie-dogs earnestly desire to be in bed, it most seems to anyone who watches them, as if they knew the time, and were waiting for the evening before turning in. But bed-making with them is a very serious matter. Common straw, ragged in just as it is, does not suit them at all. It has all to be cut up to a certain length, and then carried in in bundles and "made up" side. Each prairie-dog sits up on end, and tucks straw into its mouth in a most dreadful way, holding the straws across and breaking them off on each side with its paws, exactly as did sewing-maids indulge in the bad habit of tucking cotton with their teeth. As soon as the prairie-dog has filled its mouth till it cannot hold any more, it drops on all fours and gulps off into the sleeping box, arranges the cut straw, and rushes out again for a fresh supply.

THE FRIEND.

FOURTH MONTH 24, 1897.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

This body may be regarded as commencing its sessions with the meeting of the Yearly Meeting of Ministers and Elders on Seventh-day, the nineteenth of Fourth Month.

There were several strangers present, among whom our friend Phebe R. Gifford, of Providence, Rhode Island, now aged about ninety-four.

During the time of waiting on the Lord, which preceded the transaction of the business, there were several communications, and the closing over the meeting was a comfortable one.

Last year a Committee was appointed to visit subordinate Select Meetings. Their report was an acceptable one. In it was extended a caution about such a study of the Scriptures, as would lead any to trust in the knowledge thus obtained, instead of depending on the opening of the Spirit of Truth, whose revelations must be experienced to give a really valuable knowledge of spiritual things. Much time was spent in the consideration of this report, and there was a general unity of sentiment on the points discussed. One Friend called attention to the danger of views gradually creeping in, which were opposed to the doctrine ever held by Friends, of the Divinity of Christ.

After answering the first two Queries, the meeting adjourned, feeling thankful for the favors vouchsafed.

The Yearly Meeting for Business convened on Second-day morning, the nineteenth of Fourth Month. During the time of silence, there seemed a solid covering over the assembly, and a concern that the Head of the Church might preside, and season the minds of those present so as to qualify them for the right transaction of the business to come before them. After the opening business had been gone through with, a Friend referred to the former practice of taking up the epistles from other meetings at that time, and, under a sense of duty, proposed the appointment of a Committee to consider the propriety of preparing an epistle of brotherly love to Ohio Yearly Meeting, with authority to produce such a document, if way should open to prepare one. A considerable number of Friends expressed their unity with the proposal. Another Friend suggested that our Yearly Meeting prepare a short loving address, to be sent to Friends everywhere, encouraging an adherence to our ancient principles. This met with a favorable response, and both subjects were referred to the same Committee.

A Committee was appointed on the Treasurer's account, and one to nominate a new committee to have charge of Westtown School. A caution was given to this Committee to have especial regard in the selection of a new committee to the religious qualifications of those proposed, which, it was stated, were more important than the intellectual ability or acquirements.

Bucks Quarterly Meeting, in view of the much reduced number of their members, requested the appointment of a Committee to be incorporated with their meetings, and to assist them in deciding whether or not to give up their Quarterly Meeting, and to be joined to another. As this is a weighty subject, a few Friends were named to nominate such a Committee.

A Committee was appointed to propose a member of the Meeting for Sufferings in place of Joseph Rhoads, deceased.

A portion of the Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings was read.

Among the matters which had claimed the attention of the Meeting for Sufferings during the past year was the preparation and distribution of an Appeal to our fellow-Christians on the subject of war, and a protest against the introduction of military drill into schools, and the forming of what are termed "Boys' Brigades." This appeal was mainly directed to the professors of Christianity, and was enforced by references to the teachings of Christ and his Apostles, as well as by the predictions of the ancient prophets, of the coming of a day when war should cease.

One hundred and ten thousand copies of this Appeal had been printed, and they had been sent to the ministers of various denominations, to teachers and other classes of influential citizens. Many replies had been received expressing sympathy with the objects of the Appeal and offering aid in its distribution. In several cases inquiries were made as to the general principles held by the Society of Friends, and way was thus opened for the distribution of books and tracts setting forth the Christian doctrines of our Society.

An edition of "Dymond's Essays on the Principles of Morality" had been published, abridged by the omission of some parts which were either especially adapted to England, or have been rendered unnecessary by the changed conditions of modern practice.

An edition had been printed of the Memorial of Deborah B. Webb, of M. Brooks on "Silent Waiting," of "Thirteenth Proposition of Barclay's Apology," and "Memoirs of Stephen Grellet."

The Treasurer of the Yearly Meeting had received nine hundred and fifty dollars from a bequest to the Meeting for Sufferings, left by our late friend, Edward C. Jones, the interest of which is to be used in publishing and circulating the approved writings of our Society.

During the year the following appropriations had been made from the funds in the hands of the Charleston Trustees: Da Morris Monthly Meeting, Kansas, one hundred and twenty-five dollars; Rich Square Monthly Meeting, North Carolina, two hundred and fifty dollars.

A memorial to the Senate of the United States in favor of ratifying the Treaty of Arbitration between Great Britain and the United States, had been prepared and forwarded.

Memorials for our deceased Friends, Rebecca S. Conrad and Clarkson Sheppard, had been examined and directed to be laid before the Yearly Meeting.

In addition to the "Appeal on War," two thousand nine hundred and twenty volumes and two thousand two hundred and fifty-one pamphlets had been taken from the Book Store.

Third day, The Representatives proposed that Ephraim Smith be appointed as Clerk, and Joseph L. Bailey as Assistant Clerk. For the present year, which was united with, and they were appointed.

The Verbal Committee appointed yesterday to examine two communications sent to the Meeting reported that one of them was an epistle from London Yearly Meeting, which they suggested should be read, as a matter of information and courtesy, with the distinct understanding that it was not to be regarded as opening a regular correspondence, or in any degree withdrawing from the support of those principles which we had heretofore maintained. The Clerk was to convey the information of what had been done, to the Clerk of London Yearly Meeting.

A suggestion was afterwards made that the Clerk should sign his communication as Clerk, thus giving it an official character, but it was thought best not to go beyond the report of the Committee.

After this matter was disposed of, the remaining Minutes of the Meeting for Sufferings were read. Their proceedings met with the approval of the meeting. In considering the report of the Book Committee, some Friends spoke especially on the value of two books they had issued during the past year, "Stephen Grellet's Memoirs" and "Jonathan Dymond's Essays on the Principles of Morality." Friends were encouraged to aid in the distribution of our approved writings.

After the disposal of this business, the first three Queries were read and considered, and then the Meeting adjourned.

We insert in the present number a communication from a well concerned Friend, who questions the propriety of admitting into THE FRIEND anecdotes respecting worthy servants of the Lord, which indicate that they were at times off their guard, and indulged in too much levity. We are willing to take our share of the censure, and hope in the future to be more guarded as to what is admitted into our columns. For while we have no controversy with innocent cheerfulness, and do not doubt that some minds may draw instruction from funny anecdotes, there are others who may so misuse such incidents as to encourage therein a degree of lightness inconsistent with that watchfulness against evil which religion enjoins.

We have received several notices of meetings of different sorts to be held during the week of our Yearly Meeting, but for the reasons indicated in the editorial of last week—especially the disadvantage of having the interest of Friends drawn away in part from the proper business of the Yearly Meeting, we have believed it best to decline publishing any of them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—It is stated that the commander of the International fleet has received notice that the United States does not recognize the existence of a blockade of Crete.

A number of the Western Senators, representing wool-producing States, have agreed upon amendments which they will insist shall be made in the Dingley Tariff bill. These relate chiefly to the "carpet wool," and increase the rates provided in the pending bill. The United States are now a postmaster in New York city would have the power to appoint 2,000 subordinates, while now there are but two positions not covered by the Civil Service rules.

The New York Senate has passed the Greater New York Charter bill over Mayor Strong's veto by a vote of 45 to 17.

The State of Maine has a Canadian French population of 55,000.

Immense beds of paint rock have been discovered near Augusta. Specimens have been sent to experts, and have been pronounced of the best quality. The beds are about fifteen miles from Augusta, and the rock which is of two colors—red and yellow—is found in large quantities.

On the 15th instant the Mississippi River at Vicksburg had fallen six-sixths of a foot in consequence of a crevasse at Bigg's levee, and the greater part of the southern section of Madison Parish, Louisiana, was under water. The flood had then reached Tallahassee, eighteen miles west of Delta, and was rising a foot an hour.

A despatch from New York city of the 20th instant says: "To-day is a record breaker in two respects, according to the official weather observer. It is the coldest April 20th on record, and is the first day on record when we have had freezing temperature after the 19th of the month."

The Public Ledger says editorially: "The reports which come from the anthracite coal regions as it is being revealed to a committee of the Legislature indicate that it is most pitiful and deplorable. The entire coal area appears to be overcrowded with cheap labor, large numbers of the men being able to earn scarcely enough to keep themselves and families from starvation; many of them are suffering from every conceivable form of physical distress, and the prospect of their being able to improve their condition is altogether hopeless. . . . They have in some places, as appears by the testimony presented to the legislative committee, reduced the wage rate so low that it is scarcely sufficient to provide the necessities of decent, sanitary living. They herd in squads, subjects of squalid poverty, and are beset by disease, dirt and hunger. . . . The worst of it is, that the evil consequences do not end with their distress and suffering. The low wage rate which these aliens have so generally introduced into the coal and iron industries of the State is likely or certain to become the popular one unless immigration is restrained from ever again being so largely allowed. . . . There are many reasons for the need of reforming our immigration laws are required that are to be found in the storm-strewn and visible facts presented during the last few days to the committee, showing the wretched condition of the foreigners herded like cattle in some of the coal fields of Pennsylvania. That which has happened in one or two of our industries is likely to happen in others. . . . The restriction is directed against the tide of foreign cheap labor which is steadily pouring into our ports."

Deaths in this city last week numbered 419, which is 65 less than the previous week, and 108 less than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 229 were males and 190 females; 66 died of pneumonia; 43 of smallpox; 28 of scarlet fever; 19 of influenza; 19 of cholera; 15 of convulsions; 16 of marasmus; 16 of old age; 15 of diphtheria; 14 of apoplexy; 13 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of nephritis; 12 of whooping cough; 10 of cancer, and 9 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—No wool sheep were on the market; Extra clipped, 4 1/4 a 4 1/2c; good, do., 4 a 4 1/2c; medium, do., 3 1/4 a 3 1/2c; common, do., 3 a 3 1/2c; clipped lambs, 4 a 5 1/2c.

Wool.—No. 1 Western, 6 a 6 1/2c; other Western, 5 1/4 a 6c; State, 5 1/4 a 5c.

FOREIGN.—A convention has been signed between France and Brazil for the arbitration of the Guiana boundary dispute.

Information has been received in Washington that the President of the Swiss Republic has been selected as arbitrator in a boundary dispute between Brazil and French Guiana.

The financial delegate of the Russian Government in Paris says that de Witte's financial policy is now definitely accepted by Russia, which is irrevocably committed to the gold standard.

The Evening News on the 14th instant published a despatch from its special correspondent at Athens, saying that the Turkish Government had formally informed the Greek Government that any further raid of irregulars into Turkish territory would be regarded as a declaration of war upon the part of Greece.

The Turkish Council of Ministers on the 15th declared that their war has broken out, and ordered Edhem Pasha, the Turkish military commander, to the aid.

A despatch of the 15th from Athens, says: "The Turkish batteries at Prevesa, on the north shore of the entrance of the Gulf of Arta, where, according to the treaty of Berlin, the Turks had no right to erect fortifications, fired a gun and sank a Greek steamer, the Meobis, this morning while she was attempting to leave the Gulf of Ambracia. The crew of the steamer were saved by boats from the shore, but the Captain of the Meobis was severely wounded. Upon receipt of this news, the Greek Government sent orders to the Greek fleet in the Gulf of Ambracia to bombard Prevesa. . . . The bombardment of Prevesa commenced at 6 o'clock this morning and continues as this despatch is sent. Prevesa, which is in Epirus and eighteen miles from Arta, is strongly fortified."

The Greeks hold that it was an attempt upon the part of the Turkish Government to occupy a strategic position near Mount Anaktoria, in the bank between the neutral zone, which led to an encounter on the 15th between the Greeks and the Turks. This, it is added, was used at Constantinople as a reason for ordering Edhem Pasha, the Turkish Commander-in-chief, to take a more offensive, and led to the rupture of diplomatic relations between the two Governments. The so-called outrage off Prevesa, when the Turkish batteries there sank the steamer Meobis, further justified Greece, in the minds of the Athenians in waging war against Turkey.

A desperate fight occurred at the Milouva Pass where the Turks were victorious. The bombardment of Prevesa continues. At Reventi the Turks were defeated with heavy losses.

Russia has been assured that Bulgaria, Servia and Montenegro will maintain strict neutrality during the present trouble.

Immigrants from Italy numbered 306,000 the greatest on record. More than 60,000 came to this country, 75,000 went to Argentina, and the rest of the remainder to Brazil and Uruguay.

The Zar has ordered that hereafter all criminal condemned to imprisonment in Siberia shall be conveyed there by railway, instead of being compelled to march.

Captain General Polioraja says the rebellion in the Philippine Islands is nearly quelled; that only 600 insurgents, partly armed, are in the field.

Small diamonds have been discovered in the sand taken from a lake formed by the crater of an extinct volcano in the Wilkes Hoek Mountains of Natal which are beyond the hitherto known diamond fields.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Supt.

DIED, on the fourteenth of Second Month, 1897, NATHAN WHITE, aged eighty-eight years, two months and nine days, after an illness of several days. He was a life-long member of Piney Woods Monthly Meeting of Friends, near Belvidere, Perquimans Co. N. C., and a firm adherent of the principles of early Friends. His longevity was a striking example of temperance in all things. Mentoring his words and actions by the golden rule, he lived peaceably with all men. He was a devoted husband and father, kind neighbor, and loyal citizen. He leaves a loving wife four children, four grandchildren and one brother. May they emulate his example, so when called from works to rewards, they may be a reunited family where parting or death may never separate them. He died on the third Sabbath during his last illness. May we, like him, when passing through that "valley of the shadow of death," fear no evil, realize that his rod and his staff they comfort us, and underneath us are "The Everlasting Arms." The funeral services were conducted at Piney Woods, where a large circle of friends met in sympathy with the bereaved. Respect to one they love is all extended. They were admonished not to weep for him, but to weep for themselves and their children. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright, for the end of that man is peace."

At London Grove, Pa., on Third Month 12th 1897, GEORGE SARGENT, an erstwhile elder and overseer of Linton Grove Monthly Meeting, in his eighty-eighth year of his age.

At the residence of Eliza H. Varney, Bloomfield, Ontario, Canada, on Fourth Month 1st, 1897, AMY LEAR, aged eighty-one years and five months. She was a consistent member of West Lake Monthly Meeting of Friends, and was beloved by all classes. She was ill about a week, and evinced resignation to the Divine will, and thankfulness that she was with her friends during her sickness (she lived alone). She several times said she was ready to go, and when spoken to her about her recovery, she replied: "I should only have to be gone over again before long. She was a pattern of piety, meekness and love to us all. She leaves one daughter and one grandson to mourn their loss."

Prayers and Letters of Deborah Brooks Webb.

1894.—Fifth Month.—Notwithstanding the ail condition of her health, she obtained a duite to visit the meetings of Philadelphia quarter, in company with her friends R. S. A. and G. J. S. This visit was felt by herself to e an evening sacrifice. She was mercifully faored with strength to complete it, to the peace f her own mind and the satisfaction of Friends. A solemn feeling accompanied the return of er minute in the Eighth Month following and is proved to be the last occasion on which she attended her meeting.

1895.—First Mo. 10th.—To R. S. A.: "How veet and kind to write me all about the funeral f our precious departed friend, Samuel F. Balrston. No shadow of doubt, he is accepted of is Father and Master. "They that turn many r righteousness shall shine as the stars forever d ever." I hope the dear Master can fill his own of life full of stars. Oh, he was so helpful e, in my early ministry.

How I eeded to be convinced surely, and over and ver again, I was so weak and little. The dear aster has been so good to me, all my life long. ow, I have such sweet nights, sleeping mostly, at waking every one or two hours, and seemg close with the dear Father. I often marvel find myself speaking to Him in prayer or raise so constantly after lying down. Somees a sweet little message comes from Him adore!"

She writes to a friend Fourth Mo. 1st, 1895: How wonderful it was that the visit was accomplished. And now the Yearly Meeting is ver, and a favored time. I thought of them so equently, and hoped and desired the over-adowing of the ancient wing of goodness. The at three years I have felt so unable to sit there d be absent, and now it has culminated in a rough rest. "Come ye yourselves apart and at awhile!" It seems to be all rest. I sleep so uch, after each meal generally, and most of e night. There is more vigor after awaking on these deep sleeps, and my face does not look lite so sick and broken. Your interest in the sing generation must produce some good fruit, d I contemplate the sweet words for you, "Let r alone, she has done what she could." Do not r anxious, do not worry, only be passive in the ar Lord's holy hand."

Sixth Month 9th, 1895, to R. S. A.—"Several lately have bidden me farewell as if they were the last. The Lord's blessed will be done. I want to go to Him. How sudden was the removal of R. K. Masters! In the harness, surely."

To the same, Seventh Month 21st: "And my tongue shall speak of thy righteousness and thy praise all the day long." Just reading this in the Psalms now, and an intimation to pen it to my dear R—, as indicative of the even tenor of the spirit within me. Only, only, held up by his mercy, and feel the force of the words, 'Say unto my soul I am thy salvation.' 'Thy wonderful how good He is to me, when I do so little for Him."

To the same, Sixth Month 6th, 1895: "I love the will of the Lord, and want it glorified! glorified!" Again in allusion to dear E. F—, "How wonderful that the dear Lord can direct us with the illuminations of his Spirit, even away off there, among the aliens and unbelievers. We will trust her in his care."

Eighth Month 11th.—"Your Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting has passed. Just one year ago, we both attended with our minutes. Did not the dear Lord help us? Our Ebenezer! Surely we can raise it now: glory, glory, to the Lord on high! His handmaidens went forth, nothing in scrip or purse, spiritually, no might, nor strength, nor power of their own, yet 'He filled the hungry soul with goodness and satisfied the longing soul.'"

Tenth Month 9th.—"How sweet dear Clarkson Sheppard's life seems to have been to beholders! Yes, we will pray for our Jerusalem. Nothing but the Lord's pres-erving care can prosper us. People do not love the cross, but it must be borne."

She was now drawing very near to the close of her life; the following letter addressed to a friend on her birth-day, though of an earlier date, seems to belong in its vivid realization of the beauty and joy of the heavenly city, to this period:

"Third Month 11th, 1893.—I have just finished putting the stitches in this little butter-dish mat for thy birthday gift. Please accept. Such beautiful visions floated through my mind as the work proceeded, and I must share them with thee—Revelations xix: 8: "And to her was granted that she should be arrayed in fine linen, clean and white; for the fine linen is the righteousness of saints." How often the flashing of this glossy linen made me think of that passage, and of the light of heaven, so solid, so white, so pure, different from the light of the sun or moon. "Then the golden streets and walls of beauty! I did not think the little thing could bring up such thoughts of the heavenly city with so much sweetness. Then the edgings of white seemed like the jasper walls or the floating out of the white robe. The time will come when we all three of us will hope to reach that glorious city:

"City of the pearl bright portal,
City of the jasper wall,
City of the golden pavement,

Saint of endless festival;
City of Jehovah, Salem!

City of eternity,
To thy bridal halls of gladness—
From this prison I would flee,
Heir of glory,
That shall be, for thee and me!"

"Which of us three will reach there first we know not, but we trust our God and Redeemer, and love Him, and none of them that trust in Him shall be desolate. Again Dr. Nelson seemed inspired when he wrote:

"O, the joys that are there mortal eye hath not seen!
O, the songs they sing there, with hosannas between!
O, the three blessed song of the Lyons in Loft of Moses!
O, the brightness—so brightness—the pearl gate numbers!
O, white wings of angels! O, fields white with roses!
O, white tents of peace, where the rap soul repases!
O, the waters so still and the pastures so green!
And the red! oh, so sweet—more than mortal can dream!"

On Tenth Mo. 9th, 1895, to the same friend: "One week ago, on First-day, I thought so much about you, and it seems to have been about the time the fire<sup>2</sup> was raging so, and your brother's home was endangered. The language kept coming, 'I want to miss you so.' These lovely days reminded me of the time you used to ride out and bring your little offering of some delicacy you thought we did not have. Last year I did not send thee any of my fuchias. My E— was away, and I did the best I could. Now, the fall blooming is so beautiful, I hope to pick some for thee—not that I do it myself, for I am quite an invalid; hands drawn with rheumatism—thankful though that I can move around. Not been out to meeting for over a year. The least exertion makes me pant so. Thou, dear, art suffering from spinal trouble, could not ride out. Well, we are the dear Lord's prisoners; sweet He is to us both. We know not when the end may come, but we love his will. Dear W— has thee still to cheer him heavenward. Dear Clarkson Sheppard gone. Write sometimes, if able. W— wrote so kindly. Thine lovingly,
"D. B. WEBB."

This closes her interesting correspondence. On the tenth of Eleventh Month, 1895, the dear Master "did cut short her strength," as she had expressed it, and suddenly, suddenly admitted her, we may reverently believe, into the full fruition of that joy and peace for which she had such earnest longings.

The following lines were written by one of her beloved nieces in New England, Anne E. Pickens:

IN MEMORY OF DEBORAH B. WEBB.

While thou wert here
Thou ever seemed one near akin to heaven
To bless our lives, a gift to us God-given,
Grown dearer, year by year.

As Moses stood
The prophet blessed in holy place and heard,
And bore to waiting ones his Father's word,
From Sinai's solitude.

"Burning of a large planing mill in West Chester.

Then, from heaven's heights
Didst bring sweet promises of love and cheer,
To lead, inspire and light our pathways here
With Truth's bright beacon light.

Thy fervent prayers
Like constant incense rise, enfolding so
The world's great need, that all Christ's love should know,
And make thy gladness theirs.

But more than these
Will memory hold of thee in sacred place;
Thy gentle ways, thy countless deeds of grace,
And saintly charities.

O love! so dear
And pure—so ripe for God and his bright heaven!
For us, still let entreating love be given.
As erst when thou wert here.

Literary Finds in Abyssinia.

A German literary journal reports that King Menelik of Abyssinia, now that peace has been made between his government and that of Italy, has promised to permit a commission of European scholars to examine the literary treasures deposited in the famous cathedral at Axum, the ancient capital city of Abyssinia, which is known to contain valuable writings dating back perhaps to the time of the Christianization of the people in the fourth century. Those who have been permitted to see these treasures report that among them are many papyrus rolls, and all of them in good condition. As the Axum temple has been regarded all along as a sacred shrine, these documents have never been disturbed by the countless wars that have been waged in Abyssinia in the last fifteen hundred years. The Axum cathedral stands in the ruins of an old heathen temple, and the manuscripts are deposited in vaults under the structure. Of equal or greater value will be the literary remains found on the sacred inland sea of Zuañ, in southern Shea. This island has for centuries been occupied exclusively by Abyssinian monks, who, however, were not able to make use of the papyrus rolls, parchments, documents, and books found in considerable number in the cloister vaults, and some of which are claimed to have come originally from the famous library at Alexandria, destroyed by Khalif Omar in the seventh century. It is certain beyond a reasonable doubt that this collection of literary deposits is exceedingly old, a number of them dating from the time when the Abyssinian emperors ruled also over Egypt. As the entire known literature of Abyssinia is Christian, and quite a number of works lost to Greco-Latin church literature have been found in Abyssinian translations, such as the Book of Enoch and others, it can reasonably be expected that early Christian literature will be most enriched by the examination of these literary storehouses made accessible at Axum and Debra Zion. Among the literary first-fruits of the Italian expedition to Abyssinia, we have, in the recent number of the Journal of the German Oriental Society (Vol. L, No. 3), the description of several very old Abyssinian manuscripts.—S. N. Times.

DR. NANSSEN, the great Arctic explorer, has thoroughly tested the power of human endurance, under the severest exposure and distress, without the aid of stimulants. He recently assured an interviewer that he took no intoxicating liquors with him in his recent expedition in search of the North Pole. As the result of his experience, he has become a great advocate of temperance and has taken a decided stand against the use of stimulants and narcotics of all kinds.—The Presbyterian.

Who Is To Blame?

BY E. F. BURL, LYME, CONN.

Who cast Satan out of heaven? The proper answer is, He cast himself out. It is his own fault that he is not shining at the head of a heavenly host this very moment. He did himself the unspeakable damage of a rebellion, and its inevitable consequences.

What cast our first parents out of their lower paradise? Not the cherubim and flaming sword so much as their own disobedient selves that made expulsion necessary.

What cast Pharaoh of the Exodus, and Saul the son of Kish, out of their kingdoms and lives? Not so much the waters of the Red Sea, and the armies of the Philistines, as their own stubbornness, which made judgments necessary.

Why is Israel to-day outcast from the heritage, and living "scattered and peeled" in many lands? We are bound to answer, They have destroyed themselves. They owe their calamities to their own perverseness. Their peculiar troubles are of their own making. If they had remained steadfast with their God they would be at this moment in their old home and prosperity. It was not the Romans who expelled them, nor is it the Turks who keep them expelled, so much as their own shameful unbelief and forsaking of their covenant God, and rejection of his incarnate Son. This is the root of bitterness that has troubled them all these ages through, and will continue to trouble them, for—who can tell how long? The prophet foresaw this, and so said, "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself."

So it has been with other nations. The Babylonian Empire has gone; but it was not Cyrus and his Persians who overthrew it. It was first overthrown from within—by its own vices and crimes. The grander Roman Empire has gone; but it was not so much the Goths and Vandals who overturned it. It was first overturned from within. Public and private corruption had sapped the foundation of things; the Colossus was practically dead and in process of noisome decomposition when the clubs and battle axes of the northern barbarians first touched it. No wonder that it crumbled into a shapeless ruin at the touch.

And the empire of the Turk is going the same way. It is fast making away with itself by its own vices and crimes. It is, and has been for a long time, committing suicide. The great assassin is assassinating itself. Whether its arteries are finally opened with a sword or a bomb or a poniard or a pair of scissors, matters little. Whether the last breath is squeezed out of it by the Russian Bear, or torn out of it by the British Lion, matters little. It is practically dead already at its own hands—its own abominable hands.

And if the time ever comes when our own nation, or any other nation, becomes goddess and vile, whether after the manner of Sodom and Gomorrah, or those greater sinners, Capernaum and Bethsaida; whether after the manner of the Antichristians or those greater sinners who in the name of the Goddess of Reason substituted for the reign of the Bombs the Reign of Terror, it may expect to be wiped out as effectually, if not in the same way. A deluge of water may not drown it, a deluge of fire and brimstone may not consume it, the artillery of a Napoleon may not sweep it away, but away it is sure to go. For what saith the Scripture—The nation that will not serve Thee shall perish; yea, that nation shall be utterly wasted."

And the coroner's verdict over the great corpse will have to be—"Died by its own hand." By whatever means, and in whatever way, the last breath goes out, death and burial will be foregone conclusions from the character the nation has given itself. We must be self-destroyed before we can be destroyed from without.—The Episcopal Recorder.

A Letter from Paris.

It is extremely aggravating not to be able to enjoy, even for a very short period of time the sensation of being in a new place. I had thought surely in Paris I would be a little excited, have a little thrill of pleasure or surprise in seeing for the first time those marvellous works of art with which I had become so acquainted through books and pictures. But the more I see of the world the more I become familiar with its peoples and customs, the more profoundly am I impressed with the fact that humanity is one and the same thing for all time and all countries, whatever may be the outward forms with which it is clothed. The forms differ but the great throbbing heart beneath is the same—always struggling to solve the mystery of its own existence, of its relations with its Maker and with its fellow-beings; striving to find a way out of its prison, and endeavoring to render in some form or other the history of its striving and struggling immortal. It is only in this way that the grand cathedrals and magnificent works of art appeal to me. Looked at in any other light they are simply piles of stone without life or meaning.

These sees I am given over to philosophizing, it is probably a fault, and one loses perhaps a good deal of the beauty of what one sees. I must be for this reason that I am happier among objects of nature than among those of art. Unfortunately I am not educated enough to enjoy the latter simply as being works of art.

But all this is only a prelude to the few words I want to say in regard to my first visit to the Louvre yesterday. It seems strange to have been passing under the archways of this immense palace every day for a week, and though the doors stand open free to every one, not to have ventured to live so much as cast my eye inside. But I need not say that it has not been from lack of respect for the objects collected there, but rather from an oversight of respect for them. It was not possible for me to enter when hurried or with my mind occupied with other thoughts.

The limitless number of apartments is rather confusing at first, but by carefully studying my Baedeker I was soon able to find what I wanted at will, though in the course of one afternoon I could visit but a small portion of the immense building. There is no possibility of giving any idea of the treasures of art collected there. The great trouble is there are too many, one loses the value of each separate one by reason of the merits of the hundreds and thousands about it. There are pictures there for instance from the brush of Murillo or Rubens or others that one would like to see hung alone in a large hall, without a single other decoration. It is for this reason that one feels a sense of entire satisfaction on entering the apartment devoted to the Venus de Milo. The statue stands alone, perhaps the most perfect work ever formed by the hand of man—and so an entire room is devoted to it. Ah, comme elle est grande et noble et belle, cette Venus! Its exquisite unutterable beauty seems really enhanced by the absence of the arms—the slightest change in any way would spoil the perfect harmony of the whole. But one dares not say too much because words only detract from the reality, in order to know what it means one must see and feel.

There is one room now called la Salle des Cariatides, because of the reproduction of the maiden figures supporting the roof of a small portico of the Erechyon at Athens, which is at one end of the apartment, which excited my interest because of its great number of historic associations. First, it was a hallway upon which opened the private apartments of the Queen Catherine de Medicis. Some years later it was here that Henry IV. celebrated his marriage with Marguerite de Valois, and after his assassination, 1610, his body was laid out in the same hall. Later, when Louis XIV. having become aware of the brilliant talents of Molière, had invited him to his court, it was here that the great poet exhibited before the king and the lords and ladies of that time his great masterpieces.

I shall have later a good deal to tell about the history of Paris, especially at the time of the French Revolution and of the Commune, a connection with the buildings and objects of interest in general of Paris, but as yet I am not well enough informed to be able to speak intelligently, so I prefer to wait.

I continue to visit the university quite regularly, but instead of confining myself to two courses, I take everything as it comes along, two days ago I heard first a lecture on Baudelaire—it sounded to me as though it were spelled at way—a French poet of the present century, then another upon the French Revolution at the time when Napoleon was made emperor, for which followed a lecture upon the philosophy of Pascal, who upheld the principles of the Jansenists. At the first lecture, though I arrived fully fifteen minutes before it began, the hall was already so crowded that I could scarcely enter the door, and was forced to stand for an hour tightly wedged in on all sides, being near the door I had the advantage at the close of being one of the first to leave so I could rush out and get around among the first on the other side of the Sorbonne (the first was the College de France), so as to secure a seat, though there was half an hour time, already a large crowd was collected and the moment the doors were opened there was a rush. Fortunately the third lecture was held in the same hall I could quietly keep my seat.

I had several errands to do so I walked to the Rue de Rivoli (one of the greatest thoroughfares in Paris) proposing to take the omnibus at the station opposite the Louvre. But alas! Paris isn't a bit like America in regard to the position of an omnibus or street car as it fills. I believe this question has never been satisfactorily answered in America, that is to say, with the point is never reached where one more can be accommodated, here the case is different, I discovered it that evening and at last, fearing I might have to wait a long time, I started to walk, although I had a long distance to cover in a very short time.

It is really a sight worth seeing at that time the evening, coming up the magnificent Boulevard de l'Opéra and then to undertake to cross the "Place" of the same name. I thought of it and reflected that if they were here they would be forced to adopt some other head covering than thy bonnet if they did not wish to be run over a good many times. Really I never saw anything like it. Three immense boulevards and four wide streets open upon the Place de l'Opéra, and though there is no street car track it is only the much worse for that. For the omnibuses go wherever they choose and the cabs, well they seem to swarm literally by hundreds of thousands, and to rise suddenly as if by magic on the very spot from which you are rushing. They are all driven at great speed and as all the principal boulevards, avenues, etc., are covered with wood cut in oblong like bricks, the sound is deadened and one does not know from what direction anything is coming. I tell thee to get safely across this place (it is not really as wide as a Philadelphian square) is no trifling matter, and if it were not for several islands of safety here and there I am sure I should never try to venture over. During the day it is not so bad, but between five and seven in the afternoon it is a swarming, seething sea of cabs and omnibuses. But the Parisians do not seem to mind it at all, and never seem in a hurry or excited. I fancy any one could pick out a stranger in a moment just from the way they cross the streets. Coming from America it would not be so striking, but after a year and a half of Germany I find myself entirely disgusted to noise and rush. I have at last hit upon a device, however, which brings me over without the least difficulty, and that is to wait until I see a native start over and then to keep to the leeward of them until we are across. I mentally return them my thanks after reaching the other side, but allow them to go on ignorant of the service they have rendered. I have been told that if any one should be run over here and survive the accident, they are liable to arrest afterwards for blocking the public way. It is the cabs always that have the right of way.

AN ANECDOTE OF A DOG—The Christian Advocate gives an account of a dog, a cross between the St. Bernard and Newfoundland breeds, which was highly valued by its owner.

A rabbit was brought to the house, the first sight and scent of it aroused all the old wild nature of Tray. He fairly trembled with excitement. He must seize the prey, but he was ordered to be quiet. He was soon made to understand that the rabbit was now another member of the household, and that he must not harm it. This was all we dared to hope for, but Tray was generous, and in twenty-four hours his understanding of the situation was so complete that he manifested a disposition to play with the new friend. Nothing could be more ludicrous, for Tray had now attained his full and enormous stature, and the rabbit was so small an I say that it was like the effort of a lion in making overtures to a lamb for a little innocent fun.

The rabbit was suspicious, and Tray's awkward movements were terrifying to the object of his attentions, and grotesque in the extreme to the observer. But after a time Tray made himself understood, and he and Bunny became good friends.

One day the rabbit strayed into the street and ventured perhaps two hundred yards from the gateway, and was presently spied by two alien dogs, which by loud yelps gave sign that they would have him for their prey.

Down the street the rabbit bounded, the dogs in hot pursuit, until the gateway was reached, when poor Bunny was threatened with sure destruction, so close upon him were his fleet-footed enemies. In through the gateway they darted with the speed of the "Empire State Express."

What should Bunny do? Where should he fly? Quick, quick, Bunny! A safe refuge, or in a minute all will be over with you! When he, the curious and timely finding place! Far yonder on the lawn is Tray, seated upon his haunches, like a great lion, calmly surveying the tumult. Quick as a flash the rabbit darted across the lawn to where he sat. Quick as a flash Bunny sprang between his feet and nestled in her his great form to find the protection and peace that a child feels nesting in its mother's arms.

What did Tray do? He did just what we expected him to do—awaken who knew his great strength and his warm, loving heart. Bounding down his great head for a moment, he gently licked the rabbit, and in his own way said: "Don't be afraid, my pet. They shall not harm you." Then, lifting his massive head, he quietly faced the enemy. He did not deign to speak. He simply turned on them his great calm eyes, but before that look of power the pursuers quailed, halted, and turned back, apparently saying that they never before saw it after this fashion.

The College Secret Fraternities.

When Dr. McCosh became connected with Princeton College as its official head, he found that the secret Greek Letter fraternities had considerable power in the Institution, notwithstanding the fact that one of the rules required every student upon entering to sign an obligation to have no connection with such societies. It was observed that the societies sought to get the college honors to their members, and to give support to those who were under college discipline. Some photographs of the lodge members falling into the hands of the faculty, the offending students were summoned before them. "They did not deny the charge," said President McCosh, in referring to this episode, "and we sent them home. In a short time each sent in a paper in which he promised to give up all connection with secret societies. I retained those papers for a time to secure that the promise should be kept, but I have shown them to no one. The faculty restored the students, who, I believe, kept their word. Now the great body of the students would earnestly oppose reinduction of these fraternities into our college. Most of the professors in the American colleges profess to lament the existence of such societies, but have not the courage to suppress them."

The foregoing statement was probably written upwards of a dozen years ago, before the football rivalry among the colleges had acquired its present great momentum, or before the games had been given such very great publicity. I incline to the view that the tendency of the games has been to stimulate the fraternities, and that the existence of the latter has tended to the promotion of disorders, of which of late there have been many unpleasant accounts. One of those occurrences happening nearest to us was what is known as the annual "bowl fight" of the University of Pennsylvania. The beginning of the game was attended by such riotous behavior, and even the danger of loss of life, that the aid of the police had to be invoked, and the affair was seemingly stopped. It was, however, only deferred to another day. Upon its renewal, "large numbers of the combatants had their apparel torn. Indeed," continues the account, "all the men's clothes were decidedly the worse for wear, but a few were stripped of every vestige of ornament." The bowl was successfully housed by the winners, it was stated, "in the Phi Kappa Sigma Fraternity house."

This is not good education. It is not simply boyish fun; it is intense rivalry and hateful spite. The reporter of a daily paper, speaking of a prize-fighter, referred to the "awful transformation" in his countenance when he went to "work"—"the very spirit of ferocity seemed to illuminate the face, to burn under all the freckled skin, and possess every feature. It wasn't ugliness or anger merely. The entire face was transformed into so horrible, so savage a thing, fascinating in its incarnate monstrosity. . . . A man who has to face that night imagine the human had vanished." I much fear that the partisan contests in the colleges often tend to the gendering of this hateful transformation. A clergyman among the Episcopals lately referred to the brutality of the foot-ball contests, as developed in so many quarters, as being quite on a par with pugilistic encounters. The action of a number of students of one of the leading colleges, in sending a flag and a fraternal letter to one of the principals in the recent prize-fight in Nevada, accentuates this too frequent lamentable kinship.

There was introduced in the legislature of South Carolina in last winter, a bill prohibiting secret societies in State colleges. It passed one branch of the legislature, though I am not informed as to its ultimate enactment. An instructor in a theological seminary in this State, writing in the Baptist Examiner, upon "The Anti-Masonic Craze" of sixty years ago, while conceding the abduction and very probable killing of Morgan, "a no-account sort of creature," refers to the atrocious act as a stupid and certainly criminal one, and likewise as founded upon bad policy, seeing that upwards of three-fourths of the Baptist Masons dissolved their connection with the order, and their churches went so far as to testify against it. It was during that time of awakening to a great evil, affecting the church, the home and the State, that the legislature of at least one State appointed a committee of inquiry concerning the "extra judicial oaths" of the lodges, whose report was that the administration of such oaths was highly improper, and that they should be prohibited by legal enactments. No, no, it was not a mere foolish scare, as the writer in the Baptist paper would have his readers believe. Happy would be the case of the religious denomination and of all others which now accord a welcome to the secret, oath-bound orders, if they should again realize a lively awakening to the true character and tendency of such associations! It has been interesting to note a concern on the part of members of a number of religious denominations, in Pennsylvania, who have no unity with the lodges, to appeal to the legislature against them, as in the former time; but where the church generally, in its testimony is so weak, there cannot much be expected from the State authorities. Nevertheless, as the way opens, may our light be found shining throughout.

THE GREYER FOLLY.—Were a house to be in flames to-morrow, and were a mother to seize her gold, and her jewels, and her rings, and rush from the flames with them, and forget her infant slumbering in its cradle, she would neither be so inhuman nor so inconsistent as that man who cares for the toys of a day, and thinks nothing and cares nothing about a soul that stands in eternal jeopardy every hour if not justified and pardoned.—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
SPRINGTIME.

Rich is the fragrance of the passing breeze,
Wafted heaven-laden, sweet the vernal air,
All emerald-garbed in stat'ry rank the trees,
While nature whispers, "Cast aside thy care."

Springtime, glad springtime, with its joys has come,
Flowers deck the sward, blithe warblers poise on wing;
O'er copse and field the busy insects hum,
Welcome ye heralds of the glad-one spring.

And thou, glad season art alas too brief,
For time, relentless time is hastening on,
The faded flower, the changed and withered leaf,
Full oft remind us of thy glories—gone.

There is a land of changeless light and love,
Where spring and summer hold eternal reign,
Home of the white-robed, blissful throng above,
Hail thou and I this heavenly clime attain?

In that fair land where flowers immortal bloom,
And trees of healing never shed a leaf,
Within those mansions far beyond the tomb,
Joy dwells supreme, nor earthly care, nor grief.

Oh, wings, thy flight where springtime's golden ray,
Illumes the portals of the fading West,
And find in heaven's radiant realms of day,
The soul's sweet solace—everlasting rest.

Holy, most holy, Lord enthroned on high,
Through all the glorious, never-ending days,
Angels adore thee, seraphs always cry,
"Holy, Lord God," ye heavens and earth give praise!

DE. GOOD.

Not words on words, in phalax deep.
Need we to prove a God is here,
The daisy fresh from winter's sleep,
Tells of his hand in lines as clear.

For who but HE who arched the skies,
And pour'd the dayspring's living flood,
Wondrous alike in all HE tries,
Could rear the daisy's purple bud;

Mold its green cup, its wiry stem,
Its fringed border nicely spun,
And cut the gold-embossed gem
That, sets in silver, gleams within;

And fling it, unrestrained and free,
O'er hill and dale and desert sod,
That man, wher'er he walks, might see,
At every step, the stamp of God.

THE BISHOPS AND THE INCREASE OF MILLIARISM.—"What are Bishops for?" asked the New Age. "The new Archbishop of Canterbury, the new Bishop of London, and other of our professed descendants of the Apostles, sat smiling in their seats in the Gilded Chamber while the Secretary of State for War unfolded his scheme for squandering an additional five millions and a half of the hard-earned money of the people, over the Government's persistent attempt to break the Sixth Commandment and pour ridicule upon the Seventh Beatitude. The proposed addition to the army estimates, this year, brings the total cost of our second line of defence, for the next twelve months, up to twenty millions odd. This, with the still heavier expenditure on the navy and the interest on war debt, means that something approaching seventy millions sterling will be spent by this Christian land, during the present year, for the purpose of promoting, not the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven, but the reign of hell upon the earth. It is impossible to conceive of anything more wanton and wicked. Yet, in the House of Commons only twenty-three men mustered up courage enough to protest against it; and in the House of Lords not one was found faithful amongst the faithless. Not one of our highly-paid representatives of the Prince of Peace—not a single bishop raised his voice against this monstrous proposal. What hum bug all the preaching of these men about human brotherhood seems, when we compare their conduct in the Senate with their utterances from the pulpit! Whenever a national crime is to be committed, you can always depend upon the bishops to give it their blessing. This addition of five and a half millions to the army estimate is a national crime. It proves how utterly worthless and hypocritical are all our boasting about treaties and arbitration. What is the use of talking about arbitration when we are every year adding enormously to our armaments, and thereby telling all the nations of the world that we do not trust them, and that we ourselves want to be feared, and not trusted? No wonder that other countries regard us as a nation of hypocrites. We make great professions of Christianity, and we waste our resources in pursuit of the policy which Christ hated. And our bishops, of all men, approve of this procedure. They disgraced the holy religion which they profess by their silence on the proposed increase of the army.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Rock Salt.

As the writer was passing along one of the streets of Philadelphia, he noticed a cart on a loading rock salt at the store of a wholesale grocery house. The beauty of the crystallization attracted his attention, and led to a visit to the stores of two dealers in the article, who kindly furnished cabinet specimens, and gave some information that was interesting.

The salt at both of these dealers came from a deposit in the Genesee Valley, discovered within a few years, which extends over Livingston, Wyoming and Genesee Counties. Its existence was made known by boring for natural gas or petroleum. In one case at a depth of about fifteen hundred feet a bed of rock salt forty-five feet thick was encountered. The deposits from eight hundred to twenty-five hundred feet, depending on the character of the surface, which causes much thicker deposits of overlying earth in some places than in others. Salt has been manufactured for many years in large quantities at Onondago by evaporating the brine from salt springs, and a similar process is used in this more recently discovered locality. Wells are sunk to the bottom of the salt bed, and cased with iron pipe down to the salt. A two-inch pipe descends to the bottom of the bed, having perforations for a few feet only at the lower end. Pure water is let into the well between the casing and the small pipe, until well is full. The water in contact with the salt bed dissolves all it will hold, and the brine being more than twice as heavy as pure water sinks to the bottom, enters the small pipe, and is driven part way up by the weight of the outside column of fresh water, and is then pumped into large vats. The brine runs continuous from these vats into the evaporating pans.

In addition to the wells which have been bored to the rock salt, several shafts have been sunk, and by the aid of these, the salt is quarried in a solid form, as one would mine coal. When taken from the bed, the salt seems an aggregation of crystals, larger than a pea, and readily crumbles into these crystals. To make them cohere more strongly, the miners pour water over the surface of the blocks, which melts into small portions, and as the water evaporates leave a thin film of salt which binds the loose particles together. In looking at a pile of rock salt in the warehouse of the merchant, the difference between a surface which has thus been treated and a recent fracture is readily discernible. As to the geological origin of the salt beds of New York, Professor Newberry considers them to be a deposit from a great salt lake, that occupied central and western New York, northern Pennsylvania, northeastern Ohio, and southern Ontario. It probably included an area as great as Lake Huron, or perhaps Lake Superior.

The salt deposits of this group vary in composition. Some are almost chemically pure, while others contain a large quantity of chloride of calcium, chloride of magnesium, sulphate of magnesia, etc., which constitute the "bitterns" of the salt boilers, or the saline liquid that is left in the pans after the salt has been crystallized from the original liquid.

When the water that issues from springs, or bat falls in rain has no permanent outlet, but forms ponds and lakes, whose size is limited only by evaporation from the surface, such lakes invariably become salt, because the saline matters which are constantly being conveyed into them, cannot evaporate and so accumulate. One of the most noted examples of this is the Dead Sea in Palestine, which occupies a deep volcanic fissure, and has no outlet. The water has become excessively salt, and there are probably deposits of salt at its bottom. When the supply of water flowing into such a lake ceases, owing to changes in the surface of the earth, and it evaporates, it must of necessity leave a layer of salt behind it. It is believed that it was in this way that much of the salt that underlies the Tennessee Valley in New York, was deposited about here; and the thick bed of shales and other rocks that now lie above it, were subsequent deposits of mud that have since hardened into rock.

The more one studies the teachings of geology, the more wonderful are seen to be the works of the all-wise Creator, who by the operation of laws which He has given to matter, has worked out his plans through a long series of ages, and given to his creature man those intellectual and physical powers which enable him to make use of the materials stored away in the recesses of the earth. The Psalmist says, "The heavens declare the glory of God; and his firmament showeth his handiwork," and a similar ascription of praise may well arise in the heart of the devout student of geological phenomena.

Further Reminiscences of Mahlon Hockett.

Retaining, as I think, a pretty distinct recollection of that eminent seer and minister of Christ, Mahlon Hockett's visit to our Western meeting, in South Kingston, in or about the year 1828, I thought possibly I might be able to add something to the incidents given on page 35, No. 36 of present volume of THE FRIEND, amongst those who responded to the notice of said meeting was a prominent liquor seller, who, coming from a highly respectable family, took a forward and prominent seat in the house, and soon after the minister, an utter stranger, arose, and extending his hand directly to the face of above, P. T. exclaimed in full tones, "Who art thou; thou art holding the poisoned bowl to thy neighbors' lips?" which seemed to strike him at once and for all, as he never appeared to recover from its effects, but dwindled away for a long time, and then with ruined health and hopes, strolled off to die in obscurity.

But the speaker's errand was by no means yet complete, so he continued on with a close, searching testimony to the audience generally, for some little time, and then turned his attention specially, to a poor looking old woman, and not a member of Society, and began pleading with and encouraging her not to give up, but hold on to the little grain of faith she had with all her strength, and that relief would again come, if she did, in time to save her from the temptations of the grand enemy of her soul's happiness, and then began and recounted all through the attempt to end her troubles, by taking her own life, and how "she went down to the water," he said, "when no eye but that of the All-Seeing One beheld her, and intervened to save her soul," etc., in the most earnest, encouraging and tender language, untreated her not to be so beguiled again, etc., and then as she seemed to sit greatly bowed over, as if nearly oblivious of what he was saying to her, as she sat near, he made a step or two partly to one side, and extended his hand nearly to her, and said loudly, "Dost thou hear me; dost thou understand me," when she nodded several times affirmatively, thus apparently fully admitting the whole colloquy.

From there he went to Hopkinton, and attended their First-day Meeting, and as there was to be a funeral the next day, he stayed to that also; and to which three or four young men walked over across the fields, when one of them to be amusing, but whose years and position in society ought to have taught him better things, said to the others, "Well, what think he will preach about to-day. Thought he preached about everything yesterday." Soon after the meeting sat, Mahlon arose with, "Well, what think he will preach about to-day? Thought he preached about everything yesterday," and then continued, "Who has had his language, How didst thou know the Lord would give him anything to say," and then proceeded to properly characterize such levity in what we consider sacred things.

This last occurrence, however, was not made by my own observation, but no less well authenticated than the others, and there were several remarkable occurrences of his while about there, but of less prominence, and so have passed out of recollection in this long interval. But those three incidents were so marked and important as not to be easily forgotten. The liquor-seller's brave position was an overwhelming defeat at once, and his giving up the business was a great relief to his religious parents and family; and the kindly and helpful advice a great comfort and support to the poor old woman, and all showing that this ability to speak of hidden events is from the same spiritual light and wisdom, whence the Gospel flows, and is but one with it and no other. But this Friend seemed to be as accustomed to it as to the "Word of Life" in any matters and forms as he well might be, if he was only sufficiently careful to "divide" or discriminate it aright; and what an awfully sad thing it will be if our poor, weak membership, trusting to their own short sighted wisdom, which is born of beneath, succeed in establishing this latter, like the false prophets of Baal, as those of the "only true God, and Jesus Christ whom He has sent."

I send these few lines for thy perusal, and to make some use of or not, as may seem to thee best.

GEORGE POSTER.

WESTERLY, R. I. Third Month 29th, 1897.

The Wearing of Egret Plumes.

Nothing for some time has been more commonly seen than the delicate, airy plumes that stand upright in the bonnets. W. H. Hudson, author of "The Naturalist in La Plata," says: "The egrette worn by women in our day is in very nearly all cases actually made of the slender, decomposed feathers that grow at one time of the year on the egret's back and drop gracefully over the sides and tail of the bird. The less fine plumes with shorter and stiffer filaments are from the square heron, which is not an egret." W. H. Hudson adds that "those who engage in the business of procuring these plumes know that, to obtain a good supply with little trouble, the birds must be taken when the breeding season is well advanced. The best time to attack them is when the young birds are fully fledged, but not yet able to fly; for at that time the solicitude of the parent birds is greatest, and, forgetful of their own danger, they are most readily made victims. And," he continues, "when the killing is finished and the bow-hauls of coveted feathers have been plucked out, the slaughtered birds are left in a white heap to fester in the sun and wind in the sight of their orphaned young that cry for food and are not fed. There is nothing in the whole earth so pitiable as this—so pitiable and so shameful—that for such a purpose human cunning should take advantage of that feeling and instinct which we regard as so noble in our own species, and as something sacred—the tender passion of the parent for its offspring, which causes it to neglect its own safety and to perish miserably as a sacrifice to its love! . . . And those who, not ignorant of the facts, encourage such things for fashion's sake and for the gratification of a miserable vanity, have a part in it, and are perhaps more guilty than the wretches who are paid to do the rough work."

Continuing to speak of the time when the birds wear these plumes, this writer says: "It is when in that gayer dress that birds are most valuable for the purposes of fashion and for other forms of decoration; nor is this all; it is then that they are most easily found and taken. The shiest, most secretive kinds lose all their wild instincts in their overmastering anxiety for the safety of eggs or young. And when the poor bird, uttering piercing cries, its sensitive frame quivering, its bill gaping, as if the air could no longer sustain it in its intense agitation, and fluttering its lovely wings to make them more conspicuous, and by such means draw the danger away from its treasure—and onto itself—when it has been ruthlessly shot for its feathers—its fledglings are left to starve in the nest. The mania for egret plumes is still so great that it seems to exceed the former one for wearing the bodies of birds, and it is quite as senseless. Any observant person who notices these plumes waving, not singly, but often in clusters, on the heads of so many women, must know that the slaughter has not been thousands but millions."

A NUMBER of clergymen have written to the New York Voice in relation to the "new religious awakening" now going on in many places in our country. Among the dangers to be avoided, George S. Payson, of New York, mentions these: "Confounding feeling with principle, or mistaking emotion for obedience to Christ, and accordingly rushing forward to a forced acquiescence with the revivalist's wishes or will, and then deceiving them with the falacious belief that they are saved. The reaction from emotionalism, pure and simple, is disastrous to true spiritual life and growth."

The European Concert.

SELECTED.

"The so-called 'European Concert' has been much derided of late, especially by people who do not pause to consider that only in its reality and continuance does there lie any hope of the preservation of Peace.

"The massacres in Armenia were not checked because of the want of agreement between the Great Powers. There was no European Concert to put an end to them. Had there been they could have been stopped, and doubtless would have been, by a single word. The untrustworthy and evasive Turkish Government would not have been foolhardy enough to attempt any resistance had there been real unanimity between the Powers, and had they spoken decisively with one voice. The evidence of Lord Kimberley is conclusive on this point. Speaking in the House of Lords, on January 19th last, he said: 'I made every effort to obtain co-operation with Russia in this matter, and up to a certain point I did obtain that co-operation. My lords, my hopes were disappointed. There came a moment, as the papers before the House show clearly, when the Russian Government was not prepared to go any further in the direction we desired to go. Under these circumstances, the course taken by the noble marquis of asking the assistance of the Powers was the only alternative that remained.'

"Except the alternative of war! 'The reason why Great Britain took no separate action in the cause of Armenia was because, in the opinion of successive Prime Ministers, Liberal and Tory, such action would have meant war.'

"The advocates of Peace, especially, must rejoice at even the appearance of any real concert between the Powers. It is what they have been advocating and striving after. Agreement, co-operation, union between nations and Governments—is what they have preached and worked for. Their greatest difficulty, hitherto, has been the absence of any such thing. When the veteran Jules Simon raised the question of disarmament, and his words were taken up and warmly discussed by all classes throughout Europe; and when many thousands of influential persons in this country petitioned for at least an arrest in the growth of armaments until the close of the century, the insuperable obstacle was the impossibility, as it was deemed, of anything like concert. Even a simple conference to discuss the matter could not be spoken of. There was no one to begin—no Government who could even dare to suggest such a step to the others.

"The Concert exists, and those who most loudly derided it when it was a name only, and nothing could be done, now as loudly abuse it when it proposes to act.

"We may deplore that action and the necessity for it, but the fact remains that the Concert of Europe is the most hopeful factor in the present crisis, as it has proved to be the most useful.

"For the success of Greece in bringing freedom to Crete is due to the existence of the Concert. Crete will obtain her liberation because, thanks to the Greeks, the Concert comes it, and undertakes to make it effective.

"We object to the very idea of coercion. It is never any real remedy for existing evils, and this instance is no exception, for it leaves the whole Eastern Question untouched. The worst calamity of all, both as regards Europe, the Muslimans in Crete and throughout Turkey, whose interests must be safeguarded as well as those of the Christians, in any just settlement; and even Greece herself, would be for self-interest and mere aggrandizement to have their unchecked way. Wrong is wrong by whomsoever committed.

"Then as to the future, there is hope in the existing Concert: first as regards the general work of Peace, amity and unity. If the nations can confer, agree, and act together in one matter, they will learn to do so in others. If they can unite in maintaining common interests, they may find these interests multiply; if they can combine in preserving Peace for selfish reasons, they may later for higher ones. It is the first step that is of importance; it is the practice that counts for so much; it is the habit that is everything; and the first act may lead to practice and habit. So have the Peace people believed and taught.

"But, further, the larger Eastern Question cannot be ultimately solved without such Concert; for even if the long-dreaded scramble for Turkey, and the resulting war, were to take place, there would have to be, subsequently, agreement of some sort—conference and co-operation of a kind—between the few survivors of such an awful catastrophe. Better the agreement now than then. The continuance of Peace, undoubtedly, to say nothing of freedom for Crete and kindred nationalities, lies in a sincere and effective European Concert. If that can be established now, it may even be found possible eventually to solve the whole Eastern Question without war. If not, it will not. It is our hope, therefore.

"Let us, however, be quite clear on this, that International Peace, or even International Arbitration, as a method and means of securing Peace, is possible only through International Concert."

CORN FOR INDIA.—Arrangements have at last been made for the free transportation of corn to India. The United States government has chartered three steamers to carry corn to India, one to go from San Francisco, the other two to sail from New York. President J. A. Sprunzer of Chicago, Ill., has been appointed by the Home and Foreign relief Commission to superintend the gathering and shipment of grain, and the authorities have promised him room for thirty carloads, all of which will be sent free to the seaboard. There are many who have not given any money because they had none to give, but who will be glad to contribute some corn of which there is great plenty in the country. The corn is to be shelled. Sacks holding about two and a half bushels each will be sent free upon application to J. A. Sprunzer, S. W. Cor. Harrison and May Streets, Chicago, Ill. All corn contributed in Indiana, Illinois, Iowa, and the Eastern states is to be shipped to him, and he will sell it at Chicago, and buy corn in Nebraska for the cargo. The reason for this is that the Illinois, Indiana, Iowa and eastern corn is not so dry as that in Nebraska, and will not remain in condition on the long voyage as well as the Nebraska corn does. Secondly, corn in Nebraska can be bought much cheaper than in Chicago or farther east; hence there will be a gain to follow the proposed plan.—Herald of Truth.

WAR.—War is expensive—when it is over, when it is in progress, and when it is in prospect. According to Sir John Lubbock, who probably knows whereof he speaks, "one third of the national income of England is spent in paying for the past income (interest on war debts); another third is spent in getting ready for future wars; and only one third remains to discharge present obligations and set forward the nation in the way of progress." Add to that the countless ills that afflict individuals as the result of war, and the wonder is that the closing years of the nineteenth century find civilized people still nursing their brutal and barbaric instincts.—Christian Advocate.

Divided Allegiance.

SELECTED.

He who begins by halving his heart between God and mammon, will end by being whole-hearted for the world and faint-hearted for Christ. We are so constituted that it is impossible for us to exercise a divided allegiance; we must be out-and-out for God, or we shall be in-and-in for the world and all its interests.

Moreover, we become inevitably and insensibly assimilated to that which most completely absorbs our time and attention. One cannot be constantly mixed in secular society without not only losing something of his interest in the Divine society of God and angels, where he belongs by his new birth, but also becoming himself secularized. "Our citizenship is in heaven," says the Scripture. It is a sublime conception that even while here in the flesh we hold residence among seraphs and saints of the New Jerusalem. It is for us, therefore, scrupulously to keep to our heavenly fellowship; to pay taxes where we live, and to refuse to be assessed by any rival system to Christ's true Church—simply because a divided loyalty is impossible.

Odd-fellowship chills the ardor of Church fellowship, and Free Masonry detracts from our interest in that "Jerusalem above, which is free and the mother of us all." We are affirming what a wide experience has taught us in this matter. We have never known a good lodgeman who was a good churchman. We say "good lodgeman;" we mean one who attends faithfully to his obligations to Masonry or Odd-fellowship, and gives the time and zeal and enthusiasm which his society-obligation demands. Such an one has not enough of him self left to bestow anything valuable on the Church. We are not going out of our way to slur or abuse the secret society in what we say; we are only emphasizing a great principle—that a man cannot be two without ceasing to be one,—that a Christian cannot sub-divide him self among many interests without subtracting himself from some one interest.

Let it be understood that, in what we are saying, we are not attacking the lodge so much as magnifying the Church, and pleading for its supremacy in our affections as the body of Christ. The true disciple is bound to adopt the double motto, "I believe and I belong." Many Christians believe in Christ without belonging to Him; they give Christ their faith, and with hold from Him their fealty; they own Him but shrink from being owned by Him. We plead for a service of Christ which is entire, undivided, and wanting nothing. Therefore we urge upon Christians the duty of separation—separation from associations that are secret, that they may live an open life of devotion to Christ—separation from societies that assess a tax or time which is already mortgaged for its full value to the Lord;—separation from bonds that hold men together by compacts and oaths when they ought to be free to yield with their full force to the attractions of Christ. Separation in order of concentration.

This plea may seem over-exacting, and the course which it recommends, if faithfully followed, may cause one to appear out of joint with his times. So it must be. A Christocentric man is often counted an eccentric man, but such are they who have moved the world and will move it—men of an idea that they may be men of universal sympathy—men entered a Christ that they may make the world the circumference of their endeavor.—A. J. Gordon's Danger Signals.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Vitality of Seeds.—In an article under the heading, "The Amazing Vitality of Seeds," in which the writer states that Dr. Isaiah Pile, of Franklin Co., Kansas, dug a well and, at the depth of a little over one hundred feet, struck rock, under which was found "fine rich surface soil," which produced a wonderful growth of tropical vegetation, such as date-trees, palms, brubs, etc. This article has been quoted by their papers, but I am sorry to inform you that lacks truth. When I read the article I thought very strange, as the doctor and myself had over twenty years been special friends, that had never mentioned this to me, and thought I would call his attention to this article the next time he paid me a visit, which I did, not long ago, and he pronounced it a wonderful urn. He said he dug a well, but not one hundred feet. He describes it thus: Went through dirt and gravel seventeen feet; through solid rock twenty-seven feet; under this rock was dirt nearly like coal; went on this about three feet, making in all forty-seven feet; no rich soil, no date-trees, palm, or anything of the sort. The Literary Digest.

Gregarious Birds.—The lively, gregarious birds of the tropics cannot endure to miss the society of their fellows. Wilson, the American naturalist, took with him in his travels in South America, one of the green parrots which he had med. This bird was the most affectionate creature, but whenever a flock of its own species passed by, showed a strong desire to join them. Wilson soon caught a companion for his pet, but by an accident it was killed, and the survivor was inconsolable. He then tried the experiment of showing the parrot a small looking-glass. As soon as the bird saw its image in the mirror, it seemed quite contented with its solitary companion, and would sit for hours undisturbed against the glass with great satisfaction. The flocking of the non-migratory birds after the nesting season is mainly due, not to the pressure of hunger, or the pressure of food in particular places, but to their love of society. Late summer and harvest-time, when the face of the country is one broad table of food for the birds, they flock together solely for the sake of company.

THE MILLIONAIRE AND HIS CLERK.—Girard, the millionaire of Philadelphia, one Seventh-day observed all his clerks to come on the morrow to the wharf and help unload a newly arrived ship. One young man replied quietly; "Mr. Girard, I can't work on Sundays." "You know our rules?" "Yes, I know. I have a mother to support. I can't work on Sundays." "Well, step up to the desk, and the cashier will settle with you." "For three weeks the young man could find no work, but one day a banker came to Girard to ask if he could recommend a man for cashier in a new bank. This discharged young man was at once named as a suitable person.

"But," said the banker, "you dismissed him." "Yes, because he would not work on Sundays. A man who would lose his place for conscience's sake would make a trustworthy cashier." And he was appointed.—The Pearl of Days.

GOD WOULD NOT LET HIM PRAY.—A meeting was in progress at a certain place, and a young man who was in attendance was being urged by his friends to seek God, but he would not yield. The Holy Spirit strove with him, but he resisted, and would not consent to give up sin. Like thousands of others, he put off salvation to a more convenient season, vainly imagining that he would have plenty of time to get ready to die, and that he could repent whenever he got ready—a awful delusion on the part of sinners.

In the short interval of a week he was on his dying bed. There was hurrying to and fro on the part of friends, and a preacher was sought for to pray with the dying man, but none was near. There was a Christian man in the neighborhood, and he was sent for. He was found in the field plowing, and readily consented to go. Leaving his plow, he speedily mounted his horse and rode to the house of the young man whose life was fast ebbing away.

Arriving there he immediately went to the bedside of the dying man and knelt down. He stayed there on his knees several minutes without uttering a word. Then he got up and came out of the room.

His seemingly strange action in not praying, when he had come to do that very thing, attracted attention, and some one said to him:

"Mr. S., why did you do as you did in the room in not praying for that young man?"

His reply was very impressive. Said he: "The Lord would not let me pray."

Does this seem strange doctrine? It is but in line with Jeremiah vii: 16: "Therefore pray not thou for these people, neither lift up cry or prayer for them, neither make intercession to me: for I will not hear thee."

As it is true that the time may come in this life when God will not hear sinners when they cry for mercy, so it is equally true that the time may come when he will not hear his people pray for sinners (Jer. xv: 1; Ezek. xiv: 12-20).

Items.

Indian Schools.—The Indian Rights' Association have sent to President McKinley a strong request for the retention of Dr. W. N. Hallman as Superintendent of Indian Schools. The grounds for this request are his eminent fitness for the position, the success which has attended his previous labors in that position, and the accordance of his retention with the spirit of civil service reform.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 1, 1897.

Fourth-day was principally occupied with the reading and answering of the Queries. A pleasing break in the business was made by the visit of a woman Friend, who addressed the meeting, and afterwards appeared in supplication in an acceptable manner.

The concerns which seemed to take the strongest hold on the feelings of Friends were on the subject of ministry, and an exercise of spirit on behalf of the young members, that through submission to the visitations of Christ, they might come into subjection to his manifestations, and be prepared to gather up the fallen members of those who had been removed from earth, and experience the salvation of their souls at the end of their faith. Near the close of the sitting a few Friends were named to assist the Clerk in endeavoring in a minute the exercises of the meeting.

In the afternoon was held the adjourned meeting of Ministers and Elders. Jonathan E. Rhoads returned the minute granted him two years ago, to pay a religious visit to Great Britain, with information that he had performed the service he had in view, had been received with much kindness, and felt peaceful in the retrospect.

There was much expression of concern for the young. The remaining Queries and Answers were considered, and the meeting adjourned to next year.

On Fifth-day morning meetings for worship were held as usual in the city houses. In the afternoon the remaining subjects contained in the reports from the Quarterly Meetings were taken up. The reports on education gave the number of children of school age as seven hundred and twenty-four. It was concluded in future to make the returns more definite, so as to include all children between five and twenty years.

The reports of the use of intoxicating beverages indicated some improvement in the condition of that righteous concern—but, as has sometimes before been the case, there was some unprofitable discussion of the subject. After the disposal of this matter, the meeting proceeded rather rapidly with its business. Reports were read from the Committee on Education, from that on the Treasurer's Committee, from the Indian Committee and that in charge of Westtown School, etc. The closing business was a lively memorial for Rebecca S. Conrad, an Elder of New Garden Monthly Meeting.

Sixth-day.—At this concluding sitting, an exercise of brotherly love to our Friends of Ohio Yearly Meeting was adopted, and also one of a general character addressed to all meetings and their members bearing the name of Friends. The object of this was to encourage all to rally to the support of our original principles.

The committee to assist the clerk had prepared a minute on the exercises which had occupied the attention of the meeting. This was very satisfactory to the meeting and called forth much expression of unity, and desires that it might be widely distributed among our members.

A lively and interesting memorial of Clarkson Sheppard revived the memory of one who was greatly beloved by many among us.

After the adjourning minute had been read, the Friends present sat for a few minutes in solemn silence, and then separated, with a feeling that we had had a favored meeting, marked with an unusual degree of unity of feeling.

A recent number of The Presbyterian contains an article on the necessity of the observance of the ordinances so called, of Baptism and the Supper. After stating that weakness and disaster have followed in all cases where they have been set aside, it adds, "The Quakers have lost both spiritual and world-conquering power through their disuse of them."

The early members of our Society possessed "spiritual and world-conquering power" in an eminent degree, and yet the rejection of these rights was coeval with their rise. The secret of their strength was the power with which Christ anointed them for his service. On this their dependence was placed, and to the work of his Spirit they constantly appealed. Through the Divine blessing on the labors of the zealous preachers whom God raised up and sent forth many thousands were in a short time convinced of the truths proclaimed by our early Friends; and, laying aside all dependence on outward rites and forms, came to experience the spiritual baptism of Christ, and to partake of that living bread and wine which gives life to the soul.

If our Society does not exercise the same measure of spiritual power as it did in the beginning, it is because the Head of the Church does not bestow his gifts in equal measure; whether this arises from unfaithfulness in the recipients, or from his own will and pleasure. It cannot reasonably be supposed to flow from a disuse of outward rites, because there has been no change in that respect in the position of Friends.

One who believes with the writer of the article in The Presbyterian, that the ordinances "Are heaven-ordained sources of Church vitality, growth and power" must find it difficult to explain the rise of Friends without using such channels.

John William Graham in the concluding number of his series of papers on American Friends, published in The British Friend, advises that London Yearly Meeting should cease to decide between the bodies into which separations in this country have divided Friends. He says:

"We shall do well to cease to feel bound to adopt one side as right and the other as wrong in any American dispute, past or present, but shall do well to continue, by recognizing both, to form yet one surviving link between them." "Our right position is to be responsible for nobody but friendly to all."

Although we believe London Yearly Meeting has in several recent cases come to a wrong decision, in regard to divisions in this country, yet the adoption of the course recommended by J. G. W.'s article, seems to us much like a formal refusal to bear testimony to sound doctrines, to be satisfactory to one who is sincerely concerned to uphold our primitive doctrines.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Democratic members of the Senate Finance Committee will not accept the proposition, made by the Republicans, to allow the Tariff bill to be reported direct to the Senate without passing through the hands of the full committee.

The Bureau of Statistics of the Treasury Department has prepared an estimate showing that the value of the farm lands in the Lower Mississippi Valley now submerged is over $200,000,000. These lands last year raised crops valued at $217,500,000.

For the first time this year, and, indeed, for the first time since last Fall's election, gold has been engaged for export. The amount is $1,000,000.

The chemist of the Agricultural Department, in Washington, thinks that the oil made of sunflower seed, which he says is a perfect substitute for olive oil, is the coming salad oil.

A police census, just concluded, shows the population of Washington City to be 277,483, an increase of 7,341 during the last two years.

No. 2 red winter wheat sold at St. Louis on March 23rd at $1.03 per bushel, the highest price reached since 1890.

Governor McClain has issued his proclamation concerning the Legislature of Mississippi in extra session on the 27th of last month to consider questions of State Finance and revenue, and the building of a new capitol.

The Southern Pacific Railway Company is making arrangements to build a bridge, to cost $5,000,000, across the Mississippi River at New Orleans. The Illinois Central, Texas and Pacific and Louisville and Nashville roads will co-operate in the undertaking.

The Baltimore American says that a sewer in Maryland, in Virginia, has the worst season been profitable, and it never will be until other culture is fully established along the bay and its tributaries.

Bamboo grows very thrifty in California bottom lands, and is found to be a very useful plant. The seed of many species resemble rice, and is suitable for food. The stalks may be used in the building of bridges, fences and barns, and in the manufacture of paper pipes, furniture and boxes.

The people of Adams County, Wash., propose catching a few squirrels, and, after inoculating them with some disease, turn them loose in the hopes that they will be the means of reducing the number of the pest. Florida has only two species of eagles left, the bald head and the osprey, and these are being killed so recklessly that the Legislature is asked to protect them and their eggs to prevent their extermination.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 524, which is 105 more than the previous week, and 32 less than the corresponding week of the preceding year. Males, 249; and 275 females; 44 died of pneumonia; 63 of consumption; 46 of heart disease; 24 of old age; 25 of cancer; 22 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 21 of inflammation of the brain; 20 of diphtheria; 16 of convulsions; 13 of apoplexy; 12 of scarlet fever; 11 from casualties; 11 of typhoid fever; 10 of immolation; 9 of marasmus, and 9 of bronchitis. Marks for the week: 118 2's, 963; 4's, reg. 1131; 1113; compon, 1123; 114; new 4's, reg. 1233; 1233; compon, 1241; 1241; 5's, reg. 1123; 1183; compon, 114; 1141; currency 6's, 103; 107.

City mills, extra, $3.25 a $3.50; do, clear, $4.10 a $4.20; do, straight, $4.30 a $4.60; do, patent, $4.65 a $4.85. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 a $2.50 per bbl. as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 92 a 92 1/2¢.

Do, 2 red wheat, 28 1/2 a 28 3/4¢.

No. 3 white oats, 24 a 25¢.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 5; good, 4 a 5¢; medium, 4 a 4 1/2¢; common, 4 a 4 1/2¢.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra clipped, 4 1/2 a 4 1/2¢; good, do, 4 1/2 a 4 1/2¢; medium, do, 3 1/2 a 4¢; common, do, 3 a 3 1/2¢; clipped lambs, 4 a 5 1/2¢.

HOGS.—An western, 6 a 6 1/2¢; other Western, 5 1/2 a 6¢; State, 5 1/2 a 5 1/2¢.

FOREIGN.—An explosion occurred in the underground railway in London on the 20th ult. as a train was making its usual stop at Aldersgate Station. A number of persons were hurt, ten seriously. The cause of the explosion is not known, but it is believed to have been the result of an accumulation of gas. Many persons, however, believed a bomb was exploded.

England imported $770,000 worth of bicycles and exported $230,000 worth during the first three months of this year, the first year in which account has been taken month by month of the trade in wheels at the Great Britain House.

Dr. Murray, the editor of the great English dictionary now in preparation, says that "disproportionableness" is not the longest word in the English language, but that "antropomorphologically," if not the longest, is the longest that has yet appeared in his dictionary.

The report of the special commission appointed by the Dutch Government to consider the scheme of draining the Zuider Zee says the undertaking is feasible. The work would take thirty-one years for completion, and every year 10,000 hectares of land would be restored to cultivation. A dyke thirty miles in length will extend from the extreme end of the western coast of Friesland. The building of this dyke, which will be of a width 55 metres at the base and 6 metres high, will take nine years. The total cost of the works is estimated at $26,000,000, and the total value of the land thus reclaimed is estimated at $27,000,000.

The quarries from which the ancient Greeks obtained the highly prized Thessalian or verd marble were lost for nearly one thousand years, but were recently rediscovered, and are now being worked by an English company. They are near Larissa.

On the 23rd of February, while King Humbert of Italy was on his way to the races, an iron worker out of employment, attempted to stab him with a dagger. The man was seized before he could carry out his purpose. Upon King Humbert's return to the Quirinal thousands of people gathered about the palace and gave him an ovation. The man who tried to stab the king has been pronounced insane by physicians.

It was stated in the British House of Commons on the 26th, that the Powers, having assumed the occupation of Crete before the war, had determined that the island should be considered neutral, and the blockade maintained in order to prevent opposition to their authority.

A fight on the 19th, in Miloua Pass, resulted in complete victory for the Turks. The Greeks retire to the Plain of Thessaly, after suffering great loss in the contest.

The first seriously planned battle between the Turk and Greeks began on the 21st at Larissa. The Greeks were greatly outnumbered, but they fought desperately, and at night held their own.

After a fierce fight at Mati, on the 24th, the Greek retreated from Tyrnovo and Larissa to Pharsala, about twenty miles due south of Larissa.

Edhem Pasha, the Turkish General, in an interview says, "The Greek retreat was a general rout. They left everything behind, including immense quantities of artillery and munitions of war, which we will be able to make use of."

On the 26th ult. it was thought the Powers would intervene to stop the war between the contestants. It was stated that Greece would neither solicit nor accept the intervention of the Powers, and was preparing to negotiate directly with Turkey.

The total of the cases of bubonic plague in Bombay up to Fourth Month 22nd is 11,706. There have been 10,020 deaths from that disease. Many of the inhabitants of Bombay are now returning to the city.

The visit of British warships to Delagoin Bay is to frustrate the intrigues of Germany, Portugal and the Transvaal, in changing the status quo to the disadvantage of Great Britain.

Buenos Ayres, according to the recent census, has a population of 668,850, or about 100,000 more than B. de Janeiro.

The Early Religious Experience of Thomas Shillitoe.

Thomas Shillitoe's Journal gives the following account of his early life:

"I was born in Holborn, London, about the second Month, 1754. My parents were members of the national church, and zealously engaged to bring up their children in the due observance of its religious rites and ceremonies, and every moral duty. In my infancy they fed the place of my birth, and settled in White-chapel, until I had attained about the twelfth year of my age. My father had, for many years, led the office of librarian to the society of Gray's Inn. His situation calling for his daily attendance, and feeling the infirmities of old age coming upon him, it became necessary to change his place of residence, which induced him to take the Three Tuns public house at Finsbury, and move there with his family.

This change exposed me to great temptations, and naturally of a volatile disposition, and very addicted to vanity. Before, I had been kept close within doors, seldom being suffered to go into the company of other children, except at school; but now I was exposed to all sorts of company, and allowed to ramble over the village unprotected, both by day and late of an evening, crying out beer to the customers, and gathering in the pots, and waiting upon such company as came to the house. First-days were usually the most busy days I had, being scarcely ever able to get to a place of religious worship. This, by long continued neglect, became matter of the greatest indifference to me; which had not been the case before my parents changed their abode. I can now recur to the satisfaction I at times experienced, in going with my parents to what is called church; but my exposed situation in my father's house, opened almost every vice, and the artifices of such ill-disposed persons as I had at times to do with, had nearly effected my ruin. My father being unacquainted with this business, and of a easy disposition, by lending his property and other means, wasted what substance he had, which obliged him to quit this line of life, and retire to apartments provided for him and his family, in Gray's Inn, and live on his salary. I was now about sixteen years of age. A person who frequented my father's house, and who had been an officer in the army, having begun business in the grocery line in Wapping, proposed to my parents to take me as an apprentice for five years, to which they agreed. Here my situation was not improved, as respected good example; for my master was given to much liquor and company; and his wife from her manner of being brought up, was not a suitable mistress for me. These things, together with the examples of wickedness exhibited in the neighborhood, rendered my new situation every way a dangerous one. But though thus exposed, adorable Mercy met with me, and awakened in my mind a degree of religious thoughtfulness. I endeavored to obtain an acquaintance with a young man in the neighborhood, towards whom I felt an attachment, from an apprehension that his countenance bespoke him to be of a serious disposition. His company proved helpful to my preservation, from going greater lengths in folly and dissipation than I might otherwise have done; and his example awakened in me again that liking which I once had for attending a place of religious worship, when I had the opportunity; but this did not often occur; my master and mistress spending the First-day from home, in pleasure, I was left to take care of the house. My master's inclination for company and strong drink caused him to neglect his business; and after I had been with him a little more than one year, he was compelled to give it up, and move to Portsmouth, where he opened a shop in the same line. I felt regret at being obliged to leave my new acquaintance; and the more so, as my exposure to temptation was not at all lessened by my change of residence. A sense of the necessity of care how I formed new acquaintance was in mercy awakened in me, to which I endeavored to give good heed. In time a sober, religious young man, rather older than I was, attached himself to me; and our intimacy was of mutual benefit, continuing the remainder of the time I staid in this part of the country.

The neighborhood in which my master resided, exposed me more to the danger of being drawn aside from the paths of virtue, than any other part of the town; this circumstance, together with the little probability of my making any improvement in a knowledge of my business, induced me to write to my parents to procure my indentures, which being effected, I returned to London, and obtained a situation in the same line of employ. Although I did not mend my situation, as respected the neighborhood I settled in, yet the change was abundantly for the better as respected my master, who was a sober, religiously disposed man, and a great help to me. He being a constant attender of the Foundling Hospital chapel, I became his companion on First-day mornings, and in the afternoon resorted to such places of worship as were noted for popular preachers. In this situation I remained about three years, until I became acquainted with a young man, a distant relation, descended from the Society of Friends. I then forsook the Foundling Hospital chapel, and other places of worship which I had frequented, and kept solely to the meetings of Friends, on First-day mornings. But my motive for this change was not a pure one; my chief inducement being to meet my young relation, and go to dine with him, his acquaintance causing me to neglect the attendance of a place of worship the remaining part of the day, which had been my uniform practice for the last three years. My new companion also took me to the most fashionable tea-gardens and other places of public resort, where we spent the afternoon, and, at times, the evening; this led the way to my giving greater latitude than ever to my natural inclination. Still I continued to attend Friends' Meetings on First-day morning for more than twelve months, but spent the remainder of the day in pleasure. The retrospect did not produce those comfortable feelings which I had once known, when this day of the week was differently occupied; and I was again, in unmerited mercy, met with, and my attention arrested to consider the misery into which the road I had now chosen to travel would eventually lead me, if I continue to pursue it.

Feeling a decided preference to the meetings of Friends, I continued my attendance; experiencing an increased care to observe the time appointed and to be diligent also, in the attendance of afternoon meetings. The more faithfully I gave up to these impressions of duty, the more my desires increased after an acquaintance with the Almighty, and the knowledge of his ways. Earnest were my prayers, that in this day of his powerful visitation, in mercy renewed to my soul, he would not leave me, nor suffer me to become a prey to my soul's adversary, that his hand would not spare, nor his eye pity, until an entire willingness was brought about in me, to cast myself down at his holy footstool.

As resignation was thus wrought in me, to yield to the purifying operation of the Holy Ghost and fire,—that the fan of God's word and power should effect the necessary separation between the precious and the vile, corresponding fruits were brought forth in me, and manifested by my outward conduct. I soon found that my old companion considered me no longer a fit one for him, and our intimacy ceased."

FROM SENATE TO PRIZE RING.—It seems inexplicable that a man who was once the honored representative of a great State in the United States Senate, and who, by the election of his colleagues, was made Vice President pro tempore of the United States, should cast these dignities and honors behind his back and consent to be present at a prize fight as the widely advertised, and probably well-paid, reporter of one of the most vulgar newspapers in the country. Think of it, a senator for eighteen years, and presiding officer of that dignified body, taking his place among the roughs and toughs of the land, and describing one of the most brutal exhibitions that degraded manhood has ever presented to the world. Such service undoubtedly received large pecuniary compensation, but what was gained in dollars and cents is far from being commensurate with what was lost in dignity, honor, self-respect, and character.

Strange fates have overtaken some men who once stood in places of power and honor in our country, and that to which the brilliant former senator from Kansas has succumbed is quite as strange and unfortunate as any.—Selected.

Memorial to the Citizens of the United States.

It is related of the Greek philosopher, Democritus, of the Isle of Cyprus, who at the beginning of the second century resided at Athens, respected for his simple life, and full of kindness to all, that when a show of gladiators was about to be exhibited, he presented himself before the assembled people and told them that they should pass no such decree until they had first removed away the altar of pity. Only in the preceding generation, the Apostle Paul, standing in the midst of Mars' Hill, had declared unto those Athenians who was the "Unknown God" that they ignorantly worshipped, rebuked them for their idolatry and superstition, and reasoned with them of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come.

To-day, eighteen centuries further along in the world's course, the demagogues of the prize ring are let loose upon society, a multitude of people bow down in all their idolatry of animalism, and the Lord Christ, who is the "Altar of Pity," Head over all things, is certainly far removed from their hearts. Yet may we devoutly thank God that it was by no decree of the Nation that within the borders of the smallest populated of its States, there was given opportunity to ingloriously prepare and to enact the recent brutish spectacle of the prize ring. One after another had the States (with a single exception perhaps of the one unnamed) by legislative enactment brought pugilism under the ban, while Congress itself had forbidden prize-fighting in all the national domain.

The good name of the nation has been outraged not so much by the disgraceful event of a specially brutal encounter between two human beings, as by the very reprehensible course of a large number of daily papers in exploiting from first to last the prize-fighters and the fight. "We can recall no one thing in the history of the country" says a prominent, influential daily, "that has done so much to demoralize the press and the public as the continuous babbling between prize-fighters and their associates that has found publicity in the newspapers during the last five years." "There is every reason to expect," continues the same editor, "a wholesome reaction of public sentiment, not only against the reckless and babbling bruisers of the ring, but against the public journals which have done so much to teach brutality and lawlessness as attributes of modern manhood."

Unfortunately, some millions of our people, especially those young in years, who will have been so seriously damaged, morally, through the papers which gave them the babbling of the prize-fighters and their sympathetic associates, will know little of the wholesome reaction of public sentiment that is expected to set in. They seek only the class of papers which may be depended on to cater to their unhealthy warped or depraved instincts. Before the Congress that ended with the late presidential administration adjourned, there was an opportunity presented to uphold the nation's good name, by the prompt passage of the bill entitled "A bill to prohibit the transmission by mail or interstate commerce of any picture or description of any prize-fight or its accessories." The Commerce Committee of the house of Representatives (Aldrich, chairman), in its favorable report of the bill, properly said that it "simply protects the more advanced States which have forbidden pugilism as brutal and brutalizing, against having prize-fights brought into their borders in pictures and descriptions which are only a little less harmful than the degrading sport which they describe." May the simple enactment of this (re-introduced) bill, mark as well the healthy reaction, as an honest purpose to protect the honor of the country at a point where it has been so grievously assailed to its hurt!

KEEP YOUR WORD WITH THE CHILDREN.

—We cannot estimate too highly the importance of keeping faith with the children. When once that is destroyed, the corner-stone of our influence is taken away, and it will not be strange if the whole structure crumble around us, overwhelming us with trouble and unavailing sorrow.

It is related that the Earl of Chatham had promised that his son should be present at the demolition of a wall about his estate, but through accident, it was pulled down in his absence. His lordship felt the importance of his word being kept sacred, so he ordered the wall to be rebuilt, that his son might be present when it was again demolished, as he had promised. It was not that a child's whim might be humored, but that his faith in his father's word might be unshaken.

These little open eyes take sharp note of our actions from a very early age. You may sometimes get on the blind side of older people, but rarely of a little child. They go right through the flimsy disguises of sophristry and worldly politeness, and come down to bare plain facts.

A little child had been promised the next time grandpa came he should go home with him. The next time came, but the promise was not fulfilled, so the child reminded him of it. "You don't think grandpa would tell a lie?" asked the old man, sadly concerned.

"I don't know," answered the child, "what does grandpa call it?"

A mother promised a cake to her little boy when she returned home, but, being absent for several hours, she forgot it. The little boy had been watching long at the window for her, and his disappointment was great, but not so great as his amazement at his mother for breaking her word. "Forgot" was a word whose meaning he did not know. Mother went quickly out and bought the cake; but still the trouble lingered in his mind, and he was heard saying softly to himself, by way of comfort, "Mother only forgot." He could not bear to think she had told a lie. Have your children equal sensitiveness with regard to your truthfulness?

One almost trembles to hear the scores of promises which thoughtless mothers make, with no thought of ever fulfilling them. But children very soon learn to value them at what they are worth; and who can estimate the consequences to their souls of this early lesson in falsehood?—Selected.

MEETINGS for worship are intended for our spiritual profit. If we come away from them without a corresponding improvement of mind and heart, our attendance upon them has been a failure. We may have heard a great sermon, listened to fine music, gratified our curiosity and eased our consciences, but our souls have received no proper uplift and our lives become barren of gracious results. We may be able to talk about the drawing attraction of the hour but we have gained no rich, abiding experience and no impulsion in spiritual and practical directions.—The Presbyterian.

A Letter from Paris.

Oh, I have found the most interesting little old bouquiniste possible to imagine, with I stand along the banks of the Seine, not far from Notre Dame. His face is always beaming with smiles, and he dances up and down his long line of boxes as sprightly as if his hairs were not white and his figure bent. I find it quite impossible to pass without taking a glance, for he has such treasures of old books there, an always only I found some perfect beauties and too them without hesitating. He hunted quite awhile for some paper to wrap them in, and produced at last a newspaper, quite brown and stained, and spread it carefully on the stone wall, saying apologetically as he did so, "ce est pas sale, mademoiselle, c'est seulement un peu vieux, voyez" (it is not soiled, miss, it is only a little old, look) and he pointed to the date, 1848. "Cela ne fait rien" (that amount to nothing) I said, and added, that one saw very clearly his books were better cared for than any one else's there. At this he straightened himself up, making himself as tall as possible—he came about to my shoulder—said, with a knowing nod, "Oh, yes, the others are of a little different class." I left him a parently very happy in the pleasant consciousness that his books were just a little better than those of the other bouquinistes along the river. At that moment he was evidently not troubled with the thought of comparison between himself and those who had risen to the dignity of a store; it was very much better to be the bouquiniste on the Seine than to be among the poorer owners of a store. But I shall soon have to be going again to see what new treasures I have gathered. It is really quite fascinating—a pleasant afternoon, with the delightful breeze from the river, and the sunshine illuminating the beautiful cathedral on the other side, stand and look over an interesting collection of books.

But to-day was a fête day in Paris. I had not taken the trouble to find out what it is about, only I know it is something belonging to Lent, and the city seemed to have lost its wits, and its citizens partly running wild, as it was carnival time. I had occasion to go to the city (there were no lectures to-day), and crossing over the place "Palais Royale," to wait for an omnibus, I received a large shower bits of bright-colored paper in my face. I also saw that everybody was covered with the same and that the crowds rushing by were nearly all provided with large sacs full of tiny circular bits of paper, which they threw in each other's faces, or in those of harmless unarmed persons attending to their own affairs. I was forced to wait three quarters of an hour before I could get a seat, so I had nothing to do but wait the crowds. There were people in all sorts of costumes with ridiculous masques, dancing or cutting up all sorts of capers in the streets, and one poor dog I saw who did look so absurd and pathetically funny, with a baby's big bit net, running around. People were carry-little babies dressed up like clowns, and there were old women with masques, dressed like little children, and acting as though they had lost their wits. As I finally secured a place in the omnibus, the scene presented coming up the avenue and across the Place de l'Opera, was something curious. It was warm and the windows were open, so that before we had crossed the Place we were almost buried with paper flakes, for the crowd hurled in handfuls on every side. But the worst feature of it is they have rolls of paper, like a roll of narrow ribbon, which they hurl, and the affair, as it unwinds, is carried by the breeze until it catches on a tree, or window, or wire, and there it hangs, yards and yards in length, streaming in the breeze. Looking down the boulevards, they seemed to be hung with bright colored curtains, so dense were the ribbons together. I think it is most unhappy custom, and those miserable bags of paper will hang there in forlorn conditions for weeks and weeks, for they are so matted that even the rains cannot do much towards veering them away. On coming to the house, Alice assisted me in shaking from my clothing and hair, the quantity of bits of paper still clinging to me. I felt no desire to return back into town this evening, when the play will be at its height.

26th.—There was a very interesting lecture to-day at the College de France, upon "The Labor Question in the United States." The lecturer had evidently been recently in America. The topic discussed to-day was "Private Institutions of Charity," and especially in regard to what was done by private citizens to meliorate the condition of the laboring classes brown out of employment during the winter of 1893. The hall was greatly crowded, showing much interest in the subject. This is something which has struck me from the first, although I have not been in France long enough to form a judgment of much value, that the public entertained of us Americans by the two nationalities, French and German, is entirely different. I suppose that a part of this, at least, is due to political causes, but still more so the fact that French tastes, French manners and the French mind, is more in harmony with our own than that of the German people. The Germans are plodders and thinkers, but they seldom the first to realize the fruits of their own inventions or discoveries. As a general thing there is spread abroad among them a sentiment of—I scarcely know what to name it—pomp is much too strong—but weaken it and at is what I mean, against the French and the Americans. The feeling against the former is largely owing to political causes, but tends much farther than that. Though they are studying the language at seven years of age, and continue it for seven years; studying its structure and fine points in a way that we do not study anything in America, they never catch a point where they grasp its real fitness to its spirit, their very knowledge of its form prevents that.

Remember, I speak in a general way and not of particular individuals. But they are at it blame for this. The structure of their minds prevents them from doing justice to the French mind. It is a subject that I often discussed with the French Professor at Göttingen, was amusing to him, with all the German's confessed dislike of the nation, that his lectures continued to draw such crowds. He did not think that in any but a German town of only twenty thousand inhabitants, a course of lectures in a foreign language would draw such a number of people together.

The Americans as a rule are classed as a people like the French, superficial and devoted to pleasure, without any real culture. There is, no doubt, only too much truth in this, but in realizing our lack of solid culture, they fail to grasp the worth of our ingenuity, our readiness to grasp ideas on all sides, and to turn to profit what we have thus gathered. Germany is at present struggling between the old world and the new. She is of a turn that makes her cling desperately to the old, and America is the place from which the new ideas come. Above all, America is responsible for the spread of "Woman's Rights," and no self-respecting German man can ever forgive her for that. I feel constantly called upon to defend our good points, and to call people to reason. I can give no idea of how many times I heard the remark, "The Americans do so and so," simply because the individual who spoke had seen one American with a particular habit. I came to be quite dreading in this line and reached the point where at last I had taught those with whom I came in contact to avoid this manner of thoughtless speaking. An instance to the point—the German's pay the greatest possible amount of attention to the graves of deceased relatives—keeping them personally in perfect order, and as they celebrate always the birth-day of each member of the family while living, so they continue the custom after they are gone, and one sees the graves on the anniversary of the birth of the occupant, decorated with flowers; this is often kept up ten, or even twenty years after the death of the member of a family. No one who has seen something of the beautiful home life of the Germans, can help realizing in this custom something very touching and admirable. I had one day expressed to a friend with whom I visited the grave of her father, who had been dead a number of years, my appreciation of the beauty of the care for the graves, which I noticed among the Germans, but I expressed at the same time my personal feelings in relation to the matter, and that for me there was no connection between the resting place of the body and the reality of what I had loved on earth. I also explained that part of this feeling was due to the teachings I had received as a child, for the sect to which my parents belonged did not permit the use of tombstones, or any decoration of the graves of any kind.

It was several months afterwards, when in company one day I heard this same person announce with emphasis, "The Americans take no care whatever of their graveyards, and have no monuments or decorations of any kind." I was indeed surprised, and immediately begged of the company not to attribute to my country all my own personal peculiarities, nor those of the sect to which I belonged, and that as a matter of fact nothing could be more lavish than the display made in America on such occasions, although it was essentially different in character from that in Germany. I mention this to show how easy it is to give wrong impressions, and how one needs to be careful of what one says.

I have two different routes in going from here to the University. The one which I prefer passes many of the most beautiful buildings in the city. From the top of the omnibus one has a very fine view. There is a large square that one crosses just before coming in front of Notre Dame. I am always interested in passing there, because the crowds of people watching are so full that every day by the way. Of course the road which consists of broad and coffee, is not given to every one that comes; the applicant must have a ticket certifying that he or she is really needy. I do not know the regulations, but I like to watch the old woman go up with their cups, each taking their turn, and to see them pass on, looking very contented with the material comforts they possess. The men and women are served separately, and I do not see any that do not seem reasonably in good spirit.

Every time I pass Notre Dame, or indeed any other Gothic structure, I am struck with the feature common to them all, of the water spouts ending in grotesque dragons, dwarfs, etc., out of whose hideous, gaping mouths the water pours in time of rain. Notre Dame simply swarms with them on every side, and they produce a very curious effect.

This line, after passing Notre Dame, crosses the river and terminates at the Jardin des Plantes. This is one of the interesting features of Paris, for here are accumulated the museums of natural history, the zoological and botanical gardens. The museum of objects of natural history is the richest of its kind in the world, and probably the best organized. The Jardin des Plantes, which was in the beginning simply a botanical garden, was founded in 1655, but it is from 1732, when it was given over into the hands of the great Buffon, that its real history begins.

A large number of the courses in natural history are given here, and are all open and free to the public. I am constantly impressed with the generosity of the French in this respect, everything seems to be done on such a large scale, and every possible opportunity given to the public to improve their knowledge if they choose. FOR "THE FRIEND."

Grammatical Use of Words.

[Our well-known Friend, Joseph J. Hopkins, has sent to us the remarks which follow on the grammatical use of the plain language of Thee and Thou to a single person. The wide-spread use of Thee in the nominative case, we regard as a curious example of the force of habit and of the manner in which certain forms of speech maintain their hold in the community. This use of the word Thee is not peculiar to Friends, but in parts of England, where the singular pronoun is commonly used, we find the same custom. Therefore we do not believe that its use is always due to a desire to avoid the cross. Yet the grammatical use of words is desirable in itself, and among a people so generally educated as our members are, a conformity with the rules of grammar may reasonably be required.—E. J.]

Why is it that members of our religious Society, who appear in some respects to be well concerned in regard to the requirements of our holy religion, should yet ignore, or slight and so mar or spoil the beauty of the pure language of the Truth, and of the Scriptures, by substituting thee instead of thou.

I am often pained at my very heart, at hearing and seeing our plain-looking members, and those, too, filling, or occupying prominent stations in society, and in the world, who in conversation or writing will put the pronoun thee where it should be thou, and thus sadly lower the high and holy standard our early Friends in the Truth were raised up by power from on high to uphold and promulgate, in the face of, and before a world lying in wickedness. And many had to suffer deeply for this very thing, of using the plain Scripture language correctly, which many amongst us can so easily slight.

Again I ask, Why is it? Is it not because of the cross? Shall we not remember what the Lord said, "He that denieth me before men, shall be denied before my Father and the Holy Angels."

Many years ago, when our religious Society stood on a higher plane, perhaps, than at the present day, some faithful Friends of Ohio had to go into committee to plead for some testimony that we, as a religious Society, have committed to us, and, in granting the petition of the court, the judge delivered this strong testimony to them, viz: "You come here with your broad brims, and your thys and your thous, and we cannot withstand you." This I had from Benjamin W. Ladd, himself one of the committee. So that we may draw from this objective lesson the force of the necessity of faithfulness in the entire upholding of all the precious testimonies handed down to us of the present time from those sons of the morning of a brighter day. For we may lop off the branches of a flourishing tree, one after another, until it shall have no branch upon it of a fruit-bearing nature, to tell by its productiveness, what manner of tree it was.

When a lad, the writer was conveying a couple of faithful Friends from Baltimore to the neighborhood of Gunpowder, a small meeting within the limits of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. It was a period when the blessed Truth was very precious in my sight, and the Spirit of the dear Redeemer was very near in the heart, wooing and drawing into the sacred enclosure, saying, "This is the way, walk thou in it," and letting me know that I must take up the cross and use the plain language thee and thou correctly as I found it in the Scriptures.

The simple pronoun thee, I had been taught when a child, and used it; but to turn now and use thou instead seemed more than my poor weak faith was equal to. When to my surprise the two ministering Friends began to speak of the very matter that was uppermost in my mind, though at the time we were entire strangers, and I had said but few words to them. They commenced by saying what a pity it was that the beautiful Scripture language of thee and thou should be so miserably abused and mutilated, as was the case in our religious Society, such as putting thee where it should be thou. I having been deceived by the enemy of souls up to that time, thinking that none but the pure in heart should use that truly dignified language. They still going on in conversation upon the same subject, and the writer in deep attention listening to every word uttered. While they went on to tell of a visit they made to a seminary of learning, where the principal of the school was a member of Society; and the first words he used were, "How is thee?" The Friend who told it said that it almost knocked him down, coming as it did from a teacher of things true and right.

The writer then asked if they thought that it would do for any one to use that pure language. They did not see why all should not use it, as it was the language of the Bible, also the same that was spoken by our blessed Lord, and the same that was used to Adam, and so by the wisest and best of men down to the present time. And that it was according to the rules of grammar. That we should all wish to use a form of speech grammatically correct, and more than that, it was beautiful and harmonious. I had no further objection to make, but was dumb with silence, musing upon the salutary lesson of instruction taught me by those two ministering spirits, my companions. A lesson, I trust, never to be forgotten.

FOR "THE FRIEND'S"
MY SUNSET PRAYER.

"Oh, Lord, I'm weak and long for rest,
I'm facing now the setting sun;
O, let no ill my peace molest;

My work below is nearly done.
My journey's end I ain't would see,
And all my dear ones gathered there.
Have mercy, O, my God on me,
And save my soul from blank despair.

"For I am feeble, old and lone,
Dear sons have passed within the veil,
Loved ones I leaned on, all are gone.
O, Christ, my hope! Thou wilt not fail.
No silver, gold, or worldly pelf,
Can aught avail to shield or save—
My only hope is from thyself,
The treasures of thy grace I crave.

"Hide not thy face from me, I pray,
O, fill my heart, and there abide;
Support me, or I sink away,
O, dwell with me through evenside,
Long hast thou promised me to be,
And looked for fruitage ripe and fair,
Alas! that I should yield no more,
With all thy faithful, tender care.

"No work nor merit can I plead—
I'm weary, worn, heart sick and sore,
O, Father help me in my need;
Renew my strength, revive, restore;
And lead me from this home so fair,
Without regret or silent grief;
Another field for me prepare,
To gather out a goodly sheaf.

"Now all I have is wholly thine,
My life anew I consecrate,
Be thou my solace. Love divine,
My strength and joy, the while I wait;
My every want do thou supply,
And make thy gifts in me abound,
The hungry soul to satisfy,
And crumbs of comfort scatter round."

Thus having prayed, with quickened ear,
I listened for some message clear;
Some word the Spirit might apply,
My troubled heart to pacify.
When lo, a voice came, soothing, sweet,
My own responsive soul to greet.
In tones melodious and low,
It said within, in rhythm slow,

"All thou hast asked is freely given,
And more awaits thee soon, in Heaven.
Fear not, arise, and onward press,
A few years more to help and bless.
When all earth's lessons thou hast learned,
And peace and power through conflict earned,
Then wait serene thy sunset hour,
In tranquil joy—no cloud shall lower—"

"And listen for the glad 'Well done!'
Or, 'Come up higher; faithful one!
When all earth's varied scenes forsaken,
In Heaven's morning dawn thou hast waken.
What holy rapture, sweet repose
Will supersede thy worldly woes.
The joy awaiting thee is more Than all thy heart has known before."

"Then yield thy breath without a sigh,
The Lord is there and heaven nigh;
Kind friends will guard thy mortal rest,
Kind angels guide thee homeward, blest,
Then hallowed be thy soft repose,
Where living water gently flows,
How blessed then thy perfect rest,
Till called to do thy Lord's behest.

"Thy treasures here so freely given,
Are multiplied for thee in heaven;
True riches there, a hundred fold
Return for all in finest gold,
The love thou craves laid up in store,
With truth and good, find evermore.
O then, with Christ and heaven allied,
Thou shalt be ever satisfied."

"In blooming youth, with agile feet,
Thou'lt walk e'er the golden street,
Will join the seraph choir and sing
High praises to thy risen King.
Review the paths on earth thou trod,
Recount thy mercies, bless thy God;
On loving missions glad thou'lt go,
In loving service, as below."

Arabian Nights' Fancies and Letter-day Fack

THE FAIRY GRAVITATION.

Far back in the hills west of Mauch Chunk Pa., lie great beds of coal. They were mad under the sea long ages ago, raised up, roofed over by the Allegheny Mountains, and kept waiting as great reservoirs of power for the use of man.

But how can these mountains be gotten to the distant cities by the sea? Faith in wbs power can say at least to the ashes of these mountains, "Be thou removed far hence an east into the sea?" It is easy.

Along the winding sides of the mountain have been laid two rails like steel ribbons for a dozer miles, from the coal beds to water an railroad transportation. Put a half-dozen loads cars on the track, and with one man at the brake, lest gravitation should prove too willful a helper, away they go through the springtime freshness or the autumn glory, spinning an singing down to the point of universal distribution.

On one occasion the brake for some reason would not work. The cars just flew like an arrow. The man's hair stood up from fright and the wind. Coming to a curve the cars kept straight on, ran down a bank, dashed right into the end of a house, and spilled their whole load in the cellar. Probably no man ever laid in winter's supply of coal so quickly or so undressably.

But how do we get the cars back? It is pleasant sliding down hill on a rail, but who pulls the sled back? Gravitation. It is just as willing to work both ways as one way.

Think of a great letter X a dozen miles long. Lay it down on the side against three or four rough hills. Bend the X till it will fit the curves and precipices of these hills. That is the double track. Now when loaded cars have come down one bar of the X by gravity, draw them up by a sharp incline to the upper end of the other bar, and away they go by gravity to the other end. Draw them up one more incline, and they are ready to take a new load, and buzz down to the bottom again.

I have been riding round the glorious mountain sides in a horseless, steamless, electricity carriage, and been delighted to find hundred of tons of coal shooting over my head at the crossing of the X, and both cars were drawn in opposite directions by the same force of gravity in the heart of the earth.

MORE MOON HELP.

At Foo-Chow, China, there is a stone bridge more than a mile long, uniting the two parts of the city. It is not constructed with arches but piers are built up from the bottom of the river, and great granite stringers are laid horizontally from pier to pier. I measured some of these great stone stringers, and found that to be three feet square and forty-five feet long. They weigh over eighty tons each.

How could they be lifted, handled, and put in place on slender piers over the water? None of our modern derricks could swing the mighty mass. How was it done? There was no Hercules to perform the mighty labor, nor Amphion to lure them to their place with the music of his golden lyre.

Tradition says that the Chinese, being astute stonemasons, got the moon to do the work. It was certainly very shrewd if they did. Why not use the moon for more than a lantern? Is it not a part of the "all things" over which man has made to have dominion?

Well, the Chinese engineers brought the great granite blocks to the bridge site on floats, and when the tide lifted the floats and stones they locked up the stones on the piers, and let the boats sink with the outgoing tide. Then they locked up the stones on the floats again, and as the moon lifted the tides once more they lifted the stones farther toward their place, until it length the work was done for each set of tones.—Bishop Warren.

THE CURSE OF AUSTRIAN MILITARISM.—In Austria, every male subject of the Emperor, when he reaches his twentieth birthday, must report himself for service. In Third or Fourth month of every year, notices are posted up in each parish, throughout the Dual Monarchy, tating in which neighboring town the "Asseuerungs Commission" will shortly sit. These Commissions are composed of regular officers and army doctors—generally a board of about twenty altogether—who choose the recruits. All must come to the board; blindness or lameness affords no reason for absence. Cases have been reported where friends have carried the twenty-years-old subject of his majesty on a stretcher before the Commission. When rejected as unfit, by three consecutive Commissions, the applicant is considered free, though subject to a yearly tax, fixed according to his social standing. Statistics show a steady increase yearly of the percentage of rejections as physically unfit, particularly of the young men from the big towns. The causes are not difficult to seek: excessive hours of labor, low wages, insufficient nourishment, and the horrid rural mortality so rampant in the large cities in Austria. It is stated that in the manufacturing town of Reichenberg, in Northern Bohemia, in Fourth Month last, only twenty-six per cent of the recruits summoned were considered fit for service! Every man serves under the colors three complete years, without exception. When he remains seven years in the Reserve, he passes after this period into the militia for two years. When these twelve years have lapsed, the soldier is free from duty in the event of war, the Government having no longer claim upon him.

Barrack life in Austria presents not many pleasant features. The rank and file receive each a sixpence every fifth day; five round cakes of black bread, weighing two pounds each, every sixth-day; and eight small packets of dreadfully-smelling Government tobacco during the course of the month. Breakfast at six A. M., means a pint of coffee, and dinner at twelve noon a quarter-pound of the inevitable oiled beef, with about the same quantity of vegetables. There is no tea or supper allowed, except what the soldier can enjoy from his surplus portions of black bread. And the statement often made is true, that without extra monetary aid, the greater part of Austria's Atkinsons could not pull through the three years. Help comes from parents and friends, and servant girls are equally important factors in the matter. But in the country parts of Galicia, Bohemia and Moravia there exists a speciality peculiar to Austria—I mean peasants so poverty-stricken, helpless, and uneducated as to be termed by the Socialists "dead material." They fill the ranks in large numbers, and for the first time in their lives enjoy butcher's meat daily. Many surreptitiously sell their packets of tobacco, and thereby gather together about fifty shillings at the expiry of their terms of service. These Slovaks and Croats quit the ranks to become beasts of burden again with much reluctance, and alone form the exception to a general rule.—The Spectator.

FOR "THE FRIEND."
Are We Growing?

N. L. BARKER.

The farmer who would be successful in his business must study those various conditions which favor the growth and maturing of his products, and the chances of success are in favor of him who endeavors to put to the best practical use his own and the experience of others in the same line. What is true of the farmer, is true throughout the whole business world. But if the rule holds good in the business world, it is equally applicable in every field of human endeavor.

The elements of growth and decay, or in other words the conditions which lead to success or failure, must be sought out and their morale applied.

It becomes, then, one of the most momentous questions which can claim our attention. Are our own powers, physical, mental and spiritual, growing stronger, as nature intended, and if not, why? Is the one talent; are the three talents or five talents which have been entrusted to us lying idle, or, are we cultivating them to our own and to the Master's use? Along with the talent has been given the means of multiplying it. The conditions of growth are within our grasp, and the first duty which we owe to ourselves and to the world, is to employ those conditions in augmenting our powers, or at least to prevent an unnatural decay.

Nature has been compared to an open picture book, in which we have scarcely learned to read. The pictures allure us, yet they are but the beautiful expression of problems which all but frighten us with their profound import. But because we are children in nature's school, delighting to feast our eyes upon the beauty of the picture, rather than delve deep beneath the surface touches of form and color, in order to learn the story which they tell, is no reason why we should not endeavor to grow to manhood.

What may be the design of our Creator in imbedding deep in the mysterious twinkling of the stars, in the fossils of the past, and in the beauty and symmetry of the myriads of objects about us, the grand principles governing our own lives, growth and destiny?

We are lovers of the beautiful and the wonderful, and it is a beautiful thought, at least, that all that is beautiful and sublime in nature, is but a standing and tangible appeal to us to delve deep into her hidden mysteries. It implies effort—work—but in such lies not only the glory of manhood, but the making of manhood. Nature teaches that individual effort is the first essential to growth, and the only ladder which leads to success. Carlyle has said that "All work is Divine; work, broad as the earth, has its summit in heaven."

While nature rewards the lawful exercise of power, with increased capacity, so it punishes the abuse or abuse of inherent energies. Indolence or inactivity, whether it be physical or mental, is punished morally by discontent with all its attendant evils, and organically by physical degeneration. It has been said that parasites are the paupers of nature, gaining the two ends of their lives, food and shelter, without relying upon their own resources. At first thought we might suppose that in the great struggle for existence, those forms of life which rivied at the expense of others, because they could be safer from their enemies, eat and drink more easily, and live more leisurely, had gained a decided point over their hosts, who honestly depend on their own resources for gaining a livelihood. But nature does not encourage any such cheating or robbery; on the contrary she argues that the disuse of a function is a confession that it is not needed, and accordingly takes it away. The organism, then, instead of being allowed to ascend in the scale of life, must step down a notch for every breach of the law of development by use. The hermit crab furnishes an example in illustration.

The surest clue which shows to the naturalist the place in nature allotted to certain forms of life, is their early embryonic condition. So in the case of the hermit crab the fact is revealed that it was originally intended to occupy a high place in the kingdom of crustacea. But at some point in its history, in order the better to protect itself from its natural enemies and the rude waves which dashed it from rock to rock, it sought shelter in the cast-off shell of some mollusk. This trait being transmitted from generation to generation, it lost the necessity for its natural coat of mail and swimming appendages, which one by one were lost or rendered wholly useless. Thus it has lost its courage and independence of life, and continually drifts down toward the lower kingdom of mollusca, one of whose shells it appropriated. "I will take from him even that which he hath, and give unto him which hath ten talents," is but the Divine expression of a natural law.

Nature does not stop with merely punishing the offender; on the contrary, she makes ample compensation to the injured party. While the weaker individuals succumb to the influence of parasitism, the stronger survive, and thus through the survival and reproduction of the fittest the race is lifted up to a higher plane of existence, rare is lifted up to a higher plane of existence, rare is lifted up to a higher plane of existence, rare is lifted up to a higher plane of existence.

Physical or physiological backsliding finds its parallel in the intellectual sphere, as also in the Christian's life; and in endeavoring to solve the question whether or not we are growing, we should remember that the law of development by use, as opposed to the law of degeneration, becomes more rigid in its demands and more decided in inflicting the penalty for disobeying, as we trace its course through the intellectual and spiritual spheres, according as they are higher in the scale than matter. The moral, deduced from nature, and which is applicable to every phase of human life and society is to steer straight in the path which the Creator has laid down.

Parasitism, in its worst forms, is preying upon the vitals of human society. While public opinion may assign so much of the crime and misery in our midst to intemperance, pride, sensuality, or the morbid love of money, we may find that in these special weaknesses we are only reaping the fruits of a false education or discipline of our powers. Idleness, whether it is of the muscles or the brain, feels honored if it can wear the badge of honest toil. There are men who, bearing the name of Christians, hide their deeds of shame beneath the church walls, forgetting that the crumbling ruins will sometime reveal their hiding places.

Or again, there is another class of men, who perhaps are accounted industrious, moral and upright, yet who seeking for an easy path of duty and looking to the instrument, instead of the Power which should lie back of it, cast their spiritual reliance upon a human or priestly mediator which is utterly unable to save them. It is without a parallel in nature, for where a parasite lights upon a means of support, it is always sufficient to sustain it.

As a revision of creed, in itself, can not give a newness of heart, neither is legislation the natural or most effective means of lifting us out of the evils of society. Civil law is but a confession of weakness. It may impose its penalties, but it can not cure the propensity. While its enforcement may act as a restraint, it is like the opiate which eases the painful effects, and not as the specific, directed against the cause of the disease.

(To be concluded.)

Evil Tendencies of Boxing and Priz-Fighting.

The following article was sent to the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, about four years ago, and may have had its influence, along with similar righteous concerns of faithful men, in causing the entire suppression by this newspaper, of the details of the recent brutal contest in this country, so discreditable to our nation.—W. E.

The growth and development of a taste for pugilistic performances, as manifested in the public displays and exhibitions of that character in the theatres, and also in the Academy of Music, in Philadelphia, have been a source of much concern to the writer, believing, as he undoubtedly does, that such exhibitions must result in brutalizing the minds and feelings of our citizens who attend them, and will foster a demand for prize fights, which are akin to the gladiatorial shows of ancient Rome in their barbarity and utterly debasing tendency, and also in their entire inconsistency with the benign principles of Christianity.

One of the triumphs of Christianity is assumed to be that it tends to do away with these blood-thirsty shows, and substitutes therefor amusements of a more elevating character, and more in harmony with what should be the aspirations of a being originally created a "little lower than the angels, and crowned with glory and honor."

But if we are to tolerate these brutal shows, which are not only an unmixt evil in themselves, but create an appetite for something still more bloody, what advance have we made on our heathen ancestors? For it will be found, on referring to the disgustingly detailed reports given in the columns of the public press, that on more than one occasion of late years prize fights have resulted in the death of one of the combatants, and even in the case of what are called trials of skill, judging from the source of information above alluded to, serious bodily injury is likely to be inflicted on the parties engaged. And what must be the effect on the minds of our youth when they are told in the printed accounts of such trials of skill that this or that combatant had the credit of drawing the "first blood," and also of giving the "only knock-down blow?" Unless some check can be put upon the apparently increasing disposition thus to pander to the low, degrading and sensual appetites of human nature, it may result in a general corruption of the social mass, and we know from the teachings of history that when such a condition of national depravity is arrived it is followed, it may be slowly, but nevertheless surely, by national degradation or extinction. In a conversation lately had with the respected Director of Public Safety, Abraham M. Beidler, of Philadelphia, he said, in substance, that there probably never has been a time in its history when there were more arrests of juvenile offenders for crimes of a high order such as burglary, than during the last few months, and he attributed this state of things partly to the amusements that are placed within easy reach of the young. The ensnaring character of these amusements becomes more widespread by the exciting and detailed accounts and advertisements of them given in the public press. It is well to bear in mind that the prosperity and even the existence, of our nation and the popular form of government under which we live, eminently depend on the virtue and morality of our citizens; and that, under the gracious ordering of our Almighty Ruler and Caretaker, we may, by faithful occupancy of the high position assigned us among the nations of the earth, either become a blessing and a means of diffusing spiritual and moral light to the peoples of the Old World, or, if we prove ourselves unworthy of this high trust, and by our downward and sensual course frustrate the Divine plan, we may be blotted out from the face of the earth. "Righteousness exalteth a nation, but sin is a reproach to any people" (Prov. xiv: 34.)

Natural History, Science, etc.

Animals in Sickness.—Ducks and cawaries peck sick and ailing birds to death, and pigs are born bullies, the smallest of the litter—the "petmet," as it is called in East Anglia—being invariably bitten, and deprived of its food. Carnivorous animals rarely injure a sick or wounded member of their tribe, though wolves, when pressed by hunger, devour the weakest, and jackals will at once assemble and tear to pieces a wounded member of the pack. But I lately heard a curious instance of the instinct to destroy the injured among the larger cats. Some rough ground in Oudh was being driven by beaters, when a cheetah appeared before one of the guns and was badly wounded. Another cheetah appeared immediately after, and came up to the first, which it seemed to urge to follow it. The wounded cheetah was unable to move, and the second, on discovering this, sprang on it, caught it by the throat and killed it, and was shot as it bounded away after this deliberate murder. Monkeys, with some notable exceptions, are some degrees worse than savage men in their treatment of the sick. On the new Juma Canal, at Delhi, monkeys swarm in the trees upon the banks, and treat their sick comrades in true monkey fashion. The colony by the canal being overcrowded, and, as a consequence, unhealthy, dil, and probably does still, suffer from various unpleasant diseases. When one monkey is so obviously unwell as to offend the feelings of the rest, a few of the larger monkeys watch it, and taking a favorable opportunity, knock it into the canal. If it is not drowned at once, the sick monkey is pitched in again after it regains the trees, and either drowned, or forced to keep aloof from the flock.

At the Zoological Gardens the monkeys torment a sick one without mercy; and unless it is at once removed from the cage, it has little chance of recovery. The small monkeys bite and pinch it, the larger ones swing it round by the tail, and when quite exhausted or dead, as many monkeys as can find room sit on its body.

The writer was informed that some years ago at a hawk party on Salisbury Plain, a falcon was flown at a carrion-crow, which it struck after a long flight, and the two birds came down like a parachute to the ground. The party galloped up, and were about to dismount to take up the falcon, when the mate of the crow suddenly descended from a great height, with such velocity that the wings made a whizzing sound like that of a falling stone, and dashed on to the falcon. The force of the blow struck the hawk from its quarry, which was uninjured by the grapple in the air, and both crows flew of unhurt into a copse near. In this case the crow clearly understood the cause of the danger, and the possibility of a rescue when the falcon was on the ground and least able to act on the defensive.

The Chemical Make-up of a Man.—Many of us will be familiar with the arrays of bottle occasionally displayed in museums, representing the various elements and their proportions of which the human body is composed. It is now many years since Professor Huxley compiled the table upon which these displays have been based. Just lately the Paris Academy of Sciences has published a new determination, giving the same values for a man weighing eleven and a half stone (one hundred and sixty-one pounds). It may be noted that, while Huxley allowed three per cent. for the other than the four chief "organic elements," the new table gives them less than two and one-quarter per cent. For out of the one hundred and sixty-one pounds we have assigned as follows: "Oxygen, one hundred and eleven and one-half pounds; hydrogen, twenty-one and one-half pounds; carbon, twenty-one pounds; nitrogen, three and one-half pounds. Besides these, only the calcium (two pounds), and phosphorus (one and one-quarter pounds), which, with oxygen, go to form the mineral part of the bones, and the sodium and the chlorine (some two ounces each), which are chiefly combined as salt, are present in easily appreciable quantities. Indeed, the sulphur, iron, potassium, magnesium and silicon, which are the other elements capable of easy estimation, only add up to six hundred and twenty-three grains, or less than one ounce and a half. Of iron, even, there is only one hundred grains. That must have been an elegantly slender ring which the loving wife had fabricated from the iron obtained from her husband's blood on an occasion when the apothecary had bled him heavily. Perhaps the fabrication was not entirely confined to the iron in the blood.—London Friend.

Java for Snakes.—Some parts of this island have at least ten poisonous species. The Illustrated Family Newspaper gives an account of the Imho Sugar Estate, of 12,000 acres, on which eight deaths have occurred in four months. Twelve miles off is a ruined city, Ohom, a wilderness of deserted temples, exquisitely carved. From arched passages under these are hundreds of windowless chambers, haunted by quantities of snakes. An English naval officer who was collecting reptiles was attacked a few years ago by a python fifteen feet long. Seeing a yellow mass in the recesses of a chamber, he thought essly poked it. Instantly the mass flung itself at him, its fangs were buried in his shoulder, and its coils had him as a vice. The lad with him fortunately broke its neck, but a lash of his tail broke his leg, and the two lay helpless until discovered two hours later. The houlder was so crushed that the arm remained useless, but both recovered. The account says that in Batavia Museum is the skin of a python, which, when alive, must have been fifty feet long.—London Friend.

Playful Fishes.—The N. Y. Sun says: "It seems that not many persons are aware that the delicate whitebait, which are considered such delicacies in England, are natives of the waters scabulous, and that at certain seasons they are found in the enclosed waters about New York. They are the fry of the ale-wife, and during the latter part of the summer they are to be found in the harbors and inlets and rivers connected with it in enormous numbers. They ravel about in schools, and are apparently as playful as kittens. If you drift down upon a boat of this little fish they will let you approach until you can almost touch them, but if you make a single movement every little tail goes p with a flash and they disappear.

"An idler, watching a school of whitebait on the Shrewsbury River one day last summer, saw them cutting up some amusing capers. A little stick had drifted into the swarm of delicate striped fishes. Presently one little whitebait darted out of the water and sprang clear over the stick. Then another went over it. Others followed, leaping from the same side, and then another lot of them began leaping over the stick from the other side. Pretty soon he air in the neighborhood of the stick was live with the fishes, some leaping over it in one direction and some in another, and the sunlight was caught and reflected from their silvery sides and from the broken water that they brewed up as they played, it was sent forth in brilliant prismatic colors. The watcher drifted slowly nearer, and the play was going on more riotous than ever, just under his eyes and not two feet away, when he incautiously moved his cad. There was one wild flash and then the same ended, and a moment later there was nothing left of the display except the little stick."

THE THIRTY-FOURTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE EXECUTIVE COMMITTEE OF "FRIENDS' FREEDMAN'S ASSOCIATION," OF PHILADELPHIA.

The last Annual Meeting, as will be remembered, instructed us to place the Christiansburg Institute under the care of Booker T. Washington, to encourage theretofore extended teaching of the Industrial Arts, and to expend for all purposes of the Institute during the school year, ending next month, the sum of two thousand dollars.

In fulfillment of these instructions, Booker T. Washington appointed Charles L. Marshall, Superintendent of the Institute; John J. Goldwire, teacher of carpentry, wheelwright work and blacksmithing; and Anna L. Patterson, teacher of sewing; Phebe T. Grimes, of cooking, and others, whose names have been previously reported by us, to teach those things so learned from blackboards and books.

A first class sewing machine with its outfit as been secured, and a modest blacksmith and wheelwright shop have been nicely equipped. In aid of these undertakings certain Friends have given specific sums of cash; C. C. Knight $500, bars of iron and steel; Powell & Maddock, certain valuable wheelwright tools, and the Biddle Hardware Company, some blacksmith tools, and in addition some farming implements.

The equipment includes an excellent iron forge and a hub boxer.

Up to this time our boys and girls have produced from this little plant the following output:

From carpenter, wheelwright and blacksmith shops: light buggy; 5 bedsteads; 3 wash-stands; 3 towel-racks; 4 tables; center table; 2 book cases; kitchen utensil case; ironing board; lap board for sewing room; black board; tool rack; vice bench; drafting table; push cart, frame and body; coal house; flooring in blacksmith shop; 4 steel hammers; 6 iron work shoes of different patterns; 15 iron lap links of different sizes; 3 iron rings; 8 iron staples; 8 wrench; 1 key wrench.

From sewing department: 5 bed tickings; 10 pillow tickings; 7 comfortable; 10 sheets; 10 pillow cases; fancy quilt; 7 towels; 6 napkins; 4 wool dresses; 2 cotton dresses; 4 night dresses; 5 night dresses; 4 work aprons; 5 work aprons for girls; 2 pairs sleeves for boys; 2 pairs sleeves for girls; 4 handkerchiefs; pair drawers; undersuit for women; pair crochet slippers.

From the cooking school: a procession of articles which have daily become "Though lost to sight to memory dear."

These handicrafts and the study of books have divided the school hours about in proportion of three to four, and in like proportion has the time been divided between hammers, planes and other tools, and spelling books, grammars, readers, arithmetics and the like.

Your Committee would be glad if the whole of one teacher's time could be given to the manual arts and the carpenter, wheelwright and blacksmith shops be kept open all day long.

Could this be so, there is reason to believe that numbers of well grown youths, desirous above all else of acquiring these trades, would from time to time offer themselves as apprentice journeymen without pay, and thus, at little cost, would such a supply of labor be kept up as would give the departments some paying business, and make them self-sustaining or perhaps profitable.

This arrangement would require an additional teacher in the literary department, at a salary of about two hundred dollars.

The literary work of the Institute has been maintained on the lines heretofore reported. Two members of our Committee, who recently passed twenty-four hours at the school, were gratified to observe the trend of such instruction to be increasing towards the solid, substantial and necessary.

A large public meeting at Twelfth Street Meeting-house on the twenty-ninth ult., was instructively and eloquently addressed by Booker T. Washington, on behalf of the Christiansburg work, which has his earnest sympathy and active expectant oversight.

Certain specimens of the handiwork of our pupils, which have been prepared for exhibition to the Association, and which are now presented for your inspection, were on the sixth instant, shown to a gathering of about one hundred and twenty-five of the parents and adult friends of the pupils, and elicited their lively and enthusiastic interest, and will doubtless produce the same sentiments in yourselves.

The County Superintendent of schools for Montgomery and Pulaski counties, together with the school teachers of those counties, have forwarded to the State Superintendent of Education a request that a colored normal school be conducted at Christiansburg during the coming summer. In submitting to the Association these many evidences of the importance of its work at Christiansburg, we earnestly recommended that the work be continued, and with renewed zeal.

The details of receipt and expenditure are given in the accompanying Treasurer's report: Contributions amounting to $1,163.40 have been received for this year's work, to maintain which $329.00 have already been advanced from the capital of the Association.

Of the $2,000 appropriated to Christiansburg for the current school year, about $500 remains to be paid. All of this is needed promptly.

The Treasurer of the Association is David G. Alsop, Provident Life and Trust Building, 409 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

By order of,
The Executive Committee,
Richard Wood, Chairman.

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH, 1897.

We have reason to believe that, on the part of some of our younger Friends, there is a failure to properly understand and appreciate the motives of their elder brethren and sisters, which prompt the concern they feel and the advice they give to those over whom they watch with loving interest.

From the first establishment of Meetings for Discipline, they have been regarded as essentially religious meetings, in which the business was to be transacted not by human wisdom or influences, but under the government of the Spirit of Christ. George Fox advised Friends to "hold all their meetings in the power of God." The advices contained in our Book of Discipline are in harmony with this, as is shown by the following extracts therefrom:

"The love, power and peaceable spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ being the alone true authority of all our meetings, it is the fervent concern of this meeting that they may be held under the sense and influence of that holy union."

"In some places there may have been a want of care rightly to distinguish and seasonably to bring into action the talents bestowed upon some in the early stage of life. But we believe that many who were evidently under the forming hand, have been suddenly laid hold of, and introduced into service before that preparation of heart hath been sufficiently experienced which leads to a reliance upon Divine direction and renews from a confidence in the natural understanding."

When George Fox was moved to set up Meetings for Discipline in the Church, he advised that the members of them should be faithful men and women. In the early days none were expected to attend them until they had been relaxed, and the way was opened for all of the young to come, in hopes that they might prove schools of instruction. But, as Joseph Pike states, some of these, not growing in the Truth, have become troublesome to the Church. That deeply experienced Christian says that, when about twenty years of age, he was invited to become a member of the Men's Meeting at Cork—an offer which he accepted, though feeling very unworthy, in hopes of being benefited thereby. He adds that he sat among them for some years before he presumed to speak much to what came before them. " Yet I joined in, heart and soul, with those who were exercised for the Truth." If the same spirit prevailed among all our young people, they would be preserved in a humble, teachable state; would recognize the authority which the Head of the Church clothes those of his servants whom He has appointed to watch over the flock, and grow in usefulness in their several services in the Church. For it is no man's learning nor artificial acquirements, it is no man's riches nor greatness in the world, it is no man's eloquence nor natural wisdom, that makes him fit for government in the Church of Christ. All his endowments must be seasoned with the heavenly salt, his spirit be subjected, and his gifts pass through the fire of God's altar. On the Spirit of Christ rests the real authority of our Meetings for Discipline. Hence it is evident that the remarks made therein by those who are living in obedience to that Spirit ought to have more influence, and will have, with judicious persons, than the speeches of those whose senses are not yet exercised to discern between good and evil—and this is the case whether they be young in years or among the aged.

Holding these views, it is natural and right that those Friends on whom the burthens of the Church mainly rest should watch over its proceedings with solicitude, as they who must give an account of their stewardship, and should be grieved when either young or old act in such a way as to evidence that they are not moving in the obedience of Christ.

It is a grievous mistake for the young and inexperienced to suppose that this godly concern indicates any want of sympathy with their younger members. On the contrary, the fathers and mothers in the Church rejoice with unfeigned joy when they see others yielding to the operations of the Spirit of Christ, and thus becoming prepared for usefulness in the Church, and to assist in supporting the principles which our Society has ever held.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at the close of business on the 30th ult., the debt, less cash in the United States Treasury, amounted to $998,244,132, a decrease for the month of $5,718,068.

The exportation of wood and wooden ware, lumber, wooden boxes, and other shingles from the United States to foreign countries—chiefly England and Canada—amounted in value last year to more than $29,000,000. The importation of wood and wooden manufactures of all kinds amounted to $17,000,000, showing a small balance on the side of the United States.

The aggregate export of gold last week was $,537,022. It all goes to the Continent, and is said to be ordered for Austria, which is now willing to pay the best price for it. This Austrian demand for gold, coupled with the increased demand for exchange to pay for the large imports of foreign goods now coming over in anticipation of the new tariff and to meet the expenses of the army of American tourists abroad, makes the gold export.

The Washington correspondent of the Public Ledger, writing on the 2nd instant, says, "The exports of gold within the past ten days have had very slight effect thus far upon the Treasury. The free gold shows a loss since Friday last of $5,750,000, but there has been an increase in United States notes of $7,250,000, while the net cash shows an increase of over $120,000. The customs receipts continue at the same rate which has marked the average daily receipts for the past two months, the amount received Saturday and to-day aggregating upwards of $1,000,000. There is no alarm at the Treasury over the export of gold, nor will there be any ground for apprehension so long as a strong balance is maintained through the ordinary channels of business."

William J. Deboe has been elected United States Senator from Kentucky, by the Legislature, at Frankfort. The vote was: Deboe, 71; three other candidates, 64.

The Supreme Court of Mississippi has decided that a jurymen may be a witness at one and the same time.

An order has been issued forbidding the sale of liquor in the restaurants of the Maine Central road.

"Natural gas in immense quantities" has been discovered in an artesian well at San Antonio, Texas.

The gold yield of California last year is estimated to have been $17,181,502, an increase over 1895 of $1,847,245.

The town of Guthrie, Oklahoma, was overwhelmed on the morning of the 28th ult., by what is described as "a mighty wall of water," which came down the Cottonwood River, which was already flooded by unprecedented heavy rains during the preceding four days. The town drifted away about five hundred homes, besides wrecking many others. It is believed about twenty persons, mostly negroes, were drowned.

A despatch of the 27th ult., dated Newport News, Va., says: "Fire broke out in the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad company's Pier No. 5 at an early hour this morning. The pier, which was used for loading and unloading to the extent of $2,000,000 had been done. Two of the company's immense piers were destroyed, three vessels burned to the water's edge, a tugboat entirely destroyed, and eight persons injured, some of them seriously."

A great fire broke out in Pittsburg, Pa., on the morning of the 1st inst., causing a property loss estimated at $3,000,000.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 489, which is 35 less than the previous week, and 35 more than the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 229 were males and 260 females; 66 died of pneumonia; 65 of consumption; 41 of heart disease; 20 of diphtheria; 19 of cholera; 16 of typhoid fever; 16 of marasmus; 15 of cancer; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 13 of old age; 11 of nephritis; 11 of apoplexy; 10 of inanition; 9 of uremia, and 9 from casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2½, 96½; 4½, 98½; 11½, 111½; coupon, 112½; 112½; U. S. 4½, 96; 12½, 123½; 5½, 112½; 10½, 107½.

COTTON was quiet but steady on a basis of 8c. per pound for middling uplands.

FEED.—Spot barn ranged from $13.50 to $14.00 per ton for winter in bulk, and $12.00 a $13.00 for spring in sacks.

WHEAT.—Winter super, $2.75 a $2.90; do, extras, $3.00 a $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $4.00 a $4.15; do, do, straight, $4.15 a $4.35; Western winter, clear, $4.00 a $4.15; do, do, straight, $4.15 a $4.35; do, do, patent, $4.50 a $4.65; spring, clear, $3.50 a $3.85; do, straight, $4.00 a $4.20; do, patent, $4.20 a $4.50; do, favorite brands, higher. City mills, extra, $3.10 a $3.25; do, patent, $3.40 a $3.55; do, straight, $4.35 a $4.50; do, patent, $4.50 a $4.75. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 a $2.50 per bbl. as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 91½ a 91½; No. 2 mixed corn, 2½ a 2½.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Richard Esterbrook.

The writer has recently been looking over me letters he had received in bygone years on his valued friend, Richard Esterbrook, and has believed that some extracts from them may profitably be published in THE FRIEND, the testimony of a thoroughly honest, upright friend. He was a man so fully convinced of the truth of the doctrines held by our Society, and of their importance to the well-being of mankind, that he was sensitively alive to any departures from them on the part of our members; and things which seemed harmless, or early so to many, caused him mental distress, foreshadowing a surrender of vital principles, evidencing a weakened hold upon them. He was naturally a very plain spoken man, and men he believed the honor or interests of the Society of Friends were concerned, he did not care to express himself clearly and strongly.

Although we were intimate friends, and our intercourse was very affectionate, yet his criticisms were at times pretty sharp, and would have been somewhat hard to bear, if it had not been for a firm conviction of his attachment to our doctrines and testimonies, and of the unwavering honesty of the man. My feeling is somewhat like that expressed by Charles J. Spurgeon towards George Fox, of whom he says: "His convictions were too deep to be trifled with or concealed. Hence he was downright in extreme, and never erred upon the side of flattery; it may be possible that he went too far in the direction of severity. I am very conscious that he would have chastened me pretty sharply as a 'Chaffy Baptist,' and probably I might not feel satisfied that I deserved all the blows that he would be certain to launch at me, but what of that? Is it not better to be openly rebuked by an honest heart than to be in association with men whose approbation would be forfeited if you dared to be faithful to them?"

In illustration of the sincerity of our friendship, I will quote from a letter written in the second Month of 1892:

"I earnestly desire that any shadow that may have seemed to come between us to obscure our ancient friendship, as good old William Penn might call it, might be dispersed by the warm and genial rays of the Sun of Righteousness.

"I am deeply concerned on account of apprehended dangers, as thou well knowest, which I have felt for many years we were drifting into. Being in earnest, I am by my nature, plain spoken. If in any way or respect I hurt thy feelings, I desire thee, dear friend, to accept this expression of my regret. If I did thee any injustice, it was for the reason that I did not know all the circumstances that may have surrounded thee and influenced thy actions.

"We are brethren. I am with love and heartfelt esteem, thy constant friend in all storms.
R. ESTERBROOK."

He was born in Liskeard, Cornwall, on the twenty-first of Second Month, 1813. From a child he had deep religious convictions, and in one of the few memoranda he has left he writes that at about the age of fifteen he had an impression that if he were faithful he should be called to the work of the ministry. His father was a man of singular purity of life, and deep spiritual-mindedness, and his sympathy and counsel were of great service to his son, through his boyhood and young manhood. He often reverted in later years to his father's watchful care over him, as one of the greatest blessings of his life.

He was recorded a minister by the Monthly Meeting for the Eastern Division of Cornwall in the Seventh Month, 1848.

At that time Cornwall Quarterly Meeting contained within its limits many devoted men and women, whose helpful companionship and loving sympathy were a great strength to him. He travelled at intervals on religious service with minutes from his Monthly Meeting through many counties in England, at times in company with Jonathan Grubb, John Finch Marsh and other Friends.

In 1855 he visited the meetings and families of Friends in Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, Lincolnshire and Huntingdonshire; and at different periods paid similar visits to the Quarterly Meetings of London and Middlesex, Essex and other counties. He also several times held public meetings throughout Devonshire and Cornwall. In many letters written to his family during these visits, he bears testimony to the goodness of his Heavenly Father in enabling him to perform the service laid upon him, although conscious of his own weakness, and of his entire dependence on his Divine Master.

Among the memoranda preserved of our conversations during many years of close friendship are several which refer to his experiences during the period when his home was in England.

In the fall of 1879 a Friend in Chester County related that many years before, he was one of a wedding company at a marriage, when David Cope was an overseer on the occasion. At the meeting in the morning he delivered a powerful sermon, but in the afternoon he seemed much unwell and was lively and interesting in conversation. One of the company made a remark indicating a fear lest he might be too much off his guard. To this David replied that it was the mark of a good horse, after a hard day's work, to kick up his heels.

Richard Esterbrook said that this anecdote reminded him of one of his own experiences. Many years before he paid a religious visit of about six weeks' duration in Lincolnshire, England, passing along under a heavy burden. His visit closed with the attendance of a Monthly Meeting, and the day before its occurrence he came to the house of a Friend, where he met with a number of others. Feeling greatly relieved of the load he had so long borne, he was very open and cheerful in conversation. After retiring to bed, a feeling of uneasiness arose lest any of those present might be stumbled by his open and pleasant manner. After some conflict of mind, he went to sleep, and rested well. The next morning, at the breakfast table, all were again gathered together, when he remembered his mental conflict of the previous night, and alluded to it, expressing a fear lest any one might be hurt by what had taken place, saying he believed there was no occasion for it, for there was a liberty in the Truth; and instanced the spies whom the children of Israel sent into the promised land, and who brought back a cluster of grapes and gave a good report of the land.

In the summer of 1880, Richard said that many years ago he and Jonathan Grubb (son of Sarah Lynes Grubb), were intimate friends and co-workers in Society affairs. One day, James Backhouse came to them and said, "It does me good to see black-haired men at work" — meaning men whose locks had not yet been whitened with age.

Richard possessed a retentive and accurate memory, so that he was able to bring out of his mental storehouse many incidents that were interesting and instructive. When speaking of capital punishment, he remarked, "Fallible man should not pass an irrevocable sentence." In connection with this subject, he related an incident, told him many years before by the late Grover Kemp of England, which had happened to a relative of their family. He was walking along a lonely road in the country, when a horseman came alongside of him, whose horse was heated with hard riding, and the saddle-bags were filled with material of some kind. The man dismounted and handed the bridle to the pedestrian, asking him if he would be kind enough to hold his horse for a few minutes, whilst he retired out of sight, saying he would soon be back. His request was complied with, and he disappeared. Soon after, several policemen who were in pursuit of a burglar, came up, and in the saddle-bags were found plate that had been stolen from a house which had been broken into. The innocent man was arrested as being the thief. His explanations were regarded as mere fictitious excuses. He was tried, convicted and sentenced to be hung, notwithstanding all his assertions of innocence. The time was fixed for his execution. A day or two before it came, he felt a longing desire once more to look out on the light of day, and persuaded the turnkey to take him to a window that overlooked the street. There he beheld, walking to and fro, the very man who had asked him to hold his horse. He pointed him out to the turnkey, and said, that was the guilty person. The man was sent for and readily came into the prison, exonerated the prisoner, and acknowledged his own guilt. His conscience had become so stirred at the thought of an innocent man suffering for his offence that he had become willing to come and take the blame on himself. He was tried for the offence and executed, and the other was released.

At the house of Morris Cope, the efforts then being made to procure a pardon for a colored man convicted of the murder of John Sharpless, turned the conversation of the company to the subject of capital punishment. R. Estbrook narrated a case which occurred in England many years ago.

A man who was in business in London detected one of his employes in some dishonest practices, and thereby incurred his malignant hatred. He attempted to undermine the credit of his former employer in various ways, so that he finally concluded to close up his business, and emigrate with his family to a foreign country. Going to Liverpool to embark, the family stopped for a few days at a hotel until the vessel was ready to sail. On the day of sailing his wife and child or children went to the vessel and he was just about leaving, after paying his bill, when an alarm was given that a gold watch had been stolen from one of the guests. The landlord said that no one could leave the house without submitting to an examination. To the astonishment and dismay of the intending emigrant, the missing watch was found in a box he was carrying. Appearances were against him, and he was convicted for stealing the watch, condemned and executed. At the trial, the judge treated him with great harshness and seemed very unfeeling.

His implacable enemy had followed him to Liverpool, and finding what room he occupied, had stolen the watch, and slipped it into his box. About a year after, this wicked man was himself brought to trial for some grave offence before the same judge, and also received sentence of death. The judge was very severe in his remarks to him, but the prisoner having now no hope of escape, told him he had heard him use the same language a year before, and that time it was to an innocent man, who was hung for a crime he had not committed!—for he himself had stolen the watch for which the other was executed. So shocked was the judge at this announcement, that he fell forward in a swoon and died soon after.

SWEDEN has taken a very advanced and decided step in doing away with demoralizing amusements. Its government has abolished every variety theatre and every variety music hall in the kingdom. The ministers assigned as a reason for this procedure that these resorts were morally injurious to the public, especially to the young. What a good thing it would be if other nations would recognize this pioneer movement by similar action! There would, no doubt, be a howl of opposition and a cry of trespassing upon the rights and liberties of the community, but the effect of a suppression of this and other debasing, immoral and vicious forms of amusement in our cities would be to greatly promote the morals of the people, and save thousands of our youth from vice, licentiousness and crime.—The Presbyterian.

For "THE FRIEND."

A Late Reprint of a Valuable Work.

In an interesting series of articles written by our late friend Nathan Kite and published in THE FRIEND, vols. xvi. and xvii., under the title of "Antiquarian Researches among the early Printers and Publishers of Friends' Books," an account is given of William Bradford who came to this country about the year 1683, and was the first to set up the business of a printer in Pennsylvania.

Among the first productions of his press was a work entitled, "The Excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property," which contains:—

I. Magna Charta, with a learned comment upon it.

II. The confirmation of the Charter of the Liberties of England, and of the Forest, made in the thirty-fifth year of Edward the First.

III. A statute made the thirty-fourth Edward I. commonly called De Tallagio non Concedendo; wherein all fundamental laws, liberties and customs are confirmed; with comment upon it.

IV. An abstract of the patent granted by the king to William Penn, and his heirs and assigns, for the province of Pennsylvania.

V. And lastly, The Charter of Liberties granted by the said William Penn to the Freemen and inhabitants of the province of Pennsylvania, and territories thereunto annexed, in America.

Nathan Kite says in the article referred to, "I have a copy of this book, but whether published in 1686 or 7, I cannot tell for the printer has given it no date."

This mention of what was then probably a rare book was published in 1847. After the death of Nathan Kite a number of his pamphlets bound in volumes, including this, were purchased and presented to the Meeting for Sufferings in Philadelphia in whose possession they still remain.

Neither the name of the author nor the publisher of this treatise is given, but its authorship is attributed to William Penn. David Lloyd a contemporary of William Penn and a prominent member of the Assembly of the Province states that he "[the Proprietor] likewise published a small treatise, 'The Excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property, etc.,' exhorting them to maintain with firmness and resolution their inestimable privileges."

The object of William Penn in thus endeavoring to spread a knowledge of the fundamental principles upon which his system of government was established is easy to be seen. The reader who is acquainted with the earlier experiences of this remarkable man may remember with what confidence he appealed to the Magna Charta as the guaranty of individual and political liberty in his memorable trial with William Mead before the Mayor of London in 1670 when he was about twenty-six years old. We can readily believe that twelve years later when he was engaged in laying the foundations of the Province, and framing the code of laws which were to be enacted; he would consider that a knowledge of the rights secured to Englishmen by the Magna Charta should be fully known; not only that his own laws should be seen to conform to it, but as a means of enabling his fellow country-men and colonists to resist any attempts which might thereafter be made to invalidate them. These views we find expressed in the "Address to the Reader" prefixed to the work as follows:—

"It may reasonably be supposed that we shall find in this part of the world, many men, both old and young, that are strangers, in a great measure, to the true understanding of that inestimable Inheritance that every Free born Subject of England is Heir unto by Birth right, I mean that unparalleled Privilege of Liberty and Property, beyond all the Nation in the world beside; and it is to [be] wished the all men did rightly understand their own happiness therein; in pursuance of which I do hereby present thee with that ancient Garland, viz. Fundamental Laws of England, be deckt with many precious Privileges of Liberty and Property, by which every man that is a Subject of the Crown of England, may understand what is his Right, and how to preserve it from unjust and unreasonable men."

Valuable as this ancient treatise once was the fact that it had ever been published has been almost entirely lost sight of, and although from some incidental references to it, certain persons well acquainted with the early history of Pennsylvania had supposed it had formed been issued, yet until a few years ago none of them had ever seen it. The copy which Nathan Kite alludes to, as above mentioned, and which is still carefully preserved, is entirely unique. On account of its rarity and for other reasons this treatise has been selected for publication by the Philobiblic Club, which has lately issued a fac simile of it together with an introductory and notes in a very expensive form. An edition of only one hundred and fifty-five copies of it has been printed, one of which has been presented to the Meeting for Sufferings' library and placed beside the original.

From the introduction to this edition, written by Frederick D. Stone, the librarian of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, the following paragraphs are taken:—

"Only a single copy of this tract is known to have survived. It is preserved in the Library of the Meeting for Sufferings of Philadelphia and from it the present fac simile has been made. It does not bear the imprint of William Bradford. The title page looks as if the name of the printer had been removed from the form after it had been prepared for the press. There is no doubt, however, that it was the work of Bradford, as it is mentioned in an advertisement at the foot of a broadside almanac, issued by him in 1687, as being in press. Penn's presence in Europe at the time of its publication accounts for many obvious errors and awkwardnesses of expression which would have been corrected had he been present and which are referred to in detail in the notes to this reprint."

"The causes which led to its production were evidently the results of the intimate knowledge of the true basis of English liberty Penn had acquired in defending the rights of his followers. How familiar he was with the provisions of a principles of Magna Charta is shown in his trial at the Old Bailey, when he quoted it with aptness and pertinacity that drove the Recorders to his wits' end; and that official denouncement both Penn and the law he quoted in such cool and vulgar language that Penn accused him before the public of having spoken in contemptuous terms of the very foundations of English Liberty."

"As we study this chapter of Penn's life, it causes which led to the settlement of Pennsylvania stand out in bold relief. In defending the right of the followers to worship God according to the dictates of their conscience, based his arguments on Magna Charta, feeling that this was the only foundation upon which the religious liberty he contended for could safely rest, and that if he could gain for it

Quakers a full recognition of their rights as free men Englishmen, that liberty would be secured in England's Present Interest Considered, the traced-Liberty, both civil and religious, back to the pre-English Britons, pointing out that Magna Charta itself was but the embodiment of ancient customs in use when it was framed. He contended that the differences existing in England at his day resulted from attempts that had been made to enforce conformity in religious matters by subverting the ancient rights of the people, depriving them of their property without due form, and making them owe their protection not to the civil but to the ecclesiastical authority.

"His studies in the history of government convinced him of the importance of making a people the fountain of power, consequently, when the fundamental charter of West Jersey was framed, in which work Penn and a number of Quakers were interested, the most important revisions of Magna Charta were made a portion of that instrument. Owing to the financial confusion into which the affairs of West Jersey rifted, the success of that colony became doubtful, and Penn turned his attention to the territory west of the Delaware, for which he obtained a royal patent. Here he determined to establish a government of which civil and religious liberty should be the cornerstone. Bored from the entangling complication of European politics, he hoped it would be an example to the nations of the world, and called it his 'Holy Experiment.' It was not for the benefit of his followers alone that he attempted this; he was willing to accord to others the liberty he claimed for his own people. 'I went there,' he said, 'to establish a free colony for all mankind that should go thither, and more especially those of my own profession. Not that I have seen the civil liberties of others because of their persuasion, but to screen and defend our own from infringements on that account.'

"On the almost feudal terms of the Royal patent, Penn engrafted a government as liberal circumstances would admit, but not as liberal as now known, as he desired. In one draft of a name of Government he proposed to give the assembly whatever was the privilege of an English House of Commons, and in the same paper he provided that Magna Charta and all the laws confirmatory of the same, especially that called the Petition of Right, passed in the reign of Charles I., should be in full force and an effectual part of the government of the Province. That the people should understand the basis of their liberties, he deposited in the archives of his Colony a copy of Magna Charta, certified by the Keeper and other officers of the Cottonian Library, illuminated and ornamented as the original; and there it remained for a century. Whether it was before or after this that he caused 'The Excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property' to be printed we cannot say; but the act was in perfect accord with the motives for the production of that name, given in the 'Address to the Reader.'

"That 'the Excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property' had an effect on the minds of the people is evinced by the fact that nearly a century after its production it was quoted in a defence of the legislative constitutions of the Province of Pennsylvania. In speaking of Magna Charta in this paper, David Lloyd says, 'From these noble Principles the Proprietor derived the rights and privileges of this colony as the true Basis of English Liberty and Property, and not only granted his charters whereby he confirmed the same to the inhabitants; but likewise published a small treatise 'The Excellent Privilege of Liberty and Property,' etc., exhorting them to maintain with firmness and resolution their inalienable privileges.

"No one who is familiar with the able papers that were called forth by political discussions in the early history of Pennsylvania can fail to see that Penn's efforts to convey to the mind of the inhabitants of his Province a full knowledge of the character of their political and civil rights were successful."

A Letter from Paris.

Third Mo. 28th, 1897.

I have had a very interesting walk this afternoon. It was warm and sunny, so I took the omnibus that goes to the Jardin des Plantes, descending at the Boulevard St. Germain in order to follow the Boulevard Henri IV, to the Place de la Bastille. At the latter place there is of course no trace remaining of the famous old prison, of which every one has heard so much, but a beautiful monument stands there instead, and the crowds that rush by, thronging the handsome boulevards which meet here, are gay and apparently thoughtless, and it is very hard to force the imagination to picture it as it was over a century ago, on that terrible fourteenth of Seventh Month, 1793, when the dark and dismal old fortress, that had stood over four hundred years, was levelled by the mad deluded populace at the beginning of the French revolution. I walked about, trying to get away from the distracting crowds, but it was no use, so I turned up a narrow street, and came soon to the Place des Vosges. The houses surrounding this square, though occupied now by the commoner classes, look old and stately, for this used to be the "Place Royale," the centre of the fashionable world of Paris at the beginning of the seventeenth century. The houses themselves were built by Henry IV. The second story of each extends a considerable distance over the street, and as they all join, this forms an archway under which one can walk completely round the square. At present the first floor of most of the houses is occupied by fourth or fifth rate stores, for all the glory of the olden time has passed away. It was much easier to find oneself in the spirit of the past under these archways, however, even with cheap articles exposed for sale on every hand, than it was at the gay square I had just left. Here were the walls, at all events, the very same, though the gorgeously arrayed lords and ladies who had once filled them with life, had centuries ago vanished from the earth, but it required no very great force of imagination to make the present occupants give place to stately forms and flowing robes.

From this place it was a short walk to the Museum de Carnavalet. Although I am no lover of museums, I felt strongly drawn to this one for many reasons. In the first place it is one of the handsome old residences of the tenth century, and besides it was inhabited during sixteen years by Madame de Sevigne, who was one of the most talented of the many brilliant women who figured in the splendid days of Louis XIV. Her letters to her daughter have become classic, not only for their high moral tone, but for accounts which she gives of everyday occurrences, as she mingled with king and courtiers as well as the great literary men and women of the day. The house has been restored and enlarged, and remains very beautiful to gaze at, the value especially for its connection with the great revolution. One-half is entirely devoted to authentic relics of the latter. In the centre is a model of the Bastille carved from a stone of the old walls. There are many objects there that make one shudder, and for the first I came to realize a little how awful it must have been—those frightful years of the reign of terror. But when one thinks of the frightful suffering that led up to and made possible this outburst, one must pause and cease to judge. It was a hidden stream, repressed through the ages, that at last burst its boundaries and deluged the whole land.

From Carnavalet I followed several narrow streets to the square of the Temple, the site of the old structure used as a prison for the unfortunate Marie Antoinette and the two innocent children, the young dauphin and his sister Maria Theres, each entirely separate from the other, and ignorant of each other's fate.

I came home in time for dinner, and being in quite the spirit for entering into the history of Paris, I piled my hostess with questions of every kind, but especially in relation to the communists of 1871. I can understand the French Revolution, but the Commune has always been something inexplicable to me, but thanks to the explanations which I received this evening, it is a little clearer to me. But I cannot begin that subject to-night. It is too long and excites me too much. It was during that time that the palace of the Tuilleries, the Hotel de Ville, the Palace of Justice and dozens of other buildings were burned to the ground, being first saturated with petroleum and filled with gunpowder to render the destruction more complete. In some cases fire engines were used, but instead of water, petroleum was poured upon the flaming buildings to spread the conflagration. Oh, it must have been terrible, terrible in Paris at that time.

30th.—It is amazing how things straighten out in one's mind if one exercises patience and gives them time. I had not supposed that my intelligence was equal to compassing the mysteries of the Paris omnibus service. I had thought that a very good thing for Parisians, and supposed that they understood it, but I had the feeling that I would rather walk any amount of miles than try to take an omnibus—now, however, I find it a very simple and easy thing to do. In the first place one can get on an omnibus anywhere, that is to say if the sign "omnibus" is not up. You must run wildly after it, however, and if you once catch hold behind, the conductor will help you on in a very pleasant manner. If, however, you forget to look for the sign, which is put up as soon as the places are all taken, if it is up, instead of helping you, he will push you off and leave you standing ignominiously in the middle of the street. If the omnibus is going fast he will stop a little to let you off, or if he does not do that, he takes you in both hands and jumps off with you, holds you until you have found your centre of gravity, and then he runs after the omnibus and jumps on. If you fail to get on in passing along the street, your resource is to go to the nearest "Bureau d'Omnibus," and entering, ask for a number to the nearest place you are going. For instance, in coming home from the Sorbonne I ask for Parc des Batignolles; in the middle of the day there is generally no trouble, but towards the evening it is something terrible. For example, when you ask for a number, it is handed you—perhaps you get eighty-nine, ninety, or along there; you then go on the sidewalk and wait. The first omnibus on your line that comes along stops and you rush with the crowd. The official stationed there goes along and begins calling out the numbers. If you have ninety, he begins most likely, "one, two, three," etc., or if you have number one he will be sure to begin "two, three," etc., and you must wait until the one hundred is out; and those with the numbers called hand over their tickets and enter. But as a general thing half the omnibuses that come along at this time are full already, and the other half have at most three or four vacant seats, so you can get some idea of how long one must wait. For this reason I never take, if I can help it, the omnibus in the centre of the city in the evening; it is better to walk to the other side of the river, and anticipate the crowd.

To-day the lecture was intensely interesting—a continuation of the labor question in America. The Professor described in a most delightful way the city of Pullman as an introduction to the terrible strike of 1893, in which I had a good deal of interest, by the way, being six weeks in consequence without mail while in California. He is very just, very scientific and very clear in all that he says, but he cannot avoid now and then throwing in a remark which brings forcibly to light some of our American peculiarities.

After the lecture I followed a handsome wide boulevard that has recently been opened through this part of the city until I reached the line of real boulevards—the ones that replace the old fortifications—and which extend in consequence nearly in the form of a semi-circle on the northern side of the Seine, from the Place de la Bastille to the Madeleine. Beginning at the Place de la République I made the rest of the circuit, contemplating with wonder and amazement the moving throngs of humanity that fill these great arteries. It is well to begin at the outer end of the boulevards, because they grow more and more elegant as one approaches the Madeleine. The best way to see them is, of course, to walk, but besides that one must take the impériale, that is, the top of the omnibus, and make the circuit of an evening, when the electric lights add very much to the effect.

Nothing could be easier than to find one's way about in Paris. The streets are named at every corner, white upon a blue background, and every short distance one finds a policeman, who never fails to answer politely and very explicitly to one's questions. One is sure of meeting civility at every turn in Paris. I have been especially struck with this, this last week, when I have been to three or four different stations, getting information about a ticket to Switzerland over different routes, sending my baggage by "petite vitesse" (slow freight), etc. I have not simply had my questions answered civilly, but on all occasions the officials in question seemed to enter with positive interest in the details of the matter, giving me information that I did not know enough to ask for. Thomas Cook & Sons, who have their office at the Place de l'Opéra, arrange all these details for one very satisfactorily indeed, and save one a great deal of trouble, but of course one must pay them for doing it—that is, the tickets, etc., cost a good deal more at their office than if bought direct of the French lines. But even if the price were the same, I should look up all these points myself, for it is as good as any private lesson I could take, and besides I enjoy doing such things. I get all the information I can from all the different lines, and decide afterwards what is the best thing to do. In this way I find it will be better to go direct to Neuchâtel, and to leave Strausburg for the return journey, though I had made all plans for taking it in on the way to Switzerland.

Paris is the capital of France in a way that no other city of Europe is the capital of its country. Berlin, for instance, though at present almost as large, has only been the capital of Germany since the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, and was the capital of Prussia only about a hundred years before. Italy possesses numerous great centres, great historical and art centres—but even London does not bear the relation to England that Paris does to France. Century after century Paris has been not only the residence of kings and emperors, who have sought in every way to beautify their beloved city, but in the peculiar development of the feudal system in France, it became the custom for all the nobility, whether ecclesiastic or otherwise, to make Paris their permanent residence. It has been this fact, more than almost any other, that while rendering the city so beautiful and so full of attractions, has been the curse of the land, for it was the poor people who were drained to pay for it all, and most of them did not even have the opportunity to see the glory they supported—something which has its compensations. But one sees on every hand so much to wonder at and to admire. And it becomes really amazing to think how much is left when one realizes all that has been destroyed by the numberless revolutions and changes the country has suffered during the past hundred years.

Fourth Mo. 2nd.—"Vilain temps, mademoiselle" (wretched weather), said the little old bouquiniste, as I came up the Seine to-day. I could understand very well how he felt about it, for to-day has been a real old-fashioned "April day," when it rains, hails, snows and thunders in the midst of bright sunshine and clear skies, for an enterprising man of business like the one in question, does not want to miss a chance to sell if he can help it, and must have been kept very busy to-day, first spreading his wares to attract attention when the sun shone, and then hurrying them back in their boxes and putting on the covers when times changed; and this latter, by the way, is no easy matter. I invested in two books, a New Testament for two cents, and a pretty little leather edition of the best French translation of the Imitation de Jésus Christ. This is one of my favorite books, and I have been looking almost every day for it, in the form which I wanted, so I was quite glad to have found it at last.

By the time I had made this purchase the clouds had gathered and all the merchants along the borders of the Seine were hurrying their belongings under cover, so I put up my umbrella, and moved onward without interruption in the way of tempting old books exposed for sale.

At the Port Royale I crossed over the Seine, for the sun was again shining, entering the Jardin des Tuileries at the place where the palace stood before it was destroyed by the Communists in 1871. It had been my intention to walk from the Louvre to the Arc de Triomphe the first day that I found myself in Paris, but strange enough, I left it just three weeks. To-day everything was perfect. The rains of the last two days had cleared the atmosphere, which was fresh and bracing, the sky was a deep blue, with floating white clouds, and the trees and shrubbery clothed with the beautiful new green that is peculiar to the early spring. The sun shone brightly upon sparkling fountain and beautiful statuary as well as on the gay crowds that streamed by.

I expect every one who has attempted to describe the Place de la Concorde has spoken of the eight statues representing eight cities of France that guard the four corners of the square, and every one has spoken of the fact that the one representing Strausburg is decorated with wreaths and tokens of mourning, though it were a grave. I walked around the square for the purpose of examining more closely the decorations, but I did not succeed in reading much of what was written upon them. Two weeks ago I should have hesitated some time before undertaking to cross the Place de la Concorde, but by this time I had become quite heroic, in fact, don't think about it at all. The only thing is to "ne perdre pas la tête," as the French say—do not lose your head. I lost it every minute on first coming from dear, quiet Germany, but one gets used to everything after a time.

When nearly to the Arc de Triomphe I turned south, visiting the grounds and remaining buildings of the Exposition of 1878. I ascended the steps of the palace of Trocadéra. After walking about the beautiful grounds surrounding, and taking a seat upon the wide balcony which commands a charming view of the lawn with stately and shrubbery extending down to the Seine with the Eiffel Tower directly in front.

I had already had a long walk, and felt a little weary, so I ordered a cup of coffee, "café au lait," that is to say with milk, which proved to be excellent. While drinking it, I read a good deal in my little book, looking up now and then, to gaze upon the beautiful panorama spread out before me. When I started again I was entirely refreshed, and only the lateness of the hour prevented my taking in a good deal more, but as I was a good hour and a half from home, I thought it wiser to go as nearly direct as I could. I made, however, a slight detour to visit the Place des États Unis (the place of the United States), to see the beautiful statue of Washington and Lafayette which was erected in 1895. As I crossed the charming little park of the Batignolles, which is quite near where am stopping, the sun had just set behind masses of gold and crimson cloud, and the whole sky was lighted with sunset glory. The rain probably over for the present—I have no doubt the little old man of the Seine is feeling happy to-night.

E. S. K.

ONCE on a time a man, approaching the Mayor of a great city, a plain, blunt official totally unacquainted with the arts and uses of equequation, said: "Your honor, I am seeking a position of some responsibility in your city." He then named it specifically, and continued: "The gentlemen of the Board, whom I have interviewed, have not discouraged me. Hence, I have come to you, a member ex-officio. What chance of success do you, sir, consider me to have?"

"My dear sir," replied the exceptional honest and honorable functionary, "cease your search. An incumbent for the office has a ready been selected. You have not the ghost of a chance. Be assured that I know what am talking about."

This answer was definite and conclusive—the exact kind of answer the poor applicant has specially needed, and had been sedulously searching for, but had, until this moment, failed to obtain.—Selected.

TWO SURPRISES.

A workman plied his clumsy spade
As the sun was going down;
The German King, with a cavalcade,
On his way to Berlin Town.

Reined up his steed at the old man's side.
"My toiling friend," said he,
"Why not cease work at eventide,
When the laborer should be free?"

"I do not dare," the old man said;
"And I am always free;
Though I work from the time I leave my bed Till I can hardly see."

"How much," said the King, "is thy gain in a day?"
"Eight groshen," the man replied.
"And thou canst live on this meagre pay?"
"Like a King," he said, with pride.

"Two groshen for me and my wife, good friend,
And two for a debt I owe;
Two groshen for a lend, and two to spend
For those who can't labor, you know,"

"Thy debt?" said the King; said the toiler, "Yes,
To my mother with age oppressed,
Who cared for me, toiled for me, many a day,
And now hath need of rest."

"To whom dost lend thy daily store?"
"To my boys—for their schooling; you see
When I am too feeble to toil any more,
They will care for their mother and me."

"And thy last two groshen?" the monarch said.
"My sisters are old and lame;
Give them two groshen for raiment and bread,
All in the Father's name."

"ears welled up to the good King's eyes.
"Thou knowest me not," said he;
As he hast given me one surprise,
Here is another for thee:

I am thy King; give me thy hand—
And he heaped it high with gold—
When more than needed, I now command
That I at once be told."

For I would bless with rich reward
The man who can proudly say
That eight souls doth he keep and guard
On eight poor groshen a day.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Are We Growing?

The labor question will be settled only when we learn that it is the best policy to live by the Golden Rule. Prohibition will not need to be enacted into a law when true manhood lies above our selfish greed and lusts, for it will then be a law written in the heart. Honest effort directed toward a reformation of self is the natural and most effective means of correcting the evils of the day. Exercise—work—rightly directed, are the watchwords of all true progress.

All men are endowed with the working capital, in the shape of the germs of life. First the embryonic physical organism; secondly, the myronic brain, or intellectual germ, and third the child-like heart.

The harmonious development of these infant organs is not only the first mission of life, but life in the fullest sense of the word. Prof. Hulbert says that if a section be cut from the germ of an apple seed and placed under the revealing lens of the microscope, a perfect miniature of the future apple tree, trunk, branches, wigs and buds, will be seen exactly as it would grow, if it were not destined to encounter unavoidable physical agencies. The apple-tree is at an educated apple-seed, and the apple but an educated blossom.

Our lives may be likened to the development of the apple-seed. What light, heat, moisture, chemical and vital agencies are to the appleseed, discipline is to the muscles, thought is to the mind, and child-like obedience is to the Christian.

Education is not knowledge so much as discipline. Intellectual education does not consist so much in being versed in the lore of mankind, or in the achievements of science, as in having all the mental faculties symmetrically developed and trained to promptly respond to an intelligent will. Physical education does not lie in brute force, but in the highest development of all our physical powers, in order that the commands of a higher intellectual nature may be faithfully executed. Nor does spiritual education consist in being learned in the different schools of theology, or in the mere observance of any creed, but in the possession of a spiritual discernment which is under the discipline of the Spirit itself.

Knowledge is education only in the sense that it enables us to act in obedience to the demands of wisdom. To be shown a college diploma is not to be shown the proof of a true education, but only the evidence of culture, and, as with the farmer, culture alone may not result in the production of a heavy crop. So with the student, it is only a means of opening the springs of originality.

Scholarship is education only as it is a stimulant to thought, bringing into activity, not simply a part, but all the powers of the mind. Thought is the hidden spring which lies back of every action, and the greatness of all achievement is measured by his conception and the thought which planned it.

The battle of success is not won on couches of ease or indolence, but only on the line of honest and well-directed effort. We read, not simply that we may read, or be well informed, but that we may think. We reap the benefits of society, not that we may be idle consumers, but that we may return measure for measure.

The best things of this life come only as the reward of a personal battle against opposing forces, and the blessings which are heaped upon us are most deeply felt by those who have gained them honestly. In nature, duties are always reciprocal, and values relative. There may be delinquents but there is no means of escaping the penalty. Justice is the highest law of nature. There is no such thing as something for nothing. We get what we pay for, and pay for what we get. The rain may fall upon the just and upon the unjust, and the unrighteous man may even prosper in his way, yet what he thinks is his gain is not only his loss here, but his punishment hereafter.

As in nature so in human society, there are those who fall short of their appointed duties, but sometime and somewhere the account will be balanced. As water seeks its own level so just as naturally does retribution follow in the footsteps of broken laws. Every poison has its antidote and every force its rebound, so at some point all forces must be gathered up and poised in an impartial balance. Those who thoughtlessly assert that there is nothing more certain than death and taxes, seem to forget that the laws of justice are more inexorable than the laws of taxation. He who commanded that unto Caesar shall be rendered the things which are Caesar's, in his infinite wisdom, and justice did not exempt Caesar from punishment because he had levied tribute unjustly. So to-day when honest and willing labor suffers from cold and hunger, while capital pours her treasures into the haunts of revelry and extravagance; when the humble Christian must bear the pointing finger of scorn or the attacks of a "higher criticism," we may find comfort in the thought that sometime and in some way Caesar will pay his dues; for justice and truth will not always suffer at the hand of falsehood and oppression.

But returning to the principle, it is the constant use of the silver which keeps it bright, and in the battle of life it is the constant clashing of force against force which is the secret of growth.

As the infant diamond is rough and unsightly and so hard that it can only be cut by the slow grinding of its own dust, and yet when it leaves the hand of the artist is the most brilliant and valuable of all gems, so the man who must encounter the rough edge of life, finds the roughness of his nature to wear away, his powers growing stronger, and his virtues growing more virtuous and shining, with a purer lustre before the world.

The little Alpine flower, which was plucked from among the rugged rocks of an almost inaccessible mountain-side, is most highly prized, so the thorns of life may always accompany its roses, yet the roses are all the sweeter when we have gathered them.

There is told a beautiful story of a little plant which grows in the tropics. It is delicate in structure, unattractive and unproductive, until in some way a wound is made in its tissues, when a little bud springs from the wound, and gradually grows and expands, until at length it bursts into a beautiful blossom. In evident fear of death it performs the function of reproduction, leaving to the world a successor.

The Christian's experience may be likened to this little plant.

Each added spiritual grace may have left its scar in the flesh, yet in the Book of Life, the scar bears witness to an immortal growth.

Are we growing? The answer is the answer to the question, Are we putting to the best use the talents which God has entrusted to our care? The greatest of all legacies is the inheritance of every man. It is the germ of personal force. It is a legacy which begins to pay interest at birth and only ceases with death.

The value of the interest is the character of the life which we are living, and depends on whether our infant powers have developed in the sunlight of action and truth, or in the shadows of idleness and vice. Though the inheritance is common to all, yet still the title is more easily lost than held—yet still, though we may have been awarded the interest of a mis-spent life, the great exception was sealed on the cross, by which, through repentance, the principle may be redeemed in life everlasting.

MONUMENTS FROM THE CHRISTIAN STANDPOINT.—Some years ago I had for a neighbor an old veteran of the war of 1812, whose wife had died several years before, leaving him the sole denizen of the home in which the two had commenced life together at an early day. One day in early spring I found the old Colonel, then about eighty years of age, industriously setting out fruit trees in his garden. As I approached him, I said: "Colonel, why are you doing this? You will never eat fruit from these trees." "No," he replied, "I never shall; but I learned, long ago, that it is the duty of the out-going tenant to provide for the incoming one." That reply stuck to me. A thousand times I have thought it over. "The out-going should provide for the incoming." How true! And of how many applications is the wise principle it embodies capable!—A. Parke Burgess.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Our next door neighbor during last winter, cut down a large tree of the Silver Maple, which was on his side-walk, leaving the stump projecting about a foot from the earth. Early in the Third Month, soon after the ground had thawed, I noticed one morning that the hollows on its surface, left by the wood-chopper's axe, were wet, as if a rain had fallen, and the moisture had flowed to a distance of several feet. The puzzle as to the source of this moisture was soon dispelled by the reflection that it was about the time of year when an allied tree, the sugar maple, is bored for the purpose of obtaining the sweet, juice or sap, from which the delicious maple sugar is obtained. So this abundant moisture was nothing but the sap, which the roots, still alive, had absorbed from the earth, and sent upward through the cells and tissues of the wood, until it was poured forth through their ends, left open by the stroke of the axe. No doubt a similar process was going on in the other maple trees which were growing close by, only in these the sap continued to ascend and reach the smallest twigs and branchlets, swelling the buds of the flowers and leaves, and preparing them to expand as the increasing warmth of spring stimulated into activity the vital powers of the plant.

Six or seven weeks have elapsed since these observations were made. In that time the flower buds matured and produced the flowers, and those have been succeeded by the curious two-winged fruits, which are now falling on the grass-plots. In a few weeks we shall see numerous young plants developed from those which have fallen in favorable positions. The germ or embryo of the seed consists of young plantlets, already formed but not developed; and the student who will watch the germination of the maple seed, will find that they consist of a tiny stem or axis, bearing a pair of small leaves on the summit. Presently a little bud appears between these seeds and leaves. And as it grows it produces the regular leaves of the young tree. The stem at the same time lengthens, so as to raise the bud above the soil into the light and air, and its opposite extremity grows down into the soil. The little stem, pre-existing in the seed, grows throughout its whole length by the multiplication of its cells, so that a radicle of perhaps less than a line in length may become a slender two or three inches long. The root lengthens only at its lower end. Its function is to absorb nourishment from the earth, and in seeking this it develops in the direction of the soil best adapted for its use. Those who have maple trees growing in their lawns, may notice that the cultivated ground adjacent becomes filled with a mass of rootlets, extending many feet from the main stem, and absorbing the nourishment designed by the owner for the use of other crops.

The cells of which the rootlets are composed are not open at their extremities, but consist of closed tubes. Into these the crude sap finds entrance by a curious physical law, called endosmosis. If we take a jar of water in which a portion of sugar or syrup is dissolved, and insert in it a wide-mouthed bottle filled with pure water, over the mouth of which a thin piece of bladder or sheet India rubber is fastened, after a lapse of some hours the water in the bottle will be found to have imbibed a portion of the sugar, which has passed through the substance of the bladder or gum. It is by a similar process the sap is absorbed. This law is of extensive application in the growth and proservation of vegetables and animals. Through it the water and substances dissolved in it are conveyed to the highest leaf of a tree, passing in its course through millions of apparently water-tight partitions.

It is by the operation of the same law that in the lungs of animals, the oxygen of the air finds admittance into the close cells of the lungs; and that the carbonic acid gas, there formed by its union with the carbon of the blood, is able to escape.

My attention was called a few days since to the number of plants wild or naturalized, which may be found in our lawns, or in vacant lots about our village. Taking a walk on the twenty-fourth of Fourth Month, I saw eight species in bloom and about sixteen others, whose flowers had not yet developed. As the season advances, this number will doubtless be greatly exceeded, so that a student of plants may find much to learn, without going far from home. One of the most abundant of these is the Shepherd's Purse (Capsella Bursa Pastoris), so named from the peculiar shape of its seed pod. Gray says, "It is the commonest of weeds." Although it is thus disrespectfully spoken of, yet it is not without interest. A circle of radical leaves, deeply indented or toothed, lie on the ground. From the centre of this an upright stem ascends, crowned with a cluster of small white flowers, which are succeeded in due season by the purse-shaped seed-pods. This plant belongs to the natural order, Cruciferae, or cross-bearing, so called from the flowers having four petals, arranged in opposite pairs. Many of the plants of this order, such as mustard, horse-radish, etc., possess a pungent taste, and are valuable as remedies for scurvy. In this disease, there is a depraved condition of the blood, and it is accompanied by a tendency to hemorrhage, especially in the gums. It is caused by improper diet, such as the long and continued use of salt meats, without admixture of fresh vegetables. It was formerly much more destructive than of latter years.

During some periods it was believed that more seamen perished from scurvy than from all other causes combined. In modern times the use of lemon juice, potatoes, fruits and fresh vegetables have robbed this once dreaded disease of its terrors.

The experience of a small British fleet which about the year 1740, left England, under the command of Lord Anson, with orders to sail around Cape Horn and attack the Spanish settlements on the Pacific coast of South America, gives a lively impression of the nature and effects of this once dreaded disease.

The narrative of the voyage states that after passing Straights Le Maire, their long continuance at sea, the fatigue they underwent and the various disappointments they met with, had caused the scurvy to spread to such a degree, that there were few on board who were not in some degree afflicted with it, and in the Fourth Month forty-three persons died of it on board the Centurion, the chief ship. In the Fifth Month they lost nearly double that number.

The symptoms are inconstant and innumerable. Scarcely any two persons are affected exactly alike; but among the more general appearances, are large discolored spots over the surface of the body, swollen legs and putrid gums, and especially an extraordinary lassitude of the body. It was usually attended with great dejection of spirits, and a disposition to be seized with terror on slight accidents. Whatever discouraged the people added to the virulence of the disease, and generally killed those who were in its last stages.

In the sad plight to which the crew was reduced, they succeeded in reaching the island of Juan Fernandez. As they coasted along the island, seeking for a bay in which to take shelter, the narrative says: "It is scarcely credible with what eagerness and transport we viewed the shore, and with how much impatience we longed for the green and other refreshments that were then in sight. A boat was sent on shore early in the morning, which returned laden with seals and grass. The grass was soon devoured.

"After coming to anchor, tents were erected on shore, and the sick removed there, numbering one hundred and sixty-seven. Some who were far gone in the disease died, but the others regained their health and strength in a short time. The crew found on Juan Fernandez almost all the vegetables which are usually esteemed to be particularly adapted to the cure of scurvy. We had great quantities of water cresses and purslain, with excellent wild sorrel, and a vast profusion of turnips and Solilian radishes."

The cresses, turnips and radishes are all members of the Cruciferae, the natural order which, as has already been mentioned, is anti-scurbutic.

Lord Anson had carried with him a large assortment of garden seeds and stones of fruit trees, such as plumb, apricot and peach, and these he sowed and planted on the island, for the benefit of succeeding navigators. Some of these grew and thus added to the resources of the island.

Those persons whose botanical studies extend over several years, have often noticed that certain plants appear in unusual abundance on some seasons which are by no means so common at others. With us the present year is a favorable one for the dandelion (Taraxacum officinale). In many of the yards and lawns about our village, its yellow flowers appear in great profusion. It is really a beautiful flower, and the peculiar habits of the plant, especially in its fruiting, are of unusual interest. After blossoming, the circle of green leaves around the flower closes for a time; the slender beak of the fruit elongates and raises up the cluster of fine white hairs with which it is covered. The involucre is then relaxed, exposing an open globular head to the winds. The leaves of the plant are sometimes used as a salad. It is a native of Europe, but is now very thoroughly naturalized in this country.

As I passed our graveyard, I noticed a large patch of a grayish white color, which proved to be the Everlasting (Antennaria plantaginifolia). It is a low growing herb, with white woolly leaves, and bearing the stamens and pistils on different plants. J. W.

Animal Sense of Humor.—A jackdaw of the writer's acquaintance had an ingenious method of tormenting the numerous dogs of the establishment, which was most comic to behold, and which owed something of its finish to a more artistic conception of the humorous side of teasing than most jackdaws are credited with.

It was an extremely hot summer, and the dogs, of which there were three, spent the greater part of the day dozing peacefully on the lawn. Being all either Clumber spaniels or setters, they had fine silky coats, which extended to their feet, little tufts of fluffly fat sticking out between their toes.

When a dog was comfortably asleep, with it et stretched out, dreaming of partridges, the awkward hop gently round, and then make a sudden dive at these fluffly tassels between its toes, which never failed to wake the log up with a sense of discomfort, which a tug at the hair anywhere else on its body would never have provoked.

At another house, a tame magpie was kept in a stable-yard, with a couple of kestrels. The kestrels were in the habit of sitting on the sides of the water pails to warm in the sun outside the stable doors. The magpie, being in want of amusement, hit on the following plan. He autiously approached a kestrel from behind, and seizing the bird's long tail in his beak, gave one or two violent pulls and pushes, and having worked the kestrel quite off its balance, with a good forward push, pitched it into the pail, or so far in as its flapping wings allowed. The magpie then "saved itself" with great haste in the hay-rack above the manger. In this case the joke was paid for; one of the kestrels, more wide awake than usual, caught the magpie as it was approaching, and drove its claws into the practical joker's legs until his screams rought help.

Animals at Play.—Near Benbridge, in the ale of Wight, a flock of ewes and lambs were in adjoining fields, separated by a fence with several gaps in it. "Follow my leader" was the game most in favor with this flock, the biggest lamb leading round the field and then jumping the gap, with all the others following in single file; any lamb that took the leap unusually well would give two or three more enthusiasticumps, out of sheer exuberant happiness, when it reached the other side. Near the same place we have seen lambs play the game which the children call "I'm the king of the castle." This took was in a field in which seaweed was piled a heaps ready to be spread on the field. A lamb would jump on to a heap of seaweed and half-a-dozen others would attack the position and try to drive him from it. Occasionally no one would appear to dispute the possession of the "castle," and in that case the lamb playing "king" jumped, capered and performed the most ridiculous antics, as if inviting competitors to come on.

In any comparison of the games and sports of animals with our own enjoyment of the same amusements, it must not be forgotten that imagination, the "make believe," which enter so much into the play of children, is also the basis of the play of young animals. Watch a kitten, while you tap your fingers on the other side of a curtain or table-cloth, imitating the movements of a mouse running up and down. She sniffs it is not a mouse, but she enters into the spirit of the game, and goes through all the movements proper to the chase. Or perhaps he has a ball. If you set it in motion so much he better. That helps the "make believe," the ball is alive and she catches it, claws it, and half-kills it; taking care all the while to keep it moving herself.

The beautiful young lion, which was given by the Sultan of Sokoto to the Queen, would play in exactly the same way with a large wooden ball, growling and setting up its crest, and nursing the ball across the cage. Indeed, play of some kind is so necessary to the health of these big kittens that they are always supplied with a wooden ball to amuse them. These playings are evidently greatly appreciated, and he distress of one very tame tiger, Jack, and his mute appeals for help, when his ball slipped down under the bars, where he could no longer reach it, were quite pathetic.

The Largest Telescope.

The great Yerkes reflecting telescope, the largest in the world, which he ordered several years ago for the University of Chicago, will be in operation soon in the magnificent observatory which Yerkes has erected near Williams Bay, on Lake Geneva. The building is nearly completed, and the astronomers who are to be in charge are "at home" in the dwellings built for them on the border of the lake. The lens for this telescope is the largest ever made. It is forty inches in diameter and 3.6 inches thick at the thickest part. It magnifies about 9,000,000 times. Looking through this telescope the moon will appear hardly thirty miles from the earth.

The Yerkes Observatory stands on the northern shore of Lake Geneva, about fifty miles from Chicago, upon a site consisting of about fifty acres of wooded land fronting on the lake. The construction of the main building was begun in April, 1895. Its form is that of a Roman cross, with three domes and a meridian room at its extremities. The main arm of the cross lies east and west, and is about 350 feet in length. The dome for the great telescope, 90 feet in diameter and 110 feet high, stands at the western end.

The lens of this telescope has a "clear aperture" of 40 inches, its full diameter being 41.1 inches. It is four inches larger in diameter, than the lens of the Lick telescope, and its surface, on which depends its "light-gathering" power, is therefore nearly one and one-fourth times as great. This monster lens was ground and polished by Alvan Clark, the sole surviving member of the famous firm of Alvan Clark & Sons. The two disks of which it consists, one of crown and one of flint glass, were cast in Paris, and cost $400,000 in the rough. The grinding has taken about two years, and cost $60,000.

The tube which sustains this magnificent lens, made of sheet steel, riveted together after the manner of a tubular steam boiler, is 75 feet in length. It, together with the equatorial mounting of the instrument, was made by Warner & Swasey, telescope makers, of Cleveland, Ohio.

While the great telescope with its attachments—micrometers, spectroscopes, photographic apparatus, etc.—is the main feature of the observatory, the institution is well equipped with smaller instruments, among which are a 12 inch refracting telescope, mounted in the eastern dome, and in the third dome a 24-inch reflector. The motive power for revolving the domes and manipulating the instruments is supplied by electricity.

The director of the observatory is George E. Hale, the associate professor of astro-physics in the University of Chicago, but the observatory will be under the immediate direction of Professor E. E. Barnard, who was for a long time at the Lick observatory. The working force will include eight astronomers.

Professor Hale has achieved a world-wide reputation through his work in astro-physics, and particularly through his marvelous photographs of the gaseous envelope of the sun, taken with an instrument of his own devising and called the spectro-heliograph. The great telescope will be used mainly for work of this sort, which does not necessitate the quietness and transparency of atmosphere essential to the effective use of a telescope when the observer's aim is to study the fine details in the surface markings of the moon or of a planet. Otherwise it would be a pity that so splendid a telescope should be so poorly located, for the Yerkes telescope lies deeper in the great ocean of the earth's atmosphere than the Lick by more than 3000 feet, and deeper than that of Lowell, at Flag-staff, Arizona, by more than 6000 feet.

A feature of the observatory is the heliostat room, in which, as long as the sun shines above the horizon, there is a steady and constant beam of sunlight available for optical experiments.

No heat is allowed in the dome rooms. The temperature inside must be the same as the temperature outside. The work done there is so delicate that expansion or contraction of the metal work of the apparatus would interfere sadly with the accuracy of the results.

Howard Grubb, of Dublin, Ireland, proposes to construct for photographic purposes a reflecting telescope of which the mirror will be ten feet across. So far as size is concerned and excellence of workmanship, we have doubtless not yet reached a limit in telescope making, although the difficulty of making a perfect lens or mirror increases rapidly as its size increases.

What astronomers are now seeking, however, is not larger telescopes, but good locations in which to plant the instruments they have already. It makes all the difference in the world in the performance of a telescope where it stands. The largest and finest telescope yet constructed, if it were located in the heart of Philadelphia, would not be as serviceable as a good instrument with only a six-inch lens. The drawback is that the astronomer has to look, not merely through the telescope, but also through some two hundred miles of vapor-laden and dust-laden atmosphere; moreover an atmosphere which is never quiet and is often in a state of violent commotion caused by conflicting and interlacing currents of warm and cold air. One who has never used a telescope can have but a very imperfect idea of what is meant by "atmospheric disturbance." Look across a bon-fire or across the top of a chimney for which a current of hot air is ascending, and observe how everything seen through this air is flaring and wavering, and you will witness in a small way a phenomenon with which the astronomer is only too familiar. The nights on which a large telescope can be used at its full power are exceedingly rare. Usually the astronomer must content himself with using a "low power," that is, must use his telescope with no more than a half or a fourth of its capacity, since the more he attempts to magnify an object seen the more obtrusive the disturbance will become.

The great Lick telescope was located at an elevation of 4000 feet above the sea level in the hope and expectation of getting it above the worst part of this vexatious atmosphere. Yet, even on Mount Hamilton, the conditions of seeing are so unfavorable that it is rare indeed that the great telescope can be used upon the planets, which to be seen well must be well defined, with a power of 1000 diameters, although the telescope has theoretically more than twice this power. Ordinarily the powers used upon these objects range from 250 to 700 diameters, the most often used being, according to Professor Barnard, a power of 500, the state of the atmosphere not permitting any higher magnification.

The best locations for telescopes thus far tried seem to be at Arequipa, in Peru, at an elevation of 8000 feet above the sea, and at Flag-staff, Arizona, where Percival Lowell has established his observatory, at an elevation of 7250 feet. Elevation, however is not the only condition necessary for "good seeing." Professor Pickering ascribed the excellence of the Arequipa station quite as much to its pure and dry air as to its altitude. He states that it was a very unusual thing to see a third magnitude star set—to see it actually on the horizon. No one in this vicinity ever saw even a first magnitude star set. There is too much dust and moisture in the air.

The main advantage that a large over an small telescope is that it gathers more light and thus increases the number of stars visible. Its true work is in sidereal astronomy—in the study of star clusters, double stars and nebulae. In this work it is supreme; the bigger it can be made the better. But for the study of Venus and Mars and the moon the telescopes which we already have are large enough and good enough until some place for locating a telescope is found better than any yet discovered.—from the Phila. Record, of Twelfth Mo. 19, 1896.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Senate by a vote of 43 to 29 has refused to ratify the General Arbitration Treaty between the United States and Great Britain, negotiated by Secretary Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote. The rules of the Senate require a majority of two-thirds for the ratification of treaties.

The Secretary of the Treasury has sent a communication to the United States Senate, in reply to a resolution of inquiry, recommending that the tax on distilled spirits be reduced to 90 cents a gallon. He says the present rate has had the effect of greatly increasing illicit distilling.

On the 16th instant the Supreme Court of the United States rendered its decision in the suit against the Bell Telephone Company, which sustains the validity of the Berliner patent. The decision entitles the existence of the patent for nearly two years.

Governor Black has signed the Greater New York charter.

On the 4th instant a representative of the Interior Department began at Olean, New York, an investigation of the manner in which the leases for oil well operations were obtained from the Seneca tribe of Indians. Testimony was given that a Salamanca hotel keeper was present at the Seneca council and supplied the Indians freely with whiskey.

The new Mine Investigating Company of Pennsylvania last week, Ex-Astoria General Palmer was called. He said he is identified with the mining interests in so far as he owns a little coal land and is counsel for a few coal corporations. Business is in a very depressed situation now. Mines are producing as much coal as they have orders for. He could not see any one else who does not think that the mine can, unless the Legislature would form itself into a parliament of mankind and attempt to regulate the business of the world. Gen. Palmer says that there are 147 iron-ore saloons in Wilkesbarre; that if the money spent in saloons were spent for living purposes, there would be 147 schools, child, half-dothing family of 1000. He saved $2,000 in twelve years by having 500 acres. He put ten men to work, got the farm in good order, planted cotton, corn and sugar cane, and cleared the first year $2,500. He has continued to add to his land possessions, paying spot cash for every acre, and now is the owner of 2,100 acres of land, from which he makes 1000 bales of cotton annually. Besides his success on the farm he has developed the country supply store idea, and thus makes in thousands of dollars a year. He also owns a comfortable residence in Bainbridge. His profits last year were over $75,000.

The Governor of Iowa has signed the new State liquor law, including the sections allowing manufacturing.

The very deepest hole that man has yet succeeded in making in the earth is said to be near Rybik in Silesia, where the boring through strata of coal and rock has reached a depth of about 6,770 feet. The contract for the contract is believed to be an oil well at Pitsburg, which has reached a depth of 5,740 feet, but is to be bored much deeper for the sake of the information it may furnish to science.

By the will of the late Lewis Crozer, of Delaware County, $500,000 is bequeathed for a homoeopathic hospital, with a home for incurables attached, while $250,000 is given to the city of Chester for a free library.

Some geologists are inclined to believe that Cape Cod is gradually sinking or wearing away.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 418, which is 71 less than the previous week, and 9 more than the corresponding week of 1900. Of the foregoing, 163 were males and females was the same—64 died of pneumonia; 44 of heart disease; 32 of consumption; 20 of apoplexy; 16 of diphtheria; 14 of nephritis; 14 of old age; 14 of cancer; 13 of inanition; 11 of typhoid fever; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of bronchitis; 10 of inflammation of the brain; 9 of septicaemia; 9 of marasmus, and 9 of convulsions.

Markets.—U. S. 2's, 96 a 98; 4's, reg, 110 1/2 a 111; coupon, 112 1/2 a 112; new 4's, reg, 123 1/2 a 123; 5's, 112 1/2 a 113; currency 6's, 104 a 107.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5 1/2 a 6c; other Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4 c.

FOREIGN.—On the 4th instant a wooden structure in Paris, in which a charitable bazaar was being held, was destroyed by fire, the illuminating apparatus of a cinematograph having exploded. The stalls were presided over by leaders of Parisian society and there were from 1500 to 1800 persons in the building. A terrible panic followed the alarm of fire and a rush was made for the exits. Many persons were trampled and crushed to death before the flames reached them. The structure burned so rapidly that the roof fell in twelve minutes, and in twenty minutes the building and contents were entirely destroyed. The number of persons killed was 10.

On the 6th instant the Duc d'Anjou died suddenly at Zucco, Sicily, from shock on hearing of the death of his niece, the Duchesse d'Alencon, caused by the Paris fire. He was the fourth son of Louis Philippe, King of France.

Mrs. Segny and Quenisset, of Paris, who have made a prediction of the effect of Mars, advise all persons with weak hearts to keep away from the rays. The doctors say that the rays produce an unendurable palpitation, which is apt to cause fatal trouble.

The pact of the Powers constituting the Triple Alliance has been renewed for a period of six years.

On the 18th instant, after a battle of fifteen hours, the Greeks defeated from Pithagorah, 1000 monks, thirteen miles south of Pharsala. The Turks have taken possession of Pharsala. The Greeks had about 20,000 men, and against them were 50,000 Turks.

It is estimated that the loss of the Greeks in the fighting at Velestino and Pharsala was 1000 killed and 1000 wounded. The Turks lost 6000 men.

A despatch from Athens, dated 19th inst., says: "The Government has addressed a request to the Powers to allow their admirals in Cretan waters to permit the Greek warships to embark the troops that have been recalled. The Government explains the small force as the urgent need of men for the defence of Thessaly."

Greece, it is stated, has made application in writing to the Powers, through their representatives at Athens, with a view of obtaining mediation. All the representatives have promised in their replies to us their best offices, except the German Minister, who has merely acknowledged the receipt of the note from the Cabinet.

A collective note has been handed to the Greek and Turkish Governments calling upon them to cease hostilities on the assurance that the Power will undertake the final solution of the pending troubles.

Turkey demands as the price of peace an indemnity of $15,000,000, a rearrangement of the Greek frontier cession of the Greek fleet to Turkey, and the settlement of the Cretan question.

The note of the Powers to be presented to Greece is to the following effect: Upon a formal declaration of war by the Powers, the Powers propose to agree to such an autonomous régime for Crete as the Powers in their wisdom shall deem best, and accept unreservedly the counsels of the Powers, they will intervene in the interests of peace. It is understood that Greece will assent to all these conditions.

A recent consular report furnishes the following information: The camphor thrives only in certain localities, usually within reach of the sea atmosphere. They must face south, and have an average yearly temperature of 15 degrees C. The tree grows about one and one-half inches a year. It sometimes attains a circumference of 40 feet. When a tree 40 years old yields 210 lbs per cho (two and one-half cwt) of camphor, 210 lbs of camphor per acre have been yielded so indiscriminately that there are practically none available, and the price of the product has greatly advanced. Chips of stumps and roots of trees cut down decades ago are used by the Japanese farmers in winter for making crude camphor. The process is so wasteful that it is estimated that only two per cent of the camphor is obtained from the chips. It is expected that the introduction of improved apparatus will increase the yield manifold. Crude camphor contains on an average from 10 to 15 per cent of camphor oil, which yields, in turn 50 per cent of camphor. Merchants and refiners are now looking to Formosa, where a considerable extent of cultivation is found for a further supply.

President Zelaya, of Nicaragua, has signed the law abolishing capital punishment on after Seventh Month 1st, next.

The migration of the French-speaking people of Canada to the New England States has assumed enormous proportions in recent years, and shows no signs of abating. The French population of the Province of Quebec is 1,200,000 while according to the census of 1890 the number of French Canadian and of persons of Canadian extraction in the United States was 840,000. The late M. Mercier predicts that by 1910 there would be more French Canadian by birth and descent in the United States than in Canada.

NOTICES.

WESTERN QUARTERLY MEETING OF FRIENDS.—The train leaving Broad Street Station, Philadelphia at 7.17 A. M. on the 21st instant, will be met at West Grove to convey (free of charge), those desiring to attend the Western Quarterly Meeting of Friends, to be held at London Grove, Chester County, Pa. It would assist the Committee if those intending to come could inform by postal in advance.

WESTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westston School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7.17 and 8.46 A. M. and 2.53 and 4.32 P. M. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare on Westston trips fifteen cents on special trips, twenty-five cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, wire West Chester Phone 88 EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't.

WESTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters in regard to instruction and discipline should be addressed to WILLIAM F. WICKERSHAM, Principal. Payments on account of board and tuition, and communications in regard to business should be forwarded to EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent. Address, Westston P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

WESTON BOARDING SCHOOL.—The General Com union meet at the School on Fourth-day morning, the 19th instant, at 8 o'clock. The Committee on Instruction and the Committee on Admissions meet the preceding evening, at the School, at 7 P. M.

Richard Esterbrook came to America in '59, at first with the intention only of visiting son, who was living in America, but soon it settled on his mind that it would be best to retire himself and family permanently. He fled in Camden, N. J., and commenced the manufacture of steel pens, a business which rapidly developed, and is still successfully carried on at that place.

Richard Esterbrook ever retained a warm attachment to many of his old English friends. This is pleasantly shown by a letter to one of them, dated Fourth Month 13th, 1874:

"My Beloved Friend, John Elliott:—

Thy letter, dated the eighteenth ult., came to hand, and acted like a cordial upon a fainting traveller, and I am most sincerely obliged to thee for it, and above all, I thank my gracious Heavenly Father in that He hath been pleased in his mercy to keep open in thy heart the spring of brotherly love towards thy old friend—a feeling which I can assure thee I truly reciprocate, and even now with tears, how mysterious are the ways by which we are led in the passage through time, and how different are the experiences allotted in the inscrutable wisdom of Him who seeth the end from the beginning, and who said unto Peter, his servant, "What I do thou knowest not now, but thou shalt know hereafter." The bearing these things may have upon our everlasting share in the life that hath no end, we cannot say now. Many and very great have been my trials and afflictions, but the Lord is good and stronghold in the day of trouble, can my poor soul in humble reverence and gratitude declare. I was delighted to me to hear of thy dear wife and of your dear daughter Annie, and I tried to picture you mentally, but cannot do much in this way, the change altogether is so great, and a great change has taken place in me, for I am now old and gray headed, my dear friend, and I adopt the ancient language, "Oh, God, forsake me not." I have been humbled in gratitude to the preserver of men that hath pleased Him to spare my dear wife to me, so that we have been permitted to travel together, in a moderate share of good health on the whole, and partaking of our sorrows together, and at seasons, of those joys with which the world cannot intermeddle. This I have esteemed as an especial favor from the hand of the Lord. Although, like Job of old, I have been lifted up to the wind and my substance dissolved.

Thy account of the changes that have taken place is interesting to me. I have myself often gone over them, more particularly as regards our own Society. Some of those who have been removed were near and dear to me—with whom I took sweet counsel, and walked to the house of God in company. But they are gone to their eternal reward, and we are left a little longer to fill up our measure of service and suffering, according to the will of God. I am concerned to crave sometimes that this may be our happy and blessed experience, and then we may realize that our afflictions, which are but as for a moment (when compared with eternity) will work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, while we look not at the things which are seen, which are temporal, but at those things that are not seen, which are eternal.

I did contemplate a letter to thy dear sister Mary, about the time of our last birth-day, for I remember we are near an age, and I thought much of her, and think of her now with much affectionate regard, which I hope will never wear out with time. And that indeed my endeared friend, we may live in each other's hearts as epistles written not with ink but with the spirit.

I have been much interested in noticing the movements of my beloved friend, Louisa Allen, and hope she will be preserved on the right hand and on the left, in the only safe path, under the guidance of the one Shepherd. It is a day of wonderful unsettlement, and of cutting cables, and drifting away from the old moorings, and the very foundations are even called in question. I look for further developments as fruits of the same nature. Whatever may be the calling of other religious bodies, and whatever place may have been assigned to them in the universal church, I am persuaded there was a place to which we were called, to uphold among them, and in the sight of the nations, distinguishing views and great testimonies,—whether this place is or can be maintained in the existing state of things amongst us, I must leave. Vain is the thought of that man who thinks he can promote the Kingdom of Christ in his own will—"Not by might, nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." And it is only his own works that can praise Him who is still, blessed be His Name, head over all things to the Church.

It is painful to reflect and to feel that our own acknowledged principles must be pleaded for, and even contended for, among our own people. And there are others among us who are rather disposed to keep those views which really distinguish us, in the background, as if they had scarcely the courage to avow them. We must be willing to be accounted as fools for Christ's sake and the Gospel. These things ought not so to be, and I hope the Lord in his mercy and goodness will yet preserve and continue a remnant at least, who will be rightly qualified to uphold the Truth in the love of it.

Thy allusion to my old friend, Samuel Bone, is interesting to me. I have a strong attachment to him, and hope he will be favored as he descends the hill of life to have his prospects brightened as to that life that is beyond the grave. Please give my dear love to him, and to H. Edgcombe, when thou sees him.

I noticed with a good deal of interest the excitement you have had at Li-keard, and my thoughts took me back to some former experiences. It seems to me if I had been there I should not have voted for Horsman, and I am surprised to see the course taken by some men.

I may, however, not have a correct impression of the real state of things. It is a disappointment I often encounter, that of seeing men from whom you had hoped better things, giving up the battle of ideas, virtually abandoning principles, giving practical evidence they could never have been truly born of them, and so they revert back to the common rule of mankind. Well truth is truth, and a man can afford to be in the smallest minority whose feet are established on the true foundation.

I notice with interest thy elevation to the office of chief magistrate of my native town. I hope it may be a right step. I have no doubt thy acceptance of the office was a great satisfaction to those who desired purity in the administration of the duties of the office, and a general influence on the side of right. Its bearing upon our own best interests is the chief and all-important matter for us to consider. I notice we may mostly judge the quality of things by their effects on our minds. The state of things in this country at the present time is discouraging—it is almost overrun with corruption. The greed for office and official plunder is fearful to contemplate. Office-seeking has become one of the industries of the country.

I find that to judge rightly of a form of government, we must not be led away by mere abstract theories. A government must be estimated by its results, and I am much of the mind that there is no government under the sun where the results are better on the whole than in our own old country. Liberty with order seems to me better secured under it than here in this land of boasted liberty."

Among the incidents related by R. E. of occurrences connected with his life in England, I find the following:

1884.—Fifth Month 7th.—R. Esterbrook related the following incident. A friend of his, who was naturally not of a liberal disposition, attended a circular meeting, held at Newport, England. While there he saw a Friend who was in attendance, and an impression fastened on his mind, to give him a guinea. He was not acquainted with the man or his circumstances, and it seemed like taking a liberty which he hesitated about. So he put it by for the time; but seeing the same Friend afterwards the feeling revived so strongly that he took him aside, and told him how his feelings had been directed, that he did not know his circumstances, but wished him to put the money in his pocket, and make whatever use of it he pleased. The Friend then told him that when he left home all the money he had in the world was fourteen pence; but he felt it his duty to come to the meeting, and now, through his liberality, he had been made rich.

1884.—Ninth Month 4th.—R. E. related to me an experience that befel him in England many years before. He had accompanied an older Friend on a religious visit. At Chew Magna, one who had waited on them, said privately to Richard before the meeting, that his communication the day before, had been very clear and satisfactory to the people as to the great doctrine of regeneration through the Spirit of Christ, but that some of them remarked in reference to it, "Where is the blood?"

Richard made but little reply, simply saying, "We are poor creatures;" but he was brought under an inexpressible weight of exercise, which continued throughout the meeting, and after it. A large company dined at the house of a wealthy Friend, and there was pleasant conversation, in which R. could take no part, but eat his food quietly, under great oppression. When the cloth was removed, and the fruits brought on, a sudden covering of solemnity spread over the company, under which the way opened for R. to deliver a short communication. The load all disappeared from his mind. The change was astonishing to himself. The Friends were exceedingly kind and attentive.

1883.—Sixth Month 7th.—On our way to Evesham, Richard Esterbrook spoke of "Billy" Bray, a Cornwall Methodist, whom he knew very well. He was a good man but somewhat eccentric. He one day referred to the declaration that we must become fools before we could be made wise; and remarked, "The Lord had not so much trouble with me in that way, as with some others, for I never was wise, never had much sense."

Richard also spoke of a Cornwall miner, named Venan, who, with a fellow workman, was down the shaft of a copper mine, preparing for a blast. By some accident the fuse was cut off too short, so that a premature explosion was inevitable. There was but time to hoist one person out of the danger. Venan said in his companion, "you have a family, get in the bucket, in a minute I shall be in heaven." The man did so, and Venan crouched in a corner of the mine, holding a large stone before his face, to protect his eyes, of which the miners are very careful, as they are often injured. The explosion took place, and when the smoke cleared Venan was found to be uninjured.

1883.—Eighth Month 31st.—R. Esterbrook attended our Select Preparative Meeting, and dined with us. He spoke of his first voyage across the Atlantic ocean. He had a great dread of an ocean passage; but before he left home, felt, as he believed, a Divine assurance that he would be carried across in safety. So strong was his faith in this opening that though the voyage was long and stormy, his confidence never failed. The mighty ship was tossed like a cork on the waves; and when rolling in the trough of the sea, the yards would seem to touch the waves, as if the vessel would never recover itself, but all was to him a source of enjoyment, from the sense of safety with which he was favored. He remembered the language of the Palmist, "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in the great water; these see the works of the Lord, and his wonders in the deep."

1885.—Ninth Month 12th.—R. E. described an experience of many years ago. At London Yearly Meeting, in a meeting for worship, he felt an impression to speak, but postponed it till the right time had passed, when the opening was withdrawn, and a distressing feeling of condemnation took its place. Under the bitterness of this, he was willing to do anything to obtain relief, but all commission to speak was withdrawn.

When attending Yearly Meeting a subsequent year, as he was seated at the breakfast table with other Friends, it seemed as if a veil or curtain was lifted, and he saw before him the Women's Yearly Meeting. The vision soon passed from sight, and from memory. Some days after, a Friend proposed paying a religious visit to the Women's Yearly Meeting. Liberty was given, and again the vision came before Richard's mental eye, with a remembrance of his sufferings on a previous occasion, and he offered to accompany the Friend, acknowledging that he was under a similar concern.

In the Women's Meeting his Friend relieved his mind, while Richard sat without a thought of what it might be his duty to speak. In a few minutes after the other had finished, an opening suddenly presented, and R. E. arose and uttered what was given him to say.

WHO WERE THE BIGOTS?—Not long since an infidel lecturer visited a town to deliver a series of lectures against the Bible and Christianity. The people of the community took no particular interest in it, and so there was only a fair attendance. The lecturer stood it very well for a night or two, and then began a tirade of abuse of the Christians in the town for their "bigotry" in refusing to hear his arguments against their religion. He made his point good and strong by using the fact that they were unwilling to hear him, and so they must be bigots of the worst kind. When he had finished he gave an opportunity for persons who desired to do so, to ask any questions or make any remarks. A man arose and said:

"I would like to know how many infidels there are present, and in order to test the matter I will ask all the infidels present to stand up." About fifty arose, nearly all the people present. "Now," said he, when they had sat down, "I would like all of those who have risen and said they were infidels, who have attended church in the last five years, to stand up." Five of them arose, when he continued,

"Just one-tenth of you have been willing to hear both sides, and according to the judgment of the lecturer this evening nine-tenths of you are bigots, for you are too bigoted to hear the arguments in favor of Christianity." He sat down, nothing more was said, and the meeting was dismissed.—Christian Oracle.

THE BIBLE IN AFRICA.—A missionary speaking at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Bible Society, held at Montreal, said that in the last eight months the natives of Uganda had bought thirteen thousand two hundred Bibles or portions of the Bible. The books have to be carried many miles into the interior from Zanzibar. The Negroes will not have a book unless it is exactly three by six inches in size. They cannot be induced to accept even the gift of one that is larger. The reason is that this size will fit into an English biscuit tin, the only receptacle they have into which the white ant cannot make its way.—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

RESPONSE TO THE REQUEST FOR AN OPINION AS TO "HOW THE SALOON CAN BEST BE SUPPRESSED—IN THE NEAR FUTURE OR NOT."

In considering the wording of the proposition submitted to me, as above expressed, there is once presented a difficulty in undertaking an reply, because of the awkward presence in the sentence of the little word "can." The meaning of this auxiliary verb, according to Webster is "to be able; to have power, either physical or moral." Were the inquiry as to how to suppress the saloon put to those who are in possession of the delegated power of the people—our executive officers, legislators, judges, etc. and these officials really wanted the stunbling block of the saloon removed, there would be a difficulty whatever in framing an answer.

Thus, when this Commonwealth's worth Founder came hither from England, he came with a code of beneficent laws in possession, as proprietary, and with councillors and as emblemen actuated largely by desires to promote the real good of the people, there was presented the willingness and the ability to consider and try how we can bring this or that just purpose to pass. Similarly, in colonial Carolina, when the Quaker, John Ardebale, one of the eight proprietaries, was named Governor of the province, and given pretty large powers, he remarkably demonstrated in the brief period he held the office, what willingness an ability can do in the way of the correction of abuses, oppressions and disorders, the assembly for the first time in its history tendering an address of grateful thanks to the proprietaries.

And yet it was the direct aim of the Quaker proprietaries who founded Pennsylvania, as well as West New Jersey, to lodge the power direct in the people, so that if affairs went wrong they would devolve upon themselves to correct their mismanagement. It was a memorable message of theirs, that "We lay a foundation for ages to understand their liberty as men and as Christians, that they may not be brought into bondage but by their own consent; for we put the power in the people." Now, is not all the trouble of which we have so long been complaining a consequent of our own consent, seen that we have put the power in the hands of the partisan political caucus, and its chief ally the keeper of the saloon?

Our duty in the premises—the can and the ought to be about the suppression of the liquor traffic—is to be found, I think, very close to that above quoted message of two centuries ago to the settlers by the Delaware's side. The liquor question even at that time, though in a mild way, confronted our predecessors. What did they do about it? It was an age when coffee tea and cocoa were not the table beverages that they are to day, and it was a hundred years' advance of the utterance of the first public protests, by Benezet and Rush, against the use as drink of ardent spirits and intoxicants generally. Friends of that day believed they were doing no harm in making moderate use of wine and mal liquors; but they soon observed that the Indian fell easily under the assaults of the alluring and potent fire-water. In treating with them for the cession of their lands, the Friends had given long with a great variety of useful articles, a few kegs of rum, beer and cider; but, from a special examination made by me a number of years ago, relative to the extent to which liquors gured in all the early treaties of Penn and his associates, I can say that their total amounted to quantity so comparatively little, that it would be held of slight account indeed, as representing a single day's sales, by many a holder of high license privilege of this present time. Only two years elapsed after Penn's landing, when the sale of rum or other strong liquors to the Indians was forbidden. An instructive historic view to be remembered, was the notable gathering of Friends and Indians in Burlington Woods in 1685, when one of the eight chiefs here assembled told how the Dutch had first sold his people liquors which they learned to love—how the Swedes had continued the sale, and many scores of his people were dead by reason of it—"But now," he continued, "there a people come to live amongst us that have eyes; they see it to be for our hurt, and we know it to be for our hurt; they are willing to deny us profit of it for our good."

We do indeed seem to be a long time catching up to this lesson and keeping abreast of its practice. In formal conferences of the religious denominations there appears a pretty general concurrence with the advanced sentiment that the liquor traffic can not be legalized without sin. Our own amended Discipline advises Friends to "in no case sign petitions for or accept licenses for the sale of alcoholic beverages, or [to] rent or lease their buildings for the manufacture or sale of such liquors." When comes to the point of casting our votes, however, how do we lean to the expediency arguments of our favorite daily paper, or to the careful-to-often platform of our political party, or then to the clear ethics of Holy Writ. When last year's platform of one of the two principal parties adopted the safely circumspect expression declaratory of "sympathy with all just and legitimate efforts to lessen and prevent evils of intemperance and promote morality," the Wine and Spirit Gazette, readily endorsing its sympathy plank, added, "So do we, and so do all decent, honest, liquor dealers. It meets the approval of the trade."

At the late hearings before the License Court, Philadelphia, there was read a remonstrance against a certain applicant, in the shape of a letter written by the applicant's mother, an aged woman of eighty-five years, in which she requested the Court not to grant her son a license, stating that he was the father of nine children ranging between the ages of four years and twenty years, their mother being dead, and she stated that if a license was granted her son it would have a sadly demoralizing effect on the only. To which stirring appeal the president of the board made reply that the man in question was the head of his own family, and as he appeared to be of age he was no longer under subjection to his mother. So the license was granted.

The same day, in the Quarter Sessions Court of the city, a lad of eighteen years was placed on trial for the murder of his father. The other of the boy testified that she had been married nearly twenty years, her husband during all that time drinking heavily, as a general rule spending all his earnings for rum. She did her married life had been one continual round of abuse and cruelty, her husband repeatedly threatening her life. Frequently he abused his children from the house with a knife in his hand, and it was upon such an occasion that the son, defending himself from his drunken parent's attack, had fatally struck the latter with the handle of an axe.

In the daily paper (reputed the best in the city), containing both the foregoing tragic incident, and the incident of the mother's futile remonance before the licensing judges, appeared two specially displayed, double column width advertisements of liquor dealers—one of them speaking the praise of a particular brewing of beer, and the other that of the excellent brandy and whisky and rare rum turned out by a firm of distillers. Every daily paper in the city will freely advertise these dangerous goods as they have the opportunity; all of them believe in restricting the number of the privileged traffickers, charging them well for their licenses, for none is to be found who will say with the Indian sachem in Burlington woods, "They are willing to deny the profit of it for our good!"

I see not, therefore, how the saloon can be suppressed, either now, in the near future, or ever, through voting for those who are committed to the continuance of the evil institution, and who are so largely entangled in oath-bound fraternities where the ways and methods of the secret caucuses and wire-pulling partisan devices are learnt. It might be that the ballot in the hands of woman would effect a great change for the better, helping weak man to more wisely discharge his duty to the State; but should the would-be helper also drift into the methods that are hidden and devious, the political condition would not be improved, and the home would suffer a loss that would be manifest in the citizen of the future.

Pending this possible extension of the suffrage, there appears hope for improvement through reform of the civil service, now so much agitated, though it may be said that there would be no assurance that the bettered service would mean anything more elevating in its treatment of the liquor traffic than that it should keep within "decent bounds," and pay handsomely toward the expenses of the State in being thus permitted to live. No city in the world is probably better provided with material, civic improvements than is Paris, yet the dwellers therein are assuredly not known beyond all others for their temperance or godliness.

"The power," continues to be "in the people." The saloon can be suppressed, and in the not distant future, if we so will it, but the goal will not be permanently attained through the law, education and a reformed civil service. Repeating the wise charge of two centuries ago, we are bidden to "understand [our] liberty as men and as Christians;" and so we reach the conclusion that as godliness prevails more and more in the hearts of the children of men, the attractive forces of the spirit will successively break forth—"Love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance."—and the saloon will vanish out of sight. The G-spel will most effectually overcome the saloon.

JOSEPH W. LEIDY,

ROCKFORD, Fourth Month 14th, 1897.

THE marvellous and rapidly increasing commerce of the great lakes may well excite the astonishment of those who are not familiar with it, and greatly exceeds that of our country upon the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The past season some three thousand four hundred vessels plied the waters of the lakes, with an aggregate of over one million three hundred thousand tons register, and transported over forty million tons of freight. Five times as many vessels pass through St. Mary's canal at the outlet of Lake Superior as pass through the Suez Canal in Egypt.—The Presbyterian.

FOR "THE FRIENDS."

"If thy eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light."

To be single in heart Godward is to know something of purity of heart by the effectual work of the gift and grace of God in the heart, casting forth therefrom the unholiness and the unclean that defiles the inner temple of our being as did the merchandise of old the temple set apart for the worship and outward manifestation of his presence.

When the eye is single it is no longer our purpose to shape our course according to the ways, maxims or purposes of others, but it is, "What wilt thou, Lord, that I should do or leave undone?"

The spirit manifested in the letter in THE FRIEND of Third Month 27th, signed C. H., I read, and believe there was a righteous concern on the mind of the writer to know a single eye and purpose in life to the glory of God. I am not going to be the judge of others in their acts, but will leave a passage in my experience for the benefit and warning of some not to lean upon age or the length of experience as to many years, when advice is given, but to keep to the single eye to God and his will and purpose.

An aged Friend, bordering on eighty, addressed me, a young man of twenty-eight or nine, to remember the uncertainty of life, and the need to make provision in case I might be called suddenly away from my delicate wife and our then one only child.

I heard the Friend out, and then said, "Abraham, I have no freedom to do as thou wishest me, and my wife and I are one in this matter. My freedom stands in obedience, not to my own will, but to the higher sense given me of what is right for me.

"Charles," said the aged Friend, if that is your ground I have not another word to say."

To this narrative I have but to add if there was that singleness of heart and mind to God, I believe it would be very different with very many in this our day to what it is. We like to reason out for ourselves and to hear others reason out according to our mind what pleases and suits our tastes and desires, rather than to keep the single eye Godward.

Thus it happens that dimness and a want of true sensibility grows over the mind and clouds it, and the sense is lost as to what it really is to have a single eye only to the glory of God.

There are so many ways we may glorify God, and in no way more than by a patient continuance in well-doing according to the mind and will of God, which is often quite contrary to the mind and will of man, and how frequently by suffering.—"The foxes have holes and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of Man has not where to lay his head." Is there no analogy between the Lord and his servant. It is so easy to plead for that which is most agreeable and genial to us, that the rougher course into which the single eye would lead can and is very easily overlooked. Now, after the lapse of more than thirty years, I believe it right thus to express my mind anew, for the sense of the rectitude of the position abides with me, and that may believe they trust in God and their hope is upon Him alone, while they are leaning upon and their hope is in their own wise forethought.

Such is the subtle device of the enemy of all righteousness to work into the mind an imaginary dependence under the cover of a noble independent, yet all the while stealing the heart's affections away from God. There are other outcomes of a want of singleness that produce a want of fruitfulness in labor and of service. It is the consecrated vessel that the Lord uses for his purposes of mercy. The whole heart, the whole trust, the perfect confidence. It is so easy to slip away from the safe anchorage of faith in God, and to come to lean upon the arm of flesh. I am jealous for God's Truth in the inward parts, knowing how easy it is to let the reason in, by which the temple of God is defiled. When singleness of purpose is in any measure departed from there is the injury not to ourselves alone but to our fellows, to whom we may or may not become a blessing, so that a double responsibility rests upon those who make profession of faith in Christ, that they belie it not by falseness thereunto.

I am not the judge of my fellows, but I am conscious that there is a living upon what we have been as a people, rather than by what we are, and on that side of the ocean and on this there is great need for close searching of heart as to the cause of our lack of baptizing power in our meetings and in our ministry.

Doubtless, if we have lost the true centre of dependence, and of waiting in silence of soul, we may be in the position of a people of old, not knowing our right hand from our left.

We do not depart altogether and all at once out of the right into the wrong, but by degrees and bit by bit, so that a something else gets the place in us and the power over us instead of the great I Am. Sad when it is so, but let us not ignore the fact of our lack of the Divine ruling, governing, controlling power with us as a people, the rightful acknowledgment is the first step in the path of return, and it is possible to be recovered out of our lapsed condition, which will be when our false trusts are removed, in wealth, in learning, in false refinement, and our coming in the nakedness of self to feel after God, to worship Him, bow down before Him, and obey in the little as in the much, so that God through Christ will be honored and exalted and glorified.

There may be a seeming sanctity, but little purity. May God in mercy deliver us therefrom, by giving singleness of eye and purpose toward himself. If there be truthness to God our duty to our neighbors will be filled. We may maintain outward decorum, but if the inwardness of soul with God in communion is lost, what will it profit? It is the emptiness and nakedness of soul before God that gets the filling that is of and from himself, and where this is lacking nothing else can take its place.

We may hold to the shell of profession after the kernel of life is departed, and I may not often, if again, have the opportunity to express it, but I have a fear upon my spirit that God is grieved with us as a people, and has largely hid his face and his power from us.

I can but express that which is with me and there leave it. All power is in his hands. He can turn the hearts of the children of men toward himself—may He in mercy do so and among them may I now and ever be found, though but the least in the household of faith to his praise and glory.

CHARLES W. THOMSON.

GLASGOW, Scotland, Fourth Month 16th, 1897.

It is only another of those futile efforts to present Heaven in tangible form. There is enough said in the Scriptures about Paradise to indicate that it will be a blessed, pure and glorious state, adapted to purified and perfected natures, endless in duration, the abode of blood-bought humanity and a sphere of a Christ manifestation in glory—enough to quicken hope, inspire to duty, comfort in suffering and sustain in dying. For the rest, we must await the realization, remembering, "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, the things God hath in store for them that love Him."—Presbyterian.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
THY WILL BE DONE.

(Copied from an old number of the British Friend.)

Thy will be done! Not lightly be it spoken,
To fall like tinkling cymbals on the air;
Beyond all other words are these the taken
Of resignation conquered from despair.

Not all who say, "Lord! Lord," can tell what measure
Of heavy cost it takes their depths to learn;
What loss of ease, what sacrifice of treasure,
What exile out of which is no return.

He who has proved this saying bears the traces Of furnace fires that spare the gold alone;
His conversation is in heavenly places;
His life is lived as God's and not his own.

His soul in restful patience he possesses,
Nor sighs for hopes that vanish unfulfilled,
As one who meets with loss yet still ceases
Regretful dreams with spirit half-swilled.

No more in things of time his heart is centred,
For he has seen their preciousness decrease;
Has weighed the world and proved it void and entered
The upper chamber of abiding peace.

Thy will be done! Oh, utterance magnetic!
That thrills anew the soul's divine chords,
With deep compassion for that woe prophetic
Which filled the anguish-chalice of our Lord's.

Behold in that sublime self-abnegation,
What lowly path the man of sorrows trod
And know that out of thy humiliation
Shall grow the grace to stand before thy God.

Then not with lip irreverent he spoken
The hallowed words of God's all-suffering Son;
But say with contrite heart and spirit-broken,
Through loss, through sorrow, "Let thy will be done."

STEWARDSHIP.—Property is a Divine trust. Things are tools, not prizes. Life is not for self-indulgence, but for self-devotion. When, instead of saying, "The world owes me a living," men shall say, "I owe the world a life," then the kingdom will come in power. We owe everything to God but our sins. Fatherland, pedigree, home life, schooling, Christian training,—all are God's gifts. Every member of the body or faculty of mind is ours providentially. There is no accomplishment in our lives that is not rooted in opportunities and powers we had nothing to do with in achieving. "What hast thou that thou didst not receive?" If God gives us the possibilities and the power to get wealth, to acquire influence, to be forces in the world, what is the true conception of life but Divine ownership and human administration? "Of thine own we render thee." All there is of "me" is God's estate, and I am his tenant and agent. On the day of our birth a new lease is signed; on the day of our death, accounts are closed. Our fidelity is the interest on God's principal. "That I may receive mine own with interest" is the Divine intention. So live that when thy summons comes to give an account of thy stewardship, it may be done with joy, and not with grief!—Selected.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"
A Visit to Pink Hill.

Having received an invitation to visit a remarkable growth of Mountain Pink (Phlox subulata), in Delaware County, on Fifth Month 18 1897, in company with a few botanical friends I took the cars to Wawa on the Baltimore Central Road. Dismounting there, we walked up that wooded ravine through which flows Rocky Run. It was a somewhat romantic walk through ground very rich in flowers. Among these we note an abundance of the pretty little Wind-flower (Anemone nemorosa), its cousin the Rine Anemone (Anemone thalictroides), and the delicate little Dwarf Ginseng (Aralia trifolia); here grew also the Wood Betony, better known by the homel name of Loose Wort (Pedicularis Canadensis) the two early flowering Buttercups (Ranunculus fascicularis), with conspicuous bright yellow petals, and the Ranunculus abortivus, with small inconspicuous flowers; the short-leaved Meadow Grass (Poa brevisifolia), so called because the stem leaves are quite short, although the radical leaves are long as in many other grasses; the Blue Cough (Camulophyllum thalictroides), was in bloom. When mature the seeds are deep blue. This plant is not so widely distributed as many others. Have never seen it in the Central and Southern parts of New Jersey, although it grows in the more northern part of that State.

We saw also that curious plant, the India Turnip (Arisema triphyllum). It possesses a soft terranean round stem of a turnip shape, which is farinaceous and wrinkled, and with an intensely acrid juice, which has poisonous properties which disappear in drying or when the plant is boiled. Most country boys are familiar with the taste, but they soon learn to touch cautiously. Once, when walking through the woods in company with an English Friend, who was not familiar with the plant, I gave him piece to taste, not so much in a spirit of mischief as to add to his botanical knowledge. From the number of his exclamations and the energy with which the fragment of Arisema was ejected from his mouth, I believe he long retained a vivid impression of its biting characteristic.

On the steep slope of a bank facing the north were the leaves of the Round-leaved Violet (Viola rotundifolia). It is a northern plant which still survives in mountains and in well sheltered localities. The flowers, which are yellow, had disappeared. We saw also several other violets—Viola pubescens, a yellow flower species with a stem—that is the leaves and flowers do not spring directly from the root. Viola Canina, also possessing a stem and having violet-colored flowers; Viola palmata, one of the most common blue violets. We admired the beautiful bell-shaped flower and the pinnate leaves of the Jacob's Ladder (Polemonium reptans), and the peculiar manner of growth of the Wild Ginger (Asarum Canadense), in which the two rather large, downy leaves, are supported on long footstalks. In their fork is located the solitary flower, which is so close to the ground that it is often concealed beneath the dead leaves with which the earth is covered.

In one part of the wood there grew a considerable number of the Yellow Puccoon (Hydrastis Canadensis); the root stock is yellow and I said to have been used by the aborigines for dying. The flowers are white and the fruit a crimson berry-like mass of seed vessels.

With so many things to claim our attention it may well be imagined that our progress along the banks of Rocky Run was but slow. At last we emerged on a road that leads to Lima, where our party of excursionists were to meet at the house of Dr. Samuel Trimble, a botanist pretty thoroughly conversant with the plants of that region. Gathering up his family, we numbered in all a company of twelve, and concluded to lunch in the woods near by the point of our ultimate destination. Dr. Trimble was pilot, and led the way to a spot which seemed suitable in all respects, except that no water was in sight, although there was a slight ravine such as we often see at the head of a spring. The doctor quickly commenced scraping away the leaves, and throwing with his hands the stones out of the bottom of the depression, and soon made a little pool with a stream running through it, which furnished an ample supply of fluid for our wants. The spring was there, but it had been finding its way underground among the loose stones.

When dinner was ended we crossed the fence which bounded the woods, and found ourselves on the edge of the famous "Pink Hill." It was a beautiful sight. The field contained many trees, almost covered with the red flowers of the Phlox, and with an abundance of white blossoms of the large-flowered Cerastium arvense, the Arabis lyrata, and patches of the delicate bluet (Houstonia carolina), also called Quaker lady—certainly a high compliment to our sisters. The profusion of bloom around one brought a temptation to lie down and roll in his floral wealth, and suggested the story told of an officer in one of the British ships, which had captured a Spanish vessel partly laden with golden coin, on her voyage from America to Europe. He entreated his comrades to be allowed to lie down in the cabin and roll on the precious metal. I was also reminded of the late Richard Esterbrook, who when riding past a field of red clover in full bloom, wished to be seated in an arm chair in the midst of the flowers.

The soil of "Pink Hill" is unproductive and not farmed, but some grass grows on it, which is pastured. The surface is covered with cellular quartz, abounding in minute crystals. The arch is red and contains iron ore, which has been dug at different places, but it is not found in sufficient quantities to be profitable. The hill is evidently a bed of altered serpentine rock, cellular quartz and iron ore are frequently the products of decomposed serpentine.

Dr. Trimble, who has known this locality for many years, says that originally the Phlox was confined to a small part of the field, where it had refuge in the green briars and bushes which verspread the ground. As these were cleared up the Phlox spread, finding a congenial soil. Dr. Darlington, in his Flora Cestrica, speaks of it as growing on sterile rocky hills and serpentine ridges—indeed its fondness for barren soils is such, that many of its admirers have found a difficulty in transplanting it from its native localities to their gardens. In the vicinity of Pink Hill are two spots clear of trees in the woods, called Indian clearings, and supposed to have been made by the aborigines for the cultivation of corn or other vegetables. These are covered with Phlox, and beautiful patches of it are found on serpentine banks in Chester Co., Pa.

We noticed a number of patches of the curious day Apple (Podophyllum peltatum). The erect stem divides into two leafstalks bearing large leaves and a white flower in their fork. The fruit is yellowish and succulent when mature. It is sweet and has a rather mawkish, banalike flavor, which is not very agreeable, yet it is often eaten by country boys, who seem to consider every wild fruit they meet with as so much clear gain. The root is large and creeps horizontally, sending up suckers, which thus form the dense patches in which it grows.

[The members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting will generally have the opportunity of receiving the Extracts from the minutes of its late sittings, but as there are a number of our readers who are not members of this body, we have concluded to insert in THE FRIEND, the lively and instructive Minute on the religious exercises of the meeting, which is contained in the Extracts:—Ed.]

The Friends named to prepare a Minute on the religious exercises which have engaged our attention, produced the following, which was adopted by the meeting:

We have been favored at times during the course of this meeting with a degree of solemn feeling, which we may accept as an evidence of the favor and good presence of our Holy God. Under the constraints of the love of Christ, and with a desire for the welfare of their fellow-members, several of our brethren have been led to communicate to us encouragement and counsel. In guarding against pernicious reading, it is needful not only to be on our guard respecting works of fiction, which are often very wholesome food for the mind, but to avoid those so-called scientific treatises, which tend to undermine our faith in the ever-present superintendence and care of the Creator and upholder of the world over his creatures, and either lead their readers to deny the reality of miraculous events, or endeavor to explain them away, as governed by the ordinary laws of nature.

The report of the Book Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, opened the way to encourage our members individually to do their part in the distribution of the valuable literature of the Society. If Friends were sufficiently alive to this subject, it was believed that way would often open, to hand to a neighbor or stranger, some book that might be helpful to him in giving information as to our doctrines and testimonies, or in turning his attention to subjects of vital importance to himself.

The duty enjoined upon parents to their children by the third Query, and especially to guard them from the corrupting influences of worldly associations, and restrain them from pernicious reading and diversions, was brought to view. The only effective qualification for this service is to be found in submission by parents to the heart-cleansing work of Divine grace in themselves. The Lord Jesus, as the baptizer of his believing followers, will thoroughly purge the soul and set up his kingdom within us. Let all parents open to Him who knocks for admission. The filial relation between them and their tender offspring must awaken a new and powerful sense of responsibility for the present and eternal welfare of the immortal beings entrusted to their care. This should lead to an examination into our own spiritual condition in the sight of Him who is the true Light, and we should seek to realize by faith, that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin. Our daily life and conduct should be brought to the test of his precepts, as recorded in holy writ, and we ought to learn in his school that nothing is too trivial to be regulated by the law of the Spirit of life in Him; that whether we eat or drink, or what-ever we do, all should be done to the glory of God. Thus the loving parent is prepared, and the heart expanded in tender sympathy for the child by example and precept, to instruct and guard its infant mind. As soon as the opening faculties of the child can comprehend spiritual and moral truths, the watchful parent will seek for heavenly wisdom to instill them, and lead its heart to love and obey its Creator. Daily watching and prayer, under a sense of our dependence on God for ability to fulfil our duties to our children, will draw down the Divine blessing on the family.

The reverent and frequent perusal of the Holy Scriptures with them, directing their attention to the gracious Saviour, of whom they testify, and his various offices, as the tenderly visitations of his Spirit may open the Scriptures, will be found fruitful of good.

Such a godly concern will be the highest evidence to children of the value and need of taking up the cross to all that is contrary to the precepts of Christ. They should be instructed that our dress, language, thoughts, recreations, business and behavior in many particulars are to be regulated by his teachings and those of his apostles, as recorded in the New Testament, and that the rules of discipline of our Society on these subjects, conform to them.

Our youth were entreated to yield to these restraining influences and the converting power of the Spirit of Christ, as the means of their highest earthly as well as eternal happiness, and preservation from the delusive snares of worldly pleasure, which often ruin their votaries, both in this life and that which is to come.

A lively concern arose for the proper training and restraining of our children, especially endeavoring to guard them against evil and worldly tendencies. And in the selection of schools for their education, we were reminded of the importance of selecting religiously minded teachers. For if they are persons of worldly or corrupt minds, they will certainly influence the minds of their pupils in a wrong direction, even when they have no such intentions.

Our hearts have been much turned towards our younger members, with earnest desires and prayers that He who can turn the heart, as a man turneth the water-course in the field, may graciously visit them by his Spirit, and bring them into sweet communion with himself, and into obedience to his Divine requirements. There is no way to the kingdom of Heaven except that of self-denial and bearing the cross. But even to those who have in good measure escaped the pollutions that are in the world through lust, Satan presents temptations. He seeks by plausible presentations to hinder that Divine communion in which lies our strength, and to engage the mind in various schemes and employments, some of which may have a show of good. Yet if they are not entered upon in the leading of Christ's Spirit, they may prove very hurtful to the tender seed of life, and tend to promote a spirit of exaltation and self-righteousness; for, as a worthy deceased elder once wrote, "The cross of Christ, that power that bumbles the creature in the dust, is the great object of hatred of the enemy of all righteousness, at which he is ever aiming his shafts."

The church mourns over the loss of many valuable servants, recently removed from among us, and it is to you, dear young Friends, that she looks for worthy successors to fill their places. Gather up their fallen mantles, and with holy resolution tread in the footsteps of the flock of Christ's companions, submitting yourselves in all things to the government of his Spirit. If ye do this, ye will be joined in loving fellowship with those servants of God, who have received command to watch over the flock as those who must give account of their stewardship to the Chief Shepherd, and the aspirations of whose hearts often are for blessings upon you. Some of these can say with the Apostle, "I have no greater joy, than to see my children walk in the Truth," while mourning and tears are their experience when they see those they love wandering from the safe path.

A concern has also been felt for our older members, that they may be fervently exercised for the help and preservation of those younger in experience, endeavoring to guard them against all mistakes, and to encourage them in reverent waiting for and faithfully obeying the manifestations of Divine love. May they take to themselves the advice given by Paul to the Elders of Ephesus, "Take heed to yourselves, and to the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you overseers, to feed the Church of God."

We have been reminded of the solemn nature of the profession we make when we assemble for the purpose of Divine worship, and the necessity that all who are thus gathered should seek to retire in spirit, as into the presence of the Lord.

Thus engaged we shall often be favored to draw our supply of spiritual strength and consolation, directly from our Holy Head. The solemnity with which the meeting may thus be covered will have an effect upon others, and tend to restrain the utterance of words in the wisdom and will of man.

Although every good thing must come from God, and the visitations of his Grace are the moving cause of all righteousness, teaching man to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously and godly, yet it has often pleased Him to bless the labors of those whom He has anointed as preachers of the Gospel. The preservation of the Church on its ancient and sure foundation is closely connected with the maintenance of our testimony as to the right origin and exercise of Gospel ministry. It is a gift bestowed by the Head of the Church upon those whom He has selected and prepared for the service, and it is only to be exercised as He gives the fresh command, and anoints with his qualifying power. No amount of study of the Scriptures, or other means of self-preparation, can make a living minister. The ministry now must be as Paul declared his was, "In the demonstration of the Spirit and with power," and "not with the enticing words of man's wisdom."

How earnest is the exhortation of that deeply-experienced minister, William Penn, "I fervently bow my knees to the God and Father of our Lord, Jesus Christ, that you may ever wait reverently for the coming and opening of the Word of Life, and attend upon it in your ministry and service, that you may serve God in the Spirit."

The young, convinced he exhorted to "a diligent and chaste waiting upon God in the way of his blessed manifestation and appearance of himself to you."

"For you that are the children of God's people a great concern is upon my spirit for your good, and often are my knees bowed to the God of your fathers for you, that you may come to be partakers of the same Divine life and power that has been the glory of this day, that a generation you may be to God, a holy nation and a peculiar people, zealous of good works, when all our heads are laid in the dust."

Finally, "we commend you to God, and to the word of his grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an inheritance among all them which are sanctified."

A Letter from Paris.

Two weeks have passed and we have done no sight-seeing. The weather keeps cool and rainy. Of course we take little walks every day, but we put in the time studying outside of that mostly.

We have had however some very interesting experiences of other kinds, which have given us glimpses into the social life and foreign student life at Paris. For instance, we were at a dinner the other evening. Fortunately there was no one present who could speak English, and we had a very good test of our advancement in the matter of understanding new voices, and expressing ourselves as well. The most interesting person at the table was a large, exceedingly comfortable looking individual whom every one addressed with great respect as "Monsieur l'Abbe." This Monsieur l'Abbe is quite a remarkable person; you could easily imagine him as making a brilliant success in the world in anything he undertook, outside of the office of looking after souls, and yet from his Catholic standpoint that is just where he seems to have succeeded so well. He was an entirely new type to me, and I watched him very closely. He was extremely entertaining, full of stories and anecdotes, and seemed to enjoy the good things of life to the greatest extent. My friend and I kept saying now and then to one another, "everything but spiritual." He talked a good deal with us and promised to come some day and speak only English with us; but soon he explained that his list of English words was limited to three—yes, how, thanksgiving,—but they were pronounced with such a French accent that we could not immediately recognize them. He also promised to read us some English with the French accent, which would be highly amusing. He is now quite an old man. At the time of the Commune, in 1871, he was forced to put in disguise. The Communists wished to put an end to all religion, as well as to all government, and after seizing the Abbots of the Madeleine and Notre Dame, they attempted to secure the one we met the other evening, as well. He, however, escaped, and dressed himself as an Englishman, wearing a false moustache, etc.

All the places of worship in Paris were barricaded at the time. There was one man who knew of his hiding-place, and when there was any one ill or dying among his congregation, this man would go for him, and bring his priestly robes to the house of the sick person, where the Abbot would take off his mask and officiate as priest. The two high dignitaries who had been seized by the Communists, were publicly shot, along with other noted public men; after it became evident that their persecutors could no longer hold the city against the attacks of the French army, which had been forced to lay siege to the city as though it were a hostile one. But I shall have occasion to speak of this again.

Another interesting afternoon this week was spent visiting an American artist, who is studying here. It was a glimpse into the foreign student life of this great city, which is so full of all phases of existence. We are invited to spend the day with him and another friend at Fontainebleau this week and we anticipate much pleasure from the trip.

First-day morning.—This is a bright, clear Easter morning, but not warm, although the trees and grass are very green. I half wakened quite early with the delicious, dreamy consciousness of songs of birds, and great tree trunks reflected in still lakes, with glimpses of white marble, half hidden amid the foliage, and the gentle murmurs of running water. When I was roused finally to full consciousness by the maid's coming with hot water, I found I was again in Paris, although my mind had been wandering back to the enchanting scenes of the last two days, which have impressed themselves indelibly on my memory.

I have no definite ideas of Fontainebleau to give. I enjoyed it all too intensely to materialize the sensations which I felt. That limitless forest, with its innumerable paths and roadways; the dark tree trunks, half hidden by the tender green drapery of the young leaves; the wild, romantic valleys, almost cañons, with steep boulder-covered sides; all these are impressions unlimited by time or space; they belong to nature everywhere. And yet the woods of Fontainebleau are more than that. Without trying at all to realize their historic importance, the atmosphere seemed imbued with the lives of all those royal personages that history has made us acquainted with.

It was here that Francis I., Henry IV., and all the rest of the royalty of France, came to repose themselves from the cares of State. It was here that that little incident occurred between a peasant and Henry IV., which has always amused me. The latter had been hunting with his courtiers, and in chasing a deer he lost his way. Seeing a peasant he requested the latter to assist him in regaining his companions. The peasant replied he would gladly do so, but he had been waiting at that point all day to see the king pass by, and he was afraid he would miss the sight. "Oh," said Henry, "if that is what detains you, you have nothing to do but jump up behind me, for you will be sure to see the king among his courtiers."

While under way, the peasant asked how he should know the king when he saw him. Henry replied, "The one who keeps on his hat will be he." Of course the king was greeted with loud cheers by the crowd on his return; then turning to the peasant, he said, "Well, who is the king?" The peasant scratched his head and answered, "Well, sir, it must be either you or I, for all the rest have their hats off."

But that is a digression. But of course far more than the woods, the chateau is filled with historic associations. It is the only palace left furnished as in the old days. The Louvre is a museum and library; Versailles, a picture gallery; St. Cloud and the Tuilleries were destroyed by the Communists; so that this makes Fontainebleau all the more interesting.

The main delight which I derived from the palace I owe to D'Aubigne's History of the Reformation. Having formed an acquaintance through those interesting pages at the tender age, when impressions are the most vivid and lasting, with Francis I., and Henry IV., these personages stand out in my memory with a vividness far beyond that of any other figures whose acquaintance was made at a later period I cannot tell why, but I always liked Francis I., the persecutions carried on at the time always seemed to me much more closely connected with the authorities of the Sorbonne than with the king. Of course I did not reason at that age. I simply liked him, that was all, and his protestant sister—protestant at least in heart—th mother of Henry IV. (or perhaps grandmother—yes it must be the latter), was one of my heroines, while I faintly recalled over Henry IV.

The chateau of Fontainebleau breathes the atmosphere of those two kings more than any others. One small wing dates way back to St. Louis, in the thirteenth century, but the real palace was built by Francis, and greatly enlarged by Henry IV. There are also wings added by nearly all the other kings of France, including the emperors, so that the whole forms an immense pile of buildings, seemingly limitless. It requires an hour to see the apartments that are open to visitors. As soon as a half-dozen or so persons are collected, a guide offers himself and conducts the party. It is entirely free, but the custom is to give the guide a small fee on leaving as his services are indeed valuable, as he explains everything. Of course no one is admitted to wander around at will, there are too many valuable things exposed for that. One enters what is called the "Cour des Adieux," being a large green, where in 1814, the gardes were assembled to receive the farewell of their great commander, Napoleon, from the balcony there.

The first apartments shown were those of Napoleon. One sees the table upon which he signed his abdication. There is a round hole cut in it by a penknife, which he is said to have unconsciously made at the time. The guide, however, added that he did not believe it was true, for Napoleon knew too well how to conceal his feelings to admit of that. Then came the exquisite apartments of Marie Antoinette. One could not help shuddering while gazing at the beautiful drapery over her bed, to think of what hung over her last resting place. And the exquisite cradle of the little Louis XVIII., by the side of the bed brought no more cheerful associations.

Then we saw the older parts of the palace; but the details mean nothing in describing them, only the ceilings, the walls, the floors, the decorations, express the very highest possibilities of art in these lines. From the most delicate shades of the faintest fabrics, to the richest and deepest colors in plush and tapestry, heavy gold; all that painting, wood carving, mosaic could do, has been done to make this interior a temple to the beautiful; and all the while the millions were crying for bread, and he great cry that went up was heard, the people were averted.

We made twice the entire circuit, because the first time did not satisfy us. And so after having wandered several hours among the innumerable beautiful gardens, I was very glad for lunch the last afternoon, of a little sprinkle of rain, which made the rest of the party refer indoors, and I could slip off alone and wander around undisturbed by other thoughts or feelings than those that quiet, and to external ears, voiceless witnesses, of the past could whisper to me.

The excursion can be made in one day from Paris, but it is hurried, and we felt it would be unsatisfactory, for we neither of us care to go sight-seeing in the ordinary sense. In order to get the best of what one sees, one must come with a mind wholly freed from all pre-occupation, and simply receptive. Otherwise one loses all the reality that the place has to give. In any other spirit one sees only trees, statuary, and some furniture, etc.—nothing one could see at home; the difference being simply that of design or quality. And one cannot hurry into the proper state of mind in which to get the best of things; it is too subtle for that, and flies the greedy touch. It is for this reason that travelling often retards rather than aids one's higher development. It is like filling a house with rare and costly furniture, which has no use but to collect moths and dust, and prevent us from really living.

We had a charming little hotel just across from the chateau. Everything was excellent, though no display, and the pretty French maids in their white caps were polite and obliging. But with characteristic French economy, there was no fire either in our rooms or in the parlors or dining-room. We suggested asking being admitted into the kitchen, and finally succeeded in getting up a little warmth by sitting four on a sofa.

The next morning, when the chocolate was brought to our room, there was no "chauffette" for our feet, so we were forced to bundle up all the rugs to put our feet on, covering them afterwards with pillows. But as the sun came up and we had exercised a little, we felt warm enough.

It was after dark when we came into Paris at the Gare de Lyon, fully an hour by cab from the part of the city where we are staying. It was so delightful after the little outing to come back refreshed in body and mind, and to feel there was a real "chez moi" waiting for us, and not a boarding-house or hotel. E. S. K.

Natural History, Science, etc.

Annual Etiquette.—The otter at the Zoo, on the day on which the great frost of 1895 began, had just been provided with material for a new bed. It was freezing hard; half its pond was covered with ice, and the nice, warm, dry straw was pushed partly into its house, while part of the bundle lay on the bridge, and some in the water. In order to make itself comfortable, all the otter had to do was to step out of its house on to the bridge and pull the dry straw in. There was plenty for a bed without meddling with that in the water at all. But it is not permitted by otter etiquette to do any work on dry ground which can possibly be done in the water. Like most of the etiquette of labor, this is based partly on prejudice, but partly on sound principles.

Unfortunately, in this case the material was one in which weight made no matter, and in which dryness was essential for it to be of any use, that is, for a bed on a frosty night. This did not weigh with the otter in the least. Instead of pulling the straw in dry, it plunged into the icy water, dived and came up on the side of the bridge over which some straw was dipping into the water. It swam along and collected as many of the hanging ends as it could in its mouth; then dived back under the bridge, and dragged all the dry part of the straw into the water, having considerable difficulty in doing so, because it was hitched over the edge of the bridge-plank. It then pulled all the dripping straw into its bed, rushed out, took another plunge and collected another mouthful, which it pulled into the water, and swam off with it as before. After several visits it had collected the whole of what was lying on the plank, had wetted it all thoroughly, and was preparing to go to sleep on it inside its house—a proceeding which almost induced rheumatism at sight among the spectators. But the otter was quite satisfied it had acted according to rule, and was true to amphibious etiquette, down to soaking what were to be its bed-clothes for the coldest night of the year.

Annual Dislike of Solitude.—Voluntary recluses are almost unknown in the animal world. Perhaps the one consistently unsociable creature in Europe is the hamster, an ill-tempered, sulky little rodent. Each hamster lives in a large, roomy burrow all by himself, in defence of which he will fight like a badger against any other hamster who may try to enter. Family life he wholly avoids, never allowing a female inside his burrow, but keeping her at a good distance, and making her find her own living for herself and family. The last burden is, however, not a serious one, for by the time the young ones are three weeks old, each discovers that family life is a great mistake and sets off to make a bachelor burrow for himself and save up beans for the winter. For, in addition to its other amiable qualities, the hamster has that of avarice in a marked degree, and heaps up treasures of corn, rye and horse-beans far in excess of his own private wants for the winter. His favorite plan is to dig a number of treasure chambers, all communicating with a central guard-room, in which the owner eats and grows fat until the hardest frosts begin, when he curls himself up to sleep until the spring. But this life of leisure does not begin until the harvest has been gathered. While the crops are ripening the hamsters work incessantly to increase their hoards, and as much as three hundred-weight of grain and beans have been taken from a single burrow. After harvest, the peasants often search with probes for the treasure chambers of the robbers and no doubt exact a heavy tribute from the hamster's stores.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Supposing it to be interesting to many readers of THE FRIEND, particularly those in the State of Iowa, the writer feels a freedom to inform that the article, "A Reminiscence," which appeared in that journal under date of Second Month 20th, 1897, relating to the kind care of the late Joseph Scattergood many years ago in furnishing the then newly built prison for the State above named, with a quantity of books to be placed in its library, and their kind reception by the officials of that Institution, together with the information that that library had recently been destroyed by fire, claimed the notice of worthy surviving members of the deceased's family, and the subject was laid before the Book Publishing Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, who kindly made an appropriation of a quantity of books, which were shipped direct to the warden of said prison, and the writer being furnished by that official with the subjoined acknowledgment of the reception of said books, deems it worthy of the highest regard of the religious Society of Friends, and hopes they may only appreciate the same.

Under date of Third Month 24th, 1897, P. W. Madden writes me:

"My Dear Sir:—I am in receipt of your esteemed favor of recent date, and beg to assure you of the gratitude of myself, Chaplain Croker, and inmates of this Institution for the very kind interest you have evinced in our behalf. We have been advised by Mr. Scattergood of the contemplated shipment of books, and have written him our personal assurance that they will be appreciated.

And again under date of Fourth Month 1st: "I am pleased to be able to inform you that we have received the books from our mutual friend Scattergood, and they are very highly appreciated. The consignment consisted of fifty-two volumes, all new, and will be valued very highly in arranging our new Library."

For "THE FRIEND."

The teaching of Christ from first to last, according as shown to us in the New Testament, is full of instruction. When we consider the labor that is bestowed among professors of religion to get suitable food to satisfy immortal desires, is it not evident that they feel that in the abundance there is a sufficiency? Forgetting that "without faith it is impossible to please God." Sufficiency is wholly of the Lord. It seems strange that professors of Truth should be weaklings of the flesh. It is Holy Ghost power that can satisfy the hungry soul. And how is it to be obtained? not by works of righteousness which we have done, but by humbling ourselves under the mighty hand of God, in order both for feeding, for strength and heirship with Christ in his kingdom which hath no end. It is Gospel power that is needed for the conversion of sinners.

THOMAS R. GIFFORD.

PROVIDENCE, Fifth Month 22, 1897.

The nautilus has hitherto been so inaccessible to the student that its embryology has never been examined. At length Dr. Willey, late of Columbia College, has gone to New Guinea, and after keeping numbers of the nautilus in a large cage, sunk to the depth of three fathoms, in the sea of the Loyalty Island, has had the good fortune to secure the spawn. Each egg is as large as a grape and is deposited separately by the mother nautilus, whereas they are deposited in bunches by the squid. The nautilus is trapped in baskets by the natives of some of the Melanesian Islands and used as food.—The Independent.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—On the 17th instant President McKinley sent a message to Congress stating that a number of American citizens in Cuba are in a state of destitution and recommending an appropriation of $50,000, to be immediately available for use under the direction of the Secretary of State. The appropriation was made by the Senate, but no action was taken in the House.

On the 14th instant, Stephen E. Mallory of Florida, was elected U. S. Senator of that State. There had been twenty-five ballots taken.

David A. Wells says in the Popular Science Monthly "Of the commodities in general use in the United States, the two that have not notably declined in consumption during the almost universal depression of industry in recent years are fermented liquors and manufactured tobacco, more especially in the form of cigarettes."

According to tables given in the Engineering and Mining Journal during the year 1896, the total production of gold from all the mines of the globe was 10,922,010 ounces. The United States headed the list with 2,737,629 ounces; next came Australia with 2,114,412 ounces; the Transvaal was third, with 2,092,521 ounces, and Russia stood fourth, with 1,528,742 ounces. The total value of the gold mined during the year was more than $24,000,000.

The Mississippi Valley Cottonwood Association, in session at St. Louis, has decided to advance the price of all grades of Cottonwood lumber two dollars per thousand feet. This action was taken on account of the destruction to cottonwood which the lower Mississippi floods have caused. A memorial to the United States Senate was adopted favoring the proposed duty of two dollars per thousand feet board measure on all imported lumber.

Iowa has chosen the wild rose as its State flower, both Houses of the Legislature having voted in its favor.

Governor Black of New York, has signed the "Civil Service" bill. The Governor has explained his approval of the bill in an official memorandum, the language of which seems to increase ten-fold the indignation caused by the act itself. The memorandum is a direct challenge to the Civil Service Reformers, and from this time forward, a memorial to the United States Senate will be the object of their fiercest attack. Governor Black has also signed the two bills needed to remove every obstacle to the building of the new East River Bridge. The first caisson for the New York tower was launched the afternoon of the 13th instant.

Natural gas, which promises to be superior, both as to quantity and quality, to any other cost wells, has been struck in Colorado, and the total supply from the well is estimated at 100,000 feet daily.

The towns of Woodsdale, Moscow, Springfield and Fargo in Kansas, which had a population of 1,100 in 1896, have now only a population of eighteen, according to the United States Laretor. Higdon has there been found to be the most fertile soil in the State. Nine children go to the $10,000 schoolhouse, and there is standing, like a monument of folly, a water-works system that cost some Eastern investor $36,000. The town never paid a cent of principal or interest on all this and never will.

New Bedford, Mass., has twenty more liquor saloons than the law allows, and the police are in a quandary to know which of them belong to the legal excess.

On Fourth-day, the 12th instant, the Grand Jury indicted Commander Booth-Tucker, of the Salvation Army, for maintaining a public nuisance in the Salvation Army barracks, in West Fourteenth Street, New York. It is charged that the barracks are more than half disturbed by the singing and shouting of the army at their religious meetings. Commander Booth-Tucker is therefore under $300 bail to appear for trial, and is in danger of being imprisoned for a year, which is the maximum penalty for this kind of misdemeanor. This seems to be unnecessarily harsh treatment of a man who is charged with the use of his methods, which are certainly trying to accomplish a great deal of good in this city. Fourteenth Street is no longer a residential centre. It is a business street, and the barracks are no more a public nuisance than two or three concert halls on the same street, which are undisturbed.

Deaths in this city last week numbered 345, which is 7.5 per cent. above the average for the same time of the corresponding week of 1896. Of the foregoing, 257 were males and 206 females; 60 died of pneumonia; 47 of consumption; 27 of heart disease; 23 of diphtheria; 20 of nephritis; 20 of cancer; 16 of apoplexy; 13 of convulsions; 13 of marasmus; 12 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of typhoid fever; 10 from casualties; 9 of anæmia; 9 of Bright's disease; 6 of old age.

City mills, extra, $3.50 a $3.50; do, clear, $4.30 a $4.40; do, straight, $4.40 a $4.50; do, patent, $4.60 a $4.75. RYE FLOUR—$2.25 a $2.50 per bush, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 85 1/2c.

WHEAT—No. 1, 87c; No. 2, 85c; No. 3, 83c.

No. 3 white oats, 27 & 28c.

BEF. CATTLE.—Extra, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4; good, 5 a 5 1/2; medium, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4; common, 4 a 4 1/2.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/2 a 4 3/4; good, 3 1/2 a 4; medium, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4; common, 2 3/4 a 3; lambs, 3 1/2 a 3 3/4.

HOGS.—Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4; State, 5 1/2.

FOREIGN.—The number of Queen Victoria's living descendants is seventy. There are seven living sons and daughters, thirty-three grandchildren and thirty great-grandchildren.

A dispatch from London of the 12th inst. says, "The continent is suffering severely from a heavy snowfall, from Austria to Russia. In all the mountain districts of Austria and Germany the damage to fruit trees has been very great. Yesterday a heavy snowstorm swept over Hamburg, Cologne and Nancy. Widespread injury has been done to the vineyards in the districts of Bordeaux, Angouleme and Burgundy. In most of the above-named districts this season has been eleven degrees below the average."

Drunkenness has greatly decreased in Liverpool. In 1889 there were 16,042 cases, in which the police interfered, while in 1895 there were only 5,305. Among the causes named as helping to bring about this improvement are the greater difficulty in securing licenses for the manufacture of beer, and the greater athletic sports, the greater difficulty of securing advances of wages, and the greater ease of reaching home from the workshops.

The exportation of frozen rabbits to London is reducing the numbers of rabbits in Austria, and promises to put an end to the plague. About 12,000 rabbits a day are shipped from Victoria alone.

The Spanish Minister of War, General Azarraga, says the Spaniards have captured the last strongholds of the insurgents at Cavite, Philippine Islands, and that it is believed the military authorities will soon be able to send home the remainder of the army, and that no further reinforcements will be required.

Intelligence is received from St. Petersburg that on the 13th instant, a terrible railway accident befel a military train between Rokenhof and Elvra, on the Valki-Jarjine line. Sixteen cars were smashed. Two officers and nearly one hundred soldiers were killed, and many others were injured.

The Greek Government has been notified by the Powers that the Greek troops may leave the Island of Crete, and that the admirals of the international fleet will release the steamers which have been seized during the blockade.

The Greek Premier says the Government is in a serious position, and in order to receive aid, and that it has not compromised itself in the eyes of both Greece and Creten, without obtaining a positive guarantee that Turkey will cease hostilities. Should war be resumed the position of the Government will be most unenviable.

The Sultan declares his agreement to armistice until the terms of peace are settled. He demands an annexation of Thessaly, and indemnity of £10,000,000 Turkish and the abolition of the capitulations. If these conditions are declined the Turkish army will continue to advance. It is regarded as quite certain that the Powers will not consent to a retrocession of Thessaly. Even Germany is believed to be resolute in this respect. The present situation creates a violation of the Berlin Treaty and imperil the peace of the Balkans.

On Third Month 17th the London Daily Telegraph's special correspondent with the Turkish forces in Thessaly, telegraphed: "Edhem Pasha has moved on from point to point, and finally occupied Demokos. On this point he has sustained a crushing defeat on the conditions proposed by the Porte as the terms of peace with Greece have been freely discussed in the lobbies of Parliament to-day, and the idea of the retrocession of Thessaly and of such an indemnity as is already suggested is ridiculed as impracticable and absurd. At the outside an indemnity of £5,000,000 or £9,000,000 and a slight strategic modification of frontier are considered as likely to be the terminally settled upon. The Transvaal produced last year 1,340,000 tons of coal, 2,386,186 ounces of gold, according to the statistics of the Johannesburg Chamber of Mines.

A despatch from Madrid states that Peru and Bolivia have submitted their territorial dispute to the arbitration of Spain.

The provincial elections in Quebec resulted in the complete overthrow of the Conservative party.

In a loose memorandum bearing the date of 358, I find the following lively memorandum: "Having about the time of our last Quarterly Meeting, in the Ninth Month, and on an occasion or two since, been much favored with the situation of Divine love in the secret of my soul, for times of deep trial and conflict, both from within and without, and witnessing in a remarkable manner the restoring, healing influence thereof, I feel an inclination to record the same in humble, grateful acknowledgment of the Lord's mercy to me, a poor, unworthy creature, and in the hope I may, when the waves are again permitted to rise high, be enabled to confide in the same Almighty Arm of our Father. "Bless the Lord, oh, my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy Name."

Another memorandum says:

"Without date.—"I think it is safe to assert that among the members of our Society who have one after another abandoned the incidents of our profession, there has been a falling away from the foundation of all spiritual Christianity."

"Gurneyism, I believe, led to Beaconism, and Beaconism to Episcopalianism. I think out of those called Beaconites joined the church of England."

"There is no stopping-place, no half-way use."

The following letter is calculated to be very encouraging to the honest-hearted traveller in the way to Zion, who is encountering some of the difficulties which pilgrims on that journey sometimes meet with:

"CAMDEN, Fourth Month 4th, 1872.

"My Dear Friend Thomas Conard:—

"I have, within a few days past, had my mind turned towards thee and thy dear wife in a feeling of love and sympathy and affectionate remembrance, which is renewed this morning in the way as seems to call for expression in a few lines. I believe it is consistent with the Father's good pleasure that his dependent children should at times salute one another, as fellow pilgrims and heirs together of the grace of life, and commune by the way as travellers rough a world in which are found many trials, conflicts and exercises, both from within and without.

"You have been brought so forcibly before me in the feelings of brotherly regard and affectionate sympathy, and in such a degree that it has been sweet and refreshing to myself, and in the sense of it, I have felt breathings to the God of my life for your comfort, encouragement and strengthening to hold on your way, in faith and faithfulness, in simplicity and godly sincerity, trusting in the Lord.

"It is a day of trial and proving, and of perplexity, but, beloved friends, the 'foundation of God standeth sure.' And I am, I trust, made thankful this morning, in the renewing sense that the ancient Arm of strength and the refuge of the righteous in all ages remaineth. The name of the Lord is still a strong tower, the righteous runeth into it and is safe. If it is at present then, dear Friends, a low season with you, accept the word of exhortation, 'Be patient, therefore, unto the coming of the Lord; wait, oh, wait, in humility and lowliness of mind, upon Him, and He who shall come will come and will not tarry longer than will be for your good, and for the trial of your faith, which exercise is more precious than gold which perisheth. There is a state of things existing and developing itself more and more, that is permitted perhaps to try the very foundation.

"Yet once more I shake not the earth only, but also Heaven;" and this word (or declaration) signifieth the removing of those things that are shaken as of things that are made; that those things which cannot be shaken may remain; that we receiving a kingdom that cannot be moved may have grace whereby we may serve God acceptably, with reverence and godly fear. For our God is a consuming fire.

"There is a place of safety for all of us, and that is on the watch-tower. Having the eye and expectation fixed upon the Lord alone. He who is head over all things to his church will not fail in the right time to reveal the Arm of his Power, and enable his trusting children to adopt the ancient language, 'The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear; the Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid.'

"I want you, my dear friends, to be encouraged, and to lift up your heads in hope, trusting in the Lord. They that trust in the Lord shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed but abideth forever. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth, even forever. I would that the experience of the precious things of the everlasting hills was more sought after amongst us as a people. Then the Lord would turn again our captivity; Jacob would rejoice and Israel would be glad.

"Truly I retain a very grateful and pleasant recollection of your kindness and hospitality towards me. In a near sense of love to thyself and thy dear wife, I am, etc.

"RICHARD ESTERBROOK."

"P. S.—Dear friends, I feel now to express my desire that you may be strengthened to rise above all discouragements. The enemy of all good is a discourager and a betrayer; these are his works; 'Keep the word of patience; and of faith, and ye shall be kept preserved.'"

The following letter to one of his children, not only manifests parental affection, but gives some insight into the spiritual exercises of which he was a large partaker:

"CAMDEN, Fifth Month 31, 1872.

"My Precious Mary Anna:—

"It seems to me a good while since I wrote or we heard direct from thee, darling. How is this. As for me, I have been away two days; I left early on Fourth-day morning for Falling-into, Bucks County, to attend the Quarterly Meeting, on Fourth-day the Select Quarterly Meetings and on Fifth-day the General Quarterly Meeting, both which were times of Divine favor and goodness, in which my soul humbly rejoices and all within me gives thanks to our gracious and merciful Saviour. I left home a sort of spiritual bankrupt, divested of every resource, and in a low condition indeed, but the Lord in his abundant mercy arose for the help of the poor, and for the crying and sighing of the needy, and we had a plentiful shower of his goodness and mercy—renewing faith and hope, and engagement of mind to press forward in the path of life.

"Well, darling, I have often had evidence of my own nothingness and weakness, and the language is still good as a watchword to the humble careful traveller, 'Serve the Lord with fear and rejoice with trembling.'

"By a note from dear Frank this afternoon I learn that you are all well as usual. Let us hear from thee soon.

"With near and tender love, thy ever affectionate father, in haste,

"R. E. ESTERBROOK."

"Dear mother is nicely, has just been here in the office."

Having loaned to Richard a copy of the Memoir of Charles G. Finney, he returned it with a letter dated Third Month 11th, 1877, in which he said:

"In the course of reading it, I was confirmed in a view I have long entertained that there are places and services assigned in the universal church for many besides ourselves. 'Other sheep have I which are not of this fold, them also I must bring, that there may be one fold and one shepherd' in the fulness of time.

"Fully persuaded I am however, that if our Society should drift into the adoption of such views of religious truth, and such ideas, and the practices which are the natural fruit of them, it would entirely fail to accomplish the designs for which it was raised up in the beginning, (not for its own sake only) by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm."

"CAMDEN, First Month 9th, 1886.

"We have our low time when perhaps we are wisely permitted to feel as worms of the dust—and indeed, what are we—what am I? All of us have perhaps hidden and acute causes of discouragement, burdens to carry.

"I think the day fastens when Friends will not be able to occupy middle ground, and be half claimed by both sides of any question. Such a course is very trying and causes great suffering and loss.

"On Fourth-day last, in the Monthly Meeting, held in New York in joint session, a communication came from the 'Evangelical Committee' of the Yearly Meeting, that they were lacking in the needful supply of funds, appealing for help. William R. Thurston rose and said, he had no unity whatever with this committee or its objects. He believed it had been a great injury throughout their Yearly Meeting, and the additions to the membership that had resulted from it, were of no value. He remarked further that as so much had been said in relation to our late valued Friend, B. Tatham, that in a conversation with him quite lately, B. Tatham expressed similar views, and said that he had never subscribed a dollar towards the work, and never expected to do so. William added, that he also should pursue the same course; and furthermore expressed his belief that one of the effects of it had been to lower the standard of Gospel ministry.

"I do not believe that many are at all aware how devastating these things are, and what mischief they have wrought in some, begetting, through Satan's devices, a want of confidence in anything under our name, and prepares them to take their flight altogether."

REFUSED THE WRONG BEGGAR.—"I never refuse the plea of a beggar," says a leading member of Congress. "You must not use my name and advertise me as a philanthropist, for I am not. It is simply a matter of necessity with me. I am obliged to give something to every beggar or I could not sleep at night. I made a bad mistake once, and I would rather give occasionally to the unworthy than to ever deny assistance to the worthy.

"Once upon a time I was in St. Louis on business. It was winter, and you know how cold that town can be when it tries hard. I was out on the street at eleven o'clock one bitter night when a chap struck me for a dime. He was poorly clad, looked hungry and sick, and I ought to have handed out the money at once, but I was just brute enough not to do it. He followed me a hundred feet, begging and pleading, and I finally threatened to have him arrested. He turned away with a sob in his throat, and I went to the hotel.

"There was a big snowstorm that night, and next morning they found him in a drift, frozen stark and stiff. I saw the body and recognized it. The pale face was pinched and drawn with hunger and suffering, and the eyes were wide open as yours—great big blue eyes, sunken back in their sockets, and staring at me in an awful way. Yes, sir, they seemed to be fastened on me alone, and to follow me as I moved. When I heard car-drivers, draymen, bootblacks, and newsboys, saying how gladly they would have given the poor wretch a quarter to buy lodgings and food I sneaked away, feeling that I was a murderer. It hurt me more than I can tell you. I don't wait now to be asked for alms. I give to some who are, no doubt, undeserving, but I take my chances on that. That thing re-acts like a murder on my conscience, and nothing like it shall happen again."—St. Paul Globe.

A Letter from Paris.

Fourth Month 20th, 1897.

The lectures have begun again and with them lovely days. Paris, like her people, is all extremes; she either laughs or cries. Nothing could be more lovely than she is now. The sky is so blue, and the exquisite outlines and colors of her buildings, standing in such bold relief against it; then the avenues of green, with the beautiful river, and the brilliant light and rapidly moving throngs that crowd her boulevards; all this forms, especially when seen from the "imperiale" of the omnibus, a panorama of ever varied and continual delight. To reach the Sorbonne we take the omnibus line that passes down the principal avenues and streets of Paris, past the finest buildings and through the gayest throngs. We descend as we cross the bridge just back of Notre Dame, and take two or three little streets, which have conserved all the smells of old Paris, but which bring us, in less than five minutes, in front of the College de France.

There is an atmosphere about the Latin quarter in Paris that one gets no where else. It seems as if with each breath one took in something of the old intellectual life that has continued here during so many centuries. The very walls of the old university building seem able to impart from their store of experiences of the past. We like to wander aimlessly about in this quarter, not trying to think or speak, but to absorb whatever we may. The Pantheon is only a short distance away, also the old church building of St. Etienne. Then the palace and beautiful gardens of the Luxembourg; but best of all, the bonquistes! Ah! how we like to wander up the Seine after "finds." My little old man, whose shops extend at least a half a square up the river, we found smiling and fresh as ever, and full of business. I had been getting home sick for the bonquistes during these ten days of no lectures, and had threatened to go down on purpose to get another book, but the rain unfortunately shuts them up; it is the sunshine that makes them blossom out, like it does everything else in Paris.

Well, yesterday we had a great harvest. We kept walking along, picking up one thing after another, until finally our arms would take in no more, and we were forced to cross over the Seine and take the omnibus at the Place Chatelaie. Anywhere but in Paris we would have made a sensation, but one can't do anything strange here. One may be dressed in the last possibilities of elegance or of rags; one may do all sorts of strange and unusual things, but even the street urchin, the "gamin de Paris," pays no attention to one. They are all too self-absorbed, too self-contented, to bother about anyone. For this reason we wear old clothes (the tops of the omnibuses are terrible on clothes, getting up and down), that we brought along to wear out in the mountains of Switzerland, and feel quite as comfortable and self-respecting as the Parisians themselves. But the other day we did a good deal of laughing to think how we would look in Philadelphia. I had seven large books and three little ones in my hands and two stuck in my belt. My friend had two or three more, and all the wraps, umbrellas, etc., and with this we tried to get on an omnibus! I have explained the Paris omnibus system—one can get on anywhere if one can run fast enough and catch on; but with both arms full of loose books, that is not easy. I had just succeeded in reaching the step when the conductor came back wildly waving, and saying "complete," and so I was forced to ignore nominously seek the pavement, where my friend was laughingly awaiting me. We decided to go to the "bureau" and wait there. But ever once on the platform, the ascent, with both hands full, was not easy. We succeeded, however, in getting our treasures safely home.

28th.—Last evening we had a delightful ride and spent a most profitable evening. It was warm and beautiful, so we took the "imperiale," although we were "dressed up," but we had both hands free to take care of our skirts. We had been invited to spend the evening with a very remarkable woman; a friend of M's was to meet us at the end of the omnibus line to conduct us to her rooms. Oh, it was lovely going down town in the evening, through the brilliantly-lighted streets. We passed the Madeleine, and crossed the Place de la Concorde getting a lovely view over the beautiful Champ Elysees; but it was the Seine, with its innumerable lights reflected in the water, that was most charming.

After descending from the omnibus we had a short walk to the house, upon the fifth floor of which the person lived to whom we were going. The old Paris houses are so singular one enters a corridor, as in a German house, but unlike the latter, the kitchen "la cuisine" is the first room one comes to, and being a small dark hole, the door is mostly open, so that one gets the odors without going in search of them. After passing this, we started to go up a winding staircase. With characteristic French economy, no space is wasted on entry-ways, and I have already told you of the possibilities of French walls for enclosing mysteries. When one begins to go up one begins to count, and if one forgets in the midst of it, the result is apt to be that one stops at the wrong apartment or keeps on up to the top, and then has to sub tract coming down.

The person upon whom we were going to call is a writer and public lecturer upon the woman question. We found her charmingly simple and frank. It was quite a new experience here, for there seems to be comparatively few women who interest themselves in any of the great questions of the day. She spoke with enthusiasm of the possibilities of women in America, and of the work they had done and are doing. She dwelt also upon the profound and searching mind of the Germans, but seemed to have absolutely no hope for her own country. She smiled sadly and in a resigned way as she said, "No, our work is done, we have missed our inheritance. The Latin race has had its day and will fade away." She related in a most interesting manner her early life, which was passed in the country. She said that though she was born a Protestant, her father had been educated for a priest in a Jesuit College, and that the horror of it stayed with him all his life. She herself was sent to Switzerland to be educated. She confirmed what I have heard rumored already several times, that the present government is far from being firmly established in France. There are those who want the monarchy reestablished, others the empire, and scores of others with wild, unformed ideas of socialism and democracy. But they are all smoldering fires. On the surface the joyous careless life goes on, because the French nation turns its back upon all unpleasant problems. I notice that in all classes, and in relation to the smallest details of life, the reluctance to look at the dark side of things. Of course it many of its developments that is an excellent trait, but it seems to me that the French, drunken with their love of beauty and harmony, in trying to shut out all deformity and discord, have missed entirely the whole secret of attaining to the real beauty and the real harmony in their lives. One cannot help saying over and over, "What an endowed nation! What clearness of intellect, what depth of penetration!" and yet it is as if one were pursuing something contemptibly fleeing from before one,—the soul eludes one's grasp. She explained to us that it was quite impossible to reach the women of France so long as the Catholic church has the hold it has. She said, "We French are from temperament very religious, but when we lose it, then we go to the other extreme. It is the women who are under the power of the priests, and I then go to keep the peace tolerate their interference, though as a rule they have ceased to believe in the church."

But I am undertaking too much, to try to give a resumé even of what she said, and as for personal observation, it is of course limited and of little value. But with all the gayety and brilliancy, one cannot help feeling that after all, there is a deep undercurrent in the character of the French nation, the very opposite of that we see on the surface. France may not yet have drunk the cup of her adversity to theregs, she may have revolution on revolution before her; she may be rent and torn by forces working within herself, but I cannot think that she is utterly doomed.

I find I want more and more to come closely in contact with the peasant life in some of the fertile provinces of France. It seems to me at there lie hidden the latent forces that are going to redeem the land. E. S. K.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Believing that a few extracts from the report of the Book Committee, to the Meeting for Sufferings would be of interest to many readers of THE FRIEND, together with some extracts of a letter since received, I submit the following for publication. JOSEPH HALL.

"A considerable number of our publications have been placed in the libraries of educational institutions, or reading rooms; 465 volumes have been granted for this purpose to be sent to different parts of Pennsylvania, Delaware, Tennessee, Kansas and California, and 309 volumes of 830 pamphlets have been forwarded to Richmond, Indiana, for Libraries of Monthly Meetings, and for distribution; 168 volumes have been sent to Atlantic City; 52 volumes, mostly copies of Barclay's Apology, have been given to ministers of different denominations. "A number of volumes have been granted on application for individuals and distribution in West Virginia, Florida, Ohio, Iowa, South Dakota and other parts of the United States, and in Mexico, Nova Scotia and Australia.

"In the course of the distribution of the Appeal in reference to War, requests were made of a number of persons who had received this pamphlet, for further information respecting the principles held by our religious Society. Many of these resided in neighborhoods remote from Friends, and the opening thus presented for circulating our approved writings has been felt to be a favorable one; and has been freely responded to.

"It has been encouraging to believe from these and other inquiries that have been received that there are not a few individuals in different localities, who are desirous of knowing more of the spirituality of religion; and we trust the dissemination of our approved writings among such may be the means of exerting a salutary influence upon the community in which they live.

"Some interesting information has lately been received from a young woman, who has placed some of our books in the hands of the inmates of a prison in Santa Fé, New Mexico. She writes, 'I never saw Friends' books so much valued before as they are by these men.' One young man said he wrote ten pages of passages from the 'Life and Writings of William Penn,' to send to his brother in South America; another was writing some of it for a young man who was paroled about three months ago. More than twenty men have read 'Dymond's Essays,' and the Superintendent of the prison has remarked upon the good effect which it and other books had had upon the convicts, and said he wished he had a copy of 'Dymond's Essays' in each cell."

EXTRACT OF LETTER.

VERNON, NEW JERSEY,
FIFTH MO. 13th, 1897.

"An Appeal to Professing Christians, etc., in regard to War," is received. It did me good. I saw in it the true unadulterated Christ. Life. That was the pleasure I received in reading it. I am glad there are Christians who can preach and uphold the very principles of the Teacher sent from God. I am trying to live those principles, and have endeavored to preach them, your tract gave me new light. I argued with my boy, that I would not fight for my country, if I knew it was in the right, but I was willing to send him to a military school. Now I cannot, because of the new light your tract gave. Preach the Christ Life in your society; but I know you will find few who will follow your teachings. The tendency of the times is to make religion, (which is the opposite of this world and human nature), popular. It is destroying the power of the church in the world. I have been a preacher and stood by the Christ, until I was slandered and dropped by the denomination I served. I am now teaching school, but still seeking to know and practice and preach the Christ Life. I will be glad to distribute some of your tracts. Yours in Christ, for his pure religion in the world.

FRANCIS S. WILLISTON.

How HE GOT HIS BUGGY.—"Life is short; time is money, and speech should be to the point. Circumlocution is the thief of time, and often takes away opportunities and repels effort. An eminent pastor lately gave his experience in dealing with this mental defect in a sincere but wordy missionary, who had asked permission to make a personal appeal for help to his congregation. In a roundabout way the good man referred to his need of an 'aid to locomotion,' and the fatigues attending 'pedestrianism.' Finally the pastor, knowing that the matter-of-fact, direct way of appealing to his people would be the most effective, said, somewhat bluntly: 'Our friend wants a buggy; give him one.' The missionary got his buggy. He also got a lesson in direct speech."

Who knows but some long, windy, wordy prayers might be similarly shortened, and bring greater results? Most of the prayers recorded in the Bible were short ones; and a short prayer will often reach farther than a long one.—The Christian.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Concord Quarterly Meeting.

This gathering of the people occurred this year on the tenth and eleventh of Fifth Month, at Concord, where it is now held in each Fifth Month. The other three meetings are held at Meda. The country was looking very beautiful; vegetation had come forward very rapidly within a week or two—the young leaves on the trees, the grain fields, the luxuriant growth of the clover, and the patches of bright yellow flowers of the Winter Cress (Barbarea vulgaris), and the Buttercup (Ranunculus bulbosus); and the bright white blossoms of the Dogwood (Cornus florida), and of the Black Hawth (Ilex pennsylvanica), all combined to make the ride in the cars from Philadelphia a pleasing experience.

The railroad station at Concord is situated in a valley alongside of Chester Creek, but the meeting house is reached by a climb up a high hill of half a mile or more in extent, from which a fine view is attainable over a fertile country, well cultivated.

In the meeting of ministers and elders held on Second-day, Fifth Month 10th, one of the most interesting items of business was brought up by a minute from one of the Monthly Meetings of the Quarter, expressing its belief that a gift in the Gospel ministry had been conferred on one of their members. After a time of deliberation, an unusual amount of unity was expressed with this judgment, and the clerk was directed to notify the Monthly Meeting of the decision in the case.

Philadelphia Yearly Meeting has lost many of its valuable members by death of latter time, and it was comforting to believe that the Lord's mercy is still extended to it in preparing and qualifying others, who may take the places of these deceased worthies as faithful advocates of the Lord's cause.

The general Quarterly Meeting on Third-day was a sitting in which much religious exercise was felt. The young people were advised that there was a wide field for service open before them in promoting the welfare of mankind, if they would submit to the preparing hand of the Lord and obey his calls to service. It is a source of much weakness in the Church that so many of its members choose for themselves the kind of labor in which they will engage, and are not careful to wait upon the Lord for counsel and direction, and for the ability which He gives his obedient children. They are forgetful of the truth, that "except the Lord build the city, they labor in vain that build it;" and do not fully appreciate that every good thing must come from our Father in Heaven, "from Him is all that can ennoble life, the high endeavor and the glad success, the strength to suffer and the will to serve."

As I returned to Philadelphia in the afternoon a fellow-passenger, a member of Concord Quarterly Meeting, entered into conversation. He said he had lately been travelling somewhat beyond the limits of our own Yearly Meeting, and the evidences he met with of departure from the principles of Friends had brought him more fully than had formerly been the case, into sympathy with the concern of our leading members to keep the flock from straying. He had seen the reality of dangers which formerly he had not appreciated.

In the second meeting a concern of Esther Fowler to pay a religious visit in some parts of the west for which she had been liberated by Birmingham Monthly Meeting was united with, and the way opened for the performance of the service. She is in very feeble health, but it seems to be her experience, that according to her faith she is helped to perform what to the eye of reason would seem impracticable.

As I walked to the meeting house from the home of the hospitable Friend who entertained us, I was reminded of attending Concord Quarterly Meeting about fifty years before, when it was a season of Divine favor and much tenderness of feeling under the lively ministry of David Cope, so that I remarked at the time that it would be worth walking twenty-five miles from Philadelphia to Concord, to enjoy such a season of favor. I mentioned my cogitations to a Friend by my side. When the meeting was over, he inquired how this meeting compared with that of fifty years ago. There did not seem to me to be so large a measure of tenderness, but an increased degree of religious exercise under the various matters that come before the meeting, so that it was probably equally profitable, or more so.

On the lawn of our kind host, was a beautiful specimen of the Ecocharita, a Chinese shrub of the rose family. It was abundantly clothed with white flowers. The genus has but a single species—the E. grandiflora.

Scattered through the grass were numerous specimens of the Viola striata, which in my early botanical days I knew as V. obovata. The flowers are white and of rather large size. It was marked as rare in Dr. Darlington's Flora Carolina, and as it was not common in the immediate vicinity of Westtown School, it had an especial attraction for me, which still adheres to it.

An Old Love Letter.

NORTH PROVIDENCE, First Mo. 22nd, 1780.

Most affectionately beloved:—After reading over several memorandums of the exercises my poor soul has passed through, in my pilgrimage through this vale of tears, my heart salutes thee in a fresh spring of that love which I feel increasing, and hope may never wax cold towards thee. And having felt thee abundantly near this evening, I am free to write what revives for thy perusal, hoping it may be useful towards our rightly stepping along through time together. And first dearly beloved, let me tell thee, that however short I may be of strict adherence to the light of life, yet it is my crown, my chiefest joy, to feel the holy, harmonious influences and inshinings of the love of Jesus my Saviour, upon my soul; and I feel that without this I must be miserable indeed. I also believe, that the true enjoyment of the marriage-union consists eminently in both being engaged to draw near to the Lord, and act in his counsel; which I not only wish, but in a good degree expect, may be our happy case. If I should, though we have as it were a dry morsel to partake of, as to the things of this life, yet we may joy in the Lord, and rejoice in the God of our salvation. Thou knowest I have no great things to invite thee to. If we are joined together, (the which I trust we already measurably are,) we must not expect the paths of affliction; no, no.

"This day be bread and peace our lot,
All else beneath the sun,
Thou knowest it best bestowed or not,
And let Thy will be done."

This, my dear, our minds must come to, if we intend to be happy; yet this I know, that One who cannot lie, has promised to add all things necessary to those who seek first the kingdom of heaven, and in this I confide. Let us, therefore, unite in seeking this heavenly kingdom, and that in the first place. And may we, the remainder of our lives, earnestly press after resignation to the Lord's will; and, above all things, strive to please Him who only can give peace in whatever circumstances we may be. Then, I trust, the guardian angel of his holy presence will encamp around, and his everlasting arms be underneath to support us. Farewell, my dear, farewell, says thy sure friend, Job Scott.

SUPPOSE.

Suppose, my little lady,
Your doll should break her head,
Could you make it whole by crying
Till your eyes and nose were red?
And wouldn't it be pleasanter
To treat it as a sick
And say you're glad 'twas Dolly's,
And not your head that broke?
Suppose you're dressed for walking,
And the rain comes pouring down,
Will it clear off any sooner
Because you're cool and frown?
And wouldn't it be nicer
For you to smile than pout,
And so make sunshine in the house
When there is none without?
Suppose your task, my little man,
Is very hard to get,
Will it make it any easier
For you to sit and fret?
And wouldn't it be wiser,
Than whining like a dunce,
To go to work in earnest,
And learn the thing at once?

Suppose that some boys have a horse,
And some a coach and pair,
Will it tire you less while walking,
To say, "It isn't fair?"
And wouldn't it be nobler
To keep your temper sweet,
And in your heart be thankful
You can walk upon your feet?

Suppose the world doesn't please you,
Nor the way some people do,
Do you think the whole creation
Will be altered just for you?
And isn't it, my boy or girl,
The wisest, bravest plan,
Whatever comes, or doesn't come,
To do the best you can?

—Exchange.

SELECTED.

"I do not like to hear him pray,
On bended knee about an hour,
For grace to spend aright each day,
Who knows his neighbor has no floor.

"I'd rather see him go to mill,
And buy his lackless neighbor bread,
And see his children eat their fill,
And laugh beneath their humble shed.

"I do not like to hear him pray,
'Let blessings on the widow be,'
Who never seeks her home to say,
'If want o'ertakes you, come to me.'

"I hate the prayer so loud and long
That's uttered for the orphan's woe
By him who sees them crushed by wrong,
And only with the lips can feel.

"I do not like to hear her pray
With jeweled ears and silken dress,
Whose washerwoman toils all day,
And then is asked to work for less.

"I do not like such soulless prayers;
It wrongs I do not wish to forgive,
No angel-wing them upward bears;
They're lost a million miles from heaven."

For "THE FRIEND." The Caged Lion.

On a recent visit to the Zoological Garden for the first time, my attention was drawn in pressively to a lioness that was walking back and forth incessantly from one side of its cage to the other, looking between the iron bars, apparently very uneasy with her confinement, and seeming not satisfied with looking in vain, once twice or thrice, for a place of escape, but keeping up a continuous watch for some opening through which she might regain her liberty; and exercise her vicious propensities.

I felt a degree of pity for the brute, and at the same time, I knew that the safety of myself and others would be jeopardized should she find a way of escape.

It seemed to me as though there might be some profitable reflections drawn from the animal and her movements, but I could not then see what there was of instruction to be gained from a caged lioness, and so passed, on apparently came to the cage of a lion; he was a noble specimen of the king of beasts. He appeared to be enjoying a quiet nap, apparently oblivious to his surroundings, appearing as unconcerned as though the liberty of the forest was his; he, too, excited in me a feeling more than mere curiosity. What! is he satisfied with his surroundings? Don't he care for liberty? Are his vicious propensities subdued? Ah! he is only napping; well it is for me and others the iron bars are between him and us. Those caged lions came before my mind at time for several days, without my knowing why I should be so, until one morning lately, as I was engaged in some bodily employment, it presented to my mind, those lions represent the evil propensities of our nature. How like the lioness some of them are; even when we have them under control, ever on the alert, seeking after some weak place or opening in the iron grating. How important it is that we be on the watch, that there be no avenue for their escape, for though they may seem to be in some measure tamed and in subjection, yet all the want is liberty, and the untamed nature, though unsanctified will, will be as dangerous as ever.

The old lion seems quiet for the time being yet his vicious nature is there. So it is with some of the strongest and most dangerous of the evil propensities of our nature; we may think they are subdued when, like the lion, they may only be napping, and when we are off our guard, or something crosses our pathway that arouses the old nature in us, the strength of the lion may be suddenly aroused, and happy will it then be for us if the iron bars are intact, so as to restrain the corrupt will, that would rend and devour had it full liberty.

O, the mischief that has been done in this world, and in the church, by seemingly good men and women, who really themselves though the old lion in them was subdued, when he was only napping, and being thus deceived, they would neglect to watch the iron bars, that they were all safe and in their place, and so what something occurred that waked up the lion, the strong man in them, how has he broken loose from his confinement, and gone forth, "Dividing in Jacob, and scattering in Israel." So, dear friends, of every name and class, let us be ever on our guard, and see to it, though the lion seem ever so quiet for the time being, that we keep him caged in, by the love of God; that the iron bars, "love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance," (which are all forged and properly tempered in the workshop of the Spirit), are all in their allotted places; for if one of these be lacking, we may rest assured there is a weakness with some of the others.

Those "caged lions" that have led the writer to these reflections, must eventually, according to the course of nature, or from their confinement perhaps, die, without an effectual change being wrought in their natures as to make them safe companions for man; in this they differ from the animal propensities of our nature, for the prophet Isaiah tells of a day where, in all our animal propensities may be so changed that all will make one harmonious whole, see Isaiah, chapter xi:—"The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb" (how opposite their natures), "and the leopard shall lie down with the kid, and the calf and the young lion, and the fawning together, and a little child" (the Babe of Bethlehem) "shall lead them." "They shall not hurt nor destroy in all the Lord's holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea. And in that day there shall be a root of Jesse, which shall stand for an ensign of the people, to it shall the Gentiles seek, and his rest shall be glorious." Yea, glorious. What great encouragement there is for us in this to watch, that our lions be kept securely caged whether they seem to be on the alert like the lions at the Zoological Gardens, or like the old lion, apparently sleeping, until all within is so brought under the transforming power of the Lord's blessed Spirit, the Spirit of the Gospel of the dear Son and Sent of God, that our very natures become changed.

The wolf or the leopard or the lion will no longer seek to escape from the place assigned him, for all shall be led and kept in their proper place by the "little child," the Babe immortal, seen in prophetic vision by Isaiah. "Verily their remains to be a rest for the people of God," "All thy works shall praise thee, O Lord, and thy saints shall bless thee." Psalms 145: 10. T. H. W.

GOD'S GRAPEVINES.—The grapevine that is growing under my window this morning suggests to me a talk about the organic union between Jesus Christ and all healthy Christians. I am the vine, and ye are the branches." The word vine here includes both the stock and the branches, because the vital sap that flows out to the furthest tendrils is drawn from the central trunk. Saving faith is the process of being united to Christ by a heart union; and obedience to Christ is the evidence that the union is genuine and strong.

There is such a thing as being tied to Jesus Christ, by an act of external profession, without being ingrafted in him. A little twig may be thrust into the incision in a tree, and tied fast here, and yet no incorporation follow. Spring may come singing and opening all the buds on the tree; summer may shed its sunshine, and autumn may shake down baskets of ripe fruit, but that poor ill-joined branch yields neither bud nor flower nor fruitage. Held on by dead lay or rotting cord it is only a withered and uselessly thing. Such is every false professor; or she has no heart-union with the Saviour, and it is a very rare thing for such a self-satisfied formalist to be truly converted afterward. That is a very sharp and startling word which Christ spoke when he said that the sapless, useless withered stick should be "cast into the fire; if not a true branch, then a burning!"—Theodore L. Cuyler in The Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND," Reminiscences.

Many years ago a Friend and his wife, residing in a sparsely settled district of country in the State of Iowa, having occasion to go to the village of Anamosa to trade, were making the trip in their one horse market wagon, containing such produce as their farm furnished. They necessarily passed through an unimportant village, situated in the edge of the timber skirting the Wapsipicon River, where lived a man known to the writer as a cooper by trade, and who was commonly called "Peg Leg," because of the loss of one foot nearly to the knee. As a substitute for the lost limb he wore, strapped firmly round the joint, a short crutch or peg—Hence the name of Peg Leg.

When we were just passing out of this village, said cooper with a strange man with him in a one-horse buggy drove up and hurriedly passed us. When we had done our trading and were en route for home and less than one mile out of town, we were overtaken by the same parties with a comrade of theirs seated on a temporary seat in the front of the box. They drove furiously by, giving us reason to think that they were influenced by honor, for though they made great haste, their headway was not so much, because of their frequent halting and chastising their poor dumb brute. Finally their halt was so protracted that we passed them by, and it was not difficult to discover that this prolonged detention was caused by the one that occupied the temporary seat losing his balance and tumbling helplessly to the ground, and the others were endeavoring, but in vain, to restore him to his former position in the buggy. I say in vain, for ere long the two drove up, giving cause to think that they had left their triend in the gutter. When they came up with us they queried in an excited tone if we had picked up any papers or money since leaving town. My answer was no. They drove furiously on, and while yet in sight turned round and met us on the identical spot where we first saw them in the morning, passing us by as if unnoticed, but very quick wheeled about and came alongside of us so close as to almost cause the wheels to clash. The one next to us having the lines in hand, the other, Peg Leg, levelled his double-barrelled fowling piece at my breast, declaring with many vile oaths that he believed that I had his papers and money. I reassured him that I had not; neither do I think that he had lost any, and, said he, "I am going to shoot your heart out." I saw him set the triggers, heard the click it made, and again saw his finger extended hand along the guard to touch them. Nothing but the outstretched arm of Omnipotence restrained that inebriate wretch from hurling into eternity one, alas! too like himself, unprepared to meet his God.

The mother of my children sat dignified and composed by my side, hugging her infant to her bosom. Our eldest boy of seven years, shocked at what he saw and heard, crouched between us for safety. The moment the ruffian pointed his gun in an opposite direction, my horse received a sharp stroke from the lash of my whip and started off at good speed, but ere many strides were made two loud reports greeted our sensitive ears. Looking back we could see two separate volleys of smoke that had issued from the deadly weapon. We subsequently learned that the less infuriated man had wrenched the gun from the grasp of his companion and discharged it so that it might not do harm. I may confess that at that time my legal knowledge of the responsibility that I would incur by omitting to act as plaintiff in such a case had no bearing with me whatever, for I knew not the statute. But my thought was that it would be right for me to call immediately on the justice of the peace of the place and order an arrest. But when this was mentioned to my wife she was averse to it, thinking that it would probably result in putting one or both of these unfortunate fellow-beings in prison for a term of years, but both she and I came to realize that confinement would without doubt have been best for them, as their future history will amply prove.

It has already been mentioned that Peg Leg, or George Votman, his proper name, lived in the village of Fairview, on the street of which this tragedy was committed. The three comrades were reunited ere the night set in and the transient parties were the guests of George Votman. The foregoing having happened on the Seventh-day of the week, their rancor continued until the first of the following week and so did their rioting and revelling; and their conduct on the First or Sabbath-day was so offensive that the citizens of the place preferred a charge against them on Second-day morning for breach of the peace and abuse of the dumb brute.

A personal friend of mine that lived in the suburbs of the village, having learned something of what had happened to me, came out to my place on Second-day morning, desiring that I would attend court that afternoon, stating that the community was much excited. I consented. My appearance at court was evidently very exciting to the culprits. The trial was long and tedious, at the conclusion of which the justice directed the sheriff to hold the parties in custody until the following morning, for he did not feel capable of giving a verdict that evening. They begged the pardon of the people, averring that it was a strange and new thing for them to get into such a scrape, which might have been true only because they had not been held up as examples, for their bearded eyes and pug-noses were too sure witnesses to be misunderstood. On meeting them at the conclusion of the court, my remarks reminded them of their recent conduct toward me. To which they at once acknowledged, but begged me by their Maker not to appear against them.

The following morning my wife and I, with our little boy that had been with us in our perilous situation, repaired to the office of the justice of the peace. The culprits met us at the threshold, and began their pleadings for mercy, the wife of the assassin joining him, and his accomplice said that the aged mother of her husband wished to see me before I proceeded against her son, and that she was in yonder cabin, not able to come to me; would I not bear them company to her? "Yes," said I, inviting my wife to walk along, but she being feeble declined. They and I set off, escorted by a numerous crowd of eager lookers on, each embracing an opportunity to speak their mind to me. Some would say, "Crack them through; give them the full lash of the law." Others would say, "Oh, you won't put them in prison, will you?"

On reaching the cabin I was introduced to the aged mother, who at once began her pleadings for her guilty son, with all the tenderness that she was capable of assuring me that he was her sole dependence for maintenance, and if I put the law in force against him it would place him in prison for a series of years, and she knew not what would become of her. The words that were given me to speak were not my own, were only lent me for that occasion, therefore will not attempt to repeat them. The guilty son acknowledged with tears trickling down his cheeks the vileness of his conduct, assuring me, and not me only, but a multitude of listeners that, God helping, he would never do the like again; and as a safeguard thereto he would never drink another dram. My feelings I will not attempt to describe, because they were utterly indescribable, but may venture to say that my heart so overflowed with the love of God for us all as sinners that my feelings were to forgive them, that I also might be forgiven. Thus we parted; they loading me with blessings that were meet only to be bestowed on a truly seraphic object.

Such a court has perhaps never been held on the soil of the Hawkeye State. Such a scene has seldom been witnessed by human eyes, and so far as I now know, I am the only one living that passed through it all; my son that was the little boy mentioned is still here, and will testify to what he saw and remembers. But, gentle reader, my story is scarcely half told, therefore bear with me a little longer, whilst I remind you of the utter inability of man unaided by superior Power Divine to keep even a good promise, as thou may see by perusing this narrative. Not many weeks after this, my wife and I had occasion to travel over to the same village to trade, and in our homeward route entered the street of the lesser village. Just at the edge of dark, when upon the identical spot where the foregoing had happened, a little brother and sister, ranging from seven to nine years, stepped out of the bushes into the street, desiring me to stop, which being done they proceeded with sobs and tears, "Please, sir, come and help us; we live in yonder cabin. Our father is dead. This afternoon mother went out to attend to some business, leaving us to keep home, and we are expecting her to come home every minute. But a little while ago a drunken man came and drove us away from our home, and if mother comes we don't know what she will do." "Won't you, sir, please come and get him away?" "Yes," said I, heading my team up to a post near the door of a house in which there were three or more females. I invited my wife to go in and sit until my return, but she chose to sit in the carriage. But one of the women at the door said, "Sir, you won't go there alone, will you?" "Yes," was my reply, "but you must go up-stairs and get some of the men to help you. It is Peg Leg, and he is a wicked wretch and may hurt you." "But," said I, "I am not afraid of him," and my wife making no objections, I took the path leading toward the infested cabin, but ere I reached the threshold the object of my pursuit was found crouched down about his haunches with a blanket cast about him. "Ah, George," said I, "what is the matter? What is thee doing here?" "I am sick," was the reply. I then laid my hand on his head, with a "Come, get up, here, let's see," and he made an effort, the fumes of his person plainly told the cause of his debility, whereupon I exclaimed to George, "Thou art drunk; what shall I think of thee? Don't thee remember promising me a few weeks since that thee would never drink any more whiskey, and now here thee is drunk." He began to realize, saying, "Is it you?" "Yes, it is Deewees," said I, "Oh, quoth he, 'for God's sake help me up, and get me on my horse, and I'll go home and behave myself like a gentleman.'" I stopped to fetch the horse, but ere I got it in place the inebriate had lost his balance and tumbled over. I held the bridle with one hand, helped him up with the other, and succeeded in getting him astride of bare bones, and he rode off and I never saw him more. But subsequently learned that he left Fairview and returned to Mechanicsville, from whence he had come to Fairview, and his comrades that had been mentioned were at home at Mechanicsville; one was his uncle.

A period of several years elapsed, in which I knew nothing of my strange acquaintances; finally a distant neighbor of mine had occasion to pass through the village of Mechanicsville, and on his homeward route called on me, and in the way of chat told me that at that place there was great excitement because the night before a fellow called Peg Leg had stolen a horse and got off with it.

Another period of time elapsed when it fell out that wife and I were travelling by way of Mechanicsville, and called at a farm house not far distant to bait our team, etc., our host and hostess informed us that they were the first settlers of the country and had lived in that place ever since. It occurred to me that perhaps they had known something of those desperate men. I remembered all their names, as I do yet. On inquiry, they knew them all for many years, and told me that one had died in a fit of drunkenness, and at that time one was still there, a base sot, and George Voman or Peg Leg had stolen a horse at that time, and the Vigilance Committee, a band of outlaws, went after him and he had never been seen or heard of since. "The way of the transgressor is hard." My thought is that when I found him on the way to the cabin I should have arrested him—what think ye, gentle reader? Let the answer be, "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."

These things have many times claimed my consideration, attended with feelings of regret at my lack of considering the providence that there must have been in the circumstance of directing those children to me for aid, seeing that we knew not each other at all, had never seen each other before, and have not seen or heard of each other since. How can I view it other than a providence of God to lead me to a knowledge of the evil course of that inebriate wretch that I might call for justice, and extend the protective arm of the law over him, by placing him in prison, so that he might not have stolen a horse and come to a violent death. But I trust that God beareth me witness that my error was on the side of mercy, as I then felt toward my erring brother.

W. S. DEWEES.

A PRIEST TRAPPED BY A WOMAN.—A Roman Catholic in England, being about to marry a Protestant woman, it was mutually agreed that there should be no contest on the subject of religion. For some time after their union this agreement was scrupulously observed, but in process of time, the priest who paid them frequent visits, expecting an easy prey, began to talk about the peculiarities of his religion. He particularly insisted on the doctrine of transubstantiation, and grew troublesome by his importunity. The woman thought herself how to get rid of him; and one day seeming to be overcome by his arguments, she agreed to attend the mass with her husband the following First-day, provided she might be allowed to prepare the wafer herself. The priest not suspecting anything, and glad on any terms to secure such a convert, gave his consent. The woman accordingly appeared at the chapel with her husband, and after the consecration of the wafer which she had brought with her, she solemnly demanded of the priest, whether it was really converted into the body of Christ? To which question he, without hesitation replied, that there was a conversion made of the whole substance of the bread into the body of Christ; and that there remained no more of its former substance. "If this be really the case," said she, "you may eat the wafer without danger; but as for myself, I should be afraid to touch it, as it is mixed with arsenic." The priest was thunderstruck by a discovery so unexpected, and was too wise to hazard his life upon a doctrine for which he had however contended with all the earnestness of perfect assurance. The woman's husband was so struck by this practical confutation of a doctrine which he had before implicitly believed, that he never afterwards appeared at mass.—Selected.

BAHAMA ISLANDS.—About the Bahama Islands are thousands of persons employed in collecting sponges, which in shallow water are harpooned, a special kind of harpoon being made, in the shape of a five-pronged fork with a long wooden handle. At the Bahamas the water is so clear that, with a machine equivalent to a bucket with a plate of glass at one end, the bottom of the sea can be clearly seen at a depth of one hundred and fifty feet. This is the old Greek system, but it is used in the Bahamas, and over five thousand men and boys are said to be steadily employed at the business.

The diving method is employed where the sponges are more than twenty-five fathoms down. The diver stays under two or three minutes. At still greater depths they dredge with a net. The sponge area within reach of the Key West fishermen covers no less than three thousand five hundred square miles. Every day many schooners, each having a crew of five or six men, and equipped with two dingies, sail to the reef, where one man keeps the ship while two go out in each dingley after sponge; one sculls and the other searches the bottom with a sponge glass. The sponge is hooked up with a long pole and spread on deck, where the gelatinous matter decays. When they have a sufficient cargo they land, and fasten the sponge in crates or crawls, the tide ebbing and flowing through them. This cleansing process requires about one week. Before being crawled they are black in color and emit a foul odor. When clean they are bleached. I visited the largest sponge establishment in the city. The Florida sponges are famous throughout the world, probably only the Mediterranean can compare with them. Some are several feet in circumference, and so soft that they are spoken of as Florida sheep wool.—Christian Advocate.

A GLASS OF BEER.—"Would you not like a glass of beer?" said some one to C. Spurgeon, when he returned, much fatigued, to the hotel where he was staying.

"Yes," was the answer; "but some poor beggar to whom drink is a temptation might hear of it and feel encouraged to take a dozen glasses. I abstain for the sake of such."

This was the true spirit of Christ manifested in the matter of not putting stumbling-blocks in the way of others. There are so many who are easily misled, and who require but a feather's weight to incline them to yield to temptation, that it is of the utmost importance that strong, faithful, noble men, should stand aloof from things which, though not perhaps specially dangerous to themselves, might, through the example of their use, bring disaster to the weak and unwary. Thus the great Apostle said: "It is good neither to eat flesh, nor to drink wine, nor anything whereby thy brother stumbleth, or is offended, or is made weak" (Rom. xiv: 21). Even if the strong drink were healthful instead of harmful to them, it would be wise for Christian men to avoid it lest weak ones should stumble and fall through their example.—The Christian.

The Tulip and its Story.

Now that the Feast of the Tulips, as it has been wittily termed, is almost here, it is interesting to trace the romantic history of this wonderful flower that, after more than three centuries of adoption by European and Occidental nations, yet remains essentially what nature first created it—a child of the Orient, boldly-simple in outline, intense in color, and gorgeously magnificent in its beauty.

As we might expect, its birthplace was sunny Persia. The botanist of his age, the celebrated Dr. Gesner, came across it in his travels and brought it back with him to Europe in 1559. The old blood-red tulip of our gardens (Tulipa Perseriana), in its specific name still commemorates the name of its introducer, just as its generic name of Tulip commemorates its Persian origin, tulip being a foreign corruption of the Persian name of the flower thoubelan, signifying turban, from the shape of the blooms.

Considering the restricted intercourse of that day, the tulip was rapidly disseminated over Europe. Under cultivation it soon sported into brilliant variations. Its surpassing flakings,atherings and pencillings were so unlike any other flower that there was the greatest favore about it. This enthusiasm culminated in the celebrated "Tulip mania" of Holland in 1636 and 1637, a happening unique in history; so raptured did the staid Hollanders become with it, and so great the demand for rare or highly prized varieties, that capitalists began to speculate in tulips as Wall Street magnates do today in wheat and corn, not only buying up all in sight, but trading in futures.

The infection spread until men of limited means mortgaged their homes to buy a few dozen of these bulbs. Prices ran incredibly high. One hundred and twenty bulbs of one variety brought at auction a lump sum of three thousand six hundred dollars, or thirty dollars each bulb. Varieties, of which only a half-dozen or so bulbs were to be obtained, sold for thousand dollars or more apiece; but the climax was reached when a single bulb of a variety named Scmper Augustus sold for 1,300 florins, the equivalent of more than five thousand dollars in United States money! It is a melancholy illustration of the mania of the time, that the common Persian tulip that Gesner obtained for the asking, is still extant in our gardens; while the offspring, that seventy-seven years later brought the greatest price ever paid for a single plant or bulb, has absolutely disappeared from cultivation.

Of course the reaction came; and the crash in prices ruined scores of men who had invested heavily all in tulips. In spite of all, the Hollanders retained their intense passion for the flower, and do until this day—a passion shared by all the German people.

Royal blood is privileged to royal peculiarities. The regal tulip, not content with having helped to make history, or with having conquered masculine indifference, insists upon a unique seed propagation unlike that of any other known flower. The shiny black seeds are of good size, and, in the hands of those who understand their culture, not particularly difficult of germination. However, the tulip seedling is no plebeian plantlet, that feels its incumbent upon itself to push at once into the luscious, flowering world. Quite the reverse. It takes a five or six years' leisure growth before it deigns to send up its first flower. Here again it leaves the beaten track of flower usage. No matter from how brilliant a tulip the seed may have been saved, nor how gaily the parent flower may have been streaked or feathered, the bloom of the seedling is of a plain self-color. It is now a "Breeder" tulip, and year after year the seedling tulip wears the self-colored dress in which it first elected to appear. This goes on for three, four or five, or even nine or ten years; then the flower "breaks" or becomes rectified. In other words it has passed through the preliminary flowering stage, and is ready now, some ten or fifteen years from the sowing of the seed, to show what manner of flower it intends to be.

Curious as it may seem, the breeder flower gives not the slightest indication of the color or marking of the mature tulip. The muddy, magenta-hued blossom may be transformed into the most brilliant blood-red, or the quiet mauve into a flaming flower, most gorgeously blazed and flaked. This change is a radical one, affecting the smallest offset from the parent bulb. As tulips in favorable soil increase rapidly, through new bulbs forming, in the course of a few years longer (some twenty or twenty-five years in all perhaps since the seed was sown), the grower is able to put the best of his seedlings on the market. We fear few Americans would have patience enough for the undertaking.—Lora S. La Mance.

"To-day the Saviour calls: ye wanderers come;
O ye benighted souls, why longer roam?"

"To-day the Saviour calls: oh, hear Him now; Within these sacred walls to Jesus bow."

"To-day the Saviour calls: for refuge fly;
The storm of justice falls, and death is nigh."

"The Spirit calls to-day: yield to his power; Oh, grieve Him not away, 'tis mercy's hour."

THE FRIEND.

FIFTH MONTH 22, 1897.

During the late religious visit which our friends John and Esther Fowler paid to Egypt, they met with a young woman, in whom they became much interested. She is now living in Switzerland, and employed as governess in a family of children. A recent letter from her shows that the interest was mutual. In it she says, "My heart is full of thankfulness, first for having met you, because I have been helped and strengthened by seeing you and talking to you both; and secondly for being remembered by you. I have been much blessed since I have been in Egypt. I used to be unhappy and to fret for many things, but now I am content, and know that our lives are ordered for us. I am learning to say, Thy will be done." She expresses a desire that they might remember each other in their prayers, "and that shall be a tie between us."

Such incidents as the intercourse with this interesting young woman, are occasionally met with by those who are laboring in Christ's cause, and at times they are the beginning of a life-long interest and friendship, but open the way for the exercise of Christian concern and private labor, which is blessed of the Lord. They are a source of encouragement to the Lord's servant, who may see in them an evidence that his Master is pleased to use him for the promotion of his cause in the earth.

Services of this kind are often placed in the power of those who have not received a gift in the ministry of the Gospel, but who are endeavoring to be found partakers of the Divine communion, and in their performance they experience the truth of the promise, "He that watereth, shall be watered also himself."

May we all be watchful to make a right use of these openings and opportunities for doing good, which are graciously put in our power.

In the account of Concord Quarterly Meeting in the present number of THE FRIEND, mention is made of the concern of our dear Friend, Esther Fowler, to pay a religious visit in the Western States. Her prospect is to attend the Quarterly Meeting of Salem in Ohio in the Eighth Month next. From there to go pretty directly to Pa-sadena in California and attend the Monthly Meeting there, which is a branch of Hickory Grove Quarterly Meeting in Iowa, and visit some or most of its members. On her return eastward, she proposes to attend Iowa Yearly Meeting, held the present year at West Branch, Iowa. Her minute also liberates her to appoint some public meetings.

We have no doubt many of our readers can unite in the desire that the Lord who sends her forth may bless her efforts in his cause, and enable her to return with the reward of peace.

We have received a letter from a respected Friend, referring to the article published in THE FRIEND of Fifth Month 8th, on the correct use of the plain language. Our correspondent thinks that some who have felt that it would be right to use "thou" instead of "thee" in the nominative case, have been discouraged by the fear that it might seem like a presumptuous assumption of superior sanctity. His concern is that all may be encouraged faithfully to follow the impressions of duty made upon their minds. In this feeling we concur.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—By the entrance of Corea and the Orange Free State into the Universal Postal Union, which has been announced to the Postal Congress at Washington, and the probable entrance of China before 1899, the entire postal circuit of the globe will have been accomplished.

The House has passed the resolution appropriating $200,000 for the relief of American citizens in Cuba without a dissenting voice, and the President has signed the bill.

On the 20th inst. the Morgan Cuban resolution was passed by the United States Senate by a vote of 41 to 14. The resolution declares "That a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the Government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America will maintain a strict neutrality between the warring parties, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States." An analysis of the vote shows that the affirmative was cast by 18 Republicans, 19 Democrats and 4 Populists, and the negative by 12 Republicans and 2 Democrats.

The Morgan resolution in the House was referred to the Committee on Rules. The matter will not be brought before the House until the negotiations which it is believed are being conducted by the President with the Government of Spain, looking to the pacification and independence, have been concluded, and the result is made known to the country. No details of the negotiations now under way in regard to Cuba have been made public, but it is under-and-1 that they include complete amnesty to all who participated in the revolution as a prerequisite to a treaty of peace with a Liberal government with Spanish consent, the withdrawal of Spanish troops and subsequent voluntary acknowledgment by Spain of the independence of the island possibly upon the payment of a war indemnity. This solution of the question is being pressed, with intimations that the United States will guarantee the performance of the conditions on both sides.

Senator Joseph H. Earle died at his home in Greenville, South Carolina, on the 20th inst.

It appears that in the last quarter of a century, or since 1873, says the New York Sun, there have been cut in Michigan, Wisconsin and Minnesota alone 154,000,000 feet of white pine, 6,000,000 cords, besides 83,000,000 shingles, and in the last three-fourths of that period about 200,000,000,000 feet, taking the whole country together. New York and Pennsylvania have, next to the States just mentioned, large quantities of standing coniferous timber, and the amount left in the Northern States is estimated at about 100,000,000,000 feet, or half as much as has been cut since about 1878 in the whole country. Canada is another resource, with about 37,000,000,000 feet of white pine.

Forest fires are burning at many points in the upper Michigan peninsula. Unsettled weather has destroyed much of the standing timber, as well as the wiping out of settlements, may result.

A New Orleans dispatch says, "It is thought there will be no further damage done by the yellow fever. The losses in Louisiana is estimated at $1,750,000, in Mississippi at $8,500,000, and in Arkansas at $4,200,000, or a total of $15,750,000, but as serious a loss as in any other year, with few exceptions of overflow, when the river was not nearly as high as it is now."

By a fire in Hoboken on the night of the 20th inst., one whole block was reduced to ashes, and 140 families were rendered homeless. The flames started in a large factory. The loss is believed to exceed $500,000. The fire nearly destroyed the City Hall. Fifteenth and Race Streets, the Clerk stated that he had received a communication, which, though addressed to him personally, he had no doubt was intended for the Meeting. According to custom, it was decided to refer the paper to a small Verbal Committee for examination. This Committee reported that it was desirable issued by Friends of Arch Street Yearly Meeting. They were united in recommending it should be read in the meeting and pondered, but that the members should refrain from commenting upon it. This was united with. We are informed that an unusual degree of solemnity was felt when the epistle was read. In the Women's Meeting, a similar course was made in like report, and the reading was listened to without remark. Many of the members have expressed their satisfaction with the epistle and with the action of the Men's and Women's Meetings in having it read.

Deaths in this city last week were 413, being 30 less than the previous week, and 13 more than the corresponding week of 1890. Of the foregoing, 217 were males and 196 females; 54 died of pneumonia; 26 of consumption; 26 of heart disease; 20 of apoplexy; 19 of cancer; 17 of diphtheria; 16 of old age; 16 of convulsions; 15 of scarlet fever; 17 of typhoid fever; 11 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 11 of inflammation of the brain; and 9 of inflammation of the lungs.

FOREIGN.—The scheme of the Government for the relief of Ireland, as outlined in the House of Commons last week by the First Lord of the Treasury, A. J. Balfoar, was sprung as a surprise upon most of the members, and was the leading topic for discussion in the political world. Under the scheme the land tax will be about $250,000 ($1250,000) early, and the tenants will be relieved of about £400,000 ($2,000,000) of yearly taxation. It is understood that the project was approved at a Cabinet Council, and that before it is submitted to Parliament its salient features will be communicated in confidence to the leading Irish landlords.

DIED. at his residence, Newmarket, Ontario, Canada on the twenty-sixth of Second Month, 1891, THOMAS MOORE, in the seventy-third year of his age; a member and elder of Yonge Street Monthly Meeting of Friends. Though charitable to all true believers in the Lord Jesus Christ, he was firmly attached to the Friends of his locality, and his avocations were professed by early Friends, and took great interest in reading their writings, was diligent in reading the Holy Scriptures, often speaking of deriving comfort therefrom, and in attending all our meetings which health would permit, in which his voice was occasionally heard with acceptance. In the year 1868, being in the advanced stage of an affliction which afflicted him, and under a sense of duty made the journey, to which he often referred with pleasure, mentioning the kindness he received from Friends and relatives being a stranger in a strange land. For a number of years he suffered much from palpitation of the heart and nervous prostration, which was borne with patience. To the above named affliction was added the loss of hearing to a considerable extent, which was a great trial to him. Being of a social disposition it is a measure deprived him of the enjoyment of the company of his friends. On the twenty-ninth of Twelfth Month last he was stricken with paralysis, which left him partially helpless. A physician being called he endeavored to ease him from his confinement, but he informed his time here would be short, that medicine would avail little, said, that was good news, he was going home; and thought in his case it was better to depend on Providence than medicine. His suffering over eight weeks were very great, but his hope in God through Christ Jesus was not shaken. He had the children of his faith know his feelings, and all felt at one time saying, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly;" at another, "Oh, that I had the wings of a dove, that might fly away and be at rest." He often prayed for patience and resignation to hold out to the end, saying, "The Lord's time is the best time." Once, on being asked if he would have something to eat, said, "I have meant to eat, but know not how to eat." He died, at last, and his many little acts of endurance after articulation had ceased, showed his affection to those around him. He leaves a wife and daughter to mourn his loss.

She often amply earned Christ's counsel to those around her, as faithful and devoted service to her dear Master. She was of a cheerful nature, whose daily life and conversation revealed a close walk with her Saviour, so that it may be truly said of her, "A mother in Israel is found." On her way from meeting she fell from a stroke of paralysis, and she died after she was stricken. She leaves the comforting assurance that an heaven peace crowned her departing spirit.

She was regarded by her acquaintances as a willing helper to those in need of suffering, and her ministrations to the wants of others was one of the characteristics of her life. She was careful to heed the injunction, "Let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth;" she was firm in upholding the faith and doctrines as held by ancient Friends. The last year of her life was one of intense suffering borne with cheerful resignation, often expressing thankfulness for her many favors. Her friends have no more consoling evidence that their loss is her eternal gain.

"CAMDEN, Second Month 21st, 1886.

"I attended Western Quarterly Meeting on sixth-day. I think, as far as I know, I was the only stranger, as Friends often say.

"It was a wintry time outwardly, and was very such so, I thought, inwardly—very little sensible exercise prevalent, so it felt to me—very little warmth and very little verdure. I thought there was to be felt the absence of much feeling the second meeting, in all of which I suffered some degree. Yet not without some instruction, remembering with some fresh tenderness the next morning, that the disciples of old toiled all night and caught nothing; and yet the Master, in his condescending goodness, drew near and commanded them to cast the net, and then they drew a plentiful supply. The remembrance of which comforted my spirit. There seems a great lack of a general religious exercise—restless for the blessing until the day breaketh.

"I have been looking over the little book from William Penn's writings, lately compiled by me, and I feel grateful that thou hast labored in it. It was a good work I think."

"[The latter part of this letter refers to the annual inquiry made of the members of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting as to their use of intoxicating drinks. To this method R. Esterbrook took strong objection, regarding it as an injudicious method of endeavoring to promote a worthy object. The letter says:]

"If Friends could be satisfied with the reading of a minute, carefully worded, of advice, once a year, as a caution and as a reminder, I entertain no doubt it would secure the respect of our members, and be much more efficacious, in the course now imposed upon the meetings. I am convinced it is a great blunder. I know no man who has a deeper sense of the evil of temperance than I have. I yield to no man in this respect, but for all good objects we must strive lawfully, if we would be crowned with true success."

"CAMDEN, Third Month 4th, 1886.

"Our Monthly Meeting was a quiet, solid meeting. (I felt it so.) Not wholly silent. In the second meeting our Friend, Charles Rhoads, in a very agreeable manner, laid his concern before Friends, and it was feelingly united with, and a minute prepared accordingly, worded perhaps in this way, 'A visit in Gospel love to the meetings of Friends within the limits of North Carolina Yearly Meeting, and for such other service as way may open for.'

"It seems a duty we owe to one another, and it is also a privilege, when we can be brought into a feeling of sympathy, and bear one another's burdens a little.

"Charles Rhoads was comforted by thy sympathy for him, which I endeavored to impart to him as thou requested."

"[In allusion to the separation in Canada.] "It is an idle thing, a weak thing, to be looking towards London for recognition under existing circumstances. It looks as if London Yearly Meeting thought, and the expectant Yearly Meetings thought, that London had some especial store of spiritual help to impart. It is a great, and to me an unaccountable delusion, except that it shows a great lack of depth of discernment.

"I have just read the editorial in THE FRIEND, and I am grateful for it. It is high time that the delusive notion should be exploded that London Yearly Meeting is the great source from which the law of Quakerism is to be given forth, and the word to all the Yearly Meetings, were ever situated. As Morris Cope said, in the Meeting for Sufferings, 'Ephraim lost his strength, and did not appear to know it.'

"[The editorial above alluded to was published in THE FRIEND of Fourth Month 3rd, 1886, and contained some comments on a conference recently held in London on the subject of correspondence with various bodies in this country. It takes the ground that "the dissemination of sentiments at variance with our doctrines has been the primary cause of the difficulties now affecting the peace of the Society; that much of the responsibility for this departure from our ancient standard of faith and practice rests upon London Yearly Meeting, because it failed to apply a restraining hand or to openly condemn those doctrinal views issued by its members, which paved the way for this departure, and the official sanction or toleration by London Yearly Meeting of mission and other movements, in which the principles of Friends do not limit the actions of those interested, place it in such a position that it is difficult to see how its epistolary correspondence can exert a salutary influence upon those bodies of Friends who are most affected by the decision of the Conference.]"

"CAMDEN, Fifth Month 8th, 1886.

"The baptism of Christ is by one Spirit into one body, where all are made to drink, and delight also to drink of that one Spirit. Where this is wanting, the essential Truth is wanting. So that, while we have cause to be thankful for the help afforded to us during the late Yearly Meeting, etc., the language is still applicable, 'Serve the Lord with fear, and rejoice with trembling.'

"PLAINFIELD, Sixth Month 21st, 1886.

"Our meeting here yesterday was a refreshing one. The blessed promise made to the two or three met together in the name of Christ being graciously fulfilled in our experience, and the favors openly acknowledged with thanksgiving. I thought our Quarterly Meeting a favored one, although I confess I should be glad if the dear Friend who spoke so well to us and with such a good concern, possessed the art of condensation. I was afraid the service was somewhat marred by repetitions."

"PLAINFIELD, Sixth Month 27th, 1886.

"The article in the Christian Worker on J. G. Whittier will neither injure the reputation of THE FRIEND or the "Poet" with any whose judgment would be of much value to J. G. W. "That, I think, would be my feeling were I the object of its criticism.

"Perhaps the same may be said of J. H. M. And so completely are such people gone overboard that all hope of rescue is departed from me. I think argument is mostly lost upon them. Only like furnishing a fresh supply of fuel.

"We enjoyed the visit from one Sixth-day to another Sixth-day of our friends, Morris and Deborah Cope. I accompanied them to Philadelphia on Sixth day last, and they expected to reach their home yesterday. Dear M. C. is not the man he was two years ago. Seems to need extreme care. He is very feeble. We thought it a privilege to have such a visit. Can scarcely expect a repetition of it. I think M. C. fully realizes the great uncertainty of life, and is favored to contemplate the exchange of time for eternity with calm resignation and holy confidence."

"[Richard Esterbrook's letters frequently manifest the high esteem and warm affection he felt for Morris Cope, whom he called one of nature's noblemen. He was, indeed, a man of no ordinary character. His powers of mind were above the average, and were associated with a sanctified common sense and a kindness of heart that endeared him to many, while his unwavering attachment to the principles of the Society of Friends and his boldness in defending them, were bonds which closely united him to their true and living advocates. One illustration occurs: On one occasion the Meeting for Sufferings, of which he was a member, had under consideration a document referring to the principles of Friends, and the position, in reference to them, of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. Some one suggested a change in a paragraph, the effect of which would have been to greatly weaken the force of the essay. Morris Cope said, in substance, "If we want to say that all the exercise and concern of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on behalf of sound doctrine for the last twenty years amounts to nothing, that's the way to do it." To this sharp criticism no reply was made, and the essay passed unaltered. His memory was accurate and retentive, and he possessed a vein of originality that added to the interest of his conversation.]

(To be continued.)

Against Accepting Offerings from the Injurious.

There seems to be a frequently recurring need for the revival of the testimony of Chrysostom, delivered fifteen centuries ago, that "The Church receives no offerings from the injurious." This enunciation has come afresh to my mind within a few days, in seeing the announcement made in a daily paper of Philadelphia, that the brothers Duke, of Durham, North Carolina, had just given ten thousand dollars to Guilford College in that State, as "a lasting memorial of their goodwill" to the Institution. Having received there the principal part of their education they "have ever held the school in high esteem," it is stated, "and watched its growth and progress with much interest."

The business in which B. N. and J. B. Duke are very extensively engaged, is that of the manufacture of chewing tobacco and cigarettes. It would seem quite unnecessary to expatiate in this place upon the unhealthy character of these manufactured products. Admittedly, the traffic in many respects considered, is highly injurious. Very pointedly and pitifully was this business on the part of the Durham firm brought under death-bed arraignment in the case of a lad of nineteen years who had been employed at a shoe factory, and who died at his boarding place in Camden, New Jersey, from the excessive use of cigarettes. Shortly before his life was thus miserably cut short, he said: "Tell all my friends 'Duke's Best' have killed me, and beg of them never to smoke another."

Further, its so general association with impurity additionally operates to bring this traffic under marked condemnation. The writer feels that he is justified in speaking directly upon this matter, inasmuch as it has fallen to his lot—probably beyond that of any other member of our religious Society in these parts—to seek such relief from those in authority as might measurably reduce the evil referred to.

Ten years ago (1857), a letter was received by me from a minister who for years filled the position of secretary of the Conference of one of the larger religious bodies held weekly in Philadelphia, in which he expressed his concern at the exposure in a tobaccoist's window, near his home, of a large frame containing two hundred or more small pictures of actresses, many of the pictures being highly indecent. These indeed were to be seen similarly displayed all over the city. He had frequently noticed lads gathered around the window, and was led to query whether there was to be found no remedy for this grievous evil, for he had appealed in vain to the Director of Public Safety. Upon receiving this letter, the District Attorney was consulted, and he being in accord with the view that the law prohibitive of such displays ought not to be set at naught, the dealer was summoned before a magistrate to answer the charge. The pictures in question were advertising cards for the cigarettes of Duke & Co., of Durham, N. C., aforesaid, with factory and also offices in New York City. The retail dealer of this pictured impurity was required by the magistrate to answer before the Court. As I waited near the room occupied by the Grand Jury, with the minister who had called my attention to the case, he told me how he had had cause to realize in his early youth the serious consequences to the pure mind of giving admittance to those soiling things. He had found to his sorrow how difficult they were of effacement, needing even yet in mature years a watching upon prayer, and how he desired he might be able to be a help in preserving the young people in the present day from this snare of the fowler. But the complaint was to be stated to the Grand Jury. Going into the room I found it, to my misgiving, filled with tobacco smoke, and it was these smokers who were to decide whether one who dealt in goods that ministered to their gratification was to answer, yea or nay, for his alleged misdeeds before the judge. These men not only found that he should not be brought to account, but being incensed at the attempt to overturn their idol would have laid the costs upon myself; whereas the Judge (Gordon) non-concurring in the attempt to have a citizen punished for essaying a disinterested service to the community, sent back the bill of indictment. The District Attorney laid the latter before them again, appealing to them to reverse their finding, but they would do no more than reluctantly take off the costs.

And what did these hundreds of vicious pictures displayed in the tobacco dealer's windows stand for? They were samples of such as were slipped singly into each package of Duke's cigarettes, and to be had by every lad or other purchaser of the mind and body defiling wares. "Duke's Best have killed me!" What a wail to arise from the nauseating smoke of this furnace! Often have I thought of the mother (and she was of a family of Friends) who pathetically wrote me about finding one of the defiling cards in a pocket of her boy's clothes that she had taken up to repair, beseeching that something might be done to stop this awful work of the desolators of homes.

Not yet, alas, is the brief narrative finished of the direct work of the injurious in this connection. Three years after the Grand Jury incident (1890), the same firm of manufacturers of cigarettes, ambitious to yet further develop the ungodly trade, made very extensive use of the mails to send their circulars and abominable pictures into thousands of our homes. A Methodist minister, the unwilling and indignant recipient of one of these prints, was the first to call my attention to the outrage. An Episcopal clergyman and editor wrote me (upon learning that the matter had been laid before the postal authorities) that he had been the recipient of one of the pictures, as was likewise his son and the assistant editor. My own home was similarly invaded. Exceedingly unpleasant it is to refer to this episode, yet I believe its relation, with what I have further referred to, to be a duty that is owing to this day and generation. I need only add that I have the circular of the firm before me, and it bears upon it the names of the three managing directors, two of whom are B. N. and J. B. Duke, the bestowers of the recent gift of money to Guilford College.

Is it wise and righteous to accept a benefaction of money so acquired? The manufacture of cigarettes in our country increased from two hundred and thirty-eight millions in 1879, to three thousand six hundred and twenty millions in 1894, or fully fifteen fold in fifteen years. So evident has been seen to be the evil physical effects of the weed (irrespective of its accompaniment of moral impurity) that there is probably not a State that has not at least legislated against its sale to minors. (An almost hopeless repression, nevertheless, while parents continue to set the bad example.) Coming directly to our own Society in the State of North Carolina, the last statistics of the Yearly Meeting there showed that upward of fifteen hundred of its members were either engaged in raising or dealing in tobacco, or were concerned in its manufacture, or personally use it—being a proportion of no less than one to every three! In the light of this hazardous alliance, can Guilford College afford to accept the gift that is herewith con sidered?

Rather would I commend such near at hand testimonies (many could be cited from our annuals) as that of the Pennsylvania iron manufacturers, who refused to accept a lucrative order from the United States Government for metal plate which would have been used in the construction of war vessels; or, those manufacturers of glassware who have declined order for thousands of dollars worth of bottles they were wanted for alcoholic liquor purposes; or the firm of belting makers who recently rescinded an accepted order for a large quantity of the product when they learnt that it was intended for use in a brewery.

How morally helpful has proved to be the incident of the Presbyterian Hospital, of Philadelphia, in declining to accept its designate proportion of the proceeds of the annual Charity Ball—the two thousand five hundred dollar cheque being sent back to the donors. How the members of other religious corporations were thence strengthened to stand against similar acceptances, so that the managers of the worldly entertainment, that they might not encounter agent the like rebuff, felt constrained to adopt the rule that all philanthropic organizations desiring to share in the dance must themselves apply for it. What a wholesome and effectual answer was that (over a century ago) of the Baptist pastor, Ryland, in England, who being written to by the President of Rhode Island College (now Brown University) as to the feasibility of raising money for the struggling institution by lottery, replied "As to raising money by a lottery, I dislike it from the bottom of my heart. 'Tis a scheme dishonorable to the Supreme Head of all work and of every true church. We have our fill of those cursed gambling lotteries in London every year. They are big with ten thousand evils. Let us not touch or taste."

On the other hand how stumbling and humiliating was the action of that Wesleyan educational board in Maine, who elected as an associate trustee a noted Portsmouth brewer, who had acquired a large reputation as a liberal contributor to benevolent enterprises; or, the acceptance by a church orphanage of Philadelphia, of large benefactions from the owner of very successful opera house where most sensuous entertainments are frequently given; or, again the attendance of Roman Catholic ecclesiastics at euchre parties where prizes were gambled for the proceeds of which were to be for the church benefit.

The educational Institution in North Carolina under the care of Friends which has been made the recipient of the Duke brothers' gift of ten thousand dollars, can find ready use for the money. It needs increase of funds. This fact however, does not alter in the least the moral bearing of the matter. Herein, indeed, is the one foremost and most plausible plea upon which are founded and set going innumerable pernicious enterprises for monetary relief. The desire of the Dukes' to remember with a hand some gift the school where they were in part educated, will not suffice to cleanse the quality of the money, or reduce the moral risks, com promises and perils incident upon its acceptance.

A very large legacy, only recently operative (it is said it will reach in amount the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars) was left by the fill of a merchant in the iron trade, to Haverford College, for the reason, as he expressed it, that he had "great confidence in the wholesome influence over those who in their youth are reared under the training, care, teaching and example of the Orthodox Friends." This surely reates an exceedingly responsible trust, as well toward the testator and his memory, as the Institution which became directly his beneficiary, and also the Society of Friends at large.

More than a year ago, a brewer of St. Louis, Missouri, tendered to Drury College in that State, the sum of a thousand dollars. The president of the college was desirous of taking the gift with thanks, but many of the students who appeared to have better apprehended what was involved in such acceptance, protested against it.

What was said by the writer thereupon could seem to be equally or still more applicable to the gift of the cigarette-makers—that altogether different [about taking the money] could be the position in the case of a reputable brewer or distiller, converted from the error of its ways to God, who should relinquish the business and thenceforth act upon the conviction that whatever he had of this world's goods could be used to uplift, where theretofore they had been largely used to debase his brother, accepting the money of one who is well satisfied with his continuance in this business will do him no good. Accepting it, if he has felt convictions about its rightfulness, will operate to crush the voice of the inward monitor, and pervert his awakening scruples to compound with its conscience."

Although this plaint of dissent may seem really sufficiently long, there may properly be added a reference to the discouraging effect that a thankful acceptance of this kind of a benefaction may have upon a greatly needed reform and the toilers therein. Many school directors and teachers are authorizing or giving instruction to the pupils under their charge concerning the deleterious effects of the use of tobacco. In Centre County, this State, the directors have notified the county superintendent of schools that the teachers should be non-users of tobacco, requiring him to enter on every available teacher's certificate granted, whether or at the holder is a user of tobacco in any form. In the late emperor of France, Napoleon III., though himself a tobacco user, finding that paralysis and insanity had increased in the same ratio as the revenue from tobacco, and having arranged that the users of the product in the schools and colleges were inferior both in scholarship and character to the non-users, prohibited, by edict, in the national institutions of learning, the minister of instruction likewise issuing similar circulars to the teachers in all the schools of every grade. Efforts in the same direction have been made in Germany. In 1880, the class of Yale University was divided according to grade of scholarship into four divisions, with the result that in the highest division twenty-five per cent. were found to be users of tobacco; in the second, forty-eight; in the third, twenty; while in the fourth, the division containing the poorest scholars, tobacco was used by eighty-five per cent.

Hence, considerations affecting scholarship, character, health, pure and cleanly living, and an accountable use of money, should all incite us to staunchly maintain our testimony against the tobacco-using habit, and against the culture of the weed, its manufacture, products, and the traffic therein.

Diseases of Work.

It is well known that there are a number of dangerous trades which give rise to serious diseases, but as a matter of fact, almost every occupation has some ailment peculiar to itself. A doctor can always tell if his patient is a baker, for instance, by the state of his teeth. The flour dust collects on the teeth, becomes acid, and gives rise to a special kind of decay. Bakers, owing to their irregular life, sleeping in the day and working at night, and because of the hot air and dust, are great victims of consumption. Blacksmiths, strong as they are, are very often suffer from paralysis of the whole right side, from the continued shock of hammering, and their eyes become weak from the glare of the fire. Athletes, strange to say, do not, as a rule, enjoy long life. Professional boxers, wrestlers, gymnasts and cyclists are short-lived, and suffer from enlargement of the heart and diseases of the lungs. Boilermakers get deaf from the continued loud noise. Brewers and brewers' drivers drink beer in such large quantities that they ruin their lives, and generally die young. Bricklayers and plasterers are very healthy, and they are said to resemble asses in never dying. Butchers are very strong and healthy, but they suffer in health through eating little pieces of raw meat. Cabmen are noted for "nipping," and they endure the natural consequences. The cold, also, affects their faces to such a degree that the muscles of the face frequently become paralyzed. Carpenters and cabinetmakers are afflicted with varicose veins in the legs, and the action of the shoulder in sawing and planing produces a diseased condition of the large artery that runs from the heart to the arm, so that there is not a carpenter living, a doctor says, in whom a curious noise may not be heard by applying the ear to that blood-vessel. Hardly a single china scourer lives to old age without becoming asthmatic. Clergymen's sore throat is, of course, well known. It is said by some to result from having the mouth open so frequently, the air going in that way and drying the throat. Others say it is caused by the clerical collar. And others still say it results from the fact that the clergyman preaches from a pulpit, and has to bend his head downward, for barristers, who talk quite as much, do not suffer as much as clergymen, being on the same level as their hearers.

Miners, from working in the dark, become very irritable. Their eyes get weak, and their lungs become quite black—miners' lungs. Cooks, particularly male cooks, working in hotels, clubs and restaurants, get gout from continually tasting rich food, and both male and female cooks get varicose veins and flat foot from long standing, as well as the well-known ache of the face from the heat and dirt. Coopers have a lump on the knee, which is really a little bag of fluid put there by nature to protect the knee from the injurious effects of pressing it against the barrel. Divers' hearts become distended from holding their breath.

Domestic servants are remarkable for suffering from typhoid fever. House-maids are frequently afflicted with poverty of blood from drinking tea and running up stairs. Dress-makers' long hours and confinement result in indigestion, poverty of blood and impaired eyesight. The fumes of nitric acid make goldsmiths' eyes sore, and they get cramps in their fingers from catching small screws. Nearly all the human beings who suffer from that awful disease, glanders, are groomers.

India rubber workers have very bad headaches and great mental depression. Patients are poisoned by the lead they use so much, and all their muscles become very weak. Photographer get poisoned by cyanide of potassium. The dust that enters the lungs of potters when they are sifting clay interiors so much with their breathing that "potter's asthma" is a well-known disease. Compositors get cracks and fissures in their lips and small tumors in the mouth, and consumption attacks them frequently because of the stooping posture and the confined and sedentary life. Politicians are the greatest sufferers of all, the constant dram drinking giving them indigestion, jaundice and nervous diseases, killing them at earlier age than members of any other profession. Sailors, very singularly, suffer greatly from consumption, owing to the cold and damp and the bad air of the forecastle. Salesmen and saleswomen in shops have a lot of standing, which gives them various veins and pains in the feet. Cloth-scoopers, who inhale benzine and turpentine, suffer much from headache, lassitude and nervousness. Shoemakers get their chests pressed in by the last, lose their appetite and strength, and have headaches. Stone-cutters' eyes are often injured by the flying stone.

Tea-tasters, although they only take the tea into the month, and do not swallow it, become so nervous that they can follow their employment for only a period of eight or ten years. The sedentary life of lawyers, artists, students and literary men give rise to gout.—Christian Advertiser.

Letter from Paris.

Fifth Month 1st, '97.

It did not seem hardly right to leave Paris without seeing Perri-Laichaise, one of the most famous ceteries in the world. It was in reality only to see three graves, however, that I finally decided to go. First and above all that of the famous and unfortunate pair of lovers, Abelard and Héloïse, who with all the cruel expedients that the incensed family of the high born girl could contrive, remained true to one another until they finally came to occupy one grave. For several centuries unhappy lovers have been wont to resort to this spot, where, throwing flowers upon the grave, they have foolishly believed that the now sainted occupants would plead for them at the court of heaven, and that their earthly path would thus be made more smooth. A Gothic canopy covers the two recumbent statues, and as it is in the old part of the burying-ground, surrounded by simple monuments, the effect is solemn and impressive.

The other objects of my visit were the graves of LaFontaine and Molière. As I stood beside the two simple urns which stand side by side in one enclosure, I could not help comparing the pomp and magnificence of the place of sepulchre of Napoleon, with the absolute unpretentiousness of the last resting place of these two men.

I stood here a long while, and finally before leaving I returned to reach my hand through the iron grating, and pick a tiny spray of box—the only plant growing on the graves. Of course one is not allowed, but I felt justified in doing so; my admiration for the poets seemed to warrant the act, and besides, I was very modest in the amount I took.

8th.—This week has been devoted to sight-seeing— that is in the afternoon—for since we plan to leave us soon we feel all the more anbitious to get in as many lessons as possible, as well as places of interest.

The most perfect day that I have spent since being in Europe was last First-day at Versailles. We had been keeping it in mind all along and decided to take for the trip the first entirely pleasant day that came. So it was pure accident that it happened to be when the "grandes eaux" (fountains) played. I had heard and read much of Versailles, and expected something wonderful, but was by no means prepared for what awaited us. We were both of one mind to fly the palace, spite of their historic associations, and the fact that one can see the battle of Yorktown among the French victories in the "galerie des batailles." It was the gardens that attracted us most. We wandered there hour after hour, every step opening up new wonders. The sky was a most perfect blue, the clouds so white, and the foliage of the trees in perfect harmony. Never has any one succeeded in combining art and nature with the result attained in these marvellous "jardins de La Notre." But most of all we enjoyed the exquisite rural simplicity and charm of the grounds belonging to "Le petit Trianon," which was the favorite residence of Marie Antoinette. "Le hameau," of which I had heard so much, is a group of artistic rustic cottages, scattered about near a lake and quite covered with vines and plants, many of the latter growing out of the thatched roofs, where the above mentioned queen and the ladies of her court played at dairying.

We had brought our lunch with us, so we had the pleasure of eating it under the shadow of one of the magnificent trees of the park.

It seemed incredible to read in Betecker that though the fountains played only during about an hour, the cost each time was no less than two thousand dollars, and after seeing them we could understand. Towards four o'clock we wandered back to the grand central avenue, commanded by the palace, and seated ourselves on the grass in front of the great basin of Apollon. By this time the grounds were alive with people, there being many thousands present. It is impossible to give any idea of the extent of the park, or how it is possible for so many persons to get together, but when I say they are in proportion to the palace, and that the palace accommodated ten thousand persons, you may get a faint idea. But this I must say—I have never seen a crowd more orderly and well behaved in my life. Walking on the grass or nothing of the kind is forbidden, and yet one sees no destruction anywhere;—one sees no idle curiosity or meets with no incivility.

The fountains do not begin all at once, but in a certain order, so that one can follow them to see all the principal ones start. They begin in front of the palace, followed by the basin of Apollon, so that was why we took our seats commanding the entire grand avenue. As soon as these were in full play, we hastened up a side avenue, where a giant jet emerging out of the rocks hurls a jet of water nearly a hundred feet in the air. A little farther is what they call the "obélisque," from the peculiar form of the column of water—and so on and on—nearly or in fact every group is a mythological one, and the number and variety is simply incredible. The most beautiful and wonderful is called "les bains d'Apollon." It is a huge grotto, simply overgrown with vines and plants in the midst of the forest, where is a beautiful mythological group of the "sun-god," with his chargers on both sides, as if drinking. Here the water comes dashing down, forming cataracts and cascades on every side. The last that begins to play is the basin of Neptune, which is, I suppose, the most tremendous fountain or group of fountains in the world—but why try to describe the indescribable?

All week we have been sight-seeing. One other day we took our lunch and went up to St. Cloud, taking one of the bounts on the Seine, which brings one to the latter place in a little over an hour, and for the extravagant sum of four cents! The ride up the river is perfectly beautiful, and the park of St. Cloud only less lovely than that of Versailles. The palace was destroyed by the communists, but the grounds are still preserved with perfect care. From the heights above the river one has a magnificent view over Paris, with the winding river and the towers and domes standing out strongly.

In the afternoon, on returning to the city, we visited the Luxembourg, and from there took a cab, driving across the Place de la Concorde up the Champs Elysees, and about in the beautiful Bois de Boulogne.

Another afternoon we spent at St. Denis, a suburb of Paris, visiting an old, old cathedral, where repose the royalty of France, from the days of Clovis down to the victims of the revolution. We made a last visit to the bouquinistes, and that made us most unhappy of all, to think we could not loiter up the Seine any more, peering over the old treasures. Oh, very often in America I will wish myself back in Paris, just to spend an hour with the bouquinistes.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

AFTER TWENTY YEARS.

I sat beneath the tree to-day,
Where, twenty years ago,
I carved my darling's name and mine,
What time the roses blow;
And one by one, as freighted ships
Sail in from distant shores,
The golden hours of youth returned
Through memory's open doors.

Gay banners bore in life's fair morn,
Bright hopes and treasured thences,
Came drifting backward from the past
Like half-forgotten dreams;
And merry voices—silent long—
The echoes woke again
With many an old, familiar tune,
And many a glad refrain.

Again we climbed the daisied hill,
Her dear hand clasped in mine,
Or lingered by the sylvan stream,
Its bordering flowers to twine.
Again we breathed the fragrant air
Of June, within the grove,
While on a sturdy Beech I drew
The token of our love.

That day our young hearts danced for joy,
For gathered round us were Such charms as nature only yields
Her truest whopper.

We envied not the hour worst
Its honors, fame or gold;
As perfect then our paradise
As Eden was of old.

She watched me with her soft blue eyes,
As earnestly I traced
Each letter there, and, smiling, said,
They soon would be effaced.
But twenty sweet and bitter years
Their cycles since have run,
And still our names—two names—remain,
Though blending into one.

O happy days! O golden hours!
O joys forever flown!
Why come ye not in truth to me
And bring ye back my own?

The brightest visions ye unfold,
The treasures ye reveal,
Though beautiful as fairy-lands,
Are, like them, all unreal.

Now silently my darling sleeps
A-nigh those scenes of mirth,
Her lullaby the stream's low voice,
Her couch the breast of earth.
In vain I strive to pierce the veil
That shrouds the grassy mound;
Nor cheering song, nor tears shall break
Her dreamless sleep profound.

Ah me! the weary days march on
With slow and measured tread,
And many a shadow lovers near,
And many a hope lies dead;
But patiently I'll wait the hour
Their marchings will be done,
When, like our times, her life and mine
Shall blended be in one.

THERE WAS SILENCE IN HEAVEN.

Can angel spirits rest repose
In full sweet rest of the sky?
And can the veil of slumber close
A cherub's bright and blazing eye?

Have seraphim a weary brow,
A fainting heart, an aching breast?
No, far too high their pulses flow,
To languish, with inglorious rest.

Oh, not the death-like calm of sleep
Could hush the everlasting song;
No fairy dream, or slumber deep
Entrance the rapt and holy throng.

Yet not the lightest tone was heard
From angel voice or angel hand;
And not one plumed pinion stirred
Among the pure and blissful band.

For there was silence in the sky,
A joy not angel tongues could tell,
As from its mystic fount on high,
The peace of God in stillness fell.

O, what is silence here below?
The fruit of a concealed despair;
The pause of pain, the dream of woe.
It is the rest of rapture there.

And to the wayworn pilgrim here,
More kindred seems that perfect peace,
Than the full chant of joy to hear
Roll on, and never, never cease.

From earthly agonies set free,
Tired with the path too slowly trod,
May such a silence welcome me
Into the palace of my God.

The French peace women have sent the following letter to Melnik, King of Abyssinia:

"The women who excrete war, which is wholesale murder, who detest in our European civilization hatred between peoples, the spirit of conquest, the desire for revenge, disregard for the rights of the people with all the evil which it engenders, are happy to discover a last in you a true human soul, a just nature which knows how not to take advantage of victory and will not harbor the spirit of vengeance. Though compelled to defend yourself, you extend your hand to the conquered in relief and do not even ask of them a war indemnity. You treat as brothers and friends those whom their injustice of others has made your prisoners, and as far as in you lies, you undo the evils which you yourself have not done. If a lofty spirit of justice ruled in our European society, King Melnik, we should not think it worth while to congratulate you for having done your duty but in presence of the evil passions which poison with their breath our Occident, we bow down with a delighted and respectful surprise before an example of magnanimity which we have no yet had the opportunity of observing among our Europeans."—Advocate of Peace.

Joy of a Letter from A. S., of Ballitore, to J. Waring, of Bristol.

Dear Friend—This morning I received thine. No doubt, ere this reaches thee, thou wilt have read of the issue of the impending stroke and severe trial to the Church by the removal of our valuable Friend, Job Scott, whose heroic spirit and truly Christian walking have left few examples on earth to equal. He left Dublin the ninth of last month, intending for Munster, not feeling his mind free to leave Ireland, more I apprehend, through the pressure he was to pass through than much prospect of further service in this land. Yet, on the way here, he expressed to a Friend that his mind seemed relieved from its usual depression and burthens, which were almost continual in Dublin and other places in England and Ireland. He was at our meeting yesterday; that in the evening attended by a multitude of people by invitation, to whom Job was powerfully led in his way. He sat in my family in the evening, and spoke a few words respecting the everlasting Sabbath or Seventh-day rest, to which those who had the number of the Beast (666) were unable to come. In the morning he seemed anxious to set out, but had sensation of great heaviness and oppression, which he strove to throw off by medical aid, himself being skilful in that way. Two days after a physician was called, who, apprehending his complaint inflammatory, bled him to relieve his breath, which was exceedingly oppressed, but without much good effect. On Fifth-day he eruption appeared and of the confluent kind. He now addressed himself to bear this new and unexpected kind of suffering. The same day he expressed something about the disposal of his papers, said his sentiments were unaltered respecting the Divinity of Christ and what is called the Trinity. He said he had written a treatise in baptism, which his friends had published since he left America, adding, "There is an Eternal Arm underneath, which is sufficient to rear up and support. I have long been confirmed in the sentiment that nothing could possibly happen that would harm or injure me while I keep under the Divine influence, although I am not without some considerable bodily pain. Yet I feel such a portion of that good which is infinite, that it does not seem worth mentioning, and if there was no greater enjoyment hereafter, the present would be a state truly desirable, through a never-ending sterility, and yet the fulness is still more desirable, the Lord's will (be as it may) must be done, whether it be to bring me to my eternal home or not."

Seventh-day he said, "I have seen the magnanimity of a true believer, and how one that really so would bear all the trials permitted to attend him," and, by way of illustration, added, very forcibly, "dost thou believe in God, thou must also believe in the justness of all his dispensations. This is a service, if I had not any other in Ireland. Death is a service we all owe our great Creator, and sickness is a service required of many." "Oh, Ireland, Ireland, the Lord hath service for thee in Ireland!" often sounded in the ear of my soul before I left some as distinctly as you now hear me speak it."

Speaking of the doctors, he said, "I believe my having this disorder and being here is in the ordering of Providence. It is not given me to know the event, but if there be a field of labor for me to enter into, it is as possible for the Master to raise me up now as it was for him to create me at first. But I have no will in it."

Again he expressed that, if ever he rose above the present weight, which he felt, and seemed to be sinking under, it would be through the marvellous display of eternal power and influence; requested that if he was removed, some further particulars might be transmitted to his friends at home, adding, in substance, "The Lord's will is blessed, and I feel no controversy with it. It is the Lord that enables me to coincide with his will and say, Amen to all the trials and conflicts he permits to attend us."

"I do not expect to have much lively matter to communicate in the course of this disorder, or that my strength will admit of it, but my mind is centred in that which brings into perfect acquiescence. There is nothing in the world worth being enjoyed out of the Divine will, that brings us into a state of existence, and it is for a purpose of his glory, and if we have answered the purpose He has an undoubted right to dispose of us as He pleases. When my mind is capable of deriving satisfaction from anything outward, it is an inexpressible satisfaction to me that my lot is cast here, and that I am surrounded by such near and dear friends, both from within the family and those who have accompanied me."

Second-day, 18th, he expressed that nature had a hard struggle, and that his getting through was very doubtful; gave directions, if he should go home, everything about his interment, it should be plain and simple; said that He who raised up Lazarus could, if He had further labor for him to do, break his bonds asunder, but that when he had reason with nature, it seemed as if he was gradually advancing towards his everlasting home. He expressed his entire resignation to Divine disposal, and that he found nothing to stand between him and the Fountain of Everlasting Love.

Third-day he remarked the efforts to support nature failing, said, "There are many resources in nature, but if the great Author of Nature does not think fit that any of them should be for me, all is well. I have no fear, for perfect love casteth out all fear; he that feareth is not perfect in love."

Fourth-day morning he supplicated thus, "Lord, my God, Thou that hast been with me from my youth to this day, if a man who hath endured, with a degree of patience, the various turnings of thy holy hand, may be permitted to supplicate thy Name, Thou who hast wrought deliverance for Jacob, evince that thou art able to break my bonds asunder and show forth thy salvation, that so my soul may magnify thy Name forever and ever!" And after a pause, wherein he seemed to feel the earnest of his petition, added, "'So be it,' saith my soul," and calling a person to him, he said, "Attend to that which leads to settlement, guarding against the right hand or the left. Be not over anxious for illumination, nor give way overmuch to depression."

His stomach refusing nourishment, he said, "Do not force nature. Let me pass quietly away to the eternal inheritance, to which I have no objection to go, and the sooner the better if the work be done. I have no wish to lay here. It is a tremendous state I am in, as to bodily feelings, though the mind is quiet. I am waiting patiently to see the salvation of God. Do you wait patiently with me. I have no desire, nor the shadow of a desire, to be restored. I hope the doctors will soon find out that they have done their part."

Fifth-day,—"You have seen the awful progress of this disorder. As to me, it matters little, only present pain. May the Lord release me shortly. You may tell my friends in New England and every part of the world that never did my soul bless the Lord on account of any worldly enjoyment as I do in the blessings felt by me, in the prospect of a very speedy release. I do not wish hastily to make my escape, but if the Lord will be pleased to cut the work short, considerably short, in righteousness I think I shall be willing to enroll it on the list of his unspeakable favors."

At another time he said, "Some of my wishes for myself are centered in as speedy a release as may be consistent with the will of our Heavenly Father, and an admission which I have no doubt at all of obtaining into that glorious kingdom where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary soul is eternally at rest."

"I think I have not for seven years past known much or anything of boasting. I have known something of that law of grace whereby all boasting is entirely excluded, but I may say, through that which has supported me under all my trials, to you, my beloved friends, as dear children, follow me, as I have endeavored to follow Christ Jesus, the Lord of Life and Glory and the Rock of my eternal salvation. It would be painful to me to have to return again to combat the trials and conflicts of mortality, but if the Lord should see meet to continue me a while longer I must submit, after having, in humility and resignation, put up my intercessions to be released from the struggles of nature. I feel, and wish you to feel for and with me, after the eternal Rock of Life and Salvation, for, as we are established therein, we shall be in the everlasting unity which cannot be shaken by all the changes of time, nor interrupted in a never-ending eternity." In a while he said, "I must not expect a release but by suffering a due portion of pain and distress. You may feel sympathy with me, but you cannot feel the reduction which must precede a release."

About one o'clock on Sixth-day morning, after great uneasiness and getting little or no rest, he said, "Oh, Lord, if it be consistent with thy holy will, let loose my bonds, and send the moment of a release to my poor body and soul." Afterwards he said, "We cannot approve or disapprove by parts the works of Omnipotence. We must approve the whole, and say, 'Thy will be done' in all things." From one to three he was restless from, as he said, the extreme irritability of the whole nervous system. About four he seemed in great agony, turning his head frequently on the pillow, and said, but "Can it be on any other ground than that the time is come, that the purpose must be effected." Calling the physician, he said, "Make great allowance for me, my distress is nearly as great as is supportable by human nature. Is there no possibility of getting any sleep? Oh, the pain, the inexpressible pain of my lungs!" Being told that, from appearance, there was likelihood of his being released, perhaps in an hour or two, he replied, "If so, the Lord's name be blessed and praised forever, I had much rather it was so than otherwise, for some time I have perceived it hastening fast. The desire of my heart is the blessing of time and the consolation of eternity." In a while, calling his friends to him, he said, "The way is open for all, for all!" The way is open for all! About five, he seemed to wrestle with death, struggled little, considering his remaining bodily strength, so, drawing his breath shorter and shorter, until seven o'clock, after which he breathed no more in these regions of pain and distress, but ascended with joy to his heavenly mansions of glory and an incorruptible inheritance with the saints in light.

I have sent thee these as the most material part of the fragments collected from the lips and the experience of the dying saint who exhibited to us a rare instance of a triumphant exit, having braved death with the same fortitude that he often opposed the combined powers of hell and the grave. I have scribbled it in a hurry, being unwilling to defer the information thou wishest to hear, respecting the dear departed, expecting that the same recital may include a confirmation of sorrow as well as consolation, in which I desire to unite with thee and all the living in the varied sensations, and am, with sentiments of love, though personally unknown, thy affectionate friend.

A City without Saloons.

BY FRANK FOXCROFT.

On the first day of May, with children's festivals, public meetings and religious services, the people of Cambridge, Mass., held a unique jubilee.

The day marked the completion of ten full years without a licensed saloon. In December, 1886, acting under the Local Option Law, which submits this question to the people at each city election, Cambridge voted not to allow the licensing of saloons. At ten successive elections since, this decision has been reaffirmed; and as the license year begins May 1st, that date this year marked the completion of the first decade of closed saloons.

Cambridge is a city of eighty-five thousand people. Cities of equal size, in some sort of popular indigence, have been carried against the saloons. Worcester, Lowell, Fall River and Atlanta, Ga., are instances of such cities. But the gust of indignation has always spent itself. No other city of equal size has ever been carried for "No-license" in two years in succession. That which makes the position of Cambridge unique is that the No-license policy has prevailed there at eleven successive elections.

What has brought about this condition of things in Cambridge? And what are the practical workings of ten years of closed saloons which are thought worth commemorating by a public jubilee? These are questions which I shall endeavor briefly to answer.

Prior to 1886, Cambridge had voted for five years, from the passage of the local option law, for License. With her accustomed conservatism, she fully tested that system before undertaking a change. The saloons became every year more arrogant. They were contemptuous of the law. Their influence was dominant at the City Hall. In 1885, the vote against License which had been cast rather as a protest than with any expectation of practical results, increased ominously and the license majority of eleven hundred the year before was cut down one half. In the summer of 1886, two things happened which set people to thinking more than before upon the question. There were two saloon murders, in one of which the saloon keeper was the murderer. Then the board of aldermen afforded public sentiment by licensing a saloon on Kirkland Street, near Harvard University, in one of the best residential districts.

When the campaign approached, a public meeting was called at which a Citizens' No-license Committee was appointed, representing each ward. Each year since the same committee has been reappointed, with some changes or enlargements; and each year a Ministers' Committee has co-operated. The Citizens' Committee has conducted the political campaign; the Ministers' Committee has arranged meetings in the churches.

In 1886 none of the four local papers were in sympathy with the movement. The Citizens' Committee immediately started a paper of its own, called the Frozen Truth, which was sent by mail to all the names on the voting list—eleven or twelve thousand in all. The contents of the paper were as described in the title. The paper did not touch the general question of temperance but printed information as to what was being done in Cambridge. It gave a list of saloon keepers and their bondsmen; and it gave a map showing how the aldermen had planted saloons all around the schoolhouses. This plain speaking aroused attention. When election day came there was a majority of five hundred and sixty-six for No-license.

The leaders in the movement were wise enough to see that this was not the end of the fight, but the beginning. They proceeded promptly to organize a Law Enforcement Association with more than a thousand members, not to make prosecutions but to strengthen and aid the authorities in enforcing the law. In place of the customary pressure on the side of How-not-to-do it, the Association substituted a strong and wholesome pressure on the side of How-to-do it.

The liquor saloons did not close. They expected to reverse the result the next December, and to bridge over somehow the interval between May and December. The next campaign was a spirited one. Experienced political campaigners declared that no political party had ever done more thorough work than was done by the No-license committee. It opened headquarters, and employed clerks and canvassers. It made a complete house-to-house canvass of the voters. It ran barges to carry its voters to be registered. It naturalized voters. It printed and distributed two numbers of the Frozen Truth, together with various rallying circulars. It manned every polling place with workers and carriers. The remarkable result was that the total vote was nearly three thousand larger than the preceding year, but the increase was split exactly in two and the majority for No-license was the same as before. The local saloons interests, liberally supported as they were by the wholesale and brewing interests of Boston, were handsomely beaten in a desperate fight which they had made for existence. They had fire-works in readiness for their expected victory; but instead, the church bells were rung.

Several general principles have been kept in mind in all of the campaigns. There has been no confusion of the main issue with anything else. As a committee the No-license organization has had nothing to do with parties or candidates. There has been no waste of strength in idle controversies. The No-license workers have expended none of their ammunition on each other. There has been no vituperation. People who did not approve of No-license were not called names, but were invited to study the results of the system. There has been no attention paid to political differences. Republicans, Democrats, Prohibitionists and Independents have worked together harmoniously. Nor has there been any regard to religious differences. Two-thirds of the committee, perhaps, are Protestants; the others are Catholics. But all have worked together. Catholic priests and Protestant clergymen sit on the same platform; the annual ministers' appeal for No-license is written by a Catholic priest and signed by every Protestant pastor in the city, and by nine priests representing four out of five of the Catholic parishes. The platform is made broad enough to hold every man of whatever faith or politics or general theories or personal practice in the matter of temperance, who simply does not want the saloon back in Cambridge.

But the chief reason for the continuance and growth of No-license sentiment in Cambridge is the demonstrated advantage of the system. There were the usual objections at the beginning; that the city could not afford to do without the license fees; that as much liquor would be sold under No-license as under License; that local trade would suffer, and that the law could not be enforced. Every one of these objections has been refuted by experience. If all moral considerations are ruled out, it is possible to prove the advantage of No-license in Cambridge on the hard basis of dollars and cents. For ten years, up to 1886, Cambridge was under License, half of the time under a general law and half of the time under local option. Here is a chance to compare ten years of License with ten years of No-license. Let us see what the figures are. From 1876 to 1886 the valuation of Cambridge dropped from $62,000,000 in round numbers to $59,000,000. In the next ten years it rose to $83,000,000. Here is a loss of $3,000,000 in the License decade, and a gain of $24,000,000 in the No-license decade. If this fact stood alone it would be highly significant; but it does not stand alone. In the ten License years the average annual gain in population was one thousand one hundred and eighty-two; in the ten No-license years it has been two thousand one hundred and ninety-five. In the first decade there were one hundred and fifty-one new houses built annually; the average the second decade has been three hundred and thirty-two. The city gets annually in taxes on the increased valuation of the city under No-license three or four times as much as it would get from license fees, if it called the saloons back.

During the ten years of License the Cambridge savings banks made a net gain of $155,333 each year in deposits. During the ten No-license years the annual net gain has been $366,654. This gain, as an analysis of the returns shows, has been chiefly in small deposits of fifty dollars or less. In East Cambridge, the principal manufacturing section of the city, the deposits last year were four times as large as in the last year of License.

The anticipated injury to local trade has not been experienced, although Boston with all its stores is only a bridge-length away. Two years ago two hundred and fifty seven merchants, in all departments of business, signed a public appeal declaring that No-license had benefited the material interests of the city, and expressing a hope for its continuance.

As to the effect upon the public order: the Chief of Police and the three police captains agree in bearing witness to the improved condition of the streets, and the falling off in drunkenness. The chief states that seventy-five per cent of the arrests for drunkenness are made on the bridges or the street cars, and are of persons who bought their liquor in Boston.

We had last June a celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the incorporation of Cambridge as a city. The finest feature of that celebration was not the brilliant trades display, nor the division made up of the Harvard boys, nor the parade of the Manual Training School, nor the gathering together of seven thousand school children; it was the spectacle of eighty-five thousand people keeping holiday, and from sunrise to sunset not a drunken man visible anywhere.

This is why the supplemental celebration just held seemed appropriate; as an expression of gratitude to Almighty God, and as a testimony to a world of what may be done in suppressing the saloon evil, even in cities of considerable population, when the movement in that direction is characterized by resolute purpose and a sane, lifted common sense.—The Independent.

Asking in His Name.

Jesus says over and over again to his disciples, "Whosoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do;" "If ye shall ask me anything in my name, that will I do;" "If ye shall ask anything of the Father, He will give it you in my name;" "In that day ye shall ask in my name: and I say not unto you, that I will pray the Father for you; for the Father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me, and have believed that I came forth from the Father." What does all this mean? What is it to ask in the name of Jesus? Is it, as many Christians seem to believe, to conclude a prayer with the set formula, "All which we ask in the name of Jesus?" Or is it something more than this?

The "name" in primitive thought stands for the person bearing that name; it is, in a sense, he person himself; while in our modern and Western thought a "name" is often deemed little more than a label attached to a person, in order to distinguish him from other persons. To know another's name, to have a right to bear that name, to speak and act in that name, is, in primitive thought, to be a sharer of that person's life,—by birth, by marriage, or by covenant adoption,—and so to be, in a peculiar sense, representative of that person. A son bearing his father's name stands for that father, and rightly expects to be received with the respect due to his father. A member of a family or of a tribe is recognized as worthy of the position and honor due to that tribe or family. A soldier of a commander, or a servant of a ruler, coming with a message from his master, does not stand merely on his personal worth, but in the reputation of him whom he represents. Hence to ask, or to come, in the name of another, is, as an Oriental would understand it, and as the Bible would state it, to be a representative of the one whose name is thus borne.

So, in this matter of coming in the name of Jesus, and of asking in the name of Jesus, it is not the saying over that name, but the representing of that which that name represents, which brings a petitioner within the scope of his specific promises of Jesus. There were those in the days of the apostles who thought, as many Christians now seem to think, that the saving power from God was a result of saying over the name of Jesus, as if it were a magical formula. And persons of this sort "took upon them to name over them which had the evil spirits the name of the Lord Jesus, saying, I adjure you by Jesus, whom Paul preacheth." But being thus adjured, in one instance, "the evil spirit answered, and said unto them, Jesus I know, and Paul I know; but who are ye?"

and harm came not to the evil spirit, but to those who took the name of Jesus. On the other hand, those who had the spirit of Jesus, and were sharers in his nature, lived, and acted, and spoke, and thought, in his name, and had acceptance with, and power from God continually. And those who were thus in his name, were loved for his name, or were hated for his name, by those about them. So it is to-day with all who live in the name of Jesus.—S. S. Times.

FILTHY RAGS must be torn into bits, ground to a pulpy mass, acted upon by various chemicals and washed many times before they are converted into the pure white paper which is so useful to man; how much paper-making resembles the Divine discipline, consisting of trials, temptations, and tribulations, through which sin-dyed souls must pass ere they are fit to join that company clad in robes washed white in the blood of the Lamb.—Herald of Truth.

Items.

—A part of the proceedings of our late Yearly Meeting and the reading of interesting memorials from our deceased friends Rebecca S. Conard and Clarkson Sheppard. They have been printed, and may be obtained at the Bookstore, No. 204 Arch Street, Philadelphia; price, five cents each. We would encourage our readers to procure copies for their own use, and to hand to others to whom they might be useful.

The general or circular epistle adopted at our Yearly Meeting, has also been printed, and copies will be given, at the same place, to those who may apply for it. Copies have been sent to London Yearly Meeting, and to the meeting whose annual sessions are held at Fifteenth and Race Sts., Philadelphia. It was read therein, and it is believed was kindly received by many. The committee who have charge of its distribution propose sending it to all the other bodies under the name of Friends, in season for their annual sessions; and also to make arrangements for a liberal distribution to private persons, as way may seem to open.

Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting, England.—The London Friend states that this body has forty-one meetings and two thousand five hundred and eighty-five members. At the meeting held on the twenty-eighth of Fourth Month, a proposition was introduced from the women's meeting to discontinue the answering of the Queries, excepting to report whether meetings for worship were regularly held. The proposition was adopted, and directed to be forwarded to London (we suppose to the Yearly Meeting). This change seems to us an additional step in the direction in which our English brethren have been moving for some time, i. e., of substituting attention to outside matters for the examination of their own spiritual condition, which in former days was a prominent part of the concern and business of their meetings. We fear the effect of such changes will not be for the good of the Society.

THE FRIEND.

SIXTH MONTH 5, 1897.

There was, perhaps, no error which the early members of the Society of Friends more earnestly opposed than that delusion which leads men to believe that they can be saved through the merits and sufferings of the Blessed Son of God, our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, without experiencing the cleansing work of his Spirit in the heart. They rejected the doctrine, that the all-wise and unchangeable God would consider any as holy who were not practically made so by the eternal working of his power; or that He would impute any righteousness to them other or further than He had first clothed them with, through their submission and co-operation with his own Divine Grace. Their testimony was in accordance with that of the Apostle: "But ye are washed, ye are sanctified, ye are justified, in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God."

George Fox, in his reply to Philip Tavevner, says: "So far as a man is sanctified, so far is he justified, and no further; for the same that sanctifies a man justifies him; for the same that is his sanctification, is his justification, and his wisdom, and his redemption; he that knows one of them, knows all; he that doth not feel one of them, feels none of them at all."

Robert Barclay, in Prop. 7, of his Apology, has this passage: "Let not any deceive themselves, so as to foster them-selves in a vain hope and confidence, that by the death and sufferings of Christ they are justified so long as sin lies at their door, iniquity prevails, and they remain yet unrenewed and unregenerate, lest that be said unto them, I know you not. Let that saying of Christ be remembered, 'Not every one that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter, but he that doeth the will of my Father.' To which let these excellent sayings of the beloved disciple be added: 'Little children, let no man deceive you; he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous. He that committeth sin is of the devil; because if our heart condemn us, God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.'

Isaac Penington, in "A Salutation of Love and Good will" (Works, vol. 2, p. 352), thus counsels those to whom he was writing: "There is no way of avoiding the eternal insupportable wrath of God but by travelling out of that nature, spirit and course which it is to. Him that sowed to sin and corruption under the law, the sacrifices would not save them; nor him that sowed to sin and corruption under the Gospel, the sacrifice of Christ will not save now, but he that is saved by Christ must be sanctified and redeemed from sin and corruption by Him; which Christ worketh by his principle of life sown in the heart."

The main bent of the ministry and writings of these Divinely enlightened men was to turn the attention of the people to the practical work of salvation, by close attention, obedience to, and co-operation with the Light or Spirit of Christ in the heart, as God's gift for man's salvation, through which redemption was to be experienced from the power of sin and participation known in the forgiveness of past iniquities through the merits of the Saviour.

They were accused by many of want of faith in the atoning efficacy of the offering of our Saviour for the sins of mankind; but this charge their writings abundantly refute. Of the multitude of extracts that might be produced from our ancient writings, showing the sincerity of their belief in this doctrine, it may be sufficient here to quote the following from Isaac Penington.

"God himself, who knew what virtue was in the inward, yet hath pleased to make use of the outward; and who may contradict or slight his wisdom and counsel therein. Glorious was the appearance and manifestation of his Son in the flesh; precious his subjugation and holy obedience to his Father; his giving himself up to death for sinners was of great esteem in his eye! It was a spotless sacrifice of great value, and effortful for the remission of sins; and I do acknowledge humbly unto the Lord the remission of my sins thereby, and bless the Lord for it; even for giving up his Son to death for us all, and giving all that believe in his name and power to partake of remission through Him (Winks, vol. 3, p. 380).

We believe there is need of caution at the present day, that none may be led into error through dwelling on certain aspects of truth, and neglecting other views equally sound and essential. The attention of people may be directed to the atoning sacrifice of our Saviour as the ground of our acceptance with God; and this may be so presented to their view, that they may gradually be persuaded, that nothing more is needed to secure their salvation than to believe in the truth of the Scripture records respecting it, and to apply it to themselves by an act of their own imagination. Others, seeing the insecure ground on which such are building, may exalt the testimony to the practical nature of redemption by the work of Grace in the heart, and yet undervalue the atonement of our Saviour. In such cases we believe there is a want of that faith which accepts the Divine revelations in simple acquiescence; these persons are apt to lean to their own understanding and reason, and to place their dependence in measure on the deductions of their own mental powers. To these the caution of I. Penington is very applicable—"God himself, who knew what virtue was in the inward, yet hath pleased to make use of the outward; and who may contradict or slight his wisdom and counsel therein?"

Much of the controversy among Christian professors on subjects of doctrine arises from the indulgence in speculative notions about religious truth, which are not the plain testimony of Scripture, or the result of living experience of the work of God in the soul. However satisfactory these may be to their inventor, they carry insufficient evidence of their truth to the minds of others; and may be as far astray from any true conception of the reality, as the speculations of a blind man as to the nature of light fall short of the vivid effect of a beautiful landscape on a healthy eye. Some who have indulged in such speculations on mysterious points have involved themselves in a labyrinth of error, and gone farther and farther astray, till finally they have denied the truth of doctrines that in better days they believed and cherished. Seeking to be wise above what is written, they have become darkened in their imaginations.

We greatly desire for the members of our beloved Society that they may be preserved from all the snares of the devil, and opening their hearts in simple and faithful obedience to the Light of Christ which shines therein, they may be led in the way of salvation from one degree of religious experience to another; that they may abound in faith, love, humility and every grace; their dependence being placed not on anything they can do of themselves, but on the work of Christ in their hearts, and on his offering without them.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The sub-committee of the United States Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, which has been investigating, in connection with the Alaskan boundary treaty, the question raised at the last meeting of the full committee as to the effect of accepting Mt. St. Elias as a part of the boundary marked by the 141st meridian, has practically completed its work.

The committee is of the opinion, after the inquiry, that the provision in regard to Mt. St. Elias is not a serious matter, but, as a precautionary measure, they will recommend that the treaty be amended so as to declare specifically that the acceptance of the peak as a boundary mark in determining the 141st meridian shall not be construed as a concession of any territory which the United States may claim under its purchase from Russia along the sea-coast. It is believed that this amendment will have the effect of preserving all the rights of this country and at the same time retaining the mountain as a landmark, which is very desirable.

On the 31st ult., Judge Simonton, of the U. S. Circuit Court, at Charleston, has filed a decision in the case of the Vandercook Company against the State of South Carolina, restraining the State from preventing the sale of liquors brought into the State. This decision, if sustained on appeal, it is claimed, will have the effect of rendering nugatory the State Dispensary law.

The Governor of South Carolina has appointed Congressman John L. McLaurin to be United States Senator to succeed the late Senator Earle.

The President of the United States, after Dakota Supreme Court, has handed down an opinion sustaining the legality of the amendment repealing prohibition in that State.

A slight earthquake occurred on the afternoon of the 31st ult., the vibration lasting about five minutes, and extending from the north to the south. It was felt from Washington, D. C., south to Georgia and Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky and Tennessee. South-western Pennsylvania was also slightly shaken.

A Santa Fe despatch says that Rio Grande flood waters have inundated a part of the town of S. Corcor, including the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R. yards, and scores of farms and orchards are under from two to three feet of water. The damage will be many thousands of dollars to the fruit trees and crops. About 2,500 persons were driven from their homes in El Paso, Texas, by last week's rise in the Rio Grande. The most serious effect of the flood, however, is the shifting of the course of the river, by which it is reported that 500 blocks of the city will be transferred to the Mexican side.

Deaths in this city last week were 428, being 15 more than the previous week, and 2 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 205 were males and 223 females; 43 died of heart disease; 32 of pneumonia; 39 of consumption; 26 of influenza; 15 of convulsions; 16 of cholera; 16 of typhoid fever; 15 of cancer; 14 of apoplexy; 15 of indigestion; 15 of the brain; 13 of scarlet fever; 11 of old age; 10 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 9 of Bright's disease, and 9 from casualties.

The Russian railway mileage at the beginning of 1897 amounted to 26,946 miles. In 1896, 1,425 miles of new railways were put into operation and 1,396 miles were completed, but not yet operated, making 3,815 miles of new construction for the year. There are also 5,325 miles of railway in course of construction by the State and private companies, and many new lines have been authorized.

The Nevee Vremya says that the Russian census gives a population for the empire of 127,000,000, exclusive of the Grand Duchy of Finland, which takes its own census. Some other figures have still to be added from the utmost parts of Siberia, as well as from the tribes of the steppes and the mountains of the Caucasus, and these will probably be completed by the work till the spring. The full total is expected not to be under 130,000,000.

At Select Yearly Meeting on Fourth-day (Fourth Mo. 21st, 1889), Richard Esterbrook delivered a very weighty and important testimony on the true ground of religious services, which he expressed his conviction that unauthorized religious labors were at the root of its difficulties in our Society.

The true ministry and the right knowledge of divine things arose from the unfoldings of the spirit of Christ, made from time to time in the progress of our religious experience, which was a school of Christ. It came from the Lord; it was another kind of ministry and of knowledge which came from man. Much of it as the product of the intellect, as applied to a study of the Bible. It was substantially on the same basis as the ministry of other religious nominations, and there was no line of distinction that could be drawn in such a course—no stopping-point short of the establishment of schools and colleges expressly designed for the training of persons for the ministry of the Gospel. He dwelt also on the hurtful effects of permitting such ministers to go on year after year sowing mixed seed among the young, which could produce evil fruits, and referred to his preservation of the effects produced by this cause at a large meeting in England.

In a memorandum respecting Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of 1884, I find the following: To my mind the most impressive of the vocal communications was that delivered on Fourth-day morning, by our dear Friend, Richard Esterbrook, who stated that the doctrines and testimonies of Friends were not the result of an rearrangement, or human contrivance or agreement among men, but that, when our early members were convinced of the Divine character of the manifestations of the Spirit in the earth, and were turned to this as a Leader and Guide, they were by it led into the principles they adopted, and the practices which distinguished them. These revelations of the Father, through his Son, have been and ever will be, a Rock on which the Church is founded; and no man can grow in grace but as he submits himself to their guidance.

"As our younger Friends come into this obedience of faith, they will be led to walk in the footsteps of their forefathers in the Truth, and be taught the same doctrines."

1883.—Sixth Month 13th.—As I was riding to Evesham to Select Quarterly Meeting, in company with my dear friend, R. E., he spoke of a conversation he once had with John Allen, an elder of his meeting, whom he highly esteemed, but from whom he differed in judgment as to the course to be pursued in reference to the separation in Ohio Yearly Meeting. John expressed his sorrow that Richard was not fully in unity with his own Yearly Meeting (London). Richard replied in substance that a man could not change his opinions like he could his clothes. It was not a matter of choice with him, but of conviction. The views he held had grown up in him.

In our further conversation, reference was made to a member of one of the larger bodies of the Western Yearly Meetings, whose doctrinal views seemed to be sound. R. E. feared that but little help would be received from him in the controversies which are now agitating our Society. He thought no man was prepared to be of much service in the Church, until he was ready to be sacrificed for his convictions.

"CAMDEN, N. J., Twelfth Month 9th, 1897.

"My Dear Friend, Rebecca McCollin:—

"Having thee in remembrance this morning in a feeling of lively sympathy, I was much inclined to call upon thee under thy comforting influence. I have had a trying headache most of the day, so as to feel that I could not well make the attempt at this time, and thought I might send thee a few lines to assure thee of my love and my warm desire for thy encouragement in the midst of bodily infirmity and depressing effects sometimes. He whom it has been our desire above all other things to love and serve, will, I humbly yet firmly believe, continue to be with his truly dependent children, through all the dispensations He appoints for them. He will be their strength, the Lifter up of their heads, at seasons, in renewing and reviving hope, and their great salvation. The fresh sense of these things having come before me, thou wert brought near to my spirit in such a way that I felt as if drawn to send thee this little salutation. Those who are preserved alive in the Truth have much to feel, and feeling is an evidence of life, and have to share in the cup of suffering, and it is indeed a blessed and precious experience—but these provings prepare them to partake of those consolations which also abound, and the God of all grace who hath called us unto his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after we have rightly endured and suffered, will more and more establish, strengthen and settle us, to whom be glory in the Church throughout all ages, world without end. Thy dear sister shares in my tender sympathy with her in her provings, and the continued sense of her great loss, and in love to you both.

"I remain thy affectionate friend,

"R. ESTERBROOK."

"CAMDEN, N. J., Sixth Month, 1882.

"HENRY P. HEDGECOCK.

"My Dear and Valued Friend: I send herewith a few books for thy acceptance, with the design of enabling thee to obtain a correct view of the origin of the religious Society of which I am a member, and of its distinguishing doctrines and testimonies. It has been said that a society is only valuable for that by which it is distinguishable—that being the reason for and justification of a separate organization. As respects ourselves as individuals, and our personal experience of the salvation of God through Jesus Christ, I thankfully believe that what is essential to this end will not be withheld from the sincere-hearted seeker, for the same Lord unto all is rich unto all that call upon Him—unto all that call upon Him in truth—that is, in humble sincerity, whose tender mercies are over all his works. My little intercourses with thee, dear friend, has been very pleasant to me. I can hail thee as a fellow-traveler towards the rest and the kingdom of God. May we be animated to press forward in the heavenly race, laying aside every weight, and every hindering besetment, looking for the strength which we need, unto Jesus, the Author of our faith.

"There are many trials to be met with here below, and there are many spiritual conflicts to be passed through in the Christian warfare, and tribulation worketh patience, and patience experience, and experience hope, and hope maketh not ashamed because of the love of God which is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost which is given unto us—wherefore, said the apostle, 'we glory in tribulations also.'

"Please remember me very kindly to the members of thy family, and with affectionate regard for thee, I remain thy friend and brother,

"R. ESTERBROOK."

"P. S.—I commend my son, who is now thy near neighbor, to thy kind care and oversight for his good. Good intentions may be strengthened by a kindly word sometimes—I know he has a great regard and respect for thee."

TO A YOUNG FRIEND IN THE MINISTRY.

"Second Month, 1890.

"I feel it to be a serious thing to address thee, dear Joseph, lest I might write a word which might tend in any degree to take thee from under the operation of the Divine hand, and draw away thy attention from the secret instruction of the Holy Head and High Priest of his Church. Since the short conversation we had at the close of the Quarterly Meeting at Concord, I have several times had thee in remembrance, and have felt unwilling that either by manner or expression I should have appeared as if wanting in love and tender sympathy for and with thee. I am settled in the belief that without the stripping and poverty of spirit, and the baptisms into death and suffering, we cannot have that kind of experience that qualifies us to rise in newness of life. We must descend into the depths of Jordan before we can bring up stones from thence, whereas we can of our own experience build an altar unto the Lord and set up our Ebenezer. It is these inward trials and provings that are designed to keep us in our right places and to enable us to grow from stature to stature in the Truth. It is the design of these to keep us low and humble, by letting us see that we are nothing. Paul testified concerning himself and his brethren in the ministry. We had the sentence of death in ourselves, that we should not trust in ourselves, but in God who raiseth the dead, and this experience is a necessary part of the equipment of a soldier of Jesus Christ in every age. Thus it is to me cause of rejoicing when I behold any who are travelling on this road, and I cannot desire them to be taken out of it before the Lord's time, that they may know Him indeed, and the power of his resurrection and the fellowship of his sufferings.

"When any have been truly brought under the preparing Hand and endued with a gift for the ministry, I believe such may leave it in the hand of the Lord in humble confidence that he will supply all their needs in his own time and way, as they look to Him, and depend upon Him alone. After seasons of proving, when they have walked as in darkness and had no light, He would again arise for their help, and they would be enabled to adopt the ancient language, 'Now know I that the Lord saveth his anointed. He will hear him from his holy heaven with the saving strength of his right hand.' For want of keeping to this path, and patiently travelling on to know the Lord therein, many have run out into words and hurt themselves, and burden all who are sufficiently alive in the Truth to feel rightly.

"Live without carefulness, and the Lord will give a right issue," is a saying which applies to the ministry when rightly understood. This is the way to live and to have comfort and quiet from day to day, and to wash and anoint in our days of fasting, and to watch in our days of feasting.

"Thus, my dear friend, have I written what has presented, which I trust will tend to thy comfort and encouragement. To be of that number to whom it is given not only to believe in Christ, but also to suffer for his name, is cause indeed for rejoicing to be accounted worthy. The foundation on which these are building is a durable one, it is as safe as the everlasting hills. These rest not upon the fluctuating, uncertain opinions and sentiments of mortal men, but upon that eternal Rock upon which the true Church of Christ in all ages has been built. The inhabitants of this Rock are qualified at seasons to sing praises to the Lord for all his mercies, his faithfulness and his Truth, and they delight to wait for his arising who hath the Key of David, who openeth and no man shutteth, and when He shutteth no man can open, to whom be glory in the Church, throughout all ages, world without end.

"Thy loving friend,

In one of the sittings of the Yearly Meeting in London, in 1869, Thomas Peirce bore the following testimony to the value of the Gospel labors of James Backhouse in Tasmania: "I was a Unitarian in faith and by profession. I was attracted to the Friends' meeting-house in Hobart Town by their loving demeanor one toward another. I heard James Backhouse preach often; I was brought unto Christ Jesus, my Lord and Saviour, through his instrumentality; but not by any argument that I could have replied to, nor by discussion; that I was anxious for. It was by the power of the Holy Spirit accompanying the plain preaching of Christ crucified that I was convinced of my undone condition, and that I was lastingly brought to Him who had died for me on the cross; who forgave me my sins, and in whose presence there is fulness of joy."

Shortly after hearing this testimony, T. Peirce was seized with paralysis in one of the meetings, and never spoke again. His wife became a valued member of the Society of Friends.—Taken from the Memoirs of James Backhouse.

Letter from Switzerland, 49.

PREES NEUCHÂTEL, 49 Corcelles.
Fifth Month 11th, 1897.

It has been a long while that I have been writing to this address and receiving replies, so that we found ourselves wondering as we came along last evening, what sort of a place it would turn out to be. "Very pretty," every one had said who had been here, but I had never formed very definite ideas—only of one thing I was quite sure, that it was on the borders of Lake Neuchâtel, with the Jura Mountains somewhere in the background, and the Mont Blanc range in the distance, the other side of the lake. When we wakened this morning, at about five o'clock, we realized that we were quite high, and the ground was white with frost. Soon the scenery became wilder and more beautiful, and after passing the boundary between France and Switzerland, we began rapidly to descend. There were foaming cataracts and deep, narrow valleys, with quaint villages, and the mountain slopes in the highest state of cultivation. Finally, through a gap in the mountains, we saw the lake, lying far below, and a little later, when turning around the base of the mountain, we caught a first glimpse of the long, white, snow range, with the crowning summit of Mont Blanc. Not long afterwards we pulled up at the station of Aurrelerin, where we were to leave the train. We had asked the conductor beforehand, and he had said Corcelles was about ten minutes' walk from the station, so we had decided to leave our baggage and hunt up No. 49. We had not gone many steps before we saw some one coming towards us, and in a few minutes we were talking with our hostess to be. But I cannot express my surprise on finding that the Jura Mountains rise most abruptly above the lake, and that, though the little town to which we were coming may, in a sense, be said to be on the lake, it is at least five hundred feet above it. I can give no idea of the magnificence of the view spread out before and about us. The mountains, some sombre with pines, and others clothed with a bright, fresh green, the terraced vineyards; the long lake, of which neither end is visible; with a thousand varying effects of light and shade; then the dark mass of hills beyond, with the snow-clad range in the background; all this, together with the mountain air and the mass of flowers at our feet, made it seem doubtful when we would reach our destination. But we kept on climbing up a narrow path, and finally, entering into the village, we stepped in front of an old house with stone steps and a large pile of wood on either side of the front door. This was No. 49, so we entered.

We were not long in solving the mysteries of an old Swiss house. When I say, "old," I do not mean "shabby"—far from it, for nothing could be more proper, more perfectly in order than it is. But it was built about two centuries ago, and has walls nearly three feet thick and great porcelain protuberances in the rooms, into which one puts fire through a door which opens into a great chimney which is in the passage way. These old-fashioned stoves are really very satisfactory, I believe, and I suppose give out a great deal of heat. They retain it, of course much longer than an iron stove would.

I began a very sleepy letter the other evening, and as the days pass so rapidly and are so full, letter writing has very little show. We are here very much as in a regular pension—that is to say, school—everything goes like clock work. At seven we have dejeuner, which consists of coffee or chocolate, bread, butter and preserves. Our lesson begins at nine. We are given enough work each time to keep us busy the greater part of the day. After the lesson the morning is put in between reading, studying and walking. Dinner is served at twelve after which I have a lesson of an hour or two by myself, for reading and relating what I have read. After that we take another walk. So with supper at six and retiring at nine or half past, the time goes without our knowing how or where. Of course we study nearly all the time but every little while we take a wrap and run out for the air and a look at the mountains.

They cannot imagine how magnificent they are and how the scenes change continually. From early morning till late night every moment presents a different view. The effect of the clouds and the sky, and the light upon the lake, offers opportunity for untold effects. It is only two minutes from our front door to the edge of the village, on the upper side; the path then goes on very steep to the edge of the forest. But we keep turning around every few minutes, and there can easily imagine the exclamations one might hear if they were near by. The lake looks almost like the sea. It is only the snow range on the other side that limits it and looking down from the edge of the forest where great branches interlace and form a frame as it were, the view is most enchanting. After crossing the narrow strip of wood there is a beautiful meadow, shut in on three sides by peaks. Then the forest begins again. It is here we have found a cozy nook, where we bring out books and spend an hour or two when it is warm enough. Then there are the sunsets and storm effects upon certain peaks, and the sunlight breaking through, casting a rainbow or the lake. And then the clouds! But there I won't say any more, for one cannot describe those subtle effects of nature.

Any way, there is no end of things to do, and simply limitless enjoyment. And then, best of all, the being in the centre of a quaint Swiss village and hearing good French and having excellent lessons. It is certainly enough to make one contented with life.

We have spent two afternoons at Neuchâtel. It is only ten minutes by train, so that it is not much of a journey. There is a beautiful old castle there and quaint, winding streets. But I have no enthusiasm left for even old towns. It is all spent on the mountains and the clouds and the sea.

THE English do certainly pour out their money generously when a great claim is presented to them. The Mansion House Indian Famine Fund has now nearly reached the sum of £520,000 ($2,600,000), or £5,000 ($25,000) more than was raised during the whole course of the last famine. There is an addition to this sum, as several of the large provincial funds have been remitted to India direct.—Selected

William Jackson's Visit to England.

William Jackson was a valuable and highly esteemed minister, who resided at West Grove, Chester County, Pa. Having for many years been under a religious exercise to pay a visit to Ireland and England, in 1892 he obtained the requisite minutes from his meeting, and left home to perform this service. His wife, Hannah, during his absence, resided with her aged father, on Long Island. He engaged passage on a ship from New York, bound to Liverpool, but about a month elapsed before she was ready to sail. During this interval his wife was taken sick, which, he says, "was an additional weight and dipping to my spirit, and many thoughts I had to encounter, but endeavoring to get to hat [condition of mind] of not being too anxious for the morrow, my precious heart was easier, which afforded no small comfort to me. Through the sympathy and endeared affection for her and the weaning weight that balanced across the seas, I felt as if I was torn between two, yet, upon the whole, enabled to keep [my feelings] pretty much to myself, and such freed from anxiety of future days, my precious wife having all along encouraged me hereto."

After a religious opportunity at Robert Boone's, where divers Friends were present, and wherein prayers were offered up to the Most High for reservation and support, William Jackson went on board the ship on the nineteenth of seventh Month. They had a tedious and uncomfortable passage, in which William Jackson suffered much from sea-sickness. His journal says:

"27th.—I am sometimes lying, sometimes sitting, sometimes leaning over the ship's side, sometimes walking about, but so depressed, so comfortless, that it is a very gloomy journey to me."

28th. To his wife.—"I cannot describe to thee how near and dear thou feelest to me. I think of thee not only daily, but hourly, with desires that the Lord may be with thee to comfort and support thee. Seeing we are so separated as not to be able to afford one another my assistance, we must resign ourselves to Him that gives us breath and being, and also can and will take it when and where He pleases."

"29th.—Last night, ruminating on my present situation, and how exceedingly discouraging and sinking to the spirits, as well as the body, sea-sickness is, these words of King Hezekiah came fresh into my mind, 'Thou wilt cut me off with pining sickness; from day until night thou wilt make an end of me.'

"Eighth Month 3rd.—Dull sailing, thick fog and almost a calm, yet my mind has been comforted in feeling the fresh springing up of that precious uniting love to my dear friends, relatives and precious dear wife, that I have left behind on my native shore. May the Lord be with them, who remains to be all in all to his dependent people, which I may humbly acknowledge is at the present my only refuge in his floating pilgrimage.

"We sat down to dinner. There was a cry, 'A school of porpoises!' With a harpoon the mate caught one seven feet long. It was soon dressed and some of it cooked to eat. On the banks of Newfoundland they caught many fine cod."

As might have been expected of one affected with sea-sickness, his appetite was very poor, a cup of water-gruel per day being his principal subsistence. The table was supplied with a variety of dishes, but, he says, "Not quarter as good as the Johnny-cake and milk of home."

They got into port at Liverpool on the twenty-seventh of Eighth Month, where he was kindly invited to the house of James Cropper. It did him good to see the face of a Friend, and his heart filled his eyes. His wife's cordial reception, attentive, tender care and good nursing made it a comfortable retreat.

At Liverpool he met with Richard Jordan, who was about returning to America, after paying a religious visit in Great Britain. They were at meeting together on the third of Ninth Month, where, he says, "Richard was favored in testimony, and more so in prayer, that a memorable time it was to me. I feel myself warranted in saying, as Paul did in his acknowledgment, when beset both outwardly and inwardly, 'Notwithstanding, God, that comforteth those that are cast down, comforted me by the coming of Titus.' So I was comforted by the coming of dear Richard Jordan, and we were comforted together in the Lord, praised be his worthy Name."

On the seventh of Ninth Month they took an affectionate leave of each other, and William went to Warrington, ninety-eight miles. He attended several meetings in those parts, including Chesire Quarterly Meeting. Of these meetings he says, "I may, with reverence, acknowledge that, in these meetings, through the fresh springing up of life, I was enabled to labor amongst them to the relief of my own mind and to the tendering of the hearts and quickening the spirits of some others."

In the course of his visit in the North of England, he was at Leithersdale, where several Friends had been taken prisoners and confined in York Castle for refusing to pay for the support of a priest. He lodged two nights at the house of one of these prisoners, John Stanfield.

"His wife, Mary, told me she had her clothes put up twice in order to go to prison. As the estate came by her, the suit was entered in the Bishop's Court against her. But by some means they shifted it and took her husband, which she was no way rejoiced at, for she had rather gone than that her husband should."

William Jackson adds, "Friends are a plain, country-like people, and the Truth rose the highest in this meeting of any I have been at."

This account contrasts with that given of another, which, he says, "was a hard meeting, for I believe the members were but indifferent ones as to holding up the Light."

At another meeting, he had to remind some present, that it did not avail to some formerly to say, "We are Abraham's children," nor will it avail any now to set themselves forward and account on what their parents or grandparents were, without sharing of their virtues, which was not likely to be the case so long as they were enemies to the cross of Christ.

After meeting he was told by a friend, as they travelled the road together, that there were a number of the grandchildren of that worthy old friend, John Fothergill present, very dressy, fine folks, with no appearance of Friends, who came with as much assurance as if they were Elders, and placed themselves on the seat under the gallery.

He returned to Liverpool on the fourth day of Tenth Month, having attended twenty-seven meetings during this outing.

The Tomb of Nekht.

The exquisite little tomb which has only been opened six or seven years, and the wall-paintings on the ceiling, which are in many places still as clear in design and as beautifully fresh in color as when they were put on, more than thirty centuries ago, had evidently been the delight of its future occupant during its construction and decoration.

A pious Theban gentleman of the Middle Empire, "made his soul" by making himself a costly and artistic sepulchre, just as a Western devotee of our own day makes it by building a church or endowing a religious order. One sees in a moment that Nekht must have worked lovingly at his own little "bijou residence" for eternity. It is nearly finished, but not quite; its incomplete condition meaning, it is to be feared, in this, as in other cases, that the heir was of opinion that the deceased had spent quite enough money on his hobby; that it was really sufficiently decorated to do all reasonable credit to the family, and that on the whole the tomb might be closed without calling upon the artist to add the colors to that little wall scene which he had just "blocked out" in black and white in one corner of the chamber, when the late lamented paid the debt of nature.

Unfortunately, the imperfection of the pictured record begins at the very point at which the dead man's deeply religious instincts would have made him particularly regret the failure to complete it. In this scene, Nekht and his wife are seated at a table loaded with funeral offerings, and four priestly officials are bringing up haunches of veal or beef. To have left this plain instead of colored, was a grave omission. Did Nekht suffer for it in the underworld, one wonders? Did it undo the work of those multiplied prayers in hieroglyphy, the incessant reiteration of which on the walls of Egyptian mortuary chambers, produces almost an effect of passionate appeal. Osiris and Harmachis, and Ammon and Anubis are again and again beseeched to grant favors to "the double of the temple-servant, Nekht, a free passport for the disembodied soul to the regions of the dead, a coming in and going out from the underworld, not being repulsed at its gates." It is to be hoped that there was no hitch in the arrangements.

The temple-servant, however, was evidently a cheery soul, and seems to have been not less interested in the things of this world than in those of the other. It is this which brings him so much nearer to us than all the conquering and building kings who have raised their gigantic temples, and mined the earth with their vast sepulchres all up the valley of the Nile.

Nekht has made his artists set forth scenes of his daily life; its business and its pleasures. Here we see his farm servants gathering grapes, treading them in the wine-press, and drawing off the new wine into jars. Here, again, are men ploughing and reaping; women gleaning, laborers binding up the sheaves. Nekht looks on with a complacent air of proprietorship, with the inscription above the head, "Sitting in the chamber seeth his fields, the temple-servant of Ammon, Nekht triumphant before the great God." Further on, we see the worthy citizen taking a holiday with his wife and children. They have, in fact, gone out for a day's sport, and are spearing fish from a boat, and bringing down birds with the boomerang in a papyrus. Above is the inscription, "Passeth through willow marshes with gladness, speareth fish; Nekht triumphant." On the bank stand two of his servants—blinding sunbats, staff, boomerang, etc., and lower down is another servant bringing the game to his master. The inscription above it reads, "Rejoiceth, seeth happiness in making the chase, and in the work of the Goddess Sekhet," (the country goddess, the Ceres of the ancient Egyptians), "the temple-servant, Nekht, triumphant."

His lady, the singing priestess of Ammon, the sister of the house, Tani, saith, "Rejoice thou in the work of Sekhet and the birds which he (Nekht) sets apart for her selection." Such was the sort of diary of his simple pursuits and pleasures the Theban gentleman of the Middle Empire kept upon the walls of his tomb-chamber for perpetual remembrance. It is like a page of Pepps in stone.—From Odis to Soudan.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Hunting in the Himalayas.

The poet Cowper, in speaking of hunting, says, "Detested sport, that owes its pleasure to another's pain." A feeling of this kind leads me, in general, to avoid the books which describe the adventures of those who penetrate the most distant and inaccessible parts of the earth for the sake of killing the wild animals which naturally dwell there. I recently, however, glanced through the pages of "In and Beyond the Himalayas," a record of travelling and hunting in the high mountain country north of India and on the borders of Tibet. While it contains considerable information respecting those wild lands and their inhabitants, its perusal tended to revive the feelings of disgust at the spirit which finds keen enjoyment in the destruction of game, although, in this case, somewhat relieved by the evidence the book furnishes that its writer was not altogether insensible of the cruelty of his pursuit. But the temptation to secure the heads and horns of the wild sheep and goats and other animals that dwell among the snows and precipices of the mountains, and to preserve these as hunting trophies, seems to have been too strong to be checked by motives of humanity.

On one occasion he wounded a bear in the forest, but not so badly as to prevent it from escaping pursuit. He remarks, "I was disgusted with myself, less because I had lost the bear than because I had wounded the poor beast and allowed him to escape. No doubt he would recover from the wound, but it was an uncomfortable thought that he had been put to unnecessary pain."

When hunting wild yak, Stow killed three of these large animals, and says, "I might have continued for another fortnight, and collected a good supply of these enormous heads. But for the most exciting in the world; the climate, the ground and the surroundings the most trying. The chase of the wild dog (yak), therefore, must be classed among the severest tests of a sportsman's quality, but a bag of three good bulls quite satisfied me. I have a horror of big bags. An unconquerable disgust at my own butchery comes over me when I stand over a noble animal that has been slain by my own hand. This feeling increases with every trophy added to my collection, till it forces me to drop the pursuit of that particular game. In the present instance remorse got the better of me after the third bull. The escape of a wounded bull haunted me and made me unhappy for several days, though I spent some precious time trying to retrieve him. He crossed the range of mountains to the north, and must have made his way to the Great Plains beyond, and died in lingering misery. May I be forgiven?"

SELECTED. LITTLE AND MUCH.

It matters little where I was born,
Or if my parents were rich or poor;
Whether they shrunk at the cold world's scorn,
Or walked in the pride of wealth secure;
But whether I lived an honest man,
And held my integrity firm in my clutch,
I tell you, brother, plain as I am,
It matters much!

It matters little how long I stay
In a world of sorrow and sin and care;
Whether in youth I am called away,
Or live till my bones and pate are bare;
But whether I do the best I can
To soften the weight of adversity's touch
On the faded cheek of my fellow-man,
It matters much!

It matters little where be my grave,
On mountain or plain or in the sea,
By purling brook or heath stormy wave,
It matters little or naught to me;
But whether the angel Death comes down
And marks my brow with his loving touch,
As one that shall wear the victor's crown,
It matters much!

ONWARD.

"Have faith in God."

Comrades in Christ's unfinished work—
His confidential friends acknowledged still—List we the summons which alone can kill—
The fears that in our pathway lurk!

Still speeds the work as wears the day;
Vague visions find fixed shape to earnest eyes,
Which shrink not weakly from the harsh surprise
With which at first they cloud the way.

So hath all human knowledge grown,
While God, still hiding, the still flowing veil
Of his own works, o'er obstacle and ail,
On human intellect hath shone.

Still and the just shall live: his field
Of struggle as exploit shall stretch and change,
While hope, still led by memory, shall range
O'er new domains half-unrevealed.

Self courts the world: but faithful souls,
Unbound by self, in triumph work, and weld
Anew the stuff by which shall still be held
The craven wills which form controls.

The corn is killed in grinding: so
The truth, to those who know it only by
Its forms, shall seem alarmingly to die,
And order into chaos flow.

Not so may we rest in the way:
But dig and plant again while we consume,
And reap rejoicing in that day of doom
Which shall to each his wages pay.

"HIS COMPASSIONS FAIL NOT."

[From "A Book of Poems," by JOHN W. CHADWICK.]

The farmer chides the tardy spring,
The sun will hold its sun-dial ray,
The days are dull and cold and gray,
No shadow doth the maple fling.

From snow-clad peaks and icy main
The north wind cometh wet and chill,
And evermore the clouds distil
The hoarded treasure of the rain.

But still, O miracle of good!
The crocus springs, the violets peep,
The straggling vines begin to creep,
The dandelion gilds the sod.

The rain may fall in constant showers,
The south wind tarry on its way;
But through the night and through the day
Advance the summer's fragrant hours.

And though the north wind force him back,
The song-bird hurries from the south,
With summer's music in his mouth,
And sturd with songs his airy track.

What then, my soul, if thou must know
Thy days of darkness, gloom and cold,
If joy its ruddy beams withhold,
And grief compels my tears to flow?

And what if, when with sorrowed form
I praise the gods for benods past,
There ever comes a fiercer blast,
And darker ruin of the storm?

As tarry not the flowers of June
For all the ill the heavens can do,
And, to their inmost natures true,
The birds rejoice in sweetest tune:

So, Father, shall it be with me;
And whether winds blow foul or fair,
Through want and woe, and toil and care,
Still will I struggle up to thee;

That, though my winter days be long,
And brighter skies refuse to come,
My life no less may sweetly bloom,
And none the less be full of song.

Art in Christianity.

BY E. F. MARVIN.

What is the relation of art to civilization and Christianity?

1. Art is naturally materialistic and sensual in its character and influence. It employs material objects to affect the sensibilities through the eye and the ear. Form, color and sound naturally appeal to the aesthetic rather than to the moral nature. As the beautiful has a necessary connection with the true and the good so the sense of beauty is not connected with duty. Indeed, all history shows that high and complex art has commonly been used in the service of pride, worldliness and vice. Art was born in Paganism, and it reached its highest perfection there.

The Greeks declined in virtue as they progressed in art. No nation ever equalled them in the exquisite conception and execution of the beautiful, and perhaps none in the refinements and varieties of sensual pleasures and moral corruption. The most refined and cultured Roman matrons were often harlots and passionate admirers of bloody gladiatorial scenes. The "shaggy demons of the wilderness" who destroyed Rome were more moral than their civilized, cultured and refined foes.

Says Lord, the historian: "Was Leo X., wiser Pope because he delighted in pictures. Did art make the Medici of Florence more susceptible of religious impressions? Does art sanctify Dresden or Florence? Does it make modern capitals stronger or more self-sacrificing, better fitted to contend with violence, or guard against the follies which undermine a State? What are the true conservative forces of our world? Or what did Luther and Cranmer build their hope of regeneration? Art does not teach to resist temptations. It presents temptations rather. It gilds the fascinations of earth. It does not point to duties or the life to come. The sense of beauty never prompts to the discharge of any moral obligation, nor does it ever restrain from sin."

"All history," says Delitzsch, in speaking of the world culture which was born among the sons of Cain, "has shown that the refinement of civilization are always in direct relationship with forgetfulness of God." And Nitzsch says in his "System of Doctrine," that "all progress resulting from the natural faculties and powers of man augments corruption and accelerates the real ruin of race."

Complex art in dress often has a sexual relevance, and it leads to all the pride and abominations of modern fashions.

Novel writers and stage players are the leading artists of the times—and what of their general morals?

We can easily call up a multitude of poets, painters, sculptors, scientists and artists of every kind, in confirmation of Dr. Chalmers' argument upon "The slender influence of taste in morals and religion."

Ruskin makes this extraordinary statement: "One great fact first meets me. I cannot answer for the experience of others, but I never yet met with a Christian whose heart was thoroughly set upon the world to come, and, so far as human judgment could pronounce, perfect and right before God, who cared for art at all."

2. God has never encouraged, but rather discouraged, high or complex art in religious worship. Indeed, worshipping Him through the medium of material forms or artistic symbols, except so far as God especially appoints, is forbidden in the Second Commandment.

In Acts xvii: 29, Paul condemns such worship; and in I Cor. ii: he discards rhetorical art in preaching the Gospel. Paul gave but a passing glance to those creations of art among which he moved, and which have ever since been the wonder of the world.

God and his prophets never encouraged art among the Hebrews, and hence it remained far below that of surrounding nations. The Hebrews never had a theatre or an art gallery. Even the Temple and its furniture, though never costly, presented no specimens of high art which would satisfy Grecian taste. Jewish worship was simple and inartistic. Its most striking part was the slaughter of animals, presenting a scene quite repulsive to the aesthetic nature, and, even to this day, abhorrent to "refined esh."

We find nothing to encourage high art in Christian worship in the teaching or example of Christ while on earth, nor in the writings of life of the apostles. Order and decency, simplicity and spirituality, are characteristic everywhere. Stately and elegant forms, introduced to embellish worship and make it attractive, almost inevitably become "formal" by instant repetition.

3. The whole history of the Church shows that when artistic and elaborate forms and ceremonies of worship have been assumed, spirituality and power have declined. Whenever power has declined, forms have multiplied.

The simplicity and directness of apostolic worship gradually gave way for a more elaborate and showy service, to satisfy the taste and excite the sensibilities of the cultured, and to foster the superstition of the ignorant.

Thus came in the "Poisonous Honey" of Romanism, with its cathedrals, sculptures, paintings, images, processions, antiphones, vestures and gestures, all appealing to the tastes, sensibilities or superstitious nature of man, and constituting a spectacular and sensuous religion, which cannot please God or make men holy.

The reformers of the sixteenth century, regarding these complex forms invented by art ad man's device as hindrances rather than aids to spiritual worship, reformed the worship of the Church as well as the doctrine. God's eternal truth was unveiled and enthroned again. He truth directly spoken in the power of the Holy Ghost took the place of artistic forms, colors, sounds and motions, addressed to the senses.

We do not apprehend God by the aesthetic, but by the spiritual nature—hence Divine truth is addressed directly to the conscience, and the less media intervening the better. God does not want "our best in architecture and art," if it hinders our worship in "the beauty of holiness."

The higher ecclesiastical art, like "higher criticism," begins with but little Divine grace, and is soon able to get along without any at all. Even the infidel Rousseau wrote a book, showing that the revival of art and science in France resulted in a corruption of morals.

Ecclesiastical Roman dandies who would rise and writhe in agony at the misplaced accent of a poet, were filled with ecstasy at the refined and brutal cruelties of the Amphitheatre. Indeed, the practice of all kinds of vice in Paris-to-day is made one of the fine arts. Persons from all nations visit Paris for this culture.

How often we observe that as vital godliness declines in a church, "Sweet Art" comes in with all her showy attractions in architecture, classical music, elocution, dress, decorations, floral offerings, and perhaps, a tasteful liturgical service is desired to crown the display. But what sinner was ever saved by these devices!

The emotions are indeed stirred and the taste is gratified, but the worship is spurious and God bows upon it. The incense is not holy and it is kindled with "strange fire," and not fire taken from the brazen altar of sacrifice. The truth about the Divine person and the atoning work of Jesus Christ is the genuine fire with which to kindle our worship. These artists who seek to enkindle devotion otherwise are Nadabs and Abihus with strange fire. Like them, they bring in sensational preaching, operatic singing, and orchestral fiddling, instead of Christ crucified. Like Cain, they bring fruits and flowers, instead of the atoning Lamb. Away with them. Divine worship is not a fine art, employed to gratify the taste of the natural man, but a simple, grateful and spiritual exercise of the ransomed powers. The Holy Ghost does not keep us in fellowship with the Father and his Son Jesus Christ by the use of complicated machinery, but we have freedom to enter the holiest by the blood of Jesus.

Salvation is not by taste, but by grace. Let us not mistake the gratification of the aesthetic nature for spiritual worship. Continental Europe has tried ecclesiastical art long enough to test its value in spiritual things, and under the culture and sway of its Gothic cathedrals and unequalled art, it has drifted almost in a body, either to Papal superstition or blank indelicacy.

No, if our Gospel is dull and our worship is barren, it is not for lack of liturgical forms, but spiritual power. We do not want elegant, repetitious forms to gratify our taste, nor galvanic batteries to stimulate our sensibilities, but the Holy Ghost to give us life more abundantly.—The Presbyterian.

COMMENDABLE NON-INTERFERENCE.—A more brazen attempt was never made than that of Joseph R. Dunlop, Editor of The Chicago Dispatch, who was convicted of sending obscene matter through the mails and sentenced to a two-years' term, to induce President McKimley to pardon him; and the thanks of all lovers of morality are due to the President and to the Attorney General, to whom the case was referred for investigation.

The appeal was made on two grounds: That the sentence was excessive, and that Dunlop had had paralytic strokes and would be likely to die in prison. The Attorney General responded that the sentence was not excessive; that it was more probable that the regularity of prison life would be more favorable to his health than otherwise; and that to interfere would strengthen all those classes that are engaged in promoting obscenity and licentiousness.—Christian Advocate.

The Selfishness of Ill-Health.

"Unselfishness is a game that two ought—mark you, I don't say can, but ought—that two ought to play at."

The remark was called forth by a case my friend and I were discussing. It was that of a young man who for several years had been in ill-health. An acute disease had left him an invalid, not altogether hopeless or incurable, but still confined to his room, and with no immediate prospect of being able to leave it. Though it was a sad case, for his hopes of a useful life were blighted, it was not without its alleviations. Two sisters devoted themselves to him; they gave up all the pleasures of society for his sake; they lived only to anticipate his wishes; morning, noon and night saw them devising schemes for his amusement or laboring to add to his comfort; no sacrifice was too great for them to make; and the result, instead of being beneficial, was, as far as he was concerned, the reverse, for, from being a meek, patient sufferer, he was transformed into an unconscious tyrant.

"Poor Frank fancies the light hurts his eyes," said one sister, as she drew down the blind, and prepared to sit in semi-darkness. "The click of knitting-needles irritates Frank's nerves," said the other, as she hid her work aside. "Frank feels that everything bright and cheerful is mocking him," they chimed in concert, "and therefore we deny ourselves for his sake. 'Self-denial is a duty, you know.'"

It was this that called forth my friend's remark. Frank did not dream he was selfish; he never realized that any self-sacrifice was required of him, he received his sister's attentions as his right, and plumed himself on being a martyr. It was his part to receive; theirs, to give; and the result was that his misery and despondency, not to speak of his demands, increased day by day.

It is no unusual case. There is more of this unconscious self-hness in the world than appears at the first glance, and more of it, perhaps, in our own hearts than we think.

How many of us who are familiar with pain and weakness and languor can say truly that we have never exacted more attention from our friends than we need have done, that we have been always patient and considerate, willing to see and thankful to receive every little kind deed bestowed on us? I fear there are few. We are apt to take all as our right, as the proper tribute paid to our weakness and ill-health; we seldom try to realize how much others may be denying themselves for our sakes, nor at what a cost their services are sometimes rendered. We became like spoiled children—the more we get, the more we demand, and our wants, instead of diminishing, multiply day by day.

And then how many of us have a conscience void of offense in the matter of peevishness and irritability? What a deal of extra trouble do we unhesitatingly give in this matter! We are not quite so well to-day as yesterday, and therefore every one must feel the effects of it. We must not suffer and no one know it. And how apt are we to grumble at trifles!—the opening and closing of a door, the rustle of a paper, the fall of a cinder on the hearth, the condition of the fire, the placing of a chair each is made a source of trouble to ourselves and of worry to our friends.

Have you ever observed how much more patient the sick are in a hospital than they are at home, how submissive they become—how grateful they are for all that is done for them? At home they question and find fault and tyrannize over their friends; but they never do so with strangers. Peevishness seems to vanish when they leave the family circle; they grow quiescent and contented. Why should we treat those near and dear to us with less consideration than we do strangers? why should we lay on them burdens which we would never ask outsiders to bear, and demand sacrifices which are as unnecessary as they are selfish?

There are sacrifices which we have no right to accept, even when they are offered voluntarily. "Oh that one would give me drink of the water of the well at Bethlehem, that is at the gate." Yet when the brave men burst through the hosts of the Philistines, and brought back the water, David would not drink it. Why? Because it has cost too much. They had risked their lives to get it. "Shall I drink the blood of these men who have put their lives in jeopardy?"

I think there is a lesson for an invalid in this. Some things that are offered to you cost too much. If they are the price of another's health or another's happiness, or another's usefulness, they cost too much. Refuse to accept them; rather bear your burden alone. And does it ever strike you how much you may be the poorer by accepting these sacrifices? You may get what you long for, it is true, but even in the getting of it you will find it has lost its sweetness. One of a family who was deaf said, "Don't speak so much to each other; it irritates me to know that you are speaking when I cannot hear what you say." And so, out of sympathy with the afflicted one, lips were closed, and smiles checked, and silence reigned. She got her wish, but the shadow that rested on the family circle was more depressing to her than the sight of gayety which she could not join. Better to witness joy that you cannot take part in than to see no joy at all.

Oh, the shadows that even the best and the brightest, and the most hopeful among us cast, shadows often thrown unconsciously, the shadow caused by a look, a frown, a painful tone! We don't mean it, perhaps, but the result is the same as if we did; the cheerful are depressed by it, the hopeful cast down. Instead of gladness in our dwelling there is gloom. And what can be said of those miserable people who would banish every pleasure which they cannot enjoy, and vainly lay the burden of their own pain and weakness on every one beside them? They have their reward; the burden comes back doubly weighted to their own shoulders, and stays there.

What a blessing it would be, not only to the weak, the suffering, the invalid, but to the whole of the little world in which they are placed, if they would but take to heart some such counsel as this:

Do not foster and pet and magnify your complaints; they will only take deeper root by such treatment. And don't let your self-sacrificing friends make too much of you. Take your own proper part in the game of usefulness, try and find out by experience the blessedness of consideration for others, and, instead of always receiving benefits, try and give.

What can you give, you will say, as you hold up your thin, nerveless fingers—what can you do for any one? Give love instead of always claiming it, give joy instead of trying to take it away, keep back the murmur that will cause pain to your friends, cultivate a gentle, resigned, patient spirit; fill your sick-chamber with the light that comes from inward peace. "He who imparts light to another," as Dr. Trench says, "has not less light, but walks henceforth in the light of two torches instead of one." And it is the same with happiness; strive to make those beside you happy, and you will find how greatly your own happiness is increased.—A. K. H. Forbes in The Sunday Magazine.

Natural History, Science, etc.

The Hill Crow of India and the Snow Cock.—A pair of them always attended our camp, and followed us when we went off on our shooting excursions. I do not think they were the same pair, however. I fancy a pair locate themselves permanently in each valley. After we had left our breakfasting places, they invariably came down to them and made a thorough search for crumbs, etc. They were extremely cautious and cunning. I tried several times to tempt them down with pieces of chapati, thrown to some distance. They would hover a few yards over the bread, or sit on a tree close by, eyeing it intently, but never attempting to seize the morsels while I remained on the spot; but as soon as we left they flew down, and had cleared away all the crumbs before we had gone many yards. They were present at almost every stalk I attempted, and, I am sure, were as much pleased with good shots as I was myself. On the other hand, I dresary I often heard their expressions of disgust at my failures. They were most amusing in their habits, which I watched closely for hours together, when lying idle on the hill-side. This must have been the pairing season, for conjugal affection has been highly cultivated among hill crows. When the female was any distance off from her lord, he would take up his position on the thick branch of a tree and begin a series of calls with every modulation of which his jarring voice was capable: first it was a wheedling caw of affection, accompanied by a gentle rustle of the wings; soon it changed into a querulous complaint of neglect. If this did not fetch her, he lost his temper, and with a loud caw of rage, ordered her up. At this last stage he became most energetic; his head went down at every utterance, and his tail worked like a lever. All this meant that he wanted his head scratched. When the wife did turn up, she proceeded at once to rub his skull all over with her beak—an endearment which sent the old fellow into ecstasies, every feather in his body quivering with enjoyment; then he would launch himself in the air and, sailing in wide circles, scan the hilly slopes from side to side; then, with wings at an acute angle, he would flutter across the valley and back again, uttering self-satisfied cries. This, I suppose, to excite the admiration of his partner. The female was less demonstrative. She seemed always intent on household cares, and toid had evidently sobered her. She reminded me of the women of the country, whose whole life seemed one long drudgery. If these intelligent birds could be trained to mark down game, the sportsman would be saved many a weary trudge, and have many more chances of making a bag than he has now.

Up at five A. M. and off to the ridge again, along which I went towards the head of the valley, carefully searching both the Hānt and Bagtoun ridges. It was a splendid morning; a bracing cold breeze swept along the open downs, which were carpeted with flowers, especially a yellow kind like the marigold; they were so plentiful and grew so thickly that I crushed a dozen of them at every step. I enjoyed this morning's walk exceedingly, though we saw nothing. The beauty of the scene so impressed me that a bear had he come in sight, might have been allowed to pass. Such surroundings are not conducive to bloodthirsty thoughts. Suddenly we walked nearly over a hen rūn-chākrō, the hen of the snow-cock and her brood of six chickens nestling among the flowers. The chicks were fluffy and half the size of my fist, but they could run. They ran a few yards, crouched and disappeared among the flowers. The mother, too, ran, but limped and fluttered along in such helpless fashion that Jamāla, the breakfast coolie, bolted after her with outstretched hand, expecting to catch her at every step, but she kept just beyond his reach, and, after a run of a hundred yards Jamāla came up panting and looking very foolish—for the hen mother was now following him. Her stratagem, however, was unsuccessful, for our party was still standing a few yards from her brood. A finer illustration of maternal love overcoming natural timidity could not be imagined. The hen came within five yards and circled around us with drooping wings and ruffled feathers, and limping, the very picture of decrepitude, inviting capture by a display of utter helplessness. Jamāla this time was not taken in, and we all stood motionless in sympathetic admiration, my companions exclaiming "Subhan Allah! Subhan Allah!" (Praise to God! Praise to God!) When these manoeuvres failed to move us, the hen settled on the ground, raked up a cloud of dust, fluttered her wings, and clucked for her chicks to come under protection; but by this time the chickens had run farther down the hillside, and were out of hearing. We left her still calling for them.—In and Beyond the Himalayas.

TOBACCO is an unclean master. A clean mouth, sweet breath, untainted clothes, apart from being free from stale odor are hard things for a habitual smoker to manage. This point need no elaboration. But if a proof is wanted, I only ask a glance at the floor of the smokers' side of a ferry or the smoking car of a train and a sniff of the atmosphere after a few minutes of the crowd's unrestrained enjoyment of the weed, and—what is quite as significant—a note of the contrast in appearance between the men who crowd these places, and those who seek cleaner floors and purer air.

It is an unhealthy master. It corrupts the sense of taste, injures the stomach, deadens the sensibilities, causes cancers and heart troubles. I can count half a dozen personal friends at this moment who know, on physicians' authority, that further continuance of smoking mean shortened days, perhaps sudden death. Only one or two, however, have been strong enough to give it up.

It is an almost immoral master. Not in itself a necessary evil, it nevertheless promotes certain associations and leads in certain directions to other habits which are unhealthy to the moral nature. Do you know a liquor soaker who is not fond of tobacco? Did you ever see a bar room or prize-fighting or gambling crowd or rough gang of any kind that was not smoking, and chewing? To paraphrase a famous remark of Horace Greeley: "All tobacco users are no orse thieves, but all horse thieves are tobacco-ers. A lad who has learned to handle a gar with grace has made a first-class start on road that has more than one bad stopping place. If you think that is not so, let me ask you whether, if you were an employer and wanted a young man for a position of trust and authority, you would select the one with a cigar in his mouth, or the one who had decided not use it.

It is a hard master. It is more powerful than our judgment and will combined. The old ble, "I can stop any time I want to," is disproved by the earnest attempts of many a strong an.

It is a costly master. Two seven-cent cigars day only will in thirty years cost four thousand two hundred and sixty-nine dollars, compounding annually at six per cent. I have figures of the calculation before me. Most smokers spend twice that on themselves and iends.—Christian Advocate.

A Children's Friend.

Born of humble origin at Clayhills, Tunstall, affordshire, in 1831, the boy, Smith, worked 7 his father's side at the early age of seven ars, and was accustomed to carry forty pounds clay on his head, scarcely without intermissions, for thirteen hours daily, at a wage of twelve pence per day, not infrequently standing by the lns all night. The lad by and by attended a ght school and an improvement society, and frequently, by sheer endeavor, rose above the tellectual level of his associates as one—

"Who breaks his birth's invidious bar,
And grasps the skirts of happy chance,
And breaths the blows of circumstance,
And grapples with his evil star."

At eighteen years of age he joined the Methodist Church, and afterwards became a Sunday-school teacher—a plow of service to which he pht his hand upwards of forty-five years. Previous to arriving at his thirtieth year, he undertk the reclamation of the children in the brick-flds, whose awful misery he had escaped, and t the help of whom he never rested until he ld brought them out of the house of bondage.

In this lay the foundation of his joy. Toward te young his heart overflowed with affection. It is narrated that in early manhood he was t the habit of apparently fixing his eyes upon ce beyond and above him, and, on being ken to task by his parents and others, for gng "about gazing into the sky or at the ars," he at first acknowledged that he thought l did it from the vacancy of mind; but later, ven he was stirred with religious thoughts, he d that he used to go along in the same way, generally repeating to himself, or half aloud, "ord, thy work—teach me to do thy work." E the period came when it seemed to be spoken t him, "The children—that is your work." lly possessed of that conviction, George Smith owed nothing to divert his attention from the "hildren of Ismael" and their needs.

Embarking on his humane mission in 1859, t utterances of George Smith could not wholly ss unnoticed. In season and out of season l expatiated on the degradation, immorality, iorance and suffering of children engaged in t brick and tile industry, showing that boys ad girls, not more than six years of age, worked tgether from six in the morning until seven in te evening, and sometimes throughout the night. It unnaturally these poor little ones, receiving vey of curses and blows from the men under vey they worked, because they were not quick enough in their movements, were made prematurely old or disabled. Instead of sympathly being given to their would-be deliverer, he met with fierce industrial opposition, despite which he toiled unflinchingly for eleven years, when at length friends rallied to his side. The opportunity of reading a paper upon the subject before the Social Science Congress at Newcastle, in 1870, aroused public interest; and the same year he issued an eloquent and impassioned appeal, the first of similar unpretending booklets, entitled, "The Cry of the Children from the Brick-yards of England." In the following year he formulated a number of suggestions as a basis for legislation, and the government of the day passed an act providing for the inspection of brick-yards, and the regulation of juvenile and female labor in this connection, by which some thirty thousand children, and all girls under sixteen, left the brick-fields and tile-yards to attend school.

The reforming head of George Smith was next directed to alleviating the lot of those water nomads known as the children on the canal boats. By close observation, he became familiar with every phase of existence among the population on the canals and navigable rivers of England, and found that old and young of both sexes were huddled together in filthy cabins, uneducated and depraved. Contributing an article to the Fortnightly Review, in 1873, G. Smith computed that of the one hundred thousand men, women and children afloat upon English rivers and canals, ninety-five per cent. could neither read nor write, ninety per cent. were drunkards and sixty per cent. living as men and wives unmarried. The canal children had slipped through the Education Act of 1870, as its framers could take no notice of houses that were here to-day and gone to-morrow. Six years' toil were rewarded by the passing of the Canal-Boats Bill, in 1877, for the registration of boats; and in 1884 a further law was adopted compelling the canal children to go to school in whatever district they might be. By its operation from thirty thousand to forty thousand children were brought within the scope of the Education and Sanitary Acts. Smith was indelictable in visiting the canals to inquire into the workings of the act, and any remissness was promptly reported. On one of his lonely winter tramps by the sides of the ice-bound canals, he would have been frozen to death but for the providential approach of a sagacious sheep-dog. In the course of the last few years the condition of boatmen and their families has materially improved.

With characteristic energy George Smith began, in 1879, another agitation for the education and social improvement of the children of the gypsies and travelling showmen. Though shocking disclosures of the deplorable ignorance, overcrowding and promiscuous sleeping of the fifty thousand children and young people representing some twenty thousand families living in England in tents and on wheels, were made, when the M-able Dwellings Bill was introduced into Parliament, in 1885, it was nevertheless rejected. For ten more years heroic exertions were put forth to save the children concerned, by a parliamentary enactment, from the worst consequences of their nomadic habits; but in vain George Smith endeavored to crown the edifice of his useful and honored life. Otherwise he would have died the happiest man in England. Doubtless the stars in their courses, as represented by the opposition which fought against him, cannot fight forever, and it has been pleasantly suggested that a line should be left on George Smith's tombstone to record the ultimate success of the measure.

This friend of a young suffering humanity had, however, a happy end. When confined to the house, and then to his bed during the last week or two, he used to say, "It is like Sunday," or "It is always Sunday now." It was, in truth, a short Sunday for the long work-day of the life of one whose privations, toil, and weariness for the objects of his compassion were scarcely known by the world at large.

His funeral was of ideal simplicity. The spectators who saw his remains borne from "The Cabin" to the churchyard at Crick, near Rugby, will not easily forget the scene. Nothing so touching had ever probably occurred under the shadows of the old church before. Hardly a child, it is related, belonging to the village could have been absent.—*James Johnson in S. S. —At the London Meeting for Sufferings, held on the seventh of Fifth Month, reports of the several standing committees were presented. The Peace Committee dwelt upon the value of the recent arbitration negotiations between England and the United States in arousing attention throughout the civilized world to the question of international war and peace.

The Anti-Slavery Committee spoke of Zanzibar and Pemba in Eastern Africa, and the proposition referred to the Yearly Meeting of establishing there an industrial mission.

The Committee on Armenian Relief had expected nearly fourteen thousand pounds out of about fifteen thousand pounds entrusted to them. They pointed out that there is still great need of help to that sorely distressed people.

An address to the Queen on the completion of her sixty years of sovereignty was adopted.

The membership of London Yearly Meeting was reported as sixteen thousand six hundred and seventy-four, an increase during the year 1896 of two hundred.

An arrangement had been made with the Hoadley Brothers to maintain a depot for the exhibition and sale of Friends' literature in London.

Dublin Yearly Meeting.—A minute from Cork Monthly Meeting called attention to the difference between the disciplines of London and Dublin Yearly Meetings in regard to the marriage of first cousins, which is permitted by the former and not by the latter. After some discussion and the expression of divergent opinions, a minute was finally made declining to make any change.

Due to total abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks, it was thought some progress had been made. Friends were warned against becoming mixed with the trade by purchasing shares in breweries and distilleries.

A proposal to change the place of holding the Yearly Meeting from Dublin, evoked considerable discussion, and was finally referred to the Quarterly Meetings for their consideration. The whole number of members in Ireland was stated to be two thousand six hundred.

We have received a circular from the "Sunday Breakfast Association" in Twelfth street below Vine. During the past six months 583 meetings were held with a total attendance of 69,729, of which 43,296 received a charitable meal; in addition to this 24,010 meals were served in the Industrial Rescue House.

The meetings held at the police station houses and trolley car depots were especially interesting to these men, who are so very much deprived of religious privileges. While the meetings at Point Breeze on Saturdays drew many a bright gleam of sunshine and hope over the waves of the long voyages of these men to China, Japan and Australia.

The children's meetings held every third day at night all winter have been very largely attended, sometimes as many as six hundred present.

The work of the sewing school and kindergarten on Seventh-day afternoons has resulted in much good for these little girls; many of these are taught the art of sewing and making their own garments; after which they are presented to them, and they are also taught economic, moral habits and religious truths.

Inhumanity in Syria.—In Syria the ancient belief that insanity is due to the possession by a demon spirit and that it leads to much cruelty in the treatment of this afflicted class. This has led to the inauguration of an effort to establish a suitable asylum for such patients, where they may have the benefit of modern methods of cure. T. Waldmeier, who lived many years as a missionary in that country, has latterly been travelling over Europe and America, endeavoring to raise the funds necessary to erect suitable buildings for this purpose at the foot of Mt. Lebanon.

London Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight.—In the account contained of this meeting in the London Friend, it is stated that a letter was received from Richard M. Thomas, of Baltimore, informing that he was still unable through breakdown in health, to undertake the visit to Denmark and Norway, for which certificates were granted him last year. The date of his return to America was not fixed, but it was not thought that he would be able to accomplish much further service on that side of the Atlantic.

In the reports from the Quarterly Meetings of Ministry and Oversight, references were made to imparting to their members "more organized religious instruction," and the need for the "best intellect" of their membership to be consecrated to the service of the Gospel. These statements are calculated to awaken a fear lest the attention of English Friends should be too much turned, in the exercise of the ministry, to the exciting words of nature, to the "demonstration of the power" of the "spirit and power" which accompany the anointing of the spirit.

VICTORIA'S LARGE FAMILY.—Queen Victoria has now seven living descendants. Seven of these are sons and daughters, thirty-three are grandchildren, and thirty are great-grandchildren.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—In the U. S. Senate, a steady progress has been made in the Tariff bill. It is believed the sugar schedule will pass with slight changes in the House bill.

The comparative statement of the Government receipts and expenditures during Fifth Month shows that the totals receipts were $20,757,399, and the expenditures $29,009,259, leaving the surplus for the month $8,888,131. The statement for Fifth Month, 1897, showed a deficit of $4,782,875.

The monthly statement of the United States public debt shows that the debt, less cash in the Treasury, at the close of business on Fifth Month 29th, 1897, was $299,654,462, a decrease for the month of $1,500,000, which is principally accounted for by an increase of over $2,000,000 in cash in the Treasury.

W. J. Calhoun, who was specially commissioned by President McKinley to make an examination into the Ruiz case in Cuba, and in which he will add verbally to his report upon that case his observations upon the state of affairs in Cuba, was expected to reach Washington on the 8th inst. It is learned upon the best information that Calhoun has prepared no formal document, and that the major portion of his report will be in the nature of a personal communication to the President. It is understood that Calhoun will commend the ability and faithfulness of Consul General Lee and the great promptness and vigor with which he has looked after the rights of American citizens. It is believed he will endorse General Lee's report upon the Ruiz case, which has been forwarded to the President, and in which, in a most emphatic language, presents his judgment that Ruiz was murdered in prison after having been excommunicated from communication with the American Consul for 315 hours in violation of international agreement.

The report of the Spanish representative supports the claim of the Spanish authorities, that Ruiz died of natural causes, but admits his long incarceration without opportunity to communicate with the authorities of our Government.

During the past year the lump sum of $14,225 was received by the United States Government for the "Centennial Fund," the largest amount ever received.

According to Ullman's Wochenschrift, the British Consul at Chicago reports that, in the West, German goods are driving out English manufactures, particularly in the importation of cement, chemicals, oil, pottery, glass and mirrors, cutlery, colors, gins, picture-frames, etc.

The formal opening of the Commercial Museums in this city on the 1st inst. bids fair to be the most important event that has occurred in this city for nearly a quarter of a century. Nothing from a business point of view, it is said, at all compares with it, except the Centennial Exhibition, which was admitted to be the greatest and most important made of any event of the century. The members of the advisory Board, representing the leading commercial bodies of every large city in the Union, were generally present, as were the representatives of similar bodies from all the leading cities of the Central and South American States. The views of the foreign delegates on these matters were ordered to get before the trade, Museums should be supplemented with steamship lines, and local banks with long credit. The Uruguayan delegate objected to the proposed tariff on wool and hides.

The American Medical Association held its 30th annual meeting in this city last week. The proceedings were of many interests and of great value.

The Los Angeles papers say that in the Fourth Month the heaviest consignment of ostrich plumes ever sent from California was sent to Paris. The industry is no longer an experiment in the long Pacific State. Already the business has an investment of $200,000, which is likely to be augmented by a third during the coming season. The sales of plumes this year from the ostrich farms at Fallbrook, Colorado, Anaheim, Pasadena, Pomona and Santa Monica total up to $100,000. The percentage of profit on the amount invested is large enough to make the business profitable.

Chas. J. Green, who died in Boston on the 6th inst., is alleged to have been 115 years old. She was born a slave in Virginia and went to Boston in 1854.

An earthquake shock was felt in the vicinity of Decatur, Iowa, on First-day morning.

A severe earthquake shock occurred at Helena, Butte, and other points in Montana on Seventh-day last.

We are informed that the circular Epistle issued by our late Yearly Meeting, has been read in each of two bodies bearing the name of "The Yearly Meeting of Friends of New York."

Deaths in this city last week were 367, being 61 less than the previous week, and 13 more than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 138 were males and 169 females; 42 died of pneumonia; 39 of consumption; 27 of heart disease; 23 of diphtheria; 15 of convulsions; 14 of cancer; 13 of apoplexy; 12 of old age; 11 of Bright's disease; 10 from casualties; 9 of typhoid fever, and 9 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels.

FOREIGN.—The Bank of England continues silver in circulation in its vaults since 1698. Premier Camacho's Spain has been constituted in ministerial power by the Queen Regent, and the Cabinet will remain in office, with personal and policy unchanged. All the Powers consulted by the Queen advised the recall of Captain General Veyle from Cuba, but she declined to continue him and so of the other appointees in office. Great excitement prevails. The peril of the situation, so far from being considered by the Conservatives' retention in office, is considered to be only just beginning.

Armed Bulgarian bands have crossed the frontier near Kassova, and Turkey has sent a large force of troops there.

Mount Vesuvius is in eruption. An area of 200 yards long by 500 wide is covered with lava, and it is dangerous to approach within 400 yards of the principal crater.

Nowhere in Europe are landed estates so vast as in Russia. The statistics which are furnished by the will of the late Count Malteff, of czar's estates, who bequeathed to his heirs, in addition to other property, not less than twenty-nine mines, fifteen of which are of the first importance. They afford employment to more than 60,000 workmen. The only person in Russia whose mining properties exceed those of the Malteff estate is Elin Daniloff.

The Japanese loan of 43,000,000 yen, equivalent to about $21,947,916, at 5 per cent, and payable in gold the issue price of which is 101 1/2, has been subscribed in London several times over within an hour.

It is estimated that more than eighty tons of diamonds have been unearthed in the South African field during the last few years. These represent a total value of £35,000,000.

The Australian Legislature has sanctioned the building of an aqueduct which will cost $12,500,000 and will supply the Coolgardie gold mines with 5,000,000 gallons of water daily.

PLAINFIELD, Eighth Month 8th, 1856.

"The low condition of our meetings in every age at the present time, is cause for great arching of heart. I have been considering the state of things mentioned by Jeremiah in the fourteenth chapter, as describing our exercise in some measure—and the fourth verse may illustrate and express the feelings of some. The ploughmen were ashamed, they covered their heads.' A very low time is a time of secular temptation to look about for expedients and remedies, and to seek to bring about a better state of things by artificial processes—not considering that none of the vanities of the entiles can cause the rain of Heaven to descend. But alas we have prophets that deny falsely, and we have a great variety—many shades of feeling and sentiment among even us." These things are causes of great eakness."

Referring to a recently published letter, R. says:

PLAINFIELD, Eighth Month 9th, 1856.

"It would seem as if London Yearly Meeting was in possession of some especial spiritual power and authority over the family of Yearly feelings, and that there was a sort of consolation among those who should come in for a share of her blessing and protection. To my mind at day is departed altogether and that her ret duty is to herself, and that work is not to be effected by a conference—although if one are rightly conduced, and some of the congress were truly anointed to see her situation, and point it out clearly and plainly in the authority of Truth, it might be the beginning of better day."

PLAINFIELD, Eighth Month 10th, 1856.

"The duties of the office [of Elder] are not performed by a mere quickness of perception to detect unsoundness. The great and principal qualification is the quickened sense as to the root and spring of ministry and its harmony with the true exercise of the day or time. I had been deeply impressed with the view of an increase of harmonious exercise in our meetings ll over."

PLAINFIELD, Ninth Month 8th, 1856.

"Yesterday attended our Monthly Meeting, and in the afternoon the Select Meeting, now much reduced in number. The both meetings were times of comfort and encouragement to me, and I trust also to others—being a season of favors unexpected made it perhaps the more refreshing; 'When He cometh He maketh the parched ground a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water.' The Lord is with his Church still, and 'Wisdom is justified of all her children.' So my dear Friend, Joseph Walton, need not be afraid of —

"If the Lord, the Head of the Church, is singly looked unto, and humbly and sincerely trusted in, He will give judgment to them that sit in judgment and strength to those that turn the battle to the gate—and the praise and glory of all are his due, of whom is the ability for every good word and work. I feel very much better mentally, and have a grateful, thankful feeling covering my spirit."

PLAINFIELD, Ninth Month 21st, 1856.

"Some of our dear Friends in younger life than some of us will have to be more open and stand out—step in and fill up the ranks—show on which side they are decidedly, or they will not be able to stand. I want to see an increase of the number of those who give evidence that they really share in the 'afflictions of Joseph.'"

CAMDEN, Twelfth Month 5th, 1856.

"There is a letter of J. T. Dorland which evinces that he is greatly disturbed about the members of our Society going into the water, and yet he has been the paid pastor of the congregation at Brooklyn for two or three years I expect."

"It is just these extreme measures as to the ordinances that disturb this class of Friends. For those who go so far it is easy to see can claim the name no longer with any decency."

"Previous to having any information as to the death of our late dear Friend, Henry W. Wills, I had made an appointment for a person to come over sixty miles to see me on the day of the interment. I regretted not being in a position to be present with his family and friends on that occasion. He was an honest-hearted Friend, one whom I loved and valued very much, and feel his loss."

CAMDEN, First Month 29th, 1857.

"A ministry exercised as a matter of course, whose time is always ready, is totally inconsistent with our true testimony to the Headship of Christ in the Church, and such a ministry must of necessity land the Society on another foundation and break it up into fragments."

"No Society such as ours can prosper by a total laying aside that which alone makes it of any value."

"William Cooper has our tender sympathy. He was so dependent. He had recently lost his wife. In the midst of our conflicts and trials, and the weakness and impotence of man, there is a place of safety, a tower to flee to, a refuge from the storms of life.
"The Name of the Lord is a strong tower, the righteous runneth into it and is safe. There is no other I am persuaded."

CAMDEN, Sixth Month 29th, 1857.

"Almost ever since our Meeting for Sufferings was held, my mind has reverted again and again, with a feeling of much anxiety, to what appears to me to be an increasing disposition to draw the Meeting for Sufferings into a course of action in regard to a variety of outside subjects, that, if much encouraged, will, I fear, bring about a great change in its character and in the end weaken its influence. I should be glad for Friends to give way to apprehension (well founded apprehension) of religious duty, to call upon the mayor, or other persons in authority, and relieve their minds to them in Christian concern and love, without bringing such subjects to the notice of the Meeting for Sufferings, unless for some very special object, and under the pressure of a true religious concern. That great evils exist, yea, that they abound all around us, needs no argument, but to occupy the attention of the Meeting for Sufferings with recital of what we have noticed, etc., is, I think, undesirable, unless as I have remarked, in some especial and unusual case, and under such a degree of religious concern as to constitute it a religious obligation to yield to it. If this ground is not kept to, and felt to be essential to our preservation, we are certainly already in much danger. Let any Friend who feels called upon to do it, go and see the mayor, etc., without using the machinery of the Society too often."

"I regard the primary duties of the Meeting for Sufferings to consist in a lively interest in watching over the interests of our Society, the cause of Truth, which I understand to mean the principles of religion held by us as a Society, to keep them pure and unspotted, and not to become an association for the promotion of moral reform in every direction that this man or that man may point to."

"It is no part of our business to encourage a restless activity, that has a life that may be felt by what it is doing. It is a part of our duty to endeavor to be in such a frame of mind as to recognize what appears to have a right origin. I have just been reading over the list of the divers committees to Meetings for Suffering, with fresh interest and confirmation of my concern. The Meeting has of late years been greatly bereft of 'fathers,' although we may have some who are called instructors, and the reticence of many is such that I believe we do not always get at the true inward feeling of several.
"I felt as if I wanted some one to open my mind, etc., a little for relief." Seeing eye to eye, and fellow feeling are at a low ebb I fear."

The subject alluded to in this letter was the introduction into the Meeting for Sufferings of some remarks on the existence of many evils in the community; and the propriety of endeavoring to strengthen the hands of the Mayor of Philadelphia in efforts to abate them.

CAMDEN, Tenth Month 22nd, 1857.

"I have read thy essay on the late conference' proceedings with much interest and satisfaction—presuming that the views expressed by the Christian Worker are correct, such as they are warranted in putting forth. The 'declaration' put out seemed to me a weak document—laboriously accomplishing nothing. I have parted with the last copy I had, so that I cannot quote from it, but there is a passage in it which inculcates that we may and should appropriate to ourselves some of the promises held out in the Scriptures. The precious promises so recorded are offered to the comfort and help of states, through the power of the Holy Spirit, where and as He pleaseth, and thus the salvation and strength of the righteous is of the Lord only.

"To speak my own conviction as to the result of the whole, it looks to me as totally 'insignificant' and worthless.

"Maneuvering and subtlety are all out of place, as well as whitewashing and covering over and hiding, and throwing people off the scent, or blinding them with dust—all this I cannot bear, and could not be harnessed up to it. To return to thy essay, I like it much and am glad it has been written."

This letter refers to the Conference held at Richmond, Indiana, at which deputations from London and Dublin Yearly Meetings were present.

In a letter bearing date Seventh Month 10th, 1886, our beloved Friend expresses his views in regard to epistolary correspondence between Yearly Meetings, and mentions his "apprehension that correspondence might soon take the shape of admonition on small matters which would soon cease to be edifying. There seems with some a total incapacity to make due allowances for the influence of surrounding circumstances of various kinds, and to draw lines for conduct and make religion to consist in walking up to it. This was never the religion of the Society of Friends. While I have no fellowship or unity with those who would break down the hedges, I am concerned that men or women should refrain from laying on burdens and marking out the precise path for others, believing that in a general way it is a mistake, and is like tying fruit on a tree instead of waiting for it to grow in its proper season. These have long been settled views with me, longer than the average length of a generation.

"With regard to correspondence in a general way, and its results, I am free to confess I am shy of it. I think it likely the comfortable, easy unity may be better maintained by a Christian independency, than by a close embarrassing partnership, involving the responsibility of dissent or approval of every act of the partners to the compact. The experiences and observations of the last ten years, have not tended in the direction of changing my views or abating my fears. The Society can only be kept together in unity and grow by the same principles upon which it was gathered from the 'Lo here's' and 'Lo there's,' and grew by the same, and it will be ever so. The wisdom of man, whichever way it tends, either to right hand or to left hand, will avail nothing."

OBEDIENCE.—They who hearken to the Lord and walk in the way of his commandments, go on from strength to strength; their peace and hope increase like a river, which, from small beginnings, runs broader and deeper, till it falls into the ocean.

Letter from Switzerland.

PREES NEUCHÂTEL, 40 Corcelles.
Fifth Month 20th, 1897.

I will answer your letters together, which I have just read. I spent the entire afternoon stretched out under a pine tree on the mountain side, with a view of indescribable beauty spread out before us. M. was with me, of course, stretched out on her shawl, and we both had as usual a pile of books with us, from which we occasionally read aloud, but I put in nearly two hours sleeping.

We had planned for a trip into the mountains this afternoon and to leave immediately after dinner, but a thunder storm came up directly over the peaks where we were going, so we postponed it for another day. It was simply magnificent from our perch under the pine tree to look out across the lake far, far below us, and watch the dark cloud masses rolling up around some of the peaks, while others were lighted up by the sun. It is simply beautiful as a dream here, and we feel so perfectly at home. Everything is so simple and plain as it can be, but they are such kind-hearted pleasant people. The daughter and mother live alone, the former gives the lessons and the latter looks after the house. The daughter is an extremely cultivated, educated woman, very bright and entertaining, so that we enjoy the time passed indoors as well as out. She is very kind, introducing us to her friends, and taking us with her wherever we care to accompany her. She speaks English and German equally well as French, but a fine is imposed upon any person wilfully resorting to their mother tongue. We have a good deal of amusement over this sometimes, as there is a German lady and a young English and a young German girl at the table as well, and only three French, so the temptation is strong sometimes when we want to tell an appropriate story or something of the kind.

It is perfectly astonishing to us to notice how the Swiss peasants differ from those of Germany and France, (the latter we came very little in contact with.) They are so much more self-respecting and so much better educated, and the women are not so imposed upon. So far we have seen no women working in the fields or carrying heavy loads. They probably do it to some extent but far less than in other countries. It is of course the result of the liberty that Switzerland has enjoyed for so many centuries.

We are looking forward to a delightful time in Geneva, when we are ready to go down there for a week. It has been the refuge of the persecuted of all countries for ages, and I am sure some of the spirit of those old heroes must linger about the city yet.

But I was going to speak about the terrible catastrophe in Paris, which occurred while we were there. It was indeed a most dreadful thing and I avoided speaking of it, not thinking it necessary to distress you, but since you read the account in the paper I am very glad to relate what I know. The whole city of Paris was in mourning one night almost say, and for nearly a week all the better class of places of amusement were closed. It happened that the same evening before we knew of the event (it occurred in the afternoon) we took the imperial of the omnibus for a ride down the Boulevards to see them illuminated, and were surprised to see the Grand Opera and other places like that all dark. But we soon learned the cause. One of the friends of M. Hommey who often visited at the house, told us a great many heart-rending stories, as she lives in the fashionable part of the Champs Elysées, in the centre of the wealth and nobility of Paris, and it was of course the very wealthiest and noblest families that carried on the fair. This person of whom I spoke has a pension for young girls mostly English. She said that a friend had brought tickets that very day, inviting her to bring some of her girls with her. Some slight thing intervened so they did not go, and was thus saved.

You of course understand from the paper how the fire originated, and that the building being of wood, lightly built, and completely lined with light cheesecloth, there was no hope for the inmates. What made it worse was that it was in a part of the city where there were very few passers by, and then the fire started on the side where there was the greatest chance of escape. In fifteen minutes from the moment the fire started the entire conflagration was over and the terrible work done. There were five corpses for which there was no demand, or a least were totally unrecognizable. They were interred at Père Lachaise, the funeral service being held in Notre Dame. Of course a tremendous concourse of people assembled in the cathedral, and the Abbé (I cannot recall his name, but he is endowed with remarkable oratorical powers), took occasion to deliver a very daring sermon, which was published in all the newspapers and created quite a sensation, it seems. He boldly attacked the political leaders calling the catastrophe a judgment that had been permitted to come upon them. Saying that it had been the innocent who had suffered. Of course he spoke from his Catholic standpoint and I suppose had special reference to the attitude of the present government toward the church.

As to the possibility of our having been present, in of course might have been, and yet I did not feel in any way that it was an escape for us, for we had not even heard of it; and yet a few days afterwards, M. H. told us, she scarcely trusted herself to mention the circumstances of the fire in any way, that perhaps two days before a friend had called, bringing her tickets for this bazaar, but she was out at the time so did not have the opportunity of offering to take us there. The tickets, however, were for general admission, and had no reference to this day. There being no possibility of deriving any good from it, we instinctively shrank from visiting the scene of horror.

E. S. K.

The battleship Iowa, the last of the premium-built battleships of the navy, made an average of seventeen knots an hour over the regular government course, off the Massachusetts coast, in the four hours' speed trial required by the government under the contract. Her builders, the Cramps of Philadelphia, thus won the bonus of $200,000 offered under the contract. The Iowa "is to-day the acknowledged queen of the navy, if not the most formidable battleship afloat." The bonus given to the Cramps for building this death-dealing monster was exactly the same in amount as the sum voted by Congress to assist in relieving the thousands of flood-stricken families in the lower Mississippi districts! Two hundred thousand dollars is considered a large and generous sum when given to a really humane and Christian object, but when given as an extra inducement to make a superior instrument of death it is a mere nothing.—Advocate of Peace.

William Jackson's Visit to England.

William Jackson's next draft was to Ireland, at the weather being very stormy, several days lapsed before there was an opportunity to cross. In the afternoon of the seventeenth of Tenth Month, he went on board the vessel, and the ship moved off with a fair and gentle wind, but it proved a hard passage. A storm came on and drove them to the northward. They were detained so long that their provisions were early exhausted. Of his own feelings, William says, "As it had been a time of deep searching with me, and examining of every step, and querying why should I have such trials at sea, yet could not find wherein I could have turned therewith with the same degree of clearness, therefore, though hard to bear, my mind was made comfortably quiet under it; and as I talked the deck to and fro with my mind reared, ruminating on our present situation, the eclaration of the Royal Psalmist sprang up in my remembrance, "I was once young, and now am old; yet have I never seen the righteous forsaken nor his seed begging bread." After voyage of eight days they arrived at Dublin. In his journey through Ireland, he found many of the meetings very small and weak, at Lurgan Quarterly Meeting, held on the 15th and seventh of the Twelfth Month, he met with Mary Naflet, a ministering Friend on the Island of Guernsey, who at one time was in this country on a religious visit. Of its meeting he says, "It has been a time of heart-felt pain and exercise, there being scarce a father among them, and the young men that were strong, not being such as had sufficiently overcome the wicked one, so that it was ying work for some that were there to keep anything of tolerable order."

In enumerating the different meetings he attended in quick succession, he mentions more than once lodging at the house of that valuable minister, John Conran. The damp climate of Ireland did not agree with his delicate constitution, so that he became quite unwell. He says, "The days were now at the shortest, the sun not shining until twenty-three minutes after eight o'clock. In the morning the air being extremely ardened by a thick fog, and a very hard frost, I had an appearance like I had never seen before, as white as if covered with a light snow, and the air as if it was darkened with a ery fine shower, yet could not be seen to fall on the ground. So it continued for several days and nights, and then came on a hard storm of wind and rain. In this time of frost it was so exceedingly chilly and cold, to step but just at the door. I thought it was more striking than our coldest northwest wind in America."

When at Grange, he lodged with "old Thomas Green," who was as a father to him, "and is daughter that kept his house, was affectionate, kind and attentive in nursing me, though she was one of those that were led off by the acifer spirit that has fallen upon the Society in this part. Many are quite gone off, and isolated Friends and their meetings, and some their part of the way—attending meetings for worship but not for discipline. She was one of his description. I had two or more solid opportunities of conversation with her on the occasion, and it appeared to do away that shyness a great measure that seems to be sucked in by them, and her love towards us seemed to be increased; but, oh, I had scarce any hope of anything from it durable. The defection of heart is such that they are harder to be reclaimed than if they had never known the way of truth."

The separation in Ireland, of which William Jackson speaks, is frequently referred to in the letters and journals of Friends who lived at that time; but the Friend who prepares this narrative for publication does not know of any connected and detailed account of it. But he believes the points at issue referred probably to the Divinity and offices of the Saviour, and to the authority of the Holy Scriptures.

The MSS. account from which this narrative is drawn, speaks of many more meetings held in Ireland, but does not follow William Jackson in his further labors in England and Scotland, or during his return voyage to America, which he reached in safety, and where he continued to reside for many years.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

An Excursion to Ancoara.

There exists in Philadelphia and the parts of the country adjacent to it, an association of students of natural history, known as the Delaware Valley Association, which occasionally makes excursions to points of interest. On the twenty-ninth of Fifth Month, the place selected for examination was Ancoara, on the railroad between Philadelphia and Atlantic City, on the borders of the Pine districts, where Cedar Swamps, Cranberry bogs and sandy uplands combined to furnish good exploring ground. The day was cool and pleasant, and more than one hundred of those interested in the study of natural history, gathered at the Ancoara house in the morning. After some general remarks on the characteristics of the Pine barren region, the company were divided into two sections, which set out in different directions, under the guidance of some who were familiar with the lay of the land.

The party was in good spirits, cheerful and sociable, ready to be pleased, and their attention was from time to time excited by meeting with fresh objects of interest, especially in the Cranberry bog to which we were led. The Cranberry vine (Vaccinium macrocarpon), is itself a peculiar plant. Its native home is a bog or swamp, in the slush of which the slender vines run for several feet, sending up numerous short upright stems, which bear the flowers and fruit. The pretty flowers, of a pale rose color, had not yet appeared. The leaves are small and evergreen and thickly set on the stems. In the cultivation of the cranberry, it is essential to have a supply of water, with which when desired, the bog can be flooded, so as to kill out grass and weeds, and prevent the depredations of insects.

Scattered here and there over the surface of the bog were deep green leaves, smooth and of a velvety appearance, lance-shaped and six or eight inches in length, and all springing directly from the root, without the intervention of a stem. This foliage was so unlike in its appearance to any other that grew there, as to at once attract the notice of the observer. The flowers were of a golden yellow color, crowded on the end of a stem of a foot or more in length; from this is derived its common name, Golden Club (Ossifraga aquatica). It is also called "Never Wet," because water runs off from the leaves without wetting them. The seeds and rootstalk are said to be edible when their acrid properties are removed by boiling.

Another plant that seemed to awaken still more enthusiasm among our women excursionists was the curious Side Saddle flower or Pitcher Plant (Sarracenia purpurea). The leaves come directly from the root. They are pitcher-shaped, curved, and with a broad wing. The internal hollow is surmounted with a hood, the inner face of which is clothed with stiff bristles pointing downward. The cup is usually part full of water, which contains a multitude of drowned insects. Indeed these leaves are regular fly-traps. An insect that lights on the inside of the hood is almost certain to descend into the interior. The bristles with which the hood is lined, while permitting the descent of the victim, render escape difficult, thus exemplifying the truth of Virgil's assertion—Faciès desecro Accenti (it is easy to go down to destruction).

The plants were finely in bloom, and the large dark purple flowers were very attractive to our party, numbers of whom carried home with them specimens.

Another curious family of insect-eating plants that grew in the low, sandy grounds of the pine barrens is the Sun-dew (Drosera). We found three species of them, the Round-leaved, the Long-leaved, and the Thread-leaved. These leaves are all clothed with reddish gland-bearing bristles, which exude drops of a clear glutinous fluid, glistening like dew-drops, whence the common name "Sun-dew." These glands form an effective apparatus for entrapping gnats and other small insects. When such an one alights on the leaves, it is held by the glutinous fluid, and in a short time the hair it has touched bends inward, and the adjacent hairs also fold inward, so that soon the insect is firmly fastened. Its presence probably stimulates the glands to pour out additional secretions, which destroy its life. Then the glands absorb its juices—so that these plants feed not only on the sap drawn from the earth, but also on the animals they destroy. In the middle of summer, one can scarcely find a plant which does not show on its leaves one or more insects which have thus contributed to support this carnivorous little plant. It was too early in the season to find the flowers, which are a purple rose-color in Drosera filiformis, and white in the other two species.

The Cranberry bog furnished us with still another genus of carnivorous plants—the Bladderwort (Utricularia). Of this we found two species—the Greater Bladderwort (Utricularia vulgaris), has its stem immersed in the water, and crowded with thread-like leaves. These bear numerous little bladders which are filled with air and float the plant at the time of floating, so that the flowers can open in the air. After the season of blossoming, the bladders become filled with water, and the plant descends to ripen its seeds at the bottom.

The quiet waters in which these plants grow abound in minute animalcule, called Entomostraca, which form the principal food of young fishes. These have the power of motion, and their activity and voracity often lead to their destruction when living among utricularia. The little bladders of these have lids which open upwards. The minute Cyclops presses on the lid, which sinks before it. The animal enters and the lid flies back to its place, and the poor Cyclops is left a prisoner and soon dies. Dr. Macfarlane told us that on coming home after a long walk, he threw some utricularia he had collected in a basin of water, which contained numerous animalcule. On examining it a few days afterwards, he found these had nearly all disappeared, having been devoured by the plants.

We found also another species Utricularia subulata, a delicate little plant, which had yellow low flowers supported on simple, thread-like stems, and mostly without leaves.

Several of our party were much pleased to see Andromeda in bloom. They had long been familiar with the deep green, spiny leaves, but had not before met with the loose clusters of small flowers found along the bases of the young branches and in the axils of the leaves.

In the low grounds we saw many specimens of the stagger-bush (Andromeda maritima). The flowers are pitcher-shaped, like many of the Whortleberry family and allied genera, are white and larger than in most similar plants, and are quite beautiful. The leaves are said to be poisonous to young animals, and the honey collected from the blossoms by bees is said to be more or less poisonous.

Another common and pretty species of the Heath family was the Luzula racemosa, in which the white flowers hung in long, one-sided racemes at the end of the branchlets.

Revelations from God in Dreams.

My friend, a retired sea-captain and a Christian, tells me that one night, while on the sea, he dreamed that a ship's crew were in great suffering. Waking up from his dream, he put about the ship, tacked in different directions, surprised everybody on the vessel—they thought he was going crazy—sailed on in another direction hour after hour, and for many hours, until he came to the perishing crew and rescued them, and brought them to New York. Who conducted that dream? The God of the sea.

In 1695, a vessel went out from Spithead for West India, and ran against the ledge of rocks called the Caskets. The vessel went down, but the crew clambered up on the Caskets, to die of thirst or starvation, as they supposed. But there was a ship bound for Southampton that had the captain's son on board. This lad twice in one night dreamed that there was a crew of sailors dying on the Caskets. He told his father of his dream. The vessel came down by the Caskets in time to find and rescue those two dying men. Who conducted that dream? The God of the rocks, the God of the sea.

God has often appeared in dreams to rescue and comfort. You have known people—perhaps it is something I state in your own experience—you have seen people go to sleep with bereavements inconsolable, and they awakened in perfect resignation because of what they had seen in slumber. Dr. Crannage, one of the most remarkable men I ever met—remarkable for benevolence and great philanthropies—at Wellington, England, showed me a house where the Lord had appeared in a wonderful dream to a poor woman. The woman was rheumatic, sick, poor to the last point of destitution. She was waited on and cared for by another poor woman, her only attendant. Word came to her one day that this poor woman had died, and the invalid of whom I am speaking lay helplessly upon the couch, wondering what would become of her. In that mood she fell asleep. In her sleep she said the Angel of the Lord appeared, and took her into the open air, and pointed in one direction, and there were mountains of bread, and pointed in another direction, and there were mountains of butter, and in another direction, and there were mountains of all kinds of worldly supply. The Angel of the Lord said to her: "Woman, all these mountains belong to your Father, and do you think that He will let you, his child, hunger and die?" Dr. Crannage told me, by some Divine impulse he went into that destitute home, saw the suffering there, and administered unto it, caring for her all the way through. Do you tell me that that dream was woven out of earthly anxieties? Was that the phantasmagoria of a diseased brain? No; it was an all-sympathetic God addressing a poor woman through a dream.

Furthermore, I have to say, that there are people in this house who were converted to God through a dream. John Newton, the fame of whose pious fills all Christendom, while a profligate sailor on shipboard, in his dream, thought that a being approached him and gave him a very beautiful ring, and put it upon his finger, and said to him: "As long as you wear that ring, you will be prospered; if you lose that ring you will be ruined." In the same dream another personage appeared, and by a strange infatuation persuaded John Newton to throw that ring overboard, and it sank into the sea. Then the mountains in sight were full of fire, and the air was lurid with consuming wrath. While John Newton was repenting of his folly in having thrown overboard the treasure, another personage came through the dream, and told John Newton he would plunge into the sea and bring the ring up if he desired it. He plunged into the sea and brought it up, and said to John Newton: "Here is that gem, but I think I will keep it for you, lest you lose it again;" and John Newton consented, and all the fire went out from the mountains, and all the signs of lurid wrath disappeared from the air; and John Newton said that he saw in his dream that that valuable gem was his soul, and that the being who persuaded him to throw it overboard was Satan, and that the one who plunged in and restored that gem, keeping it for him, was Christ. And that dream makes one of the most wonderful chapters in the life of that most wonderful man.

John Hardock, while on shipboard, dreamed one night that the day of judgment had come, and that the roll of the ship's crew was called except his own name, and that these people, this crew, were all banished; and in his dream he asked the reader why his own name was omitted, and he was told it was to give him more opportunity for repentance. He woke up a different man. He became illustrious for Christian attainment.—T. De Witt Talmage.

NO SMOKERS.—Ager's paper mill, in Lyonsdale, N. Y., has been running twenty-eight years without fire or accidents. Considering the chronic habit of paper mills to fires, explosions, and the killing or maiming of employees, this is a remarkable record. It may perhaps be accounted for by the following sentence in a note from the proprietors: No smokers or intemperate men are employed. The danger of employing drinking men in any business is well understood, but there is not so much stress placed upon smoking. Yet there is no doubt that many a costly paper mill has been burned by a half-lighted match thrown carelessly away, or by sparks from a cigar or pipe falling among the combustible material that fills and composes these establishments. It may seem rather hard to refuse to employ a competent man simply because he sometimes smokes a pipe, but that habit certainly involves danger in the business of paper making. At all events the most stringent rules may be duly enforced against smoking by anybody—employees or employers—on or about the premises at any time. Prevention is considerably preferable to conflagration.—Western Paper Trade.

THE THINNING RANKS.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

The day grows lonelier; the air is chillier than it used to be.
We hear about us everywhere
The haunting chords of memory.
Dear faces once that made our joy
Have vanished from the sweet home land;
Dear tasks that were our loved employ
Have dropped from out our loosened hand.

Favorite names in childhood given
None call us by, save those in heaven.
We cannot talk with later friends
Of those old times to which love lends
Such mystic beauty and soft regard;
We would not, if we could, forget
The sweetness of the bygone hours,
So priceless are love's faded flowers;
But lonelier grows the waning day,
And much we miss upon the way,
Our comrades who have heard the call
That soon or late must summon all.

Ah, well! the day grows lonelier here.
Thank God, it doth not yet appear
What thrill of perfect bliss awaits
Those who pass on within the gates.
O, dear ones who have left my side,
And passed beyond the swelling tide,
I know that you will meet me when I too shall leave these ranks of men
And find the glorious company
Of saints from sin forever free,
Of angels who do always see
The face of Christ, and ever stand
Serene and strong at God's right hand.

The day grows lonelier, the air
Hath waded in, O' glad and cold,
But woe in, O' strangled, O' rare.
What love comes from the hills of gold!
Dear crowding faces gathered there,
Dear blessed tasks that wait our hand,
What joy, what pleasure shall we share,
Safe anchored in the one home-land!

Close up, O comrades, close the ranks;
Press onward, waste no fleeting hour!
Beyond the outworks, lo! the banks
Of that full tide where life hath power,
And Satan lieth underfoot,
And sin is killed, even at the root,
Close up, close fast the waverer line,
Ye who are led by One divine.
The day grows lonelier apace,
But heaven shall be our resting place.

THE WILDERNESS EVER ENCRACING.—While the late Dr. Joseph Henderson McCarty was delivering a lecture in Saginaw, Mich., three young bears were caught by boys, or else one bear was caught by three boys, in a street of that young city. They had wandered in from the surrounding forests, but this did not excite special wonder at the time; the fact is that nature, like the sea, is ever struggling to regain its lost ascendancy.

On Long Island, within a short distance from large cities, towns and splendid estates, wild deer have multiplied so rapidly during the closed season as to become a veritable pest. They are eating up the crops of the people and destroying plants and shrubs and flowers.

The same thing has happened in another part of the country, with respect to more dangerous animals. It has not been very long since in Maine the bounty was removed, or greatly diminished, for killing bears, and as they increased so rapidly as to become dangerous to life, the bounty had to be restored.

It has been computed by a naturalist that one hundred and twenty years would be sufficient to cover this whole continent as thickly with forests as it was when the first discoverers arrived.—Christian Advocate.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

[The following is the copy of a letter written by Abel Thomas to Thomas and Mary Wister, of the city of Philadelphia, dated Tenth Month 1st, 813]:

Beloved Friends, Thomas and Mary Wister:—I am at this time at Providence, at Moses Brown's in good health, and have been so since I left your house, and may inform you that I have had a prosperous journey so far, and have almost labored through all the meetings belonging to this Yearly Meeting. In a few days it is likely I shall travel towards New York State, taking in my way Pomfret and Kenford, towards New Melford and Oblong, taking in the meetings of Friends on towards Denlay and Vergburg, and to return back again to Graulville, Queensbury, and down the west side of the river to Saratoga, and there turn west to meeting of Friends at Farmington, and back gain to Saratoga, and down the river to Marlborough and the meetings thereaway to Cornwall, New Windsor, and then across the river o New York and then return home to my family.

Although I have had a prosperous journey, I have had a rough one, on which I have been almost ready to faint often, but He whom you love more than all below, did interfere and did make hard things easy and bitter things sweet, because He did know that I loved Him and often did manifest to me beyond imagination or shadow of doubting that He did love me because He did know that I was doing all I could to please Him, and I do feel myself well satisfied, richly paid for the little services He required of me. It is not very likely I have accomplished much more than half my visits set before me last spring was a year. I let no one know, not my wife, the extent of my visit until I was, as it were, raised up from the dead in your city, where my Master let me know that He would go with me, which He hath fulfilled to this day, which is consolation great to me, inasmuch that I feel no desire or inclination for to go home to see my dear wife and children. I have so far followed out the path that was pointed out to me more than one year past without coming to my knowledge, either the right or the left, and I do see the path as clear before me opened as in the beginning, and it is my greatest pleasure to walk in it without seeing any ways daunted at what might befall this body in a cold, freezing winter. My friends, wherever my lot is cast, both young and old, how a great deal of respect to me.

From what is above written concerning my wife and children, do not judge that I esteem lightly. I cannot judge that there is any husband amongst men that have more near and dear affection to woman than I do feel for her, and also my children; but this I will mention, from certain knowledge that I do love my Master more than wife or children, house or and or any created thing in this lone world, when He is pleased to hide his face from me or the increase of my love to Him, my wife and children are but little account to me, neither all the world, the glories and pleasures thereof.

My esteemed friend Moses Brown and his son-in-law, William Almey, has purchased a new and convenient carriage for me to ride in, to take home to be my own.

My little horse, well harnessed anew, wherein I can shut myself up from the rain and from the snow. The little horse is very tractable in me, and I find it easier for him than carrying me on his back, and much more so for me; a four wheeled carriage, not easily over-cast—a new invention, not long in fashion. I never saw the like in our country.

I do desire one of you to write to my wife and let her know that I do intend to write to her when I come to the Hudson or North River. It may be four weeks. Tell her that I intend to supply myself with winter clothes, a cloth jacket, and low flannel shirts, I have wherewith so to do. I expect that my wife will be at the Yearly Meeting at Baltimore, and if this come into your hands in time you may likely send it by some Friend of your city attending that meeting, if not, direct it to care of William Railey, where she makes her home.

I may say in sincerity I am united in love to you and to your children, more than I can find words to express. I often feel you near to my heart. Tell my great little friend Thomas Stewardson that I do love him and wish him all good.

And, dear Thomas, one thing more I desire thee to oblige in, and that is if any of my people inquire where I am and what I am about, so long from home, tell them the old pedlar is moving about, all weather, from house to house and from one meeting to another, frequently offering his goods upon public sale, and although he had but a very small pack when he left home, it was so unaccountably heavy that he could not walk straight under it, but that as he continued trading he hath parted with a great quantity of goods, and also it must appear admirable that he cannot perceive that his pack is in the least diminished, but considerable more goes in it, that he judges himself that he has as good an assortment of goods as almost any in his occupation, although not so flashy, have to wear as well. Whether it is the profit from the sale of his goods, or whether he has grown stronger, that he must leave, only repeat a saying he hath heard, "Money makes the mare go." However his pack being much larger and fuller of goods, he says he can carry it along with ease and walk straight up without grieving or being in the least weary. And as the old pedlar does know most certainly the goods is not his own, but a living profit is allowed him in the sale of the goods, he is anxious to make what he can for himself; but the poor pedlar is sometimes disappointed in the sale of his goods. Master will not suffer him to carry the key of his pack when he comes to the market among his customers, he must there wait until his Master gives him the key, and he sometimes stays long, and sometimes he comes not at all; the poor pedlar is then very low, seeing his customers out of patience, having all the disappointments on him—why did he call us here to buy and would not offer his goods on sale. Truly, from the reasoning of men it is provoking, truly. The poor pedlar cannot help it. He is so little, so unlearned, so ignorant, that it is not worth while for him to attempt to make a temporary key that he might open his pack when he pleases. I did not understand that the pedlar was any wise likely to murmur or be uneasy that he undertook such a long journey, for I heard him say in a solemn frame of mind that his yoke was easy and his burden light, and in strict obedience to his Master's pointings he never was happier in his life, more clear and distinctly understanding his voice.

Seemed as if I had been and am in conversation with you in a good deal of love and freedom, and hardly know how to close. The old pedlar has found out the reason that his little pack was so unaccountably heavy that he could hardly live under it, which is this: his Master told him last spring was a year he should make ready to go out a long journey peddling, and there hath never been in the least one tittle of his views diminished or added. He wanted to know whether he might take the Jerseys last winter, which he found freedom so to do, and on his return found that he had made considerable profit to himself from the sale of the goods he dealt away.

When he came home he was easy and happy that he was once more at home with his little family—they were so near to him, that he did not know how to leave them again; and more so his wife, whom he was so nearly united to, when the Lord's hand was so heavy upon him, he so wanted to be excused he soon fell into a train of reasoning by and from which his Master was offended, and as it were spoken to him in or with a sound language.

And as it was admissible to me my endeared wife, that I did love more than all in the world, soon became withered in my view that I saw little more comeliness in her than in any other woman, and now the poor pedlar's troubles began. He thought he had offended his Master, so that He hid his face from him and that he could find Him nowhere, yet he could see the way clear where He had marked-out for him to travel in. With a woe sounding in his ears frequently, the poor pedlar was almost distracted. He had to bring his case before the judges for some encouragement; but there were so many ifs and ands, would not express unity without addition of human strength, according to custom. Then the poor, weak pedlar added greatly to the weight of his little pack in offering to speak in his own defence, which he ought not have done; he ought to have left that to his Master without meddling with it; although he did know at that time that it was his Master's will that he should go on this great visit. And thus self was the cause of the poor pedlar's little pack being so very heavy.

I do not know whether this writing can be read properly, there is so many misses in it. I could have added much more concerning the kind entertainment I had in thy agreeable family, united to me in love, and my walking so under thy wing to meetings amongst a crowd; and them I hardly conceive I shall ever see more.

I must conclude with a great deal of love. Tell my little smart boy that the old Friend is travelling about, and has not since been home; and that he remembers his love to him and wishes him to be a good boy.

ABEL THOMAS.

AN EXAMPLE FOR THE PRESENT MOMENT.—The bloody theme of war came up for consideration, and I was summoned by the voice of God to decide whether I would stand for or against it. I saw that it was a vast system of manslaughter, even in its most excusable form,—unfraternal, savage, and barbarous; anti-Christian, irrational, and full of monstrous evils. I saw that it was based on the assumed rightfulness of resisting evil with evil, and overcoming deadly force with deadly force, which Christ, both with precept and example, unqualifiedly forbade his disciples to do even towards their worst enemies. He had laid his great regenerative axe at the root of this upas-tree, and it must be destroyed trunk and branches. I was fully convinced of this, and took my stand accordingly. Starting from the Divine fundamental principle of pure, universal goodwill, of absolute love, I felt bound to go with that principle wherever it carried me, for all that it dictated, against all that it condemned.

"I did not allow myself to be sophisticated into any excuse for defensive war, or resorts to so-called justifiable force in extreme cases, but committed myself to total abstinence from all war, preparations for war, glorifications of war, and organic action involving any resorts whatever to deadly force against my fellow-men. I would neither fight, vote, pray, nor give any approval of any custom, practice or act, which contravened the law of perfect love toward God, toward my fellow moral agents, or the universal highest good."—Adin Ballou.

The Epistle to All Bearing the Name of Friends.

Probably many of our readers will remember that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in the Fourth Month last, addressed an epistle to all bodies bearing the name of Friends, without reference to any question of organization. The object was renewably to call attention to the fundamental principles of our Society, and to strengthen the hands of those who were concerned that their fellow-members might rally to the support of those principles. It was addressed to meetings and the members composing them, and its proper distribution was referred to a committee.

At a meeting of this committee held soon after the Yearly Meeting, arrangements were made for the preparation of printed copies to be signed by the Clerk of the Yearly Meeting and forwarded to the various bodies designed to be reached, and it was also decided to print ten thousand copies for distribution among their members.

Another meeting of the Committee was held on the fourth of Sixth Month, at which report was made that copies had been forwarded to the Yearly Meeting which convenes at Fifteenth and Race Streets, in Philadelphia, to London and to the several bodies in the State of New York, and in short to all those bodies whose meetings occur before the close of the Sixth Month. It had been read, and so far as appeared, kindly received, in the meeting at Fifteenth and Race Streets, and in that in New York, of which James Wood acted as Clerk, the only meetings from which information has as yet been received.

The Friend to whom had been referred the distribution among the members of the body meeting at Fifth and Race Streets, reported that he had been much assisted by the kindness of two of its members; one of whom had endorsed about twelve hundred envelopes addressed to members of their different Monthly Meetings in the City of Philadelphia; and the other had given information enabling him to reach the members generally belonging to their country meetings. This work had nearly been completed, including in all the distribution of about two thousand seven hundred copies of the Epistle.

The Recording Clerk of London Yearly Meeting had sent for five hundred copies, but the distribution within its limits and in the South Pacific was yet incomplete.

Our own members who are desirous of possessing a copy of this document can be supplied by applying at the Book Store, 304 Arch St., Philadelphia.

God has many voices with which to speak to those who will listen.

The Abolition of Slavery in Zanzibar and Pemba.

The London Friend of twenty-first ult., contains a letter from F. W. Fox, from which the following is taken:

"The proclamation of the Decree for the immediate abolition of the legal status of slavery, made by H. R. H. the Sultan at the Palace, on Fourth Month 6th, may be said figuratively speaking, to have converted the two islands of Zanzibar and Pemba from a land of bondage into a land of liberty. This great social and economic revolution, which will prove the death-blow to East African Slavery, has been carried out so far amidst every outward sign of perfect peace and good order.

In order that its perfect announcement should be made as far as possible simultaneously to all the Arabs in the two islands, it was arranged that fifty representative Arab Sheikhs, heads of the various tribes in the island of Pemba, as well as sixty or seventy leading Arabs of the island of Zanzibar, should be summoned to appear on Third-day last before the Sultan, so as to hear the edict read. The Sultan and Sir Lloyd Mathews also gave instructions that its provisions should be read and explained to groups of these Arabs the day preceding the official proclamation at the palace, so that they might clearly understand their meaning and scope.

The Sultan first invited to the palace his brother and other members of the Sultan's family, and had the clauses read to them. Then he received the fifty Pemba Arabs, and subsequently the Zanzibar Arabs. Sir Lloyd Mathews was also present with the Sultan at the reading of the decree to these several groups of Arabs, and he was greatly pleased with the excellent and wise advice the Sultan then gave his Arab subjects, to the effect, that on returning to their respective shambas, or plantations, they should adopt a conciliatory and kind attitude towards their slaves, so that by means of mutual concessions, the present relations between employer and employee should be as little as possible disturbed. In addition to the measures taken to inform the Arabs, Hardinge, the Consul General, and Sir Lloyd Mathews, had the Decree posted up at all the official residences of the Walis (or governors) in the three districts into which the island of Zanzibar is sub-divided, and in the two sub-divisions of the island of Pemba.

The news of the official proclamation of the new slave trade regulations rapidly spread during Third-day morning throughout the town of Zanzibar, but no disturbances ensued. The Indian shop-keepers, were, however, seized with a panic, and closed all their shops in the afternoon, as they anticipated there would be some riots during the afternoon and evening. Sir Lloyd Mathews took the precaution of stationing soldiers in various parts of the town, and Hardinge made arrangements to land a few marines if necessary; but everywhere the day passed off perfectly quiet.

The Arabs, who, owing to exaggerated rumors previously spread by German, French and other residents, had been led to expect their slaves would be forcibly taken away from them, were agreeably surprised to find when the Decree was explained to them that its terms and conditions were so moderate, and that it would be still possible, by kind and judicious treatment, to retain their employees on their plantations. I am told the Arab masters will now probably offer their slaves larger plots of land to cultivate and crop on their own account during three days of the week, in return for a few day's service for their masters on the shamba. If some such arrangement as this can be made it may be hoped that the cultivation of the shambas will still continue to be carried on much as at present, only under conditions of improved relations between employers and employees.

Although a week has elapsed since the promulgation of the Decree, the authorities in Zanzibar have not heard up to the present time that any slaves have applied for their freedom though undoubtedly when some of the more courageous and intelligent have taken the necessary steps to obtain their certificates of liberation, numbers of slaves will then follow their example.

Yours very sincerely,
FRANCIS WILLIAM FOX.

The Insidious Influence of the Soil on Health.

Much attention has been given of late to domestic sanitation. The average modern house has better drainage than the millionaire's mansion of twenty years ago. In most cities plumbing must be executed under official supervision and the public health has been greatly benefited in consequence.

Not enough thought, however, has been given to the insidious influence of the soil upon health. Dr. Bowditch, of Boston, and Dr. Buchanann of England, by their simultaneous investigation, showed the important relations which ground moisture bears to consumption, and I am inclined to think that the health of the community is more effected by the sanitary state of the soil than by all other influences. This is particularly true of New York, where there is so much made land, and where the soil in many places is made damp by old water courses and polluted by the leakage from gas, water and steam pipes. Wherever the earth is turned up to lay sewers or water mains, there is an unmistakable odor of illuminating gas, and the ground everywhere is more or less contaminated. It is well known that illuminating gas will pass through frozen ground and crevices in rock for a long distance, and so will cesspool air. Neither foundation walls nor cement flooring are a barrier to damp or foul air, while their entrance is accelerated by the suction of stoves and open fireplaces. The well-known experiments of Pettenclofer and Professor Doremus may be referred to in this connection.

The mortality charts of the health board show a close relation between the prevalence of certain diseases and the condition of the soil. In low-lying or saturated sections, typhoid, diphtheria, malarial fever, and other diseases find a permanent home. If Mauhatan Island could be thoroughly drained, consumption would undoubtedly diminish.

Our over-heated houses are like gigantic cupping-houses, and any impurities in the soil will inevitably be diffused throughout dwellings. In Bombay the plague has flourished most in houses with floors saturated with dripping faucets and drainage. Horse plants die if placed in a water-logged soil, and human habitations, like their occupants, should not have wet feet.

In testing a suburban residence with the smoke test recently, I discovered that cesspool air was being forced back into the house through minute crevices in the soil from quite a distance. In a large apartment house the emanations from surface water in the cellar, heated by an adjaent boiler, rose through the casing around a ste pipe into a bed-room on the tenth floor, and caused malaria among the inmates. When the opening was plastered up the attacks ceased.

Many like cases indicate that more attention should be given to the effects of such conditions on health. I should be glad to obtain from our readers further evidence to corroborate these observations.—Charles F. Wingate in Medical Recorder.

Flying Foxes.—This is the name given in the East Indies to a large species of bat, which feeds on fruit. S. J. Stone in his journeys in the Himalayas, says they commit great devastations during the nights, cannot be kept off the trees when the fruit is ripening. They robably destroy more than fifty per cent. of the crop.

These pests come every evening in thousands, and remain in the gardens during the night, and return before morning to their retreats in the upper parts of the Rangra district—at least fifty miles in a direct line of flight.

Human ingenuity has not yet invented means of protecting the fruit from them. It is well known that flying-foxes travel enormous distances in search of food, and this is a case in point: Sterndale, in his Mammalia of India, p. 9, says that these bats are exceedingly strong on the wing. One of these animals boarded a steamer he was on when it was more than a hundred miles from land. Their depredations seriously effect the planters' profits. If nothing can be done to prevent them, the flying-foxes may, in the end, ruin the industry entirely.

THE ENAMEL FLOWER.—At our young people's meeting lately, one of our friends spoke of temptations and discouragements to which men are specially subject. It seemed almost impossible to keep pure in the whirl of usefulness.

"It brings to my mind," said he, "an incident which a friend told me a short time ago. While travelling among the coal mines of Pennsylvania he noticed how very dingy the towns appeared. The coal dust seemed to blacken buildings, trees, shrubs—everything. But as he and a foreman were walking near the mines he noticed a beautiful white flower. Its petals ere as pure as if it were blooming in a daisy eld.

"What care the owner of this plant must take of it," said A, "to keep it so free from dust and dirt."

"See here," said the foreman, and, taking up a handful of coal dust, threw it over the flower. It immediately ran off, and left the flower as sinless as before.

"It has an enamel," the foreman explained, "which prevents any dust from clinging to it. I think it must have been created for just such place."

"I have often thought of this white flower," continued our friend. "If we are covered by an enamel which Jesus will give to all who ask Him, even his own blood, we need not fear that the press of business or contact with a sinful world will stain our hearts or lives."—Intelligencer.

In the autumn of 1825, a musical festival as held in the Minster at York, England. James Backhouse, under a great concern lest, an account of its being under the semblance of religion, any well-disposed people should be ensured by it, issued an address of warning in which he says: "Seeing that God is a spirit, and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth," according to the declaration of Christ, the question arises, What is there in all this pomp and parade? Is the mind rendered more sensible of its fallen and lost state? Are the audience humbled into a sense of their own inability to do anything of themselves, to save themselves from under the dominion of sin? Is their faith strengthened in dependence upon the help that is in Christ alone? Is it not rather the case that the mind being drawn into a sort of solemn admiration of these sounds which the imagination represents as having the semblance of Heavenly sounds, runs into danger of bowing to a fancied image of things above?

"If we consider the musical festival as an amusement, we must even tremble for those who run into it; who thus amuse themselves with the most solemn subjects connected with the Divine Being, and with man's salvation, and who encourage the performers, many of whom are selected from theatres and other places of vain amusement, to take the name of the Most High into their mouths for their amusement. How will such stand before Him in the day of judgment, who has commanded, 'Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.'"—Taken from the Memoir of James Backhouse.

FROM "THE BRITISH FRIEND."

London Yearly Meeting.

The Yearly Meeting opened in joint session of men and women Friends for the first time in its history. There was a very large attendance, the lower part of the house being quite filled, and a great number of seats in the gallery, women Friends largely preponderating.

The Clerk suggested that as in time past we should have half-an-hour or more of quiet, reverential worship, broken, if it seemed right, by brief and solemn offerings of prayer, but not by any long offerings in exhortation.

Epistles from American Yearly Meetings, which are sent jointly, were read.

Samuel Alexander took exception to the phrase in one epistle, "the finished work of Christ in our souls." If the work were finished, there was nothing more for us to do. But was it so?

A Committee was appointed to prepare an epistle or epistles in reply.

A letter had also been received from the Clerk to Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, acknowledging the receipt of the brotherly epistle of last year from London Yearly Meeting, and stating that it had been read, but adding that way had not seemed open at the time to re-open correspondence. A letter, signed by several leading Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, had come to hand, enclosing a general Epistle intended to set forth anew in their purity the principles and practices of the Society of Friends. This was read later.

The Epistle from Philadelphia to all who bear the name of Friends was read; the document was a long and weighty statement of the principles and practices of the Society, put with dignity and force.

J. B. Braithwaite warmly commended the document.

A Friend thought that other Non-conformists also testified to the Headship of Christ in His Church.

J. B. Braithwaite deprecated minute criticism.

John Armitage, Thomas Hodgkin, J. S. Fry, and Charles Brady were thankful that we could in general agree with and value this Epistle.

Two Epistles from the Conservative bodies in Canada and New England were read. They pointed out with great earnestness the extent of the lapses which had caused the necessity for separation.

John William Graham wished to speak on behalf of the body of Friends separated from us in 1827, and from whom we had heard practically nothing for two generations, except through the reports and opinions of those from whom they separated—he alluded to what was sometimes called the "Hicksite" body of Friends. It was his privilege last summer to attend many of their meetings and to mingle among them socially, and he should not be doing his duty if he did not endeavor to lay before the meeting the impressions that he received. There was for all practical purposes, so far as his observation went, no cause for hesitation between us and them on the question of the divinity of the Lord Jesus, his historic character, or his living presence with us now. It would be fair to add that it was not the practice of this body to deal in a disciplinary way with members or ministers on doctrinal points. They cultivated variety, and there was amongst them every variety of doctrine, so that both extremes of doctrinal view found expression in their meetings. He should be glad further if the meeting could feel it right to send a letter to those Friends on the same basis as those recently written to the Conservative bodies in America. It need not interfere with our ordinary correspondence, or commit us to anything, but might be simply a letter of brotherly love and kindness, reaching across two generations of miserable alienation, a step towards bringing together brothers who should not be separated, who were more one in spirit than we had any conception of.

Benjamin O'Brien thought it would be well if the matter could be looked at and something drawn up. He had visited a meeting of these Friends in Philadelphia, and he saw nothing in it that London Yearly Meeting could take exception to. He wished that something could be drawn up.

J. B. Braithwaite hoped nothing of the kind would be done. The ground of separation in 1828 was on points of fundamental doctrine, and London Yearly Meeting was not prepared to give them up. Some of them must remember what their fathers had suffered in this respect, and he trusted that the meeting would stand fast in the liberty wherein Christ had made them free. The opening up of correspondence would mean reciprocity of visits, and they knew the uneasiness that was caused in this country by a visit of one of these Friends a few years ago. He trusted the meeting would not drift into a position that might be totally misunderstood. These things were no stranger to his mind; he had known them since he was young, and he had a very decided judgment that we must not go back on these points, but press forward in steadfast allegiance to Christ, in whom it pleased the Father that all fulness should dwell.

Charles Brady, while recognizing the value and interest of what John William Graham had said, did not think the time was yet for the Yearly Meeting to take any official step in the direction suggested.

Joseph Storr's Fry concurred, while not doubting the truth of what they had been told as to the personal character of these people, but the great question was that of fundamental truth, and from his own knowledge of the writings of Elias Hicks, he believed that what separated them from us was much more vital than anything that separated us from any other Friends there. He would not defend all the acts of discipline that led to the separation, and he recognized that even at that time many who followed Elias Hicks did so without a full appreciation of the points at issue, so that there might still be a great diversity of opinion amongst them. But that would not justify the Yearly Meeting in ignoring fundamental differences.

A testimony to the late Isaac Sharp called forth some affectionate reminiscences of his character and services.

Considerable discussion arose as to the best course to be taken with reference to the large number of persons not members who attend the meetings of Friends. The fact that reception into membership gave them at once equal power in conducting the business of the Society, necessarily rendered Friends cautious about their admission. Finally a committee was requested to collect facts and opinions, and summarize them for the use of the meeting.

The idea was advanced that evening meetings should be used for reading the Scriptures and commenting upon them, so that they might be made especially meetings for religious instruction. An increase of vocal prayer was urged. The tendency of these sentiments evidently was to destroy the character of the evening meetings as meetings for Divine worship, in which the attention of those present is fixed on the presence of Christ, who by His Spirit is the true teacher of his people.

The report of the Home Mission Committee showed an expenditure of £3,400 and the maintenance of workers.

An effort is making in Florida to remove the Seminoles from the lands which they now occupy, to an island in the Everglades, to be made an old-time reservation for them. This would be a wrong which we are sure President McKinley and Secretary Bliss would not allow. The Seminoles ought to receive titles to the lands which they now occupy, and to be protected from all encroachments of the whites. Some rich men may not like it; but a new crime against the Seminoles, driving them off from the lands which they have long cultivated, would be a disgrace that could not be purchased profitably by the convenience of a few magnates. — The Independent.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—W. J. Calhoun, the Special Commissioner sent to Cuba by President McKinley, arrived in Washington on the 8th inst. and had a talk with the President. He is in a satisfactory situation in Cuba and the conclusion reached by him, which has not as yet been made public.

The State Department has two distinct reports bearing on the Ruiz case: one was made by Consul General Lee and the other is a joint production, signed by Consul General Lee and Dr. Congesta, the Spanish Consul at Philadelphia, who with General Lee constituted a Special Commission to investigate the conditions surrounding the death of Dr. Ruiz. This report is a mere statement of facts that are not subject to controversy. Failing to agree upon a statement of the causes which led to Ruiz's death, the Commissioners signed a document at this point, and then, by a separate agreement, made supplementary reports to their own Governments, in which they set out statements that they could not agree to include in the original report.

It is reported that a treaty for the annexation of Hawaii to the United States will be sent to the Senate soon after the return of the President from the South, which he is now visiting.

It is reported from New York, Herald, says that the experiment tried there a year ago of electing women to fill all the city offices has proved a complete success, the city business being conducted by them in a careful, economical and efficient manner.

The Indiana Supreme Court has decided that the three-cent street car fare, which relates to Indianapolis only, is constitutional. The United States Court recently declared the law unconstitutional and injunctions were granted by Judge Shewalter against its enforcement. The State will insist on three-cent fares, unless the street-car company secures an injunction pending an appeal to the United States Supreme Court. A crisis in the history of the Reformed Episcopal Church was reached at the session held in New York on the 11th inst., of the General Council, when action was taken on the subject of vestments. The situation was regarded by Bishop Fallows as so serious that he is quoted as having said, "It seems to be the beginning of the end." The causes of the trouble was a difference on the subject of vestments, a majority of the Council voting practically to do away with the use of the surplice and to substitute therefor the use of the black gown. A vote in favor of liberty in the use of the vestments resulted in 26 yeas to 58 nays.

It is reported from Chattanooga that an English sparrow is the cause of the trouble with the mines and lands in East Tennessee and Southern Kentucky, along the Cincinnati Southern Railroad.

Professor Alvin G. Clark, the famous telescope lens manufacturer, died at his home in Cambridge, Mass., on the 9th inst., as the result of a stroke of apoplexy.

It is said that since the remarkably cold winter of 1892-4, there are many parts of the South Carolina in which the blue bird, once so plentiful, has become totally extinct.

Deaths in this city last week were 383, being 16 less than the previous week, and 21 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 208 were males and 175 females; 44 died of consumption; 37 of cholera; 28 of diphtheria; 25 of scarlet fever; 16 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of nephritis; 13 from casualties; 12 of apoplexy; 12 of convulsions; 12 of scarlet fever; 10 of bronchitis; 10 of measles; 10 of old age; 10 of marasmus; 10 of cancer; 10 of cholera infantum; 9 of Bright's disease, and 9 of inanition.

FOREIGN.—The Western Mail reports that a brig back from the Arctic regions members of the Lock-on-Harmsworth expedition, who have now spent three winters in the settlement, Elmwood, near Cape Flora.

Sir George Nares describes the Polar Basin as a "locked-up bay continuing out of the narrowed Atlantic channel, with a water current which sets constantly pouring into it between Spitzbergen and Norway, and a cold, icy one, as constantly running out between Spitzbergen and Greenland and also through the narrow straits between Greenland and America; the first conveying an enormous source of heat toward the latter, the latter causing the intense cold of Canada and that on the east side of Greenland and North America."

An attempt was made upon the life of President Faure, of France, on the 13th inst. As the carriage in which he was riding to the races was passing a thicket in the Bois de Boulogne, a bomb was exploded. Two arrests were made by the police. One of the prisoners is supposed to be insane.

Despatches from Verona announce that a terrible cyclone, accompanied by hail, devastated the Valle di Caprino, on the evening of the 9th inst. All the crops, including the mulberry crop, were destroyed, and causing a great loss of silk worms.

Many of the Greeks who went to Greece from this and other countries to fight against the Turks, are in a pitiable condition. Not only is the Government unable to make any use of their service, but in the present disturbed condition of the country they can get nothing to do, and they are in actual want.

The Powers show no signs of yielding to the Turkish demands for the annexation of Thessaly, abolition of the capitulations in the case of Greek subjects in the Ottoman Empire or an exorbitant indemnity.

The Sultan has appealed to the Czar and Emperor William to support his claim to annex Thessaly to the Ottoman Empire.

The Governor of Volo has issued a proclamation that the property of refugees who do not return to Thessaly with their families within a fortnight, will be confiscated by the Ottoman Government.

A special from Funchal, Island of Madeira, off the west coast of Morocco, says that on the arrival there on the 10th inst. of the brig St. George, which had taken the Table Bay (Cape Town) on the 6th inst. 2nd for Southampton, it was announced that Barney Barnato the South Africa "diamond king," who was among the passengers, had committed suicide by jumping overboard. His body was recovered.

The population of New South Wales last year was 37,040, a gain of about 200,000 in one year.

The new South Wales is to have an entirely new set of stamps by way of participating in the Queen Victoria celebrations.

In Mexico City "first class American butter, made by an expert," is advertised at 50 and 55 cents per pound, at wholesale and retail, respectively.

It is reported from the City of Mexico that a new volcano has broken out about two-thirds of a mile from Tehuantepec. In the seismic disturbance incidental to the opening of the volcano, the village of Misticuilla was destroyed.

CAMDEN, First Month 23rd, 1888.

"As regards the general subject of the ministry, I have been much impressed of late with the importance of it: the essential importance of our testimony in this matter being fully maintained, and to this end that our principles be on time to time brought to view, and the responsibilities and duties of meetings in connection with it. I was last evening particularly impressed with the account of Deborah Bell, the fifth volume of Friends' Library. Her husband's testimony concerning her, on this subject, and her own remarks and care to keep clear the leading of Christ. I read also William's remarks describing our testimony.

"It would be a comfort to me to see John's testimony published in THE FRIEND, and that of William Penn also, at some other time. If this ground is departed from weakness must of necessity follow in every other branch of our testimony. Our Monthly Meetings are weak, and it requires religious and spiritual judgment and discernment to give a testimony that is worth anything or could be of any value. I thought I would mention this, if it should unite in the view, some space might be, I think, very properly occupied in THE FRIEND by such extracts as I have referred to, to counteract the drift of our times, and to encourage young and old to know their own standing in this matter, for it is not a matter of doubt or uncertainty, or to be determined solely by the absence of erroneous doctrine. "We are undoubtedly passing through a low season, and our hope must be in the Lord alone, to change the dispensations and not anything at the wisest of men can effect by human wisdom; and is He not calling us to a more entire and complete dependence upon himself, who the Lord of the tribe of Judah, who always and who hath still, the key of David, and when He openeth we are opened, and when He shutteth we must be shut, and no man can open us in the least degree swerve from this, we are on the way back again, and leading into confusion, and out of the unity of the one Spirit which is the bond of peace.

"The importance of the subject cannot be overstated, but how does it show the importance of knowing on the other hand the true ground of ministry. A Methodist minister once said to me, in substance, Well, if your views as to ministry are true, I should think every thing expressed under the leading of the Holy Spirit would be worth hearing. A striking and worthy conclusion."

As somewhat connected in substance with this letter, we here introduce some remarks of our dear Friend of a general character:

"I have often been impressed with the belief that one of the causes of the difficulties we experience is a want of a clear and due appreciation on the part of many of our members of the design and purpose of the blessed Head of the Church in raising up the Society of Friends and committing to it the precious testimony of Truth as a sacred trust, to be held up in the sight of other professors of the Christian name as an occupation of advanced ground to which all might be invited to a more excellent way. I fully believe the language of our Holy Redeemer may be applied to those whose spiritual eyes have been anointed to see into the glorious mystery of godliness, as many in our Society have seen and tasted it.

"Many prophets and righteous men have desired to see the things that ye see and have not seen them, and to hear the things that ye hear and have not heard them, and again, 'Blessed are your eyes, for they see, and your ears, for they hear.' This defect of perception as to our calling, has, I believe, had a tendency, through other causes, to produce a restlessness which has led into views of religious truth and sincere though mistaken apprehensions of duty, not compatible with the doctrine which lies at the very basis of Quakerism, the vital doctrine of the government of Christ in the Church, as an actual and practical experience wherever He is truly known."

CAMDEN, First Month 25th, 1888.

[This letter refers to an essay sent to R. Esterbrook for examination, which was called forth by a pamphlet, written by one in membership with Friends, and which contained some objectionable passages. After some other remarks, R. E. goes on to say:]

"But after all, these men do not effect so much harm to the cause as those do, who, professing adherence to our principles, do not give evidence of waiting for sufficient clearness of Divine direction, and so imagination and memory come to be put for Gospel ministry, and accepted as such, largely owing to the low standard of spiritual growth. Our Monthly Meetings and our Quarterly Meetings cannot be stronger than the members of them in a general way are. Hence the weakness we see and feel. With these views I confess to be more concerned (a great deal more) for our own preservation, and that the ministry among ourselves, at our meetings and at funerals and marriages, should give unmistakable evidence that it proceeds from the spring of Divine life. This is the most important concern we have,

and the credit of our profession in regard to ministry is at stake upon this very thing, and the testimony itself held up to criticism."

On the twenty-second of Second Month, 1888, as we were riding in the cars, Richard Esterbrook mentioned that he was at Salem Quarterly Meeting, held at Woodbury on the sixteenth instant. He rose to speak, but in about a minute and a quarter the subject closed up, and he sat down. Late in the meeting Edward Sharpless, who had been visiting the meetings in Salem Quarter, arose with the expression, "Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick," etc., and delivered a very plain and close communication.

The next day, while at Morris Cope's, R. Esterbrook related an anecdote of a Methodist, who resided in the same town with himself, in Cornwall. He hired a horse and carriage to a Calvinist clergyman, who had an appointment to preach at a place several miles distant. The horse was not able to travel rapidly, and so much time was consumed on the journey, that when the place was reached the congregation had dispersed, and the services could not be held. The clergyman was very much disappointed, and on his return complained to the owner of the horse for giving him an animal of so little ability, that he had been unable to meet his appointment. The Methodist in his reply made this allusion to the Presbyterian doctrine of his customer, "You ought not to complain, for it was ordained six thousand years ago that you should not get there in time."

Twelfth Month 10th, 1884.—In conversing about Catherine Phillips, of Redruth, an eminent minister of Cornwall, Richard Esterbrook spoke of a young man whom he knew well, who on one occasion visited at her house. A religious opportunity occurred in which C. P. delivered this short sermon, "Young men, try to be nothing and then thou wilt be something, and something useful."

PLAISFIELD, Eighth Month 9th, 1888.

"I received a letter from Debbie Cope this morning, giving some information as to the condition of our beloved Friend, Morris Cope. It seems as if it might indicate the nearing of the end. But we do not know. It has affected my mind with a feeling of sadness. Our beloved Friend has been and is a bright example in holy fortitude and humble resignation and confidence in Divine mercy.

"When a more general awakening and a true hunger and thirst after an experience of real experimental religion takes place, we may expect a revival. 'Behold, the days come, saith the Lord, that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed, and the mountains shall drop sweet wine and all the hills shall melt.'"

"And I shall bring again the captivity of my people of Israel, and they shall build the waste cities and inhabit them, and they shall plant vineyards and drink the wine thereof; they shall also make gardens and eat the fruit of them. And I will plant them upon their land, and they shall no more be pulled up out of their land which I have given them, saith the Lord thy God.

"The Lord alone will be exalted in that day, and the idols utterly abolished."

[This letter manifests the lively concern which our dear Friend felt for the maintenance in their purity and fullness of our views in regard to the ministry of Gospel. A subject to which he often refers.]

"BRIDGE HAMPTON, L. I.,
"Eighth Month, 20th, 1889.

"In reply to an enquiry, our Saviour said, 'The times and seasons the Father has put in his own power,' and it is not for mortals to know or determine anything but what He sees meet to reveal, and to Him, the only wise and Omnipotent, all may be safely left, and to watch against the tendency in the human mind to engage in its own 'willings and runnings' is an important part of our duty, as well as to be found ready and resigned, and run the way of the Lord's commandments when He shall be pleased to 'enlarge our hearts.' Send forth thy Light and thy Truth; let them lead me and bring me to thy holy hill and to thy tabernacle. Hence the alone true Leadership, and not any imitation or repetitions of the best sayings or doings of others. The husbandman that rightly laboreth must be first a partaker of the fruits—must have the experience in himself. We want more evidence of this, for I have long been persuaded we may come to be regarded as even Quaker preachers without this which is essential for any one. It is not what we remember in meeting, but what is really opened by Him who hath the key of David. I long that this concern may increase among us, and that an eye that is too much closed may be more fully opened to perceive the extreme necessity of it.

"Paul said to Timothy, 'The Lord give thee understanding in all things.' The understanding must come from Him. This is a going to principles, and to their root; and when the need first of it is truly felt and the experience of it our own, it will be a good day with all such."

"BRIDGE HAMPTON, L. I.,
"Eighth Month 22nd, 1889.

"I have within a week received a letter from a friend of the name of Caroline Tweedy, about my own age. Her mother, Ann Tweedy, was a very acceptable minister in the Society, and her father, William Tweedy, in the station of an elder—a prince of a man. Caroline is now in poor health, and the letter was written by her niece at her request. In the course of it she says, 'My aunt feels very much alone in the Society of Friends; things have so altered, and there is so much that she has little sympathy with. Sarah Alfred Fox is the last in this neighborhood at all of the same tone of thought.' This used to be the neighborhood within the compass of which, in my younger days, there was a body of solid Friends not often surpassed. I believe this is a sample of the condition of things generally; and the whole situation of Friends in London Yearly Meeting, should be a warning to us in our Yearly Meeting to watch against the very self-same spirit which would soon lead many forward into activities undertaken in the will and wisdom of man, in which self is at the bottom, and is the leader under whatever garb or guise he may assume. I am often pained and discouraged at the seeming unwillingness to look at this subject as if there were the least cause for uneasiness or anxiety.

"I saw the early workings of this spirit in my own country fifty years ago. The fruits of it are the same everywhere. The language of Truth is one language. There is one body and one spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling. One Lord, one faith and one baptism."

THE FAST OF THE RAMADAM.—During the fast of the Ramadama, which all Mohammedans in Algeria appear to keep religiously, the man who smokes or puts food into his mouth between sunrise and sunset, is regarded by his fellows as a traitor to his religion. As an old historian puts it, "No good Moslem will touch food so long as he is able to distinguish a black from a white thread." In every town and city where there is a garrison a sunset gun is fired during Ramadama as a signal that the fast is over for the day. We had watched the scene that ensued in the squares of different towns with curiosity, but in none was it so pronounced as at Constantine.

As the sunset hour approached the square near the theatre became filled with Arabs, who lounged or walked about, or sat on the stone steps of the buildings in attitudes that only the Arab knows how to take. The vendors of bread, greasy batter-cakes and gallette moved about, showing their articles to the passive public, which was patiently awaiting the signal to eat. Others were engaged in frying fish at portable stands, and as we passed a lively sputter of fat in the pan was heard.

At last the gun was fired, when the crowd closed in upon the provision merchants, and in a twinkling buyer and seller were busily engaged in devouring fish and grease-cakes, as if eating was the one occupation of life. How the Arab fish-man cooks his fish, eats himself, sells to dozens of hungry customers and makes the right change all at the same time, is a mystery, yet it is doubtful if he loses a sou. This scene, like the Arab market, is animated, but never boisterous. Later on, when eating is over, liquor and absinthe have produced their physiological effect, and they are ensconced on the stone seats of their cafés, drinking "coffee Arab," their conviviality becomes sometimes disagreeably audible as far as the European hotels.

"LET US HAVE PEACE."—Of all the beneficent measures of President Grant's Administration, such as the measures of reconstruction, of amendments to the Constitution, of finance, of improvement of the working classes, of the just treatment of the Indians, of the elevation of the Freedmen, of the promotion of education, and of the concessions he compelled foreign powers to make, yet in the interests of universal peace, in the ultimate recognition of the brotherhood of nations, and in the advancement of Christian civilization in the earth, Grant esteemed the treaty of Washington as the crowning glory of his Administration, not to be estimated by millions of dollars. But it was his hope and prophecy that all international disputes would some day be adjusted by peaceful arbitration, and "nations shall learn war no more." He was wont to say to me: "I have a dream that fills me with hope and peace, that the time will come when there will be a Supreme Court of the world, with its chief justice and associate justices before whose bar nations shall stand for the adjudication of these international questions which are now setted by the sword on the field of carnage." And when that good day comes, over that Supreme Tribunal will be Grant's immortal words, "Let us have peace."—Bishop Newman in The Independent.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Reminiscences of Samuel Bettle.

It was occasionally the privilege of the writer to spend a few hours in the company of this experienced and eminent minister of the Gospel at his own home, and to listen to his instructive conversation relating to subjects of general interest, and also to those connected with our religious Society, of which from almost his early youth he had been a deeply concerned member.

In the latter part of his life he was near-sighted so that in walking the streets he with difficulty recognized his acquaintances. This, with a habitual gravity of manner, made him appear reserved and difficult of access, yet when among congenial friends or in his own home he was ready to communicate in conversation many of the interesting observations and accounts with which his mind was stored. I recall the chaste feeling in his company which is at times witnessed in the presence of the humble minded Christian even when words may not be spoken.

His residence from early childhood had been in a house located on the west side of Third Street below Market, and it was in this house he died in 1861, aged eighty-six years, just previous to the occurrence of the Yearly Meeting in the Fourth Month; and when the events attending the breaking out of the war of the rebellion were filling the citizens of Philadelphia as of other large cities, with apprehension an excitement.

It was from this home, as he informed the writer, that he had frequently seen George Washington, when as President of the United States he lived in this city, pass along Third Street, on his way to what is called "Christ Church," on Second Street above Market, to mingle with small company of aged men and women ever morning for devotional exercises. He was a Samuel Bettle stated, "the most dignified looking man" he ever saw. Benjamin Franklin's this time lived on the north side of Chestnut Street above Third, the rear of which was I sight from the yard of Samuel Bettle's residence who frequently saw Franklin and his wife seated in a porch attached to their house.

Many of the public men of his day became more or less known to him either personally or by reputation, during his visits with other Friends to those in authority; and his observations upon their character were often very interesting.

The Congress of the United States sat during the years 1791 to 1800 in the building on the S. E. corner of Sixth and Chestnut Streets. In this building events took place which have had an important bearing upon the history of our country. Among these to which Samuel Bettle referred was the action of Congress upon the treaty with England negotiated by John Jay on the part of the United States, and generally known by his name.

The ratification of this treaty had been strongly opposed by a large party, who were in active sympathy with France, then at war with England. The Senate however approved it, and was proclaimed Third Month 3rd, 1796, yet in order to make it effective the House of Representatives was required to provide money.

If the money was not voted, said one party there would be war with England. If said party ther party, the money is voted there will be war with France. The matter had been debated for some weeks when on the twenty-eighth of Fourth Month, a vote was taken in the Committee of the Whole after an impressive speech ad been made in its favor by Fisher Ames on adopting a resolution to appropriate money to carry the treaty into effect. It proved to be a tie vote. The casting vote of the chairman alone decided the matter, which probably involved the question of peace or war. A war with England was averted, and the popular excitement in favor of France calmed down.

Great was the sympathy with France at this time; and also with French infidelity, and an image representing the goddess of reason was placed by Samuel Bettle, to have been dragged through the streets of Philadelphia by a deluded crowd in imitation of some of the acts of the cited populace of Paris, during the period of the French Revolution.*

Samuel Bettle stated the interesting fact that the gallery for visitors in the chamber where the Representatives met was a public notice that persons entering it were expected to remove their hats, excepting members of the Society of Friends. In commenting upon this he expressed his regret that the influence of the Society of Friends in this city, once so numerous, and so declined that such a consideration of their well known scruples as was implied by his notice, could no longer be expected, and mentioned the separation of 1827, as one great cause of the lessening of this influence. In connection with this subject it may be remarked that he was often heard to remark that separations in our religious Society were not a remedy for its troubles. He was Clerk of the Yearly Meeting when that of 1827 took place and passed through peculiar and great trials in connection with the sorrowful events attending it. John Smith, who was afterward a leader among those who left the Society at this time, was the Assistant Clerk of the Yearly Meeting, and a strong personal friendship existed between them.

In the exercises attending Friends of Philadelphia Meeting in consequence of the division of New England in 1846, the judgment of *The assistance which France had given during the revolutionary war to this country, and the sympathy which we felt with the attempt to establish a republic here, facilitated the introduction of that form of infidelity which during the French Revolution came so widely diffused, and which there produced such blasting effects. The prevalence of sceptical views in this country at that time is a matter of history. A striking Friend wrote: "The view which the rising generation at that time attempted to establish, was crushed by the general prevalence of deism, which was it is but another name for crime and depravity." John Adams, the second President of the United States declared: "The most precious interests of the United States are still held in jeopardy by the hostile signs and insidious acts of a foreign nation [France], as well as by the dissensions among them of those principles subversive of all the foundations of all religions, moral and social obligations, that have produced incalculable mischief and misery in other countries."

It is probable that the widespread influence of these principles in the community had an effect among other non members of the Society of Friends, and prepared the way for the reception by many, of those sceptical views which were promulgated by Elias Hicks as early as 1805.

Stephen Grellet, then living in New York, records in 1808, his "deep and painful trials" on account of the advocacy by Elias Hicks at that time of "sentiments" which were repugnant to Christian faith, tending to lessen the authority of the Holy Scriptures, to undervalue the sacred offices of our holy and blessed Redeemer, and to promote a disregard for the right observance of the First day of the week."

Samuel Bettle was well known to be in favor of that course which the Yearly Meeting pursued, of declining to officially recognize either body to the exclusion of the other, and also of placing before each body a statement prepared by the Meeting for Sufferings of the events which had led to it, and comments thereon, with the expression of its concern that, in the love of the Truth, such steps should be taken as would heal the differences, and restore that unity which should exist between them. This statement, presented to each meeting, claiming the name of New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, was afterwards published by the Friends of the smaller body. In reference to the division in New England Yearly Meeting he once observed, "We cannot expect the breach to be healed in the lifetime of those who made it, but if Truth prevails it will be done in their children's time."

After the separation among Friends of Ohio had taken place in 1854, and all the Yearly Meetings but that of Philadelphia had officially recognized that body of which Jonathan Binns had acted as Clerk, as the true Yearly Meeting of Ohio, the subject of continuing an annual interchange of epistles with other bodies, caused a great diversity of views in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

Under these circumstances Samuel Bettle was clear in his judgment that it would be proper to discontinue correspondence with all other Yearly Meetings, and in a private conversation with Morris Cope in 1856 expressed his conviction "that if Philadelphia Yearly Meeting shall fail to maintain its integrity in the Truth independently of any other bodies claiming the name of Friends, it will not be very long until there will be no Yearly Meeting of Friends in existence."

In 1793, during one of the visitations of yellow fever to Phila, Samuel Bettle was attacked with it, lying apparently unconscious, and for some hours it was thought he was dead. A coffin was brought to the house in readiness for the interment, which then took place a few hours after death had occurred, yet from some appearances of suspended animation, it was thought safest to defer the last necessary preparations: during which period of waiting on the part of the family he revived. His father shortly afterwards was taken with this dread disease, and was buried in the coffin obtained for the son. During the period in which Samuel Bettle lay in a trance-like state he was aware of much that was passing around him, though unable to move or to speak. His mind at this time was engaged in a solemn consideration of the invisible world, and what was unfolded to his spiritual vision at this time, was of such a solemn character that he rarely was known to allude to it.

Whether this event was at the beginning of that course of religious dedication and usefulness which characterized his subsequent life or not, is not probably known, but he was while quite young introduced into important services in the church, indicating that his friends had great confidence in his spiritual discernment and religious stability.

In 1808, he was one of four Friends appointed by the Meeting for Sufferings to present a Memorial to the Legislature then sitting at Lancaster. An account of a series of remarkable incidents connected with this visit, prepared by our late friend Nathan Kite, has been printed in THE FRIEND, vol. xxxviii, p. 121, one of which only may be mentioned here. Upon their return homewards, in the conveyance in which they were making the journey, a period of silence had taken place, when Thomas Scattergood, a minister of the Gospel whom Samuel Bettle highly valued, turned to him, and laying his hand upon his shoulder, addressed him with these words "Young man, why dost thou not yield to the requisition of the Lord? Why dost thou not preach?" In narrating this circumstance to the writer, Samuel Bettle intimated that he had long been under an apprehension that such a surrender was called for from him, and this unexpected address was a powerful confirmation of it, and that it was of Divine requiring. "It was to me" he said, "like the laying on of hands."

During the last century and the early part of this, it was customary for Friends to acquaint those who attended their meetings on First-day if certain of their members had forfeited their right of membership in the Society, with this fact and the reasons for it, by having the testimony of disownment issued on the occasion publicly read at the close of the meeting. In order to spare the feelings of the individual or his family, a notice of the intention to read it, was usually privately sent to him, so that he might, if he so preferred, be absent from the meeting at the time. On one occasion, Samuel Bettle stated, such a notice was sent to one who had formerly been widely known as a member, on a First-day morning, who putting the notice in his pocket, and without informing his family, went as usual to his accustomed place of worship. When the Friend appointed for the purpose rose to read the testimony, he rose also, and continued standing until the information it contained was given to the meeting, thus publicly, and we may believe with humility, acknowledging "I am the man."

A person, a stranger to Friends, attended Arch Street Meeting on one occasion when Samuel Bettle appeared in the ministry. The stranger was at a loss to understand the silent manner of worship of Friends, and also the truths which were delivered by Samuel, and after reflecting upon them, he thought he would call upon him in the hope that something might occur which would explain the matters then weighing upon his mind.

He went to the door of his residence, rang the bell, and to his surprise it was opened by Samuel Bettle himself. As soon as he saw him an awe overspread his mind, and without much remark he was invited in. They took seats and silence ensued. Shortly afterwards Samuel Bettle began to speak with the language "Keep silence before me, O islands, and let the people renew their strength," and went on to deliver the doctrines of the Gospel upon the very points in relation to which the stranger had felt difficulties, to his great surprise and satisfaction. When he had finished, the stranger exclaimed "I am a convinced man." (G. J. S.)

"Seventh Month, 1834.—For a number of years past it has been my lot to warn Friends, and particularly in the Yearly Meeting in London, against a spirit of subtlety that would draw us from an attention to the inward manifestation of our blessed Saviour, the Lord Jesus Christ, for I have long seen that some of those most prominent and influential characters among us never have been altogether of the Lord's own forming, either as Friends or as ministers of Christ—and many, very many, have embraced something short of Him who remains to be the fulness, and are sitting on the surface of things, building on the sand, highly extolling in words the "One Offering," which, indeed, is to be appreciated with feelings of adoration and heartfelt gratitude, but these know not of what they speak, while they preach up a literal faith in Christ crucified, and endeavor to bring people from a pure dependence on the leadings and unfoldings of the Spirit of Christ, or the inward and heartfelt power and coming of Christ within, the hope of glory. Divers ministers of our Society are sliding, and others are already gone, from that which first called them to the preparation, and then did really bring them into the sacred office. Much of this is to be traced to their adopting the views and sentiments of those mentioned above, who never wholly left their own works, but have sought to bring all things to the test of reason, instead of to that "Spirit which searcheth all things, even the deep things of God."—Extract from a Letter written by Sarah Lynes Grubb.

Some of the Last Expressions of Debby T. Howell.

"My heart is bound to our religious Society, and I now say, with my dying breath, that I believe ancient Quakerism is unadulterated Christianity. Many are trying to change our doctrines and testimonies, to make the way easier and broader, so as to evade the cross; but it is pride, pride, pride, that is at the bottom of it all!"

"She said that, during the past year, she had passed through much anguish of spirit for allowing herself to be somewhat caught with these new views; that after hearing and reading much that was expressed upon the proposed changes, she became perplexed and unsettled in her mind, particularly on the subject of silent meetings, and for a time they became inkome to her. She had not told any one of her exercise, but had begged the Lord, by night and by day, to help her out of her difficulties, and He had given her to see it was all a delusion, adding, 'And I repeat, it is all a delusion of the enemy of souls.'"

"She then remarked that, for some time before she ceased going out to meetings, she had rejoiced in some of our silent meetings, when her blessed Saviour had come into her heart, and she had supped with Him in a holy communion, where there was nothing to divert her from it; and that He had, in marvellous loving kindness, continued to do so, at times, throughout all her sickness, and said, 'I now repeat it again, with dying lips, that I believe old-fashioned Quakerism is unadulterated Christianity. It is a good religion to die by.' She then clasped her hands together, and after lying still for some minutes, said, 'What wonderful, loving kindness to such a poor, unworthy worm as I am, to have an assurance granted me that my peace is made, that I am prepared to die. I can but marvel at myself. I feel as if I only wanted wings to fly to my blessed rest, but am entirely willing to wait the Lord's time. My spirit is prepared to sing the song of the redeemed.'"

"She died on the twenty-ninth of Ninth Month, 1857, aged forty-three years."

The marvellous and rapidly increasing commerce of the great lakes may well excite the astonishment of those who are not familiar with it, and greatly exceeds that of our country upon the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. The past season some 3,400 vessels plied the waters of the lakes, with an aggregate of over 1,200,000 tons register, and transported over 40,000,000 tons of freight. Five times as many vessels pass through St. Mary's canal at the outlet of Lake Superior as pass through the Suez Canal in Egypt.—The Presbyterian.

THOUGHTS ON LEAVING HOME.

The parting words were low and sadly spoken,
Reluctantly I turned my eyes to you;
The dearest lies on earth were being broken—
Too sad almost for e'en a tear to flow.

As on I sped, my steps no more delaying,
Dim in the distance homely pictures grew;
Now far away my thoughts go homeward straying,
But only memory brings all back to view.

O, land of hills and vales with charms beguiling,
Thy woods, thy peaceful waters, azure skies!
Above all these my prairie home is smiling—
That hallowed spot "bound by a thousand ties."

Oh, what to me all earth's delightful places,
When torn from all the world I've loved before;
I wait in vain the cherished forms and faces,
The dear sweet voices greet my ear no more.

Can it be true no one will come to meet me,
Who cheered my life since earliest breath I drew;
New friends may softly speak and kindly treat me,
But will they e'er replace the tried and true.

Softly now night's silvery orb is burning—
Ah! does it too look down on those I love?
And do they feel a nameless, heart sick yearning,
And breathe a sigh, then wait my name above?

The tears adorn my cheeks are slowly creeping,
Relieving not my aching heart or brow;
Oh have I heard of sorrow's tearful weeping,
But never guessed its meaning until now.

And this it is the world is ever calling,
And bidding us to leave the parent nest,
Yes, thus the blooming rose is ever falling,
To sadden both our own and parents' breast.

Uncertain time some change is ever bringing,
Before we meet there may be joy or gloom;
For some dear one a wedding bell be ringing—
Another lonely laid within the tomb.

In days ago my heart was lightly lifted 'Mid fondly cherished dreams of by and by;
Alas! how soon upon the wide world drifted,
To find all vain; now for the past I sigh.

And yet, O blessed One, Thy love portraying,
A wondrous lesson in it all I see;
Each fading flower, each earthy gem decaying
Is but a call to nearer come to Thee.

To Thee as of old I now commend me,
To Thee I flee from every earthly strife;
When all else fall Thou ever dost defend me—
Thou hast the words of everlasting life.

O, leave me not, but let Thy strong arm guide me,
E'er let Thy lamp light to my footsteps be,
And may I cease to long for things denied me,
But calmly leave the future all with Thee.

A SHORT SERMON.

ALICE CARY.

Children who read my lay,
This much I have to say:
Each day and every day
Do what is right!
Right things in great and small;
Then, though the sky should fall,
Sun, moon, and stars, and all,
You shall have light.

This further would I say:
Be you tempted as you may,
Each day and every day,
Speak what is true!
True things in great and small;
Then, though the stars should fall,
Sun, stars, and moon, and all,
Heaven would show through.

Figs, as you see and know,
Do not of thistles grow;
And though the blossoms blow
White on the tree,
Grapes never, never yet
On the limbs of thorns were set;
So if you good would get,
Good you must be.

Life's journey through and through,
Speaking what is just and true,
Doing what is right to you
Unto one and all,
When you work and when you play,
Each day and every day;
Then peace shall glad your way,
Though the sky should fall!

An Excursion to Ancora.

Our botanical collections were not confined to the plants interesting from their peculiarities of growth or habits, but many of the women and girls were loaded with bunches of showy flowers, such as the beautiful Laurel (Kalmia latifolia), and the narrow-leaved species, Sheep Laurel (Kalmia angustifolia), and the Lupine (Lupinus perennis), with its bright blue flowers. Some added that curious member of the Liliaceae, Turkey Beard (Xerophyllum setifolium), to their treasures. From the centre of a mass of narrow, grass-like radical leaves, a stem shoots up two or three feet high, thickly clothed with needle-shaped leaves, and crowned with a large raceme of showy white flowers.

On the dry uplands we met with several species of Catchfly (Silene and Lychnis), so called because there are spaces on the stems covered with sticky material which might hinder the progress of an insect ascending it. Darwin suggests that in the lapse of ages the plant has developed this material as a protection from the assaults of insects that might otherwise injure the seed-pods. Whether the Author of the Universe originally created this plant with this defensive armor or whether He subsequently enabled it to secrete it on certain parts of the stem, it is in either case equally his work—for the laws of nature are only the expression of his sovereign will.

Near the railroad depot grew in abundance a native species of Toad Flax (Linaria Canadensis), differing much in appearance from the "Butter and Eggs" introduced from Europe. It has slender stems, with small blue flowers at the top. Near by grew also a small species of Evening Primrose (Oenothera sinuata), wild leaves sinuately toothed. It is common enough in the sandy soils of New Jersey, but it is not found in Chester County—an illustration of the well known fact, that the nature of the soil has great influence on the growth of plants, so that some species thrive only in such peculiar situations that they are greatly limited in number and in the range of country they occupy.

On the dwarf oaks which abounded we found many galls, the result of insect punctures, and they were very curious and interesting specimens.

We encountered a snake of three or four feet in length, which the most learned of our party decided to be a Pine snake. It disappeared so rapidly into its hole that I did not get a glimpse of it.

Others of the party came across the nest of a Quail with fourteen eggs. They were careful not to touch the eggs or otherwise disturb the nest, for fear the parent birds would desert it.

In the afternoon, we convened again at the Ancora house, and while seated on the porch and under the trees partook of a comfortable meal. This was followed by a series of short addresses from these presents, on the geology of Southern New Jersey, its peculiar plants, on diatoms, etc. Some of these were both interesting and instructive, especially that on the history of diatoms.

The diatoms belong to a low order of vegetable formation, allied to the Algae. They may be likened to a pill box, consisting of two valves, and having one cavity or cell. One of the most striking peculiarities of these plants is, that the box and its lid are largely composed of siliceous substances, so that the forms of the species are preserved intact in fossil deposits. About eight thousand species have been described, of which perhaps two thousand are found in America. The markings are often very beautiful and curious. These plants are mostly microscopical in size, and require microscopes of a high magnifying power to show distinctly their markings. There are few objects more interesting than a collection of diatom slides properly prepared.

In some the valves merely rest against each other, edge on edge, forming a line of junction along which the valves readily separate. In life, the diatom has an external membrane and an internal one. Diatoms are found both in salt and fresh water, and also on the surface of damp rocks and walls, garden paths, flower-pots, etc. They may generally be obtained in great numbers by allowing waters in which they exist, to stand for a few hours, and then pouring off all but the more muddy part at the bottom. They may often be seen to move a little in the water or slime in which they exist, and this was at one time regarded as evidence of their animal nature, but it is now believed to be owing to their imbibing and emitting fluids in the processes of their vegetable life. As a general rule the motions of diatoms are simply backwards and forwards; at other times they are a slow rolling from side to side.

In some of the genera the diatom increases by being divided or cut in two, as the name implies. New valves are formed on the inside of each of the old valves, so that two plants exist where there was only one before. They also multiply by simple division and in other ways. Dr. Hooker found them in such numbers in the Antarctic Ocean as to give an ochreous brown color to its surface, as far as the eye could reach, and to the icebergs floating in it; whilst a submarine deposit is in process of formation, composed of their silicious shields.

Fossil diatoms have been observed in the strata of every age. Lewis Wolman, in his remarks on the strata of Southern New Jersey, pointed out several strata composed in part of diatoms, as shown by the borings for deep wells at various points near the sea-coast. Some of them were of considerable thickness. Minute as these plants are they have been among the more important sources of the strata which now exist. Tripoli stone consists entirely of their silicious plates. One deposit of this material in Bohemia is two miles in length, and averages twenty-eight feet in thickness. Another at Bilin forms the upper layer of a hill, and is fourteen feet thick, yet the individuals are so small that forty-one billion exist in every cubic inch of the stone. The city of Richmond, Virginia, is built on a stratum of diatomaceous earth eighteen feet thick.

In a paper read before the Natural History Society of Edinburgh, it was stated, as the result of recent investigations, that in the deep green waters of the Arctic Sea, described by Scoresby, the discoloration is caused by immense multitudes of a minute diatom. These diatoms accumulate under the floes of ice. It was found that the brown, slimy masses adhering to the under surface of the ice were almost wholly composed of diatoms. The heat developed by these masses of diatomaceous hollows the ice into honeycombed chambers, rendering it so fragile (or as the whalers term it, rotten), as to be easily crushed. So this microscopic dot helps to render the Arctic Ocean navigable, by breaking up the floes. The food of the right whale consists almost wholly of minute animals which swarm in these discolored portions of the ocean. In their stomachs were found the remains of this diatom, proving that they fed on it. So in this strange cycle of being the whale is dependent on the diatom for its existence, one of the largest of animals on a planet so minute that hundreds must be massed together before they can be visible to the naked eye.

The scientist to whom had been allotted the subject of insects had very few minutes left to expatiate on this immense subject, so that he limited himself almost entirely to a dragon fly he had met with during the day, and which in his researches in Pennsylvania he had never seen there. It was a somewhat curious fact that the river Delaware should divide the region it inhabits from that in which it cannot exist. In its larval state, the dragon-fly inhabits the water and feeds on other insects; and it may be that the bogs and streams of the pine barren region are better adapted for the growth of its prey than the rivulets in the geuicic regions of Philadelphia and Chester Counties.

When the addresses were all finished, an order was given for a prompt march to the cars, and this was promptly obeyed, and we were soon en route to Camden.

By general consent it was decided that we had spent a pleasant and instructive day.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Letter of Samuel Fothergill.

"The contents of thine respecting Cornelius Cayley, and the copy of his application to Friends of Leeds Meeting, have been much in my thoughts. I have hitherto been a stranger to the person and his case. I read, some years ago, many of the journals of those exercised in endeavoring to promote the revival of Christianity, but there appeared to me so much of the nature of those things that the day of the Lord should come upon, so fully described—Isaiah ii: 10, to the end of the chapter, that I declined the search, in hope that the winning power of Truth would separate the wheat from the chaff, in minds pure, upright and sincere; and that the Power which prepared the eyes of the man blind from his birth, by spitting on the clay, and finishes his marvellous work by sending him to 'the pool of Siloam,' or to the Sont, for washing might, in the same line, and by the efficacy of the word of his mouth—which is as a two-edged sword, and whose entrance giveth light and life—have led them into that which is within the veil and impenetrable to the eyes, which have only been anointed with the spittle on their earth; and for this my soul hath often been baptized in humble, fervent prayer.

"The person under immediate notice claims and hath my sympathy; I believe him joined to all the living, through the quickening virtue of the life-giving word, and I earnestly pray for his complete formation, as a vessel meet for the Master's use. Yet a secret and painful jealousy affects me, that patience hath not had its perfect work, to lead him into all the unutterable depths of the Lord's preparing day, nor all the idols cast to the moles and to the bats; my jealousy arise from the activity of distinguished self, which loves the splendid, pleasant picture, an easy purchase, in comparison of the deep-hidden pearl of substantial truth. We sorrowfully know that we have amongst us traditional formalists, having a name only, by outward inheritance; yet there remains a worm, Jacob, the feeble yet faithful wrestler with God amongst us, whose life is hid with Christ in God, and who, through the virtue of the sacred unction, have not an absolute need of man's teaching, but are gathered in spirit into the Lord's mountain, where the Lord, of his own make, unto all his people a feast of fat things, and where He destroys the face of the covering, and the veil that is spread over all nations. But the formalists amongst us are in the same life, with all the family under the veil, and the face of the covering, and not having on the garment of needlework, wrought in a course of experience, have not a right to this feast on the Lord's mountain, but feed on perishable husks; and a superficial ministry, of the same birth, and moving on the same ground, feeds itself with the like food, fills its belly with the east wind, and empties its chilling qualities on the superficial dependents on human help.

"The testimony given us as a people, in various branches, hath been a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence, to many who have wished for our crown, without our cross, and have overlooked and despised the peculiarity of our testimony, or the testimony of the Lord by and through us. The language, fashion, and customs of the world, though by many esteemed indifferent, are not so to us, but are a part of the growth, the underwood of the lofty Lebanon, which the day of the Lord is to come upon, as well as upon the tall cedars, and when that day comes it will burn as an oven indiscriminately, with prevailing heat, and leave them neither root nor branch. All who have entered into fellowship with us, through the baptism of Christ, the true door of entrance, have, not from imitation, but clear conviction, found this compliance their indispensable duty. We might have many preachers break in upon us, were we at liberty to admit them upon the partial foundation of general speculative truths, without their coming to the unity of the Spirit, which unites faithfulness to the Lord's statutes and testimonies to us and by us to the world. How far the person in question may have seen into this testimony I know not, but this I know—many of those called Methodists, their preachers especially, rather content than approve this peculiar dispensation, which, the longer I live, the more clearly I see to be from heaven, against that spirit which rules in all carnality, whether notorious in obvious evil, more concealed in the walks of normality, or more refined and fallacious in the outward court of the temple.

"I cannot well omit a passage in C. C.'s letter, expressing that 'the Lie begins to send up fresh sap into my dead earth, and the blind in me begins to see, the deaf to hear, and the dumb to speak.' I believe this is really the truth, and a strong description of an infantile state, a resurrection from being buried in a baptism of death, into a new life, and yet scarcely grown up into a capacity of preaching the everlasting Gospel of salvation. The forty days retreat into the desert, previous to the ministry of the Holy Jesus, seems to me not fully accomplished.

"I feel much for C. C. I love him. I wish to give him the right hand of fellowship in the Lord Jesus; his spirit is near my life; and oh, that he may endure the Lord's preparing day; that he may come out of Egypt clear and un-mixed with any of those things which veil the beauty of the Lord's workmanship. I hope Friends will be tender towards him, yet, for his own sake and the testimony's, firm and steady, for this will be beneficial to him, if he ever come in at the right door. I recommend Friends concerned, and this person, to a deep inward attention to the great Minister of the Sanctuary, that in his counsel and wisdom all may move, and the precious unity of the one Eternal Spirit may be known to run to the nethermost skirts of their garments.

"I am thy affectionate friend, in deep travail for Zion's beauty, that none who love her may fail of the salvation within her gates.

SAMUEL FOTHERGILL."

FROM "THE AUSTRALIAN FRIEND."

During the past few years the principles of the Society of Friends have received exposition from almost every standpoint, sometimes in detail, sometimes briefly summarized; and, in addition to these expositions, there have been writers to justify the continuance of our religious body, and writers to proclaim its mission for the needs of the present generation, or to make known "the message of Quakerism for the world of to-day." Is this fertility of exposition a prelude to these principles taking greater hold upon mankind at large, or does it betoken a tendency in our members to theorize rather than to be living witnesses of the truths thus expounded? "By their fruits ye shall know them," said Jesus Christ: it is experience which must give the answer to our question.

But what strikes one as an essential quality of a religion which shall largely influence the people of the coming generation (if one may judge by the tendencies which are manifested in our own) is such a constitution as shall be both its justification, and the manifestation of its purpose—a constitution so plain that men shall need no instruction to understand it, and yet be unable to discover any relaxing of its demands. It is this quality in religion which revelation has all along been leading men up to, as there have been learners able to receive it. Even in the times of the Jewish monarchy the Holy Spirit influenced the men most open to its leadings to declare that to "fear God and keep his commandments" is "the whole duty of man"; that God's requiring is "to do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly" with Him; to declare also that this requirement should, in the ages to come, be made so plain that even an ignorant man, without place in a civilized community, would be in no danger of making a mistake concerning it.

It was a religion having this quality in a marked degree that George Fox and some of his fellow-workers preached, and made manifest through the formation of religious communities in divers places. But the principles which they inculcated have sometimes become so systematized that these plain preachers would scarcely recognize them. Therefore we, their successors of to-day, should seriously consider who are real followers of George Fox and his friends. Surely the true following is not in the seeking for precedents in their modes of procedure, and in the setting up of a form of doctrine based upon their writings, but in the placing of ourselves at the view-point whence they looked upon human life and duty—in realizing that the kingdom of God is even now being established, and in making it our sole aim to act as loyal subjects in this kingdom. Throughout the writings and throughout the utterances of these early confessors, there seems to run the refrain that an Authority is set up which is understandable by all, and to which all must be obedient. It is the message to those who are out of the way, to those who are in distress of mind, to those engaged in the affairs of daily life, and to those to whom has been given a service for their fellows.

And they, who thus proclaimed that men were seeking without what they would find within, were careful to declare that they were preaching "no new Gospel," seeing that the Authority to which they bore witness—the Light in men's consciences, the Word in the heart—was the same Divine Leader who had been manifested in human form; and therefore men who now disregard the One are in the same category with those who, in a former age, crucified the other; whilst they who now sorrow for sin, which the Light makes manifest, and who follow the Divine Light as the accepted Ruler of their lives, are one with those who, enlightened by Divine suffering because of man's sin, mourned "Him whom they had pierced," and afterwards rose "with Him in newness of life." Thus the government of the Holy Spirit was declared to be the same "kingdom of heaven" which Jesus Christ had preached and into which the first disciples had entered with the "Anointed" of God as their King.

It was this simple announcement of an Authority to which every human being is called upon to bow—of an ordered state of life into which men are invited to enter,—which sufficed for justification whenever these misunderstood people appeared in conflict with the religion of man's tradition. In worshipping God differently from the received method, they acted from the same guiding principle—they were still from their own thoughts and ways that the mind of God might be manifested to them and speak through them. Many, indeed, who had been teachers in other denominations and who had therefore been accustomed in their public worship to read the Holy Scriptures and to sing hymns, acted when they entered upon the new order of things as Wm. Penn did in respect to his sword. Yet these gradually discovered that the exact words of former revelations were not necessary in order to deliver a message to-day, and that sometimes the endeavor to give the exact words of a former exhortation might hinder the speaker or his fellows from ministering to a present need. They also felt that the expressing of words in sounds pleasing to the ear might in reality turn the mind away from the true Instructor, and that the real harmony to be sought was the bringing of all present into a holy fellowship. (It may be here remarked that the early Friends, though feeling that meetings for Divine Worship were a public manifestation of dependence upon God, and that reliance upon anything written or printed contravened this, were nevertheless themselves frequent in reading, and diligent in meditating upon, God's revelations to men of former ages, and were careful to exhort their fellow-members to be in the practice of reading these sacred writings to children and to others under their care.) The abuse of religious rites and observances was, in the first place, also undefended by a labored apology or search for precedent in the action of the Apostles. The reformers simply acted upon the conviction that the time had come when the antitype of circumcision or of baptism must be manifested to be a real entrance into a new state where "all things are of God" (Gal. vi: 15; I. Pet. iii: 21), and when the antitype of a common meal should be shown to be a communion in assimilation of Christ's character, a communion of "righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit" (Rom. xiv: 17 R. V.). Similarly they were not careful to reconcile with the accepted ideas of professing Christians their refusal to bear arms, but confessed that they "lived in the virtue of that life and power that took away the occasion of all wars." They were content to be "living epistles" amongst the men of their generation—witnesses of a condition of righteousness between man and his fellow-man which should ultimately be the prevailing condition amongst mankind at large.

Throughout all their actions there was, amongst the deeper-spirited of the early Friends, a simple-hearted adherence to the one testimony that God's Kingdom had come into their hearts, and that the duty was laid upon them to "let their lives preach" it to the world, so that God might work through them upon others; that thus God's creative Spirit might act in them, and in all his obedient servants, until all mankind should become fashioned according to the gracious design which He had for humanity when, letting the first light shine upon the earth, He gave the earnest of his gifts of life and order and beauty.

Such a religion whose central idea is that of submission to righteous government, is the kind needed to fit in with the present regulation of affairs, seeing that almost every transaction between man and man, from youth upwards, has its system of government:—the game of cricket, and other recreations, all kinds of friendly societies, every corporation for the transaction of business, every association for ridding the country of insect and plant pests, every association for the eradication of social evils, and every society for the improvement of human affairs or for mutual help. So ramified is this decentralized method of government that the central authority is becoming more and more occupied in directing these sub-systems of order-keeping; and therefore a religion, if it be one to last, must claim all these as parts of its working—must claim that all administrators of order are God's ministers (Rom. xiii: 6), and thus give the inference that so-called reformers greatly err when they try to oppose every kind of government, and that the true reformer is he who seeks rather to purify the methods of administering men's affairs. These thoughts lead us to understand that man is in his perfect condition when the Divine will is done in him and by him and through him; and that this is the condition in mankind by which the knowledge of God (relation to Him in love and service) is to spread until it covers the earth; for He is a God of order and of peace.

Let us take heed lest we, who, as messengers to the world, began well, lose sight of the conception with which we set out. Most of the reasons for the maintenance of our testimonies put forth by the expounders of Friends' principles, though good in themselves, are often so separated from the main one that a demand has arisen for a systematic teaching of what we are expected to believe. This surely is evidence that we are getting into a religion which is not one in which an ignorant wayfarer will not err.

THE glories of the world always lose their charms when Jesus is spiritually enjoyed.

Natural History, Science, etc.

—A new and most destructive beetle, called the gold-tail, has made its appearance in Somerville, Mass., where it is extremely destructive, and it may be possible to exterminate it before it spreads over the country. Massachusetts deserves great praise for its effort in localizing or destroying the gypsy moth; and we are glad that the discovery of this new pest has been made before it is too late to exterminate it.—The Independent.

A Volcanic Bubble.—F. S. Bortain, of Puebla, writes as follows: "It may be of interest to some of the readers of the Herald who visit Puebla to know of one of the less visited attractions in the vicinity of the City of the Angels. I refer to the Coxcomate. It is about twenty minutes distant from Puebla over the street car line to Cholula. Any street car conductor can point out to the curiosity seeker. It is to the right of the car line about five hundred yards distant. "It looks from the car window to be a pile of white stones or a well bleached haystack, but upon closer inspection proves to be a tumulus of white calcareous stone, evidently of water formation, about fifty feet in height and one hundred feet in diameter at the base. The form is that of a truncated cone. At the apex is an elliptical hinged opening, about twenty-five feet along the minor and fifty feet along the major axis. It is a bell shaped cavity and lined with ferns of various descriptions. I should judge the depth to be at least one hundred feet, and at the bottom, so far as visible, the opening must be sixty feet in diameter. In the bottom on one side we so see some gorgeous ferns and on the other side a pool of water.

"Tradition says that the ancient Aztecs were accustomed to worship here the genius of the pot, and occasionally threw in a live victim to appease his subterranean majesty. It is also said that a few victims of the inquisition were brown down here to reflect upon the controverted points of doctrine. At all events, it is a most singular freak of nature, as it is in the middle of a level plain, or rather a barley field. I look to have been some volcanic bubble, of which the Mexican upland is so full, and is well worth a visit on the part of the curious.

"Although I have inquired among my Mexican friends, I have found no one who could tell me the meaning of the name Coxcomate."—Mexican Herald.

Algerian Dogs.—Soon after leaving Oran, opportunities of verifying the truth of the captain's statement about dogs began to present themselves, and long before our Algerian tour was finished we were thoroughly convinced that the acts, in this instance at least, had been correctly stated. As we passed farm-houses and native habitations, the dogs would rush out at us, sometimes singly, sometimes in twos and threes, barking furiously, snapping and showing their teeth in a most threatening manner. These dogs are shaggy, gaunt, wolfish-looking beasts, with long, sharp noses and glaring eyes. They are to be suspicious of strangers, and are rendered more savage by being half-starved. The most ferocious are kept chained or shut up during the day, but it is never safe to approach a house unless armed with a stout cane. What would have happened to us had we not been provided with steel-cored whips it is not difficult to predict. To say the least, we should peevishly have become candidates for the Pasteur treatment. To increase the efficiency of these, we had taken the precaution to fasten good-sized shot on the snappers. This worked well on the dogs, but was detrimental to the whips, as the weight of the shot under constant use caused the snappers to break off. The idea then occurred to us to provide the lower end of the whips with six wire-barbs, similar to those used on barbed-fence wire, each projecting three-eighths of an inch. One blow, with the whip thus armed, was usually sufficient. The barking would change instantly into a short, sharp yelp, and the dog would shrink off conquered. The sudden transition from an attitude of confident attack to one of ignominious defeat was most amusing.

Later on, between Algiers and Constantine, as we were passing an Arab village a little off the road, one evening, after dark, we were startled by a tremendous barking. Of a sudden, at least fifty dogs broke out in full chorus and barked as if they would tear everything around them to pieces. Whether we were the cause of the deafening din we did not know, nor did we know whether they were chained, but the prospect of being attacked in the dark by these howling fiends was not reassuring. They did not molest us, and we once more breathed freely as the sounds grew fainter behind us.

Room at the Top.

BY ARCHER BROWN.

Every boy who has any stuff in him wants to succeed. By success he means high position, big salary or income, reputation, influence, power. Seldom is the higher success that results from lofty character, irrespective of wealth or fame, taken into account. So, for this concluding paper, I will deal with pure worldly success, the kind that men are recklessly struggling for the world over.

If the average boy approaching manhood were to analyze his ambition and define his goal twenty years ahead, it would be the presidency of a bank or great corporation, the head of a rich firm, the foremost place in the chosen profession of law, medicine, or the ministry, a seat in Congress, or perhaps the mayoralty of his town.

And here comes the surprising and encouraging truth that these great prizes of a life are not hard for a well equipped man to attain. The competition for them is not severe. Indeed, strange as it may seem, the big place is usually hunting for the man. There is room at the top. The bottom is crowded with those struggling fiercely for the small prizes. The top has ample elbow room for the few who are up there.

To explain a little. Every corporation or firm that employs men knows how hard it is to find just the right material for responsible positions. It is easy enough to fill the routine places; but brains and character are not essential; and commence to look for a man above the ordinary, and the trouble begins. One man available is honest, industrious, faithful, but lacks a trained mind. Another is capable, energetic, hard working, but there is a shadow of doubt about his moral strength under temptation. Another is honest, bright, true, but lacks industry or the power of application. Still another seems to possess every needed thing, but is without health and endurance. And so on through the list. It is next to impossible to find one who combines in himself the necessary qualities for a high and responsible position, unless there is mixed up with them some shortcoming or failure. The well-rounded man, morally, intellectually, physically, is a prize in the business world, and these controlling great interests are grabbing for him. He commands the highest pay while he serves others, and in due time you find him at the head of his own great interests.

Now turn from the top downward. With each descending step in the scale the number of those competing for place increases in geometrical ratio, until at the very bottom you find the greatest crowd of all. The lower the pay, the more menial the work, the greater is the scramble for it. For example, take a great manufacturing corporation. Its president dies or retires. The salary is perhaps twenty-five thousand dollars a year. The directors begin the search for a successor, and if they find two or three broad, able and forceful men from whom to make a selection and who have not already better positions, they will be fortunate. But suppose the vacancy is that of assistant bookkeeper or bill-clerk at a forty dollars-a-month. A hundred men—yes, a thousand, if it is in a great city—can be had in a day's time. And the twenty-five thousand dollar man is cheaper than the forty dollars a month man. I was told the other day of a vice president of a great corporation in New York who had by a timely, sagacious stroke made his company six hundred thousand dollars in a single year. It was enough to pay his salary of thirty thousand dollars a year for twenty years in advance. The president of the Pennsylvania Railroad died recently, leaving a fifty thousand dollar position to be filled. There was no scramble for the office. One man was available who had mounted every successive round of the ladder, but he practically had no competitors. I know a man who started as a poor German boy in the night schools of a Western city, working step by step through the mechanical departments of a large manufacturing business, proving himself master in each place, until the management of a great enterprise came to him unsought at twenty-five thousand dollars a year. I know a railroad president, who, coming from a small town in Maine, by sheer force of brains and character reached a commanding position. To one high office was added another, until his combined salaries equal that of the President of the United States.

Let us ask a few questions. Is it natural brilliancy or luck that puts one man so far ahead of his fellows? It is neither. Analyze the character of the men in the highest places. You will find they attained it their positions by preparation, mental, moral, physical, technical; brains well trained, energy well directed, work well sustained. Study the steps in the character of Gladstone, of Benjamin Harrison, of Carnegie, of Rockefeller, of Wanamaker, of P. D. Armour, of M. E. Loggins, and prove the statement.

Are the qualities of success attainable by a man of ordinary natural abilities? Unquestionably, yes. First the character; then the preparation; then the opportunity. The latter comes to most men sooner or later, but rare is the man who is ready to seize it. U. S. Grant as a boy in Ohio built his character. At West Point and in the Mexican war he made his preparation. In the Civil war he found his opportunity. Here are a few of the essential qualities which will win against all the powers of so-called ill-luck:

1. Absolute, unswerving integrity. Is that unattainable?
2. Brains, mental grasp. Given a fair mind, what is that but education and discipline?
3. Energy and force of character. That is a question of exercise of will to overcome laziness and love of ease.

4. Capacity for work, executive power, the ability to bring things to pass. This is the product of industry by system or method. It is energy conserved and well directed. It is the art of making every stroke count.

5. Personal manners, engaging address. What is this but the result of close, unselfish adherence to the rules for making a gentleman?

All these qualifications are not easy, it is true, but they are not impossible. It is really your own choosing whether you will be among the richly rewarded few at the top or the hungry multitude at the bottom.—Christian Advocate.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—President McKinley has sent a personal letter to Queen Victoria, which was delivered to her on the 21st instant by William Reid, Special Envoy. To Her Majesty, Victoria, Queen of Great Britain and Ireland and Empress of India.—Great and Good Friend.—In the name and on behalf of the people of the United States I present their sincere felicitations upon the sixtieth anniversary of your Majesty's accession to the throne of Great Britain."

On the 16th inst. the President of the U. S. sent to the Senate, with an accompanying message, a treaty for the annexation of Hawaii to the United States. The treaty was signed by the Secretary of State and special envoys from Hawaii. In the main it follows the lines of the treaty negotiated at the end of the Harrison administration, and which was recalled from the Senate by Grover Cleveland. There is a strong minority in the Senate who will oppose consideration of the treaty at the present session.

The Japanese Minister has filed with the Secretary of State a formal statement of the position of his Government with respect to the proposed annexation of the Hawaiian Islands by the United States.

President McKinley, it is stated, has determined to revive the abandoned treaty of general arbitration between the United States and Great Britain, a new treaty having been drafted to serve as the basis of negotiations. In this draft there are none of the points which caused the failure of the Olden treaty. The treaty is not to be submitted to the Senate before next Twelfth M-nth.

President McKinley has nominated Stewart L. Woodford, of New York, to be Minister to Spain. It is announced that his selection was influenced by the fact that he agreed to go to his post immediately upon confirmation, something very much desired by the President, and also to remain there throughout the present administration.

The director of the mint has issued a statement showing that $53,088,000 of gold and $76,609,236 of silver were produced in the United States last year, the silver being estimated at its coinage value. There was an increase of $7,475,000 in the gold and $4,018,000 in the silver production over the previous year.

A committee of the San Francisco Grand Jury has submitted a report in which attention is called to the growing use of opium in that city. The committee suggests that more stringent measures should be adopted to abate the evil.

W. C. Callahan, a San Francisco millionaire, has been sentenced to twenty-four hours' imprisonment, having been convicted the second time of spitting in street cars. The Superior Court affirmed the judgment.

A fruit company in California is said to have adopted an interesting method of drying potatoes, by which they are greatly lightened, so as to be more available for transportation. By the drying process four-fifths of the weight is removed, without lessening the nutritious value of the potato or diminishing its excellence as to flavor when cooked. It is reported that the company engaged in this business will soon have ready for market nearly a million bushels of dried potatoes, the original weight of which was about five million pounds.

According to advices from Tacoma more tea is now on the Pacific Coast than ever before at one time. The importers have made large purchases in China and Japan for immediate delivery, and are having it packed in boxes, the only superior to enter it before long into the market. It is said that 1,000 tons have already been landed, and 12,000,000 pounds are on the way.

During the visit of the business men from Central and South America to Lynn, Mass., last week, they saw a pair of women's shoes made in 14 minutes and 14 seconds. During the process fifty odd pieces of leather passed through 85 pairs of hands.

A despatch received on the 21st instant from San Francisco says that the reports regarding the earthquake shows that it was quite severe at Salinas, Monterey County. At Gilroy the earthquake did much damage. Numerous chimneys were toppled over, house walls cracked, every plate-glass store window shattered, and there was a general wreckage of bridges and buildings in Los Angeles and vicinity, and out of their homes in terror. In some houses blinds were wrenched from the hangings, and an unusual scene of petty destruction is presented in nearly every house and store in town."

Deaths in this city last week were 394, being 11 more than the previous week, and 20 less than the corresponding week of the last year. The following were males and 178 females: 45 died of consumption; 31 of pneumonia; 25 of heart disease; 19 of cancer; 15 of cholera infantum; 15 of convulsions; 14 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 14 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of nephritis; 11 of inanition; 10 of mania; 10 of old age, and 9 of bronchitis.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 99 1/4; 4's, reg. 111 1/4; 111; coupon, 113 1/4; 113; new 4's, 125 1/2; 123 1/2; 5's, 113 1/4; 114; currency 6's, 101 1/4.

COTTON was firm and advanced 1/2c per pound to 8 1/2c for middling uplands.

FEED.—Spot bar, $11.50 to $12.00 per ton for winter in bulk; and $12.00 to $12.50 for spring in sacks. FLOUR.—Winter super, $2.75 to $2.90; extras, $3.00 to $3.25; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $3.75 to $3.90; do., straight, $3.90 to $4.10; Western winter, clear, $3.75 to $3.90; do., do., straight, $3.90 to $4.10; do., do., patent, $4.15 to $4.35; spring, clear, $3.40 to $3.65; do., straight, $3.75 to $3.90; do., patent, $4.00 to $4.15; favorite brands, higher. City mills, extra, $3.10 to $3.40; do., clear, $4.00 to $4.15; do., straight, $3.75 to $4.25; do., patent, $4.25 to $4.50. RYE FLOUR.—$2.25 to $2.40 per bushel, as to quality.

GRAIN.—No. 2 red wheat, 71 1/2 to 72c. No. 2 mixed corn, 29 to 29 1/2c.

No. 2 white oats, 25 1/2 to 26c.

BEEF CATTLE.—Aberdeen, 4 1/2 to 5 good, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2c; medium, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2c; common, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Extra, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2c; good, 3 1/4 to 3 1/2c; medium, 3 1/4 to 3 1/2c; common, 2 1/4 to 3c; fall lambs, 3 1/4 to 3 1/2c; spring lambs, 4 1/4 to 6c.

HOGS.—Western, 5 1/2 to 5 3/4c; State, 4 1/2c.

The celebration of Queen Victoria's Diamond Jubilee will be held on the 20th inst. Thanksgiving services were held in St. Paul's, Westminster Abbey and in places of worship throughout the United Kingdom and in nearly every large city of Europe. The Queen and members of the royal family attended the services at St. George's Chapel, Windsor.

On Sunday, Queen Victoria went from Windsor to London. In the afternoon she received the royal Envoys at Buckingham Palace. After entertaining ninety of her most distinguished guests at dinner the Queen received the diplomatic corps.

The State Council of Switzerland has declared in favor of the State acquiring the railroads.

The London Times says: "Foreign matches, in future, instead of being supplied to us from Sweden, will apparently come all the way from Japan. The competition of the Orientals has already, it is said, destroyed the European match trade in India, China and Hong Kong, and will soon assert itself in the United States. After supplying their own markets, the Orientals are able to send 2,500,000,000 boxes to the rest of the world, leaving us taking most of the surplus output. Osaka, where an American syndicate has purchased one of the numerous factories engaged in the manufacture, produced last year 100,000,000 dozen boxes of matches, giving the thousands of children, who earn a few pence per day in the work."

Almost the whole of the Province of Assam has been devastated by the earthquake of the 12th inst. The ruin is appalling. The courts, treasuries, jails and hospitals have collapsed. The crops are mostly ruined, and it is difficult to see any prospect of success. It is difficult, as numbers of the ruins have been completely demolished. Earthquake shocks still continue to be felt in the Province of Assam and much alarm is felt, especially as renewed shocks are reported from various places in Bengal. Heavy rains are immediately ensuing, and damage already done. At Shillong everything has been destroyed. At Assam life is heavy. At Goalpara a tidal wave destroyed all the buildings, and the neighboring country is covered with fissures, which are spouting mud and sand.

The loss of life was also heavy at this place. Several of the shaken districts have not been heard from. On the 20th it was announced that 6000 lives had been lost in the Province.

Dr. E. C. Stirling, F. R. S. announces that he has discovered in the dry basin of a South Australian lake remains of an extinct bird, which in life measured 12 feet in height. The bird seems to have been without wings, and therefore is likely to have possessed many of the habits of the ostrich. The skull measures 1 foot 2 inches. It is probable that it lived in marshy places and fed on herbage. There is only one prehistoric bird known to history which has something the same appearance as this unknown Australian specimen. The bird probably afforded food to the natives of New Zealand, as is possibly also true of the Australian.

A despatch received from the city of Oaxaca, on the 21st inst., says: "The continued earthquake shocks and heavy rains have seriously interrupted telegraph communication with the Isthmus of Tehuantepec during the last three days. Advices were received here last night that the official commission sent to the city of Tehuantepec by President Diaz to investigate the reported formation of a volcano and the extent of the earthquake damages has arrived at its destination and found the condition of affairs much worse than it had expected."

"The town of Tehuantepec contains about 15,000 inhabitants and is completely destroyed so far as houses and public buildings are concerned. The town is now in ruins. There were a number of costly buildings in town. The people are living in tents and the open air on the outskirts of the place."

"The earthquake shocks continue to be felt at frequent intervals and the people are terrified. The heavy smoke and other indications of an active volcano to the west of Tehuantepec are longer visible."

President Faure of France has consented to act as arbitrator in the frontier dispute between Costa Rica and Colombia.

The treaty of Annapolis, made in Ninth Month 1895, provided for the union of the countries of Central America in a confederation, to be known as the Greater Republic of Central America. The treaty was carefully considered and on Ninth Month 15th, 1896, the treaty was ratified by San Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua. The entry of Guatemala and Costa Rica in the latter consents, which is doubtful, completes the alliance.

The object of the confederation is the amicable settlement of all matters of foreign relations affecting the individual countries. Government is by a Diet of Deputies, elected every three years, and meeting at one capital after another. Where arbitration is resorted to preference is to be given to the United States as the deciding Power.

The confederation was recognized by President Cleveland on Twelfth Month 23rd last.

"CAMDEN, Third Month 21st, 1890.

"I think the little piece in THE FRIEND, over the signature of Thomas Evans, is a gem, and I greatly desire it may have close attention, for the kind of experience he points out is essential to a right preparation of heart. More evidence of this is greatly needed. If there is nothing in it, then there is nothing to justify us; it is here that the watchmen on our walls ought to stand, for it is through the avenue of an easy, plausible ministry that most of the trials of the Society have come. The manner may be agreeable and the matter good, but both may be without the needful stamp of right authority. I am often grieved from the apprehension I have long had, that there is a great lack of the mind and experience that T. Evans so clearly describes. It is not religious activity that is needed, but that deep and weighty travail for the arising of that life, without which all is as nothing. I long to see our young men enter by his door into their ministry, and not climb up by any other way or process, or be stimulated by unskilful hands to their own lasting injury and the grief of all who are capable of true discernment. I am persuaded that this is the concern that our friends in the station of elders ought to be engaged in above every other thing, and it will be so if they are ever rightly qualified for what is required of them.

"If I have any correct feeling, there is a loud call within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting for more of this watchful care, and to guard against a disposition to force things along, to make a show of life. If the servants of God in old time had not stood still in Jordan, they could never have brought up stones of memorial from thence, and it is as needful now as it was then, if ever we are true testimony bearers. Now, dear friend, I want thee to feel this matter thyself, and not throw it aside, but consider it weightily.

"We ought to be as one man in this concern, and will be if things are right with us. No office or offices, no rank or station in the Church in which we may find ourselves give any qualification or authority. The authority is in a renewed sense of Divine life, and is held in deep humility and a sense of our own weakness. I do not desire any reply to this letter—it is not needed. I want thee to consider it carefully."

[The article here alluded to is on page 277 of the sixty-third volume of THE FRIEND, and is as follows:]

"Let it ever be borne in mind that religion is an inward work, a work of the heart, and not of the head; and that to live and walk in the Spirit with Christ, comprehends its essence.

"There may be a great danger of turning from this inward work, which is crucifying to self, and attended with many humiliations and mortifications, and substituting for it the more easy routine of specious religious activity, and thus suffering great loss, becoming lean and dwarfish, in a spiritual sense, instead of growing in grace and daily waiting on the Lord, and inwardly watching against sin, so as to be perfecting holiness in his fear.

"There is room in the Church for the exercise of every gift which the Holy Head sees meet to dispense to his servants, and there is no shortness or stinting on his part. What is wanting is humble submission to those fiery baptisms which purify the soul, and prepare it for the reception of the Lord's gifts.

"When these baptisms are patiently endured until the times are fulfilled, and the period for being shown unto Israel is fully come, then a man's gift maketh room for him, whatever that gift may be, and a door of usefulness in the Church is opened to him, under the leading and government of the great Giver, who will always help every obedient servant to occupy the gift profitably and acceptably in his fear.

"THOMAS EVANS."

[A letter dated Fourth Month, 29th, 1890, refers to an article, then recently published in THE FRIEND, which, criticized, in a "captious and unfair" manner, some of the statements put forth by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, in "A Brief Narrative" of its position. The letter says:]

"I have not a copy of the 'Brief Narrative' by me, but I believe it was designed to show what were the underlying causes that brought about the position that Philadelphia Yearly Meeting holds itself in. It was undoubtedly caused by its efforts and concern to maintain its testimony to the ancient principles and testimony of our Society.

"This fact should, I think, be re-asserted, in reply to the mischievous essay I have referred to. During the conflict with the South, twenty-five to thirty years ago, it was often asserted by persons in England, 'Oh, it is a war for supremacy, etc., etc. Slavery has nothing to do with it.' And thus it was sought to awaken the interest of the British public in the contest. I remember Harriet Beecher Stowe remarked, in reply to this, 'Although slavery may not be the form of the war, it is the fuel of it,' for the question of slavery is at the bottom of the whole struggle. I need not say more, perhaps. I hope thou wilt gather my meaning. I do not like to have the accuracy of a document like the 'Brief Narrative'—prepared under a righteous concern—impugned and its truthfulness called in question."

[In THE FRIEND of Fifth Month 17th, 1890, there was published an editorial article commenting on that in THE FRIEND, to which the previous letter alluded. This says:]

"The 'Brief Narrative' clearly points out that the difficulties and want of unity which existed in the Society of Friends arose out of departures from its original principles; and it thus shows the underlying causes which brought about the position in which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting found itself. It may be truly said that, whatever other considerations became mingled with the efforts of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, the foundation of its peculiar position was the effort to uphold the doctrines and testimonies of the Society of Friends.

"The writer of the article in THE FRIEND states that a member of the Binns' Body in Ohio was present and spoke in the Select Yearly Meeting in Philadelphia in 1888. We do not see what bearing this fact has on the general question of the position of that Yearly Meeting. Such persons have for years occasionally been in attendance and have repeatedly been admonished of the incoherency of so attending, but the fact that they have not been forcibly ejected or prevented from entering the meeting-room is a very weak foundation for the assumption that the Yearly Meeting has ceased to regard the Binns' Body as one outside of the organizations which it recognizes as co-ordinate branches of the Society of Friends.

Before publishing it I submitted it to my valued friend, R. Esterbrook, who expressed his approval in a letter, which says, 'I have no unity with Sanballat and Tobiah.'

"CAMDEN, Fifth Month 27th, 1890.

"The enclosed letter was written by a near connection of George Sharpless, who read it to me and others on First-day last, being at his house to dinner, M. Cope also there. It affected me and tendered my spirit, and it was not easy to avoid tears. It furnishes evidence of the kind of concern that existed in that day, and of the ground upon which those stood who went forth as ambassadors for Christ, travelled in the work of the ministry, not on the mere missionary principle and because they as-ert that they have consecrated themselves to the Lord's service, and thus rob Him of his prerogative to choose, prepare and qualify his own instruments. I see it is quite easy to drift into this wide departure. The steps are few and easily taken. When pecuniary compensation is connected with it the evil is more apparent. None are the Lord's messengers but those whom He himself puts forth, and every one of these depends wholly upon Him, both in going and coming. Nothing can add to this or be deducted from it that can make any difference to the value of this Divine foundation."

[The letter alluded to may be found on page 355, volume 63, OF THE FRIEND.]

"CAMBES, Sixth Month 1st, 1890.

"The correspondent was at Western Quarterly Meeting, and I think what took place there had the effect to convince nine out of ten of those who were present as to the religious standing of the man, irrespective of any reference to the doctrines advanced. Any Friend who asserts that he preaches because he has in some time past consecrated himself to the service of Christ shows at once where he stands, and that he is an intruder into the work of the ministry.

It is the prerogative of Christ alone to call and qualify and prepare vessels for use in his house. There are several that travel about and to whom staying at home becomes irksome, that have no better foundation than inclination, and are, to my mind, doing great harm. One or two that I could name have natural sagacity and can carry themselves more plausibly, but are none the less, perhaps more, mischievous. They produce among ourselves a want of harmony, and this leads to the policy of silence in regard to them, and secret countenance and assistance is given, and these things shut up or diminish the openness and freedom which I regard as one of the great blessings of religious association.

J. H. Fothergill, in his journal, relates that, on his return from a visit to this country, he resumed the occupation of farming, believing it best for ministers in our Society to have occupation, that they might not be in danger of a disposition to be too easily drawn into religious service without the sense of the clear requiring of our everlasting High Priest. I verily believe the want of occupation at home, and not caring to have it, has been a snare to several, and the lack of spiritual discernment has made it an easy thing to obtain paper credentials.

"This talk about a well-balanced and a 'round Gospel' is almost invariably heard from those who are in heart gone from our testimony or were never there. I have no doubt of it. I thought of Andrew Johnson, soon after Lincoln's death, when Johnson stood better than was afterwards the case, at a time when a class of persons called 'Copperheads' were often heard invoking the protection of the 'Constitution' for Rebels. 'Show me a man,' said he, 'who prates about the Constitution, and I will show you a traitor at heart.' I write from memory. But there is a point and lesson in it. My heart is often made sad and I grieve heavily, because of the sense I think I have of the state of things among us."

A COURTIER'S RETORT.—One may be excused for feeling a little joy when the man who goes out of his way to make a rude remark in order to show his wit receives a rebuke that is as courteous as it is effective.

The retort given by a certain learned scientist must have been more amusing to the on-lookers than to the learned gentleman's antagonist.

It happened at dinner that one of the guests began to deride philosophy and went on rudely to express the opinion that philosophy was but another way of spelling fool.

"What is your opinion, professor?" he asked. "Is there much distance between them?"

"The professor, with a polite bow to his borish vis-à-vis, responded gravely. "Some times only the width of a table."—Christian Instructor.

Letter from Switzerland.

PRÉS NEUFCHÂTEL, 49 Corvèles.
Fifth Month 30th, 1897.

This is First-day morning—I was up the first one in the house and spent an hour in the forest, to get the mountain air and the view across the lake, at the same time I committed to memory a poem which I have to recite to-morrow. I have just returned but no one but the maid seems to be stirring so I have a little time before breakfast still. Yesterday was the most perfect day we have had here, for three weeks the Alps have been half or entirely hidden with dense clouds. They kept saying when I exclaimed at the beauty of a peak that now and then showed itself—but just wait until you see the whole range." I felt it was beautiful enough and did not care for anything more, but yesterday morning when I had seated myself at the desk in the study room, putting in the minutes before the breakfast bell rang, the young girl who assists in the family and who by the way is from Zurich and who speaks at present a mixture of French and German came to the door and said excitedly, "Mademoiselle kommen Sie, on voit toutes les Alpes." I made such a spring that I nearly overturned the table and chairs in my hurry to get to the dining room from whose windows the view is superb, and oh, what a view! I was simply wild to rush off up the mountain for the still far finer view from the edge of the forest, but I did not know my lesson, so was forced to possess myself in patience. But when we were through at nine there was nothing else to do and we spent the greater part of the day up there watching the changing effects. Nothing could be lovelier, there is a long line of foothills in front of the Alps that are now only slightly covered with snow and which hide all except the highest peaks of that part directly in front of us, but they slope down at each end so as to allow a full view of Mt. Blanc at the one and the Jungfrau at the other end. Oh, they are so white, so white, and yesterday the sky and lake were the most intense blue, so that the mountains stood out with absolute distinctness and we could see great glaciers on their sides. All day the cloud and light effects kept changing, but it was in the evening that they showed up in all their glory, we spent nearly two hours watching them after tea, back of us was the glowing sky with our own mountains dark against it, all about us the woods, in front sloping steeply down to the meadows and vineyards, with the roofs of houses clustered together in the midst of the foliage, at our feet the enchanting lake and beyond the Alps, what could be finer? Constantly the colors deepened and the lake which was a perfect mirror, reflected them and the soft colors of the sky.

The Jungfrau was completely lighted up with scarcely a sign of shadow and from pure white she became rose and finally took on an almost purple glow, then the shadows crept up and finally only the highest tip remained of a rose hue. When all the rest of the range had grown pale again, Mt. Blanc, that had before seemed to be almost in shadow, suddenly became a mass of rose light, it seemed as if he were conscious of his kingly rights and wished to shine alone. But the lake, never was there anything so lovely, everyone says that it is the only lake in Switzerland that has such wonderful changes and reflects the colors as it does. It is really the lake that gives such life, such exquisite variety, such charm to the whole landscape. This morning the scene was entirely changed though equally lovely in its way. The atmosphere was no longer perfectly clear, but it hazy hung over all the foothills connecting the lake with the hoary peaks, which looked dreamy and far away. One could not be more conveniently situated than we are here, for seeing everything, and railroad travel spite of the difficult engineering is ridiculously cheap, the return ticket from here to Geneva is 9 francs (we always go third class of course for day trips) and to Interlaken and back it is about the same. We will see at least these two places. But not only the Alps can be so well visited from here, but the Juras in our immediate vicinity enclose marvellous valleys, gorges and streams.

Sixth Month, 1st.—Yesterday we had dinner at half past eleven to allow us a long afternoon for the climb of one of the peaks a little to the right and back of us. It was a two hours and a half steady climb to a little hotel near the summit of this mountain, the Tourne, and when we reached there our main sensation was that of hunger, we had come prepared for the heat, as we went in and had a most delicious lunch with the freshest butter and cream for which we paid 70 centimes (16 cents) a piece, we spent nearly an hour over it and then we continued our journey to the top. It was not far, and we had mainly the high mountain meadows to cross covered with lovely flowers, those beautiful dwarf varieties that only grow in high altitudes we were not at quite 5000 ft. however and then through a little grove, I had felt like saying several times, this is certainly fine indeed, but I had expected rather more. I kept still how ever and when at what seemed the top I asked "which path now?" And was answered "the left." I advanced quietly a few steps and then gave such a cry and spring that Mademoiselle said she thought I and my parasol were going over the precipice together! In a minute we were all united and expressing with all the energy the mountain air could give us our delight over the scene spread out at our feet. But how try to describe it? We were on a rock projecting out of the side of the mountain overhanging a beautifully green and cultivated valley a thousand feet below. We could see our own village and dozens and dozens of others the city of Neuchâtel and then not only our own beautiful lake but two others beyond and then the Alps. It seemed we could sit there always just drinking it in but we were forced to leave a little before sunset in order to reach home before dark, it was a long tramp of twenty kilometers in all and one of the most beautiful we have taken.

Last week, one day, a party of eleven of us went to the gorge de l'Areuse a little river that has eaten a way through the mountains and empties in the lake a mile or so below here. It was a ten minutes ride by train to the station from which in ten minutes more one finds oneself descending into a cleft in the earth at the bottom of which, between narrow, rocky walls boils and seethes the little river, we followed a narrow path cut in the rocks some seventy feet above the river, with a railing for safety, for several hours the sun shone down into the gorge lighting up the foliage and the water. It was perfectly enchanting. The trees that here and there found footing in the rocky walls were completely covered to their topmost branches with long green moss. The humidity was so great that ferns were growing all up amongst the branches embedded simply in the moss.

It was late in the afternoon when we entered into a picturesque little hotel, the Chalet de la Pierre, situated in a charming little valley where the mountains open out a little. We were well furnished of course, and ordered a dinner of trout, which are always on hand fresh out of the river. We were served on the broad veranda which allowed a charming view of beautiful nature around us. To reach the station which by the way was on the line that we took from Paris to Neuchâtel, we were forced to climb up the mountain side and as it was a steep down grade the train made in about fifteen minutes or less what had cost us about four hours on foot.

But there are any amount of more charming excursions at hand, for instance between four and five in the afternoon we can take the train here at Corcelles and in an hour be way up on the mountain range back of the one upon which our village is situated and then walk down or take the train as we like. The valley between the two ranges is a perfect garden spot, here are twenty-two villages there and the cultivation is perfect. Nothing could present a greater contrast than between the peasants of Germany and Switzerland. The cleanliness and perfect order of everything here is most striking and though the women work they are not slaves as they are in Germany, and there is no carrying of heavy burdens on their backs. But of course the condition of the peasants is very different here in this part of Switzerland than in the Catholic part of the country. Everyone is intelligent and educated and there is equality everywhere, one feels it in the very air. It is the freedom that makes the difference.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Shadow and Substance.

God still speaks in parables, if one would but earthen. Now, as in olden times, men go through the world with eyes and ears closed to the truths that God has placed around them. As it is written, "Eyes have they, but they see not; they have ears, but they hear not."

It seems that every incident in life, that very fact in nature, is a parable, if rightly understood. And what man calls substance, things having form, hardness, solidity, is but the shadow of things spiritual.

An acorn falls into the ground and sends up a stem having two leaves. As the plant grows the leaves come, in the fall frost fingers pluck them, and they are gone. The spring sees their shadows that men call leaves come out upon the branches, the autumn sees them go, as clouds come and go across the summer sky.

The tiny shoot becomes the sapling, the sapling became the monarch of the wood, the great oak fell and decayed, the longer shadow has passed away.

Every sower that goes out to sow is a repetition of our Lord's parable of the sower. Every seed sown which the rain and sunshine quicken into life, every plant reaching upward for light and heat, speaks in clear strong tones, but man's dull of hearing.

The hills and the valleys, the sunshine and the clouds, the cold, gray, damp, death-like fog and the starlit night, all are voiceful with a tongue that few men interpret.

Gold is the symbol of righteousness and purity of character; yet man loves the shadow rather than the substance.

Why is it? Has man been so long clutching at the shadow and finding his fingers empty, that he doubts if there be any substance? Or, have his eyes become so used to semi-darkness, that the light beyond the shadow dazzles them? Does man not know that without the substance there could be no shadow?

Shadows are given not to hinder but to help man understand the substance. O, that man could learn to discern the substance by the shadow.

A few winters ago a little ground sparrow found shelter beneath a brush heap across the road from the woodpile. All that long cold winter he sang a song wonderful in its sweetness; but low, so low that one could scarcely hear it beyond the limits of the woodyard. The fiercer the blast blew, the softer came the notes, but no north wind could still the song.

Men saw a brush heap and a bird and heard a song; but the poet saw in them the shadow of a grand eternal thought, and thought is substance, and thought being substance, is ever clothed in shadow. For this is a world of shadows.

Man himself is wrapt in shadow, as in a cloud, and his hopes and aspirations struggle to take form, struggle to make themselves known beyond the shadow. For by these alone can man make his existence known to another soul. And only by following these can he hope to solve the mysteries that lay untouched around him.

If all the outer forms that surround man are shadows, can he be blamed, if he mistake the shadow for the substance?

Yes, for to all ages, to all countries and peoples have come sages, poets and prophets testifying that these things are but shadows of an enduring substance, and, that for the sake of the substance, man must delve deeper into the shadow.

That man might know the perfect gift of God, and that man might choose the substance of eternal life instead of the eternal shadow of death, the Great Substance by whom is all substance, from whom emanates the power which makes all substance enduring—took on the shadow of man; for man could not endure the glory of the substance.

For this cause also, God must of necessity reveal himself by shadow and by parable.

What excuse, then, has man? None; for God created in man an aspiration, a reaching outward and upward to things nobler and better. And the Spirit of God, also, is sent to be a guide to the spirit of man and to lead man out of the shadows of this world into that of glorious reality, where substance has superseded the shadow.

God knows what is for the best; and whatever heaven He has prepared for man is best suited to man's condition and capacity of enjoyment. Yet, if I, from my poor limited height of observation, were to choose, I would choose a heaven, where man, freed from the haunting, ever present shadow, would see the substance as it is; where man would go from height to height, from glory to glory, ever attaining unto something better, with ever a higher standard onto which to attain.

LEWIS M. HOLLINGSWORTH, PENNSVILLE, Morgan Co., Ohio.

A BRAVE DEED.—It hardly seems possible that a girl of sixteen should save nearly fifty people from a terrible death, and yet that is what Grace Bussell did. She is often called the Grace Darling of Australia, and when you have heard her story, I am sure you will say she deserves the name. Grace lived with her parents in Western Australia, and her father was one of the first settlers near the Swan River. She used to help in many ways. She would ride twenty miles a day with the cattle, and was as much at home in the saddle as she was in the kitchen.

Before you can quite understand what a wonderful work this girl did one day, you must remember that twenty years ago the town in the new settlement in Australia were very far apart, and people had often to ride for miles to call on their next-door neighbor.

Now it happened one day in December, 1876, that a vessel was wrecked off the coast about eight miles from the Bussell's home. The steamboat sprang a leak, and not being far from land, the captain tried to steer her in. But it was of no avail. She ran aground, and there she stayed, with the water gradually flowing into her.

The life-boat which was on board the steamer was lowered, but it leaked, too, and was so difficult to manage that eight people who had ventured in it were drowned. So the rest of the crew clinging to the steamer, and wondering whether they could ever be saved. The surf ran so wildly that no one could dare to swim through it, and there was not a house or a person in sight.

But help was near, though they knew it not. The girl of sixteen was riding along with a native servant. She caught sight of the vessel in distress, and turning her horse's head toward the coast, she started at a quick gallop. When she reached the sea she urged her horse into the angry surf.

She rode boldly on till she reached the vessel. With much difficulty she took some of the children in her arms, and put them before her on the saddle. Then, with women and bigger children clinging to her dress, she started for the shore, gave those she had rescued to the care of the native, and returned once more to the wreck. So she went backward and forward for four hours, till all were safe on land, the servant having ridden to bring out the last man.

Tired and wet as the girl was, she had still something more to do. Those forty-eight people whom she had rescued must have food and protection of some sort before night came on. So Grace rode home for help, but by the time she had gone the eight miles she was so worn out herself that she fainted, and it was some time before she could tell what had happened. Her married sister started off at once with food and wraps for the shipwrecked people, and the next day they were all taken to Bussell's house.

You will agree with me that Grace well deserved the medal of the Royal Humane Society which was presented to her on January 28th, 1878.—Oswald.

AMERICAN REVISERS' EDITION OF THE BIBLE.—Since the issuing of the Revised Version of the Old and New Testaments, there have been frequent inquiries for an edition containing the preferences of the American revisers as indicated at the close of the English Revision. Such a publication is not yet allowable by the terms of the original agreement, but steps have been taken toward its preparation, and these have been mentioned at different times in these columns. A Wisconsin correspondent recently made the following inquiry:

"Please state, in Notes on Open Letters, whether the American Revision Committee have published their Bible, which, I think, it was announced they would do in 1895. I wish a new Bible, but do not wish another English one, on account of the use of pronouns, spelling and many other things contrary to American ideas. America ought to give us the best Bible."

In order to speak by authority on this point, the inquiry was referred to Professor J. Henry Thayer, of Harvard University, secretary of the New Testament Company of American Revisers, and this is the reply:

"In reply to your inquiry of the 29th ult., I may say that many months ago a correspondence was opened by the publishing house of Thomas Nelson & Sons (Edinburgh, London and New York), looking towards the issue of an 'Americanized' edition of the Revision. It reached such a stage last midsummer, that I rather expected the surviving members of the American Revision Committee would be called together last autumn to complete the work. But I have heard nothing farther from them, and it rests with them to prosecute the correspondence. I hardly need remind you that the American Revisers are debarred in honor from issuing an edition with their authorization till after the lapse of fourteen years from the completion of the English work—that is, until 1899."

It will be remembered that the Revised New Testament was published in 1881, and the Old Testament in 1885. Dr. Schaaf said, in these columns, that the Americanized New Testament might be published in 1895, but this was not done. Professor Thayer speaks of 1899 as the time when the entire Bible may be published.—S. S. Times.

Some Unpublished Incidents Relating to R. Jordan and Other Friends.

Richard Jordan went, in company with Samuel Smith, of Philadelphia, to England, they both being on religious service. Samuel had been there before, and was well known and warmly welcomed by a large company at a friend's house in Liverpool, on the first evening of their arrival. While Richard was entirely overlooked, being a stranger and making a rustic appearance. The friends even supposed he had come in the capacity of body servant to their friend Samuel. This slight R. felt very keenly. Sitting there, with no one deigning to converse with him, was rather dull. To add to the discomfort of his position, the company began to speak very slightly of his native State, North Carolina, and, particularly, they seemed to have a very poor opinion of a place called Rogue's Harbor, in that State it being, in their estimation, much like Nazareth, out of which no good thing could come. So, Richard's experience of his first evening in England was a very uncomfortable one. The weary evening at length came to an end, as all painful things in this world will. On retiring to their chamber, R.— attacked Samuel, saying, "Why did they treat me so? Why didn't they introduce me to the friends?"

"Well, now, Richard, thou must excuse me. I was so pleased at meeting with my old friends that I quite forgot thee. Thou must excuse me."

"This, perhaps, was something hard for him to do, but next day, being meeting-day, those who had assembled at the friend's house were much surprised on seeing the 'body-servant' go up into the gallery.

R.—, in relating the occurrence, said, "The first thing I had to say, on standing up, was, 'Friends, I dare not deny my country. I am from North Carolina, and reside at a place called Rogue's Harbor,' and he added, 'I think I never knew the stream of Gospel ministry to flow through me as it did that day.'

And doubtless they concluded, ere he closed, that something good might come even from Rogue's Harbor.

When at the house of that worthy Friend, J. G. Bevan, his host seemed pained with his ungrammatical way of speaking, and proposed the propriety of his taking some lessons, at the same time placing a grammar in his hand, which R.— meekly took, but soon laid aside. As they came out from the first meeting they attended together, J. G. B.— clapped him on the shoulder, and said, "Preach on, Richard, grammar or no grammar."

My informant, the late Amy Albertson, said that she often had occasion to call upon R.— for aid in some work of charity. This he would always give, invariably saying:

"Of a little take a little, thou art welcome therunto; Of a little leave a little, whatsoever thou mayst do."

I have often heard my father relate that, when Joseph Carrington opened in his Monthly Meeting his concern to pay a religious visit to England, the members, knowing him to be a man of weak mind, thought it would never do for him to go on such an important embassy, and yet, fearing to take the responsibility of stopping the concern, they gave him a minute, each one thinking surely the Quarterly Meeting will not hesitate to do it. Exactly so it fared in the quarter, his friends feeling, "It will not do for Joseph to go, but we cannot say aught against it, but the Select Yearly Meeting certainly will."

However, he went with full credentials, and had much very remarkable service. He it was that, while visiting the drinking-houses in Bristol, had that memorable interview with G. Withy and his mother, in which he portrayed the future career of that son, for whose welfare she was so concerned. It is related that on a certain occasion the elder, who was then accompanying him, was much surprised and pained because Joseph delivered, almost word for word, the same discourse that he had done at another place the day before. However, though strongly tempted to do so, he concluded not to speak of it to Joseph, seeing he appeared easy and comfortable. But imagine his consternation when, next day's service was a rehash of the same. This was too much, and the Friend resolved that now he would take an opportunity with him.

Not wishing, however, to take him aside in the daytime, he concluded to wait until they had retired for the night. And even then, though sure that his friend was off the track, yet, feeling weak, he resolved to defer the painful duty till morning. The elder passed an uneasy, rest-less night, and was early awake, but seeing his companion sleeping so peacefully, he could not find it in his heart to awaken him. Still, concluding that, when he did awake, he would relieve his mind. Before this occurred, however, he was called down to see a man who had been at all three of the meetings, and who, finding the secrets of his heart laid open again and again, was now come as a weeping supplicant, desiring the Friend's aid towards the restoration of peace of mind, and so, with the conviction that his friend had been rightly led, the curtain lecture never came off.

On another occasion, the Friend at whose house he was staying excused himself for being obliged to leave home, by saying he was appointed on a committee by his Monthly Meeting, in a case of difficulty between some of their members. Joseph immediately said, "I will get ready to go with thee." The Friend, knowing J.— to be a weak man, did not wish his company, and said, "No; thou had better stay and visit with my wife. I will return as soon as practicable." But, as Joseph insisted upon going along, a horse was provided for him. They had not, however, gone far, before the horse became restive, and ended by throwing Joseph into a mud-puddle, at which his companion, inwardly rejoicing, said, "Now thou wilt have to go back. Thou cannot go on in this plight." "Oh, no," said J.—. "That was an effort of the devil to hinder my service. I shall not be turned aside by such means." So, on they went, and, through J.—'s instrumentality, a long existing difficulty, which had baffled the efforts of the Committee to reconcile, was amicably adjusted.

A worthy Friend gave me the following relation, showing how a beneficent Providence is pleased at times to work mysteriously for wise ends. A member of a well-known family in Philadelphia, who had a remarkable capacity for straightening out and settling intricate accounts, was met one day by a stranger, who said that a person had lately deceased whose affairs were in much disorder, and asked if he would not kindly attend to the settling of them, giving (I think) information where papers relating thereto might be found. The Friend excused himself as not wishing to engage in such a matter. But the stranger pressed it upon him, saying that it would be greatly to the detriment of the family if some competent person did not attend to it. As the Friend found the matter to rest upon his mind, he went, after a couple of days, to the place the stranger had indicated, where, to his surprise, he found funeral services in progress. What was his astonishment, upon entering, to find lying in the coffin the very person who had met with him two days before, and who had deceased at the very hour of his appearance. The supernatural nature of the circumstance induced the Friend to take the matter in hand, and thus a great benefit was conferred upon a worthy family.

A ministering Friend, while travelling in England, was asked by the host at whose house she was staying, how she had rested during the night. "She said, very well, only that she had been disturbed by a man entering the room, and being asked what kind of a man he appeared to be, she said she supposed he was a butler or some such employe. This increased her host's surprise, as she had no one acting in that capacity. She signifying that she should recognize the person who had entered, if seeing him again, she was at length shown portraits of some of the family ancestors, when, pointing to one, she said, "That was the man who came into my room." Then, intensely interested, she lost queried what he did. (It is to be noted that many old English houses are wainscoted, in imitation of paneling.) She said, "He went to a certain part of the room, and drew back a sliding panel." The man of the house said he knew nothing of there being any such thing there. Upon going, however, to the place she indicated, it was found to be even so, and a bundle of papers was drawn forth, placed there, doubtless, by the ancestor.

And here comes in the most remarkable part of the story, for a suit being at that very time pending involving the legal ownership of the estate, he had now evidence making good his title.

The following incident, illustrating the power of prejudice, and how difficult it is for even goodly people to become disabused, where once they have imbibed it, was given me by the late John Stokes, who received it from J. H. Ag's own mouth. That he, Joseph, had allowed himself to indulge unkindly feeling toward a woman Friend, who at times appeared by way of ministry, "I really thought," said J.—, "that she was not fit to preach." On awakening one morning, my mind was impressed that I ought to go to a somewhat distant meeting that day. As the matter seemed clear, he awoke his wife, who said, "Well, if there has to go, it is time for thee to get ready and for me to get thy breakfast for thee." Arriving at the place, Joseph soon found his mind brought under exercise, and apprehending the proper time had come for it, he had put forth his hands to the rail to rise to his feet, when a woman Friend began to speak, using the very words which were in his mind. Joseph said that, as he sat there, the matter opened before him, exactly as if he had been on his feet, and that word for word, as it arose in his mind, so she spake it forth. And when it closed with him, she sat down. He felt perfectly relieved and had not a word to say. But as he rode home, he was led to inquire why he should have been sent and have no vocal service. He said, "I was given to see that a prejudice I had had against this woman, and believed I was sent that I might see and feel for myself, and I was bound to acknowledge that it was the Gospel she preached."

This little incident, told me by a friend, I never saw in print; that J. H.—, going into a tavern to lodge, found his mind impressed with the belief that the landlord meditated mischief, and it arose with him to say, "I intend to hold a religious meeting to-morrow." "Oh, you are a preacher, are you?" Upon which the anxiety all went off. The inference is that a preacher would not be worth molesting.

A Few Remarks on the Game called "Nations."
I have felt concerned because some Friends' children, who I am persuaded would not indulge in playing "cards," do not object to joining in he game called "Nations." The rules of this game, I am told by some who understand the matter, are founded precisely on those of cards used in gambling, the only difference being in the terms employed; so that any one understanding "Nations," can with a little instruction play euchre.

It seems to me that there is great danger of some among our young people, more especially the boys, being tempted by unscrupulous companions to try their skill at "cards," when they find out they know how to play, through having "Nations" at their homes. It is the old story of the camel's nose being permitted to enter the nan's door.

"Abstain from all appearance of evil," is a text that contains much instruction where one is in doubt as to the lawfulness of any amusement. I believe the Enemy of souls is ever watching to lead us into sin through seemingly innocent means, pleading that we need not be so scrupulous in small matters. But oh, is it so better and wiser to be on the safe side, and deny ourselves some gratification than to try how near we can come to the line that separates the harmless from the hurtful—the edge of the precipice over which we may be carried before we are aware of our danger?

HAPPINESS IS THE CROWN OF VIRTUE.

THE FIRE BY THE SEA.

ALICE CARL.

There were seven fishers with nets in their hands,
And they walked and talked by the sea-side sands,
Yet sweet as the sweet dew-fall
The words they spake, though they spake so low,
Areat slow through the fog, their way;
And we know them, one and all—
Aye: know them and love them all.

The livelong night, till the moon went out,
In the drowing waters they beat about;
Beat slow through the fog, their way;
And the sails drooped down with wringing wet,
And no man drew but an empty net,
And now 'twas the break of the day—
The great glad break of the day.

"Cast your nets on the other side!"
"Twas Jesus speaking across the tide—
And they cast and were dragging hard;
But that disciple whom Jesus loved
Cried straightway out, for his heart was moved:
"Is it our risen Lord—
Our Master and our Lord!"

Then Simon, girding his fisher's coat,
Went over the nets and out the boat—
Aye: first of them all was he;
Repeating sore the deed, his way;
He feared no longer his heart to cast
Like an anchor into the sea—
Down deep in the hungry sea.

And the others, through the mists so dim,
In little ship came after him,
Dragging their nets through the tide;
And when they had gotten close to the land
They saw a fire of coals in the sand,
And, with arms of love so wide,
Jesus, the Crucified!

"Tis long, and long, and long ago,
Since the rosy lights began to flow
O'er the hills of Galilee;
And with eager eyes and lifted hands
The seven fishers saw on the sands
The fire of coals by the sea—
On the wet, wet sands by the sea.

'Tis long ago, yet faith in our souls
Is kindled just by that fire of coals
And a voice is a-fab'ricating the sea;
Where Peter, girding his fisher's coat,
Went over the net and out of the boat,
To answer, "Lov'st thou Me?"
Thrice over, "Lov'st thou Me?"

THE BLIND WEAVER.

A blind boy sowed beside the loom
And wove a fabric, strong and true,
Beneath his firm and steady touch
He made the busy shuttle go.
And if the teacher passed that way
And gave the colors, thread by thread;
But to the boy the pattern fair
Was all unseen—its hues were dead.

"How can you weave?" we, pitying, cried.
The blind boy smiled, "I do my best;
I make my fabric firm and strong,
And one who sees does all the rest."

O, happy thought! Beside life's loom
We blindly strive our best to do,
And he who marks the pattern out,
And holds the threads, will make it true,

Those who believe that beer-drinking is helpful rather than harmful ought to read what the insurance doctors are saying. At a convention here lately they discussed the matter seriously and scientifically, and they held that the habit is injurious and makes persons bad risks for insurance. Dr. Rogers, of the New York Life Insurance Co., said:

"Recently I had occasion to make some study of what happens among persons engaged in the manufacture of beer, defined generally as brewers. My cases included not only the workingmen engaged in breweries, but also the proprietors of breweries. It is a curious fact that the mortality among the proprietors is about as high as among the workmen, showing that they are all given to copious libations.

"Another curious fact is that the data that I have been able to secure indicates that Urtel's point, emphasized by Dr. Bernacki, that mortality is very high at advanced ages, is very well borne out. The mortality is strikingly low among brewers in early years. Up to forty or the reatons brewers seem to be about as good risks as pretty much any-body else. After forty the mortality rises very high, and I should say that at fifty-five or sixty years of age about three brewers may be expected to die where one average person dies.

It is already clear that beer is not a temperance drink. Now, according to the doctors, it saps the vital forces, and this is an extremely weighty indictment against it.—Late Paper.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting.

This body convenes in the Sixth Month in the old house at Mt. Laurel called Livesham. The building is large enough to accommodate the Quarterly Meeting with comfort. For many years after the separation of 1827, both bodies occupied the house, but the meeting of those called Hicksites became so small that they concluded to discontinue their meeting at that place, and a few years ago requested our Friends to take charge of the whole building. The number of our members has also much diminished. This has been the experience of many meetings near the city of Philadelphia, which have not the advantages of railroad facilities; while others located on railroads, as Haddonfield, Moorestown, Germantown and Media tend to increase in size at the expense of those less favorably situated. An evidence of the truth of this general proposition was manifested by the reception at the Quarterly Meeting of a request from some Friends residing at Merchantville for the establishment at that place of an indulged meeting. This was kindly received by the Quarterly Meeting, which appointed a joint committee of men and women Friends to meet with Friends at Merchantville, examine the situation of things there, and report their judgment to the next Quarterly Meeting. The committee subsequently met, divided itself into three parts, which are to attend meetings at Merchantville during the next three First-days and then meet for conference.

It is a pleasing circumstance that our members residing at that place are so much interested in the case as to be willing to make an effort to establish a meeting for their own benefit and that of their neighbors. The ultimate success of this movement will depend largely on the fervency of spirit of those interested in it. A meeting held after the manner of Friends cannot be expected to prosper unless there are a body of members who are livingly concerned to wait upon the Lord and seek communion with Him in spirit, and are willing to pass through exercise of spirit in seeking the Divine blessing. We sincerely hope this may prove to be the case in the present instance, and that a body of spiritual worshippers at Merchantville may increase in number and in spiritual weight.

The vocal exercises in the first meeting were opened with a petition to the Father of Mercies, that He would spread over the assembly and the hearts of those present, as a covering, a sense of his holy presence. This was in good

London Yearly Meeting.

Second-day morning, Fifth Mo. 24th (Joint Session).—This sitting considered the proposals laid before it by the joint Committee appointed to adapt the Meeting for Sufferings to the new situation produced by the admission of women. By way of preventing the increased membership making the meeting too large for an executive body, the committee proposed that instead of the Meeting for Sufferings being open to all members of Ministry and Oversight meetings, it should be open only to ministers and elders, ex officio, and to elected representatives also, to the number of sixty from London and Middlesex Quarterly Meeting and of fifteen from other Quarterly Meetings. After a long discussion the proposals were adopted; it being understood that any Friend specially interested in any subject could obtain admission, and that the present arrangements would be unchanged till after the Yearly Meeting of 1898.

A proposal came up from Yorkshire Quarterly Meeting to cease answering the Query as to how meetings are attended, and confine the written answers to the mere point of whether meetings had been held. It was stated that many in the Quarterly Meeting had wished to do away with answering altogether. Some Friends in the Yearly Meeting also took this line. The insufficiency and trifling value of the present answers were very generally felt, and contrasted with the valuable triennial reports. It was pointed out that the answers at present mix up statistics and moral responsibility, and that the spectacle of elderly Friends puzzling over the choice of words was not very edifying to the young. The result of a long discussion was to adopt the suggestion from Yorkshire.

Second-day afternoon (Joint Session).—The report of the Anti-Slavery Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings was read, reporting the emancipation of the Zanzibar and Pemba slaves, with limitations, by the Sultan of Zanzibar, and recommending the carrying out of an industrial mission on the island of Pemba, to be supported by subscription among Friends. It was regretted that the effect of the proclamation was not extended to Mombasa. The emancipation of slaves in the Niger Territory was welcomed, and continued support was asked for in the crusade against slavery as still existing in the heart of Africa and elsewhere.

H. S. Newman (called on by the Clerk), said that with one hundred and forty thousand slaves set at liberty, it was necessary that there should be some Christian church to stand by them, advance their education, and raise them up in industrial pursuits, so that when they had obtained their freedom they might be able to provide their own support and be independent to a considerable extent of their former masters. On the island of Pemba, where no Christian missionaries of any kind were established, there were fifty thousand negroes. He would refer to some of the steps which the English Government had taken towards doing away with the slave trade. In 1875 the Sultan Barghash was persuaded to issue a decree abolishing the slave trade, but nearly twenty years after, it was found that there was still a continual influx of colored people who had been stolen for slaves from the mainland and brought over to cultivate the clove plantations. In 1889 and 1890, other appeals were made by the English Government, and they persuaded the Sultan to adopt a decree abolishing all slave trade in the measure experienced. Several Friends spoke in the line of exhortation, to the comfort and help of the meeting. One revived the language of Paul when Divinely visited on his way to Damascus: "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do." This language ought to be the habitual frame of our spirits—a desire to know and to do the will of our Father in Heaven. The necessity of bearing the cross and the blessed effect of living in submission to Christ was spoken of and awakened desires in some to experience the purifying operations of that cleansing of the heart which the Lord alone can effect.

In the second meeting, the extracts from the minutes of our late Yearly Meeting were read, and properly disposed of.

Before the conclusion of the meeting a message was received from the women requesting that at the close of the meeting the shutters might be opened. This was acceded to, and we were favored with a communication from a Friend who had been exercised in spirit lest there should be introduced into our Quarterly Meeting a disposition to set aside some of the testimonies which our Society had upheld from the beginning, and which were closely connected with the doctrines we had been called upon to uphold. The language of the Psalmist was quoted, "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion, the city of the Great King." This is still applicable to the invisible and spiritual church, and a concern was expressed that our outward visible church might more and more become a branch of the invisible and spiritual one.

A Friend, in unison with the term of the language that had been expressed, quoted the language of that dignified elder, Jonathan Evans, "The cross, the operation of that power that humbles the creature in the dust, is the great object of the Enemy's hatred, at which he is ever aiming his shafts."

The meeting separated under a feeling that it had been an interesting and profitable occasion.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration.

The Third Lake Mohonk International Arbitration Conference was held at Lake Mohonk on the second, third and fourth of this (Sixth) month, with a large attendance of representative and influential men and women from widely separated localities and various walks of life. Lawyers, ministers of the Gospel, presidents and professors of colleges, military men, and others active in the busy affairs of life, all joining in hearty accord in promoting the reign of reason in the settlement of differences between nations, instead of war and force.

Ex-Senator George F. Edmunds of Vermont presided over the deliberations of the conference with dignity and great ability, and in an opening address he contrasted the hope of last year with the disappointment over the rejection of the Arbitration Treaty. But, he said, "there was no occasion for discouragement. Senates come and Senates go, and we shall have a Senate that will ratify a treaty representing the best thought and conscience of the nation. This is a government of public opinion, and it is for us to create a public opinion in behalf of international reason and justice which shall secure them."

There was much expression of disappointment over the rejection of the Anglo-American treaty by the Senate, yet as all great questions move slowly, it was thought there was no cause for discouragement, as the principle had been firmly established, and an encouraging sign was that seven international treaties had been entered into by different nations during the past year. Much stress was laid on the importance of rousing public sentiment and training the young, that we may have a higher patriotism, which shall recognize the identity of our true national interests with the interests of mankind. We must "consecrate the people to the cause of arbitration."

The following declaration of principles was unanimously adopted with great enthusiasm:

"The civilized world may well rejoice at the unprecedented progress of the cause of international arbitration during the last year.

"We deplore the temporary check to the cause by the failure of the Senate to ratify the proposed treaty with England; but we recall the majority of the Senate in its favor, large, though less than the necessary two-thirds, and we believe that while the small minority honestly opposed it, their reasons were not such as to command permanent support. The overwhelming majority of the country should only be stimulated by this temporary failure to more zealous activity, urging our Executive to renew the treaty, with such modifications, if any, as may be approved in the light of the recent study of the subject by the Senate. Our country should also make a similar treaty with France, Germany, Austria, Belgium and Switzerland, whose Parliaments have taken action in favor of a permanent system of arbitration between civilized nations, and with all other countries which may take similar action. We look forward hopefully to the creation in some form of an international court, always open for the settlement of differences which diplomacy may fail to adjust, to which court any nation may resort.

"The thanks of this conference are tendered to ex-President Cleveland, ex-Secretary Olney and Sir Julian Pauncefote for their eminent services to the cause of international arbitration, and to President McKinley and Secretary Sherman for their hearty support of the same great cause. The outburst of public approval of this treaty proves the growing power of Christian conscience. The pulpit, the press, colleges and associations of the bar, of trade and of labor, have given almost unanimous support in behalf of the cause."

Several hundred dollars was subscribed for the circulation of the literature of the Conference, and ten thousand copies of the proceedings of the Conference will be prepared immediately. Resolutions of thanks to Mr. Smiley for his hospitality were passed and responded to by him. They proposed to fight out the cause of peace on this mountain, he said, if it took a hundred years. Senator Edmunds, acknowledging the resolutions of thanks to himself, spoke warmly and confidently of the future, believing that a nearer time than many imagine would see the establishment of international reason and peace.

A telegram was sent by the Conference to Queen Victoria congratulating her on her jubilee, and expressing the hope that peace between her land and this may continue through all coming ages.

Thou! must hold communion with God or thy soul will die. Thou must walk with God or Satan will walk with thee. Thou must grow in grace or thou wilt lose it.

islands. It became illegal to sell or buy slaves or to transfer them except by inheritance. In the same year an agreement was made by the English Government with the Sultan that every child born after the beginning of 1899 should be absolutely free. He could hardly explain to that Meeting the effect of that arrangement on those two islands. From that date the Arabs did everything they could to discontinue the birth of children, and this led not only to a great deal of infanticide, but in a large variety of cruel and immoral ways to prevent the slaves from having children. During the last seven years comparatively few children had been born to the negroes on these islands. That was a history of the efforts of the English Government up to 1896. Then the Sultan died, the owner at that time of about thirty thousand slaves. There was a contest for a few days as to who should be Sultan, but the English Government proclaimed Hamoud-bi-Mahomed.

The English Government had been getting a firm hold of the island for many years, and no doubt there had been a great improvement of late years in the condition of the slaves. When the Consuls found that manifest cruelty had been committed, the slaves were released and the masters sometimes punished. The following incident would illustrate how deeply slavery was ingrained in the minds of the population dependently of Arab proprietorship. A woman came to the Consul to complain that an Arab had stolen her, and upon this being substantiated he was released and awarded twenty rupees, half of the fine inflicted on the Arab. A little later the Consul asked her what she was going to do with the money, and she at once replied, 'To buy a young slave!' The colored people had no principle themselves against slavery, though they would much prefer freedom for themselves.

Now, to a certain extent, they had the law at their back. If a slave wanted to be free, he could go to the Valia and claim his freedom. There was a strong opinion amongst the officials in the island that the people should be kept here. But very many of the slaves when they were set free said that though willing to stop and work for a fair wage on the plantations for while, they wanted to go home to the country whence they were stolen. The Government had no right to interfere with that very natural desire. But every fair inducement might be offered them to remain; and there was no doubt that where fair wages and good treatment were offered, many of them would stay. In one case eighty or eighty out of about one hundred and fifty accepted General Mathews' request to remain on the plantations, for a fair wage and a hut and garden to each. He himself, with Theodore Burr, had visited a great many Arab chiefs, who discussed the coming emancipation with them in a perfectly open manner. They declared that they would be perfectly willing to give half the harvest of cloves as payment to the men who gathered the harvest. He did not imagine that all the slaves would at once take up their freedom; this would probably take some years.

E. Wright Brooks said the Yearly Meeting had now to consider its duty at this remarkable juncture. By political changes a great number of slaves had come under our control—though not under our flag, which by the law of the land would have freed every one beneath it. It became necessary to stir the Government and make it uncomfortable for them; and now, though the shackles had not been struck from the slaves in the way we should have desired, the legal status of slavery had been abolished, and it became illegal to hold them. The knowledge of this did not appear to have fully reached all these poor people yet, but it would very soon do so. The people were in a condition of gross darkness, and we could only help them by going to them, by sending our representatives with the weight and the influence of the Society behind them, and its hands and its money beneath them.

The Clerk said it was quite clear that the meeting was prepared to accept the proposition. He read a minute accordingly.

The report of the Joint Peace Committee was read.

Thomas Hodgkin earnestly hoped that Friends would not be disappointed by the reception which had been given to the proposal for an Arbitration Treaty between England and America. It was one of those reverses which would probably in the end lead to a victory. Perhaps the result of the movement for arbitration between those two countries might be all the more solid and enduring because it was not in any way outrunning, but rather lagging behind, public opinion in the United States. Intelligent Americans had expressed to him their great regret at the prospect of that treaty falling to the ground.

Kufus M. Jones said that the great bulk of the people of the United States had been in favor of the Arbitration Treaty and spoke in favor of it. The petitions sent in in favor would have almost filled the Senate House. Almost all the intelligent sentiment of the United States was in favor of it. Those who labored so hard for the ratification of the Treaty saw its ultimate triumph only a little further removed.

Third day afternoon (Joint Session).—The first business was the consideration of the report of the Armenian Relief Committee.

Edmund Wright Brooks said that Friends who were present at the meeting last year when the matter took so strong a hold on the sympathies of Friends, would remember the strong appeal they had made to them on that occasion for the aid of the oppressed Armenians. They now saw in the report and the accounts that had been presented to them the results of that appeal. He desired to say with regard to what had appeared in the public prints that it had not exceeded, and that it would have been impossible for it to exceed the truth as to what had taken place. The report they had just heard said that the suffering and the misery were incalculable; and that was true. It had amounted very nearly to the destruction of an ancient Christian race, solely because they were like ourselves, professors of the Christian faith and followers of the Lord Jesus Christ. Could our Society have done otherwise than rise to the occasion with sympathy and liberal help. It was almost without precedent that an occasion of this kind should be so long drawn out, that during twelve months a Committee should have been asking the Society for money, and that the Society should almost daily have been handing money to it. For something like nine months scarcely a single post had been delivered that had not conveyed one or many contributions from the Society towards this fund. It might be thought that the time had come when this great effort should be relaxed or laid down; but one of the chief objects of his speaking that day was to say that this ought not to be so. Although during the summer the suffering would be less, yet when the severity of another winter season approached, the Committee earnestly hoped that the Society would not become weary of well-doing, but that it would again be ready to extend its practical sympathy and liberal help. From various parts of Asia—Turkey, and over the border into Persia, came most distressing accounts of the sufferings of the people. Large numbers of Armenians and Nestorians, whom the Turks classed together, were making their way over the border into Persia, and Dr. Cockran had written a letter giving most satisfactory accounts of their condition. There were what seemed to be satisfactory channels for their relief.

The Clerk read a minute in which attention was called to the continued and severe suffering in Armenia, and commending the matter to the renewed liberality of Friends and the care of the Meeting for Sufferings.

Items.

Meeting of the Indian Committee.—At the meeting of this body, held Sixth Month 15th, several subjects of an interesting nature were considered.

A Friend who had recently visited the school at Tunica, reported that it was going on well, and had its full complement of forty-five scholars, but there were eighty-five applications on the list waiting for admittance to the benefits of the training received at this Institution. If a separate school building was erected, an addition of about ten might be made to the number of scholars at a comparatively slight cost. This suggestion led to considerable discussion. Attention was called to the increase of expenditure which always accompanies enlargements of families or families, and we were reminded that while it was very practicable to build up a large school, yet it might be attended with a loss or diminution of that good influence we are now exerting. The final issue was the appointment of a committee of men and women Friends to examine carefully the subject and make report to a future meeting.

Under a feeling of religious concern, one of the women members of the Committee had drawn up a loving epistle to their Seneca sisters, containing good counsel, affectionately conveyed. It was an acceptable offering, and it was concluded to have it printed, signed by all the female members of the Committee, and distributed among the Seneca families.

The Seneca Oil Company, an association whose headquarters are at Salamanca, had leased the oil rights on about forty-five hundred acres of the northeastern part of the reservation, and had paid four thousand dollars, which was one of the stipulations of the lease, and this money had been divided among the Indians individually. Future payments will be in the nature of royalties and depend on the productiveness of the wells that may be opened.

Philadelphia Meeting for Sufferings.—At the meeting of this body, held Sixth Month 18th, among other business, was an application from Garden City Monthly Meeting, Kansas, forwarded by the Trustees of the Charles-on-estate, for aid in erecting a meeting-house. The Trustees favored granting an appropriation of five hundred dollars. The case had been before them several times, and much care had been taken to investigate the matter. It appeared that the prominent members of that meeting did not favor departures from the ancient practices of Friends, as to their manner of holding meetings for worship, and the Monthly Meeting had refused to sanction the pastoral system. The Meeting for Sufferings in all the great asked for.

Ethel B. Gilford was present as a member for the first time, having been appointed one of its representatives by Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, in place of our friend William U. Ditzler, deceased.

A committee appointed at a previous meeting to examine a work prepared by one of our members, entitled, 'Friends Disfranchising the Hebrons and Descendants of the Society of Friends,' reported that after having fully studied the work, and in recommending its publication. The meeting accepted their report, and a minute was made accepting the book from its author and referring it to the Book Committee for publication.

The meeting was brought under exercise by the information, that a bill legalizing betting on horse races had been introduced into the Legislature of Pennsylvania. The Committee to watch Legislative proceedings was requested to attend to the subject.

The United Presbyterian lately had these timely remarks upon "Money for Self, but None for God;" "The times are very hard. We hear it on every side. Business men tell us that sales are greatly reduced, that collections are more difficult than ever before, and that the outlook is very discouraging. At the same time the theatres are well patronized, the saloons are not lacking in customers, political parades go on as usual before the election, multitudes go on special trains to see or hear their candidates, the excursion trains to summer resorts were full, "Sunday" excursions are crowded. There is money in plenty to waste, but for good purposes it is difficult to find. There is something wrong. There is a wrong of which God takes note, and for which He will send retribution. God's providence is inexorable, and all his dues are collected in some way, but alas, for us in the day of collection!"

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Tariff Bill is making steady progress in the Senate, and it is believed, will pass on a Fifth-day next week.

The State Department has practically completed its reply to the Japanese protest against the Hawaiian annexation treaty, but has not yet delivered it. The reply is understood to be dignified in tone, a strong legal defence of our position, which, without in any sense abating our claims, still does not differ from support them by much citation of precedent and international law.

During the American Revolution an English magazine published an estimate of the future population of the North American colonies. Placing the population then at 2,000,000, and assuming that it would double itself every twenty years, the writer then estimated that in 1890 the number would have increased to 64,000,000. This may be taken as a most remarkable prediction, inasmuch as the census of 1890 fixes the total population at 62,222,250.

The steam-ship Glendole, one of the finest on the Chinese coast, arrived at San Francisco last week with 4,700 tons of tea, of which 2,700 will be sent overland. This is the largest consignment of tea which has been received there for many years.

A great reservoir which is about to be built in the Nashua River Basin to supply Boston and its suburbs with water will entail the practical obliteration of the city of Nashua, which is the only one of the area proposed to be used for reservoir purposes. West Boston is a factory town, giving employment to several hundreds of operatives in various cotton mills.

The famous steer Jumbo, of Wichita, Kan., which had attained the weight of 5,000 pounds, was killed the other day and will be mounted for exhibition purposes.

Fighting the high water during the recent flood cost the city of New Orleans $11,000,000, which was much less than was expected.

Deaths in this city last week were 428, being 34 more than the previous week, and 70 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 209 were males and 222 females; 34 died of pneumonia; 33 of consumption; 33 of heart disease; 32 of diphtheria; 29 of marasmus; 25 of convulsions; 22 of cholera infantum; 15 of old age; 15 of cancer; 14 of apoplexy; 11 of inflammation of the brain; 11 of scarlet fever; 10 of influenza; 10 of nephritis; 9 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels, and 9 of infection.

FOREIGN.—The Jubilee procession in London on the 22nd ult. was practically in three sections, colonial, military and royal. The Queen was in a landau drawn by eight cream colored horses, and she had an escort of thirty British and foreign princes. She received a ovation on her arrival. The Queen and her escort continued to participate in the several events connected with the Jubilee to which she had been assigned. It is stated that henceforth for whatever span of life may be left to her, Queen Victoria will confine herself to such work for the state as can be done at Windsor, Balmoral or Osborne. All those official functions, such as the celebration of the opening of new halls, hospitals and the like, which bring the sovereign face to face with the people, will now be relegated to the Prince and Princess of Wales.

When Victoria was crowned Queen of England, over 20,000 gallons of wine were consumed by the people of London at the coronation festivities. Now, at the celebration of the Jubilee, the Queen's committee in charge of the arrangements has "courteously declined to accept five pipes of port wine offered by wine merchants."

The London Graphic's Washington correspondent represents President McKinley as saying on the Cuban question, "I anticipate no departure from the policy of non-interference. We have no reason to interfere in a quarrel between Spain and her colonies. Our interests are not sufficiently jeopardized to warrant other than diplomatic interference."

The Russian turret ironclad Gangot ran upon a reef near Transud on the 25th ult., during a storm, and sank almost immediately. The crew is reported saved.

The Hungarian crop prospects are very unpromising. The yield of wheat and rye will be much below the average.

The town of Kolomea, in Galicia, has been flooded by the rising of the river Pruth. A bridge was swept away while a train was crossing it, and it is believed that many persons were drowned.

It is reported that the Dhanis expedition to the headwaters of the Nile has been massacred. Baron Dhanis last year enlisted 6,000 men in the Congo Free State to take part in a secret expedition. It was the general impression that this force was intended to act in conjunction with the Anglo-Egyptian expedition up the Nile and take the Mahdists between two fires and eventually complete the reconquest of the Soudan.

Heavy rains are falling in the interior of Cuba.

Tourists are beginning to talk of the Arctic regions as a summer resort. One who penetrated Spitzbergen last year says that the temperature on a clear day in Seventh Month, is about like that of an English spring, but more frequently the mid-summer weather is cold and winter clothing including park jackets, is worn with fur. The interior of Spitzbergen, though but little explored, is to be brought within ten days of London.

It is stated that there are 1,000,000 blind people in the world, or one to every 1500 inhabitants. Latest reports show 23,000 blind persons in England, or 870 for each million in population. Russia and Egypt are the countries where the blind constitute the largest proportion, in Russia on account of the lack of experienced medical attention, and in Egypt because of ophthalmia due to irritation caused by movement of the sand by the wind. There are nearly 200,000 blind persons in European Russia, the larger number being in Finland and the northern provinces. This is ascribed to the flat country and imperfect ventilation in huts and the peasantry. Though more than half of the blind population of Europe is found in Russia, there are only twenty-five asylums for the blind in the Empire, one-tenth of the total number in Europe.

Twenty-six miners have been killed by a fall of rock in the Labor Mines, in the province of Atacama, Chile.

DIED, Fourth Month 26th, 1897, MARY K. JACKSON in the thirty-second year of her age; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia for the Northern District. This dear young Friend had no birthright in our religious Society, but was convinced of its principles while attending a school under the direction of Friends; and being obedient to the Divine manifestation was made willing to bow her neck to the yoke of Him, who said, "Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me;" and so we believe found it rest which He promised, as was evident by the calmness with which she received the intimation that her life was nearly run, although she but looked toward recovery.

"Thy kind note came to hand this morning, and the drafts of an editorial, which I have looked over, and design to keep it a little longer. I cordially approve of the preparation of an editorial on the subject. It is of great importance that it be very carefully prepared. Our testimony of plainness of dress and habits and the plain language must be read to rest upon their original foundation, connected with the work of true spiritual religion, as distinguished from an intellectual Christianity only. It is a striking fact, that I believe it is safe to state that all of the members of our Society who have ever attained to true religious experience, have been led to take up the cross of Christ, and to follow his guidance into these very things. They have known what it is to become as clay in the hands of the potter, and to experience the turning and overturning of the Divine hand upon them. And they have been made, in this way, vessels of honor, fitted and prepared for the Master's use. And He has dispensed upon such, gifts for service which cannot be obtained in any other way.

"I also believe it to be true that, if faithfulness and obedience had not kept pace with the knowledge of the Divine will immediately made manifest, that the work, the vessel, would have been marred upon the wheel, and would never have been fitted for the Master's use, but thrown aside. Whatever there is without this preparation of heart by the Spirit, is of the flesh and of the will of man, and not in the will of God. I have no doubt it is safe to assert all this in humble confidence and holy certainty.

"The revelation of Christ to every soul by the Father is the rock and foundation upon which Christ will build his Church. This seems to me to cover the whole ground. All the schools and colleges will never help it forward in the least. It comes not that way. I long that this Truth could be established and more and more prevail, that this pure and saving knowledge of God and of Christ might prevail and cover the earth, as the waters cover the sea. This is that knowledge of God and of Christ which is life eternal.

"I had a letter from Debbie Cope this morning, giving a report of dear Morris Cope's condition, which appears to be considered as critical. He seems to be in a sweet state of mind. I love him dearly.

"I enclose a check for ten dollars, as a little contribution for our beloved friend, D. H. I hope a sum of twenty dollars at least will be raised and sent. I am very desirous that his latter days may be rendered comfortable. It does not take much money to help such, whose habits are so simple."

PLAINFIELD, Seventh Month 30th, 1890.

"Thy kind note received, inclosing one from C. H., which I have read with much comfort. I like the tone of it very much. I enclose my check for twenty-five dollars, which I shall be glad for thee to send to him, with a message of my love and sympathy. It is a trying accident, as well as being attended with expense of medical and other care, which I feel glad to help out a little."

[The above refers to a Friend who had met with a serious accident. I. E. — was a liberal man, and often sent me checks for the relief of suffering cases. Indeed, I do not remember ever applying to him in vain.]

"William Penn, writing to Dr. Tillotson, says, 'There are two things I abhor in religion. One is submission upon authority, without conviction.' I write from memory. This was a kind of key-note, and ran through the whole.

"I have long been enamored with this view of things. It is this that makes strong characters. It was also a saying of William Penn, 'If Truth cannot prevail with her own weapons, all others will fail her.' Keeping upon such ground, we are safe, I believe, and there is no other, indeed, worth striving for. Let us, then, dear friend, be encouraged and keep to our strong-holds.

"After reading thy editorial in connection with 'Water Baptism,' I feel as if I would encourage thee to write another, not upon the meaning, one way or another, of a 'Greek word,' which may help to show the kind of baptism that was practised in early days. But this, its incongruity with a spiritual dispensation, and that it was to decrease and cease—as belonging to a typical and shadowy time which was to be done away in Christ, and that it is no Gospel ordinance, was never commanded by Christ; although, for a time, practised in condescension. But practice is not institution.

"W. D. H. has some excellent remarks on this subject. I venture to suggest this subject for thy consideration. I think it might be profitable. I think the report of a committee of the Yearly Meeting previous—the one before 1882 is my impression, but the year of its appointments I do not recall. I was a member of it, and I remember the drift of the paragraph I referred to well. I think it would help to show the connection, the absolute necessity of a due preparation of the heart before the reception of spiritual gifts. I desire not to burden thee. I like thy remarks as to dear Morris Cope, who is a noble character, a Christian nobleman, made of sterling stuff. Such men are like the 'stars in their courses,' as mentioned by D. Borah."

PLAINFIELD, Seventh Month 26th, 1890.

"I have no doubt it is the new rock of religion, whose foundation is in the heart, that has led to the comfortable dismissal of the doctrine of the true cross of Christ, which the apostle declared was what he had learned to glory in, by which he was crucified unto the world, and which brings forth the new creature; not by a conformity outwardly wrought by inclination or imitation, but inwardly in the course of obedience to Divine requiring through the Holy Spirit. It is in this way ONLY, and not by any outward prescription what-ever, that the blessed change is wrought in a man, and he brings forth the fruits of the Spirit, which are by Jesus Christ to the praise and glory of God. The members of our Society must be brought back to this foundation for their religion, and for all their religious activities, before the 'shout of a king' will ever be heard again in our camp as in days that I have known. It is not in man to give himself a concern to promote the kingdom of Christ on earth, and to labor for the good of others in his own time and will.

"There is, I believe, a sad departure in this respect from our proper foundation. It has become popular to be active in works by which a show of zeal is made, but it is not of the Lord. Those who feel this and see it, cannot be other than mourners in Zion, and their hearts long upon the willows. I feel sure this must be the case with many at the present day everywhere.

"By the rivers of Babylon there we sat down; yea, we wept when we remembered Zion." I encourage the hope that thou will be able to 'read me,' as the words are sometimes used, for I have penned these lines in a feeling of tenderness and brokenness of spirit.

"It is the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus that sets free from the law of sin and of death. As the members of our Society stand on this foundation, no weapon formed against them can prosper. Nothing can hurt or destroy in this Holy Mountain, and those who are truly united in this bond will be one another's happiness and joy in the Lord."

CAMDEN, Tenth Month 4th, 1890.

"I left home on Fourth-day evening, intending to goto Christians on Contesville, to attend the funeral of Walker Moore, but the way did not seem quite open to carry it out, and I attended Fallowfield Meeting, and returned to Contesville to dine. After that was over we drove—A. Gibbons and I—to London Grove, and sat about two hours with dear Morris Cope. He was sitting up in his chair, seemed feeble and worn, and was in pain with rheumatism in his arms. He thought the damp weather was the cause of it. He was quietly calm and cheerful, and at times evinced that he was still Morris Cope by some characteristic remarks. We did not observe any aberration of mind, nor much deficit of memory. He was pleased to say, when we took leave, that our company had made him feel better. It is both instructive and humbling to observe the fading character of all human qualifications, and what the finest of men are soon reduced to. It would be very encouraging to see some in younger life giving promise of coming up in strength of character and good judgment. It is the Lord that must confer these gifts, for every good gift and every perfect gift is of and from Him. In whom and as many as are found in Him, the Father is well pleased. The will and wisdom of men must be laid in the dust, that the Lord alone may be exalted. How sweet and savory are the memoranda of dear Abigail Hutchinson. They are instructive and edifying.

FOR "THE FRIEND,"

Some Rarely Observed Bird Visitors and Bird Habits in Burlington County, N. J.

[The paper from which the following is extracted was prepared and read before the Moorestown Natural History Society, by Thomas J. Beans, who, while closely occupied with his duties as a tiller of the soil, has throughout his life been an interested observer of nature.—W. E.]

It is the purpose this evening to speak only of a few of the rarer bird visitors, and of a few rarely noted habits, or at least rarely recorded incidents in bird life within our county.

In the year 1858 the Delaware tribe of Indians were located on the very choicest lands in Kansas, under their chief, "Tanganoxie," with whom I dined in that year. But though larger game was more plentiful among the original forests, it is said to be true that singing birds are comparatively scarce in such wild regions. St. Pierre, of France, writes: "It is very remarkable that all over the globe they discover an instinct that attracts them to the habitations of men. If there be a single bird in the forest, all the singing birds of the vicinity come and settle around it. Nay, they are not to be found except in places which are inhabited. I have travelled more than six hundred leagues through the forests of Russia, but never met with small birds except in the neighborhood of villages. When we perceived the sparrows fluttering about, we concluded we must be near some inhabited place. In this we were never once deceived."

As Burlington County has its ocean shore front, its pine barrens, its tide water borders, and its inland with clear streams, each district furnishing congenial homes for the characteristic modes of differing species of birds, it follows that we are likely to have a greater number as well as a greater variety of birds, than similar areas with more uniformity of surface and soil.

Among the rare birds I have met with in our county was one shot by a boy about two miles from Moorestown, and brought to me for identification by my friend, the late Dr. S. C. Thornton. It was an entire stranger. Its length was ten inches; the whole head, neck and breast glossy black, the rest of the plumage russet brown, a white spot at the base of primaries; tail, black with white tip; abdomen, white; bill and legs, yellow. Reference to descriptions in American ornithology furnished no clue to its identity. But after a long search among the collections of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, I found it belonged to the Starling family, was a specimen of Aeridotheres tristis, Syn.

Gracula—common name, "Myna." Throughout India and Burmah it is the commonest of country birds, affects towns, villages and men's habitations, rather than jungles, roosts in particular trees, and keeps up noisy, chattering concert. At sunrise disperses in groups of three or four to fields, follows cattle, picking up disturbed grasshoppers, grain or fruit. A few stay about houses watching for fragments of cooked rice; walks nodding his head; flight strong and direct. Has a great variety of notes, some pleasing and musical, others harsh; is a household bird; builds in nooks, under eaves or in pots hung out by the natives; nests four or five eggs and several broods a year. It is frequently caged and domesticated, following master as a dog. It is a good imitator and soon learns words and sentences. It was taken to Mauritius from India to destroy grasshoppers and is there naturalized. It is most likely that the specimen found by Dr. Thornton escaped from a cage, as I have not been able to learn of any being imported for introduction.

Between the years 1859 and 1863 I sent several ducks to Dr. Brown and Mr. White for the Burlington County Lyceum of Natural History collection. Among them was a "ruddy duck," which was killed by me when crossing the Delaware River at mouth of Raucocas in a skiff, during a wild storm, at some personal risk. Its mate I did not get. It was the only specimen I saw there during a six year's residence. It is met with along the shore, and we read also along inland rivers. Its red plumage gives it a unique and attractive appearance.

Adjacent to my residence at junction of Delaware and Raucocas Rivers was a marsh, that at high water was covered to within thirty yards of the house, and that at low water was exposed for two or three hundred yards. This, with large contiguous areas, was in season covered with a rank growth of aquatic plants, and was a favorite haunt and feeding ground of aquatic birds. The location and environment of this home gave opportunity for learning something of the relation of man to migratory wild fowl, especially the Mallard duck. "We kept there a flock of domestic ducks, selecting those whose plumage resembled that of the Mallard and the Dusky duck. When wild ducks were migrating southward in autumn, individuals and sometimes several, but never flocks, would feed and associate with our domestic ducks, sit on shore with them during the day and frequently pass by the house back to the barn, and there spend the night with them. Some would allow the family to pass by without showing fear; others would rise, but alight again when they found their companions did not accompany them. This would be a frequent occurrence during autumn, but never in the spring when their movement was northward. The conjecture was that the autumn familiars were young birds, who in their flight from their birthplaces in the far north wilderness had never encountered or learned to fear the form and face of man. But in their migrations and winter residence in the South, abundant opportunity would be given to make man's acquaintance to those passing northward in the spring. Further confirmation of this view was found in the fact that many of the confiding autumn visitors were not fully grown although fully plumaged. Arguing that fear of man is acquired, not instinctive.

While residing at above spoken of home, we had in season numerous but rarely visible neighbors, the Rail Birds. Their favorite food is the delicious grain of the wild rice or reed, the Zi- zania aquatica, gathering the harvest after it has fallen from the plant to the ground, and not, as does the reed bird, from the stalk. When the tide is out they feed and walk among the dense matted growth where we can scarcely force our hand, perhaps in hundreds, and we may walk by or through their residence and not suspect their presence. When the tide rises or falls, they keep at its surface, clinging to the foliage. But even then they rarely reveal themselves by flight, save where men in boats passing near compel exposure. This habit of concealment and reluctant flight is well known, as also that there are several waves of migratory movement during the autumn. But little mention is made of their rising so freely in the evening or at night. Flushed during the day, they fly slowly, with pendant legs, and alight soon. Yet this hesitating and brief flight in day time is not from incapacity for long and bolder adventure on wing, but because it is its purpose not to rise at all in the day time, to secure safety by hiding and running through the matted reeds, for which its color and conformation of body is so well adapted. Yet I have seen them in emergency during high winds make flight as wild and well sustained as the weird English snipe. They have been known to alight upon vessels one hundred miles from land. The late John Krier told me he had frequently heard their voices high in the air as they moved over the city in their migratory flight. They show most intelligent discrimination in adapting their conduct to the requirements of successful avoidance of their enemies. The marsh spoken of above was lowest at its southern extremity, one-half mile below our home, and boats in quest of rail birds would begin there and work up as tide allowed. As this occurred day after day the rail birds seemed to learn the significance of the reports of guns, for some would rise, hundreds of yards from the advancing boats, and fly to shelter of shrubbery near the house and adjacent thickets, thus affording an opportunity for observation, to a motionless critic. Their peculiarities of attitude and movement and concealment could be carefully studied. Their habit of concealment by diving and taking position beneath the water, with bill above the surface, alongside of a plant, is well known. But I was permitted to see one of their exploits that I have never read of or heard reported by others.

About the year 1860 I saw a rail bird among some docks which grew along the river's edge, outside of the reed limit. It was a quiet day, the water clear and about two or three feet deep. I walked out to it, but when I came near I saw it dive and swim readily through the water six or eight inches below the surface, using its wings for propelling, but of course with much more restraint and less extension than in flying. The water was so clear and calm, the conditions for observation so favorable, and the revelation so unique, that I followed leisurely and critically for a long time. If I passed it would rise near enough to the surface to lift its bill above it, by the side of a concealing dock, to breathe. At my approach, it would start again to swim beneath the surface, as unhesitatingly and skillfully as though it were not an emergency expedient, or an acquisition, but came of heredity. But there is danger that a single incident may indicate an individual, not a class act. There is, no doubt, distinct individuality throughout all animate nature.

These specimens of American Crossbill (Loxia curvirostris), I secured when feeding among the pine cones in a grove near the mouth of Rancoas, in the year 1865. They mainly reside farther north, and are seen most frequently during severe winters, in our county. They are not conspicuous in voice, manner or plumage, and as you see, can only feed on seed of pine cones, readily. They may be distinguished by their quite peculiar note when feeding or flying across open spaces, or by the flutter of the rudders severed by the feeding birds from the seeds pried out from the pine cones. Regarding its peculiar bill conformation, Wilson, the great ornithologist, writes: "Its deviation from the common form, instead of being a defect or monstrosity, is a striking proof of the wisdom, and kind, superintending care of the Great Creator."

Another Crossbill, the White-winged (Loxia Lincolntera), is somewhat smaller and more rare. Wither Stone and his compeers of the Delaware Valley Ornithological Club, in their valuable "Birds of Eastern Pennsylvania and New Jersey," record of this bird: "One was observed February 2nd, 1884, at Wynewood, Pa. In bill formation they are unique among our American birds and in northern Europe. We have all heard the mythical story that its bill was distorted and its plumage ensanguined in efforts to remove the cruel nails that fastened our Saviour to the cross, and that the family has been honored with the perpetuated evidence of its ancestral sympathy."

The Mocking Bird (Mimus Polyglottus), is, Mr. Stone says, a very rare summer resident, and mentions the breeding of a pair near Englewood, N. J., in 1884, and one secured by himself at Cape May on Aug. 27th, 1891. I heard of a pair near Hainesport, in our county, many years ago, and there must have been something very noticeable in their personality, for their visit is a well preserved traditional event. During a residence of thirty-eight years in Burlington County I have heard of or seen but one pair, and these bred near us about the year 1869. They arrived in the night and attracted much attention by loud, constant and vivacious song, as they moved from tree to tree, and frequently alighted on the buildings. Its imitations of other birds were nearly perfect, and were often interjected when its own song was in mid-career without breaking the swift current of melody. This unusual outburst of vocalization, so elate and jubilant, startled poultry and stilled the songs of the birds whose homes were near us. This continued for several days, so that while the novelty and brilliancy of the incessant song attracted our admiration and wonder, we at length came to wish for a change to the more quiet and sweeter music of our resident birds, whose concerted harmony without rivalry was more enduringly agreeable than the rapturous solos of this opera singer among birds, conscious of his exceeding superiority and seeming to seek recognition and applause, and permit no rival near the throne.

But this is not said in contravention of his supreme merit as a songster among American birds. The ecstatic outburst of music that announced the arrival of our mocking bird so attracted our attention that employment and conversation gave place to breathless wonder and admiration. Every modulation of voice seemed possible to him, from mellow, flute like tones to those bold, strong and exhilarant, while interspersed were imitations that exceeded the originals in effect, because following and preceding others so suddenly variant, and all the while, he himself, elastic and winged, was never at rest, but tossed by ecstasy with such an abandon of his volcan, that there was as much of vivacity in his movements as in his song. The nightingale of America, some call him.

On our warm soils with water and swamps adjacent, the Song Thrush (Harpopygus rufus), finds a favorite haunt. Our home is about one-quarter of a mile from the Ramocas, and is surrounded by trees. The lane and roadsides are bordered by them, many of which are tall. Though the Song Thrush nests on the ground and spends most of his time near it, it is when perched on the topmost boughs of the tall trees that the thrushes in early spring and during the mating season, in numbers, treat us to their sweetest minstrelsy. However many there may be, their notes and merit are distinctly individual. We often recognize birds whose vocalization is of surpassing excellence. We had never been favored with more entrancing bird-music than during the season in which the mocking bird above spoken of visited us, and among them all was one, we thought prominent in arbor, and sweetness of tone, and in exquisite modulation.

As we have already said, for several days the mocking bird, the glorious singer, had the stage all to himself, his energetic and various melody occupying the air, as if our own sweet bird choir had consented to be mere listeners. But there came a morning that exceeded all in interest. Two of the tallest trees not far from the house are on either side of the lane. On the topmost bough of one was the mocking bird. On the other, the song thrush perched at even height, not more than fifty feet away, evidently to challenge for the supremacy he had so long held, and that had so audaciously been usurped by another. Never was rivalry and effort to excel more manifest. The mocking bird did not change position, as his usage was, nor did he introduce imitations of songs as other birds, but with prudent husbandry of all his resources seemed to concentrate every faculty and endowment in a display of the utmost reach of his native power of song—of his own song. There was in the thrush's voice something of gravity, a business like earnestness, a tone of anxiety, and it was vibrant with emotion. It was especially harmonious, even when it rose to its highest pitch, and sometimes would fall in cadence by gradations as imperceptible as those of the closing light of day, while its lower notes were sweet beyond all compare, bringing to mind the "Prisoner of Chillon," word, "The sweetest song ear ever heard." But the stranger's effort, confident, clear, various and thrilling, was a wild torrent of music, that overrode and overwhelmed the sweet stream of melody of the thrush, and he flew away and came back no more.

Wilson, writing in 1808 of the great numbers of mocking birds then throughout the South, has this, "but on the second of March, in the neighborhood of Savannah, numbers of them are heard on every hand, vying in song with each other, and with the brown thrush, making whole woods vocal with their melody." The pair of mocking birds near by nested in a cedar tree, but they were robbed of their young, four in number. They reared another family of four, and these shared the same sad fate. Soon after this the parent birds disappeared, and I have not seen or heard of any in a state of nature in Burlington County, since. The young birds taken from the nest were caged and sold, but none that I traced were good singers—did not inherit the parents' genius.

The time of year is now at hand, when many are arranging to leave their business and domestic duties for a few days or weeks, and stopping out of the daily routine of life, are preparing to seek in the country or at the seaside, a change of atmosphere and surroundings. To many, who are closely engaged in life's duties throughout the year, the summer outing is a pleasant anticipation, meaning to them a relaxation from the daily cares of life and a recuperation to body and mind, that is certainly laudable and often very expedient. But with these changed conditions come other responsibilities, that we must not overlook, and the concern of the writer is, that those of us who have liberty and opportunity to indulge in change of scenery and association may be found honestly endeavoring to let our light so shine before men, that the honor and glory may rebound to Him whom we profess to serve. I apprehend that it is not difficult for some who are concerned to lead consistent lives, to adopt the distinguishing peculiarities of our beloved Society, when surrounded by the strengthening influence of home training and kindred spirits; but oftentimes when entirely surrounded by strangers, who, we may be led to believe, know nothing of our testimonies and principles, and who, we may also think, would not understand or appreciate them, how the tempter does come in and endeavor to persuade us that in this instance at least a passive stand will answer, that a clear and decided stand will be more appropriate at some other time. How he will try to induce us to frame our language in such a way that while we do not openly violate our testimony to plainness of speech, yet our conversation is such that it does not proclaim clearly and unmistakably that we are Friends. How he will lead us to believe (if we listen to his persuasive reasoning) that this, or that distinguishing part of our dress may be laid aside while amongst these strangers, for they do not know us, and cannot miss that to which they have not been accustomed. How assiduously he will work to make us believe that this or that or some other testimony, however small, is not necessary here, because it would probably be misunderstood and our motives misjudged thereby. Beloved Friends, if we listen to this line of reasoning and yield compliance thereto, are we not hiding the lighted candle as under a bushel? are we not darkening the spiritual eye and dimming its lustre? and "if the light that is in us be darkness, how great is that darkness." Let us "stand fast in the liberty where-with Christ hath made us free, and be not again entangled with the yoke of bondage." Many times when we have little reason to think so, we are being closely watched by the critical eye of the worldly-minded, who are scrutinizing our every action to see if it comports with the profession we make, and if through unwatchfulness or unfaithfulness, we are the cause of stumbling any of these, how much greater is our responsibility.

And if we desire a measure of respect and esteem from those with whom we mingle, will they not honor us far more, if we are conscientiously concerned to openly profess and stand by our convictions as to right or wrong, and even should our associates disagree with our views, will they not respect us the more for courteously declining to participate in those things which we cannot conscientiously endorse, especially if we state our reasons so declining? And will they not be apt to think lightly of a religious profession, that will admit of taking up or laying down as best suits our convenience? So my dear Friends, and especially you of my own age, towards whom my heart frequently goes out in tender sympathy, may it be our righteous concern to stand firmly for our convictions, and not endeavor to shun the cross, in the vain hope that by so doing we shall enjoy ourselves the more; but may we often that the returning day, seek that help and power, which will enable us, both at home and abroad, to live to his honor and glory; that strength which will enable us to take up the cross to our own wills and inclinations, and which alone can bring us into true happiness. May we remember that we are members of a religious Society that lifts up a very high standard before the world, and that through an inconsistency on our part as individuals, a shade of discredit is frequently reflected on the collective body.

So, whilst we are endeavoring to build up the body and the mind, enjoying the pleasure of a vacation, let us not be unmindful of our souls' needs, and if we feel an uneasiness or a secret doubt in regard to anything, which, in the eyes of others may be entirely lawful, let us be willing to give our conscience the advantage of the doubt, believing that the Lord knoweth the conflicts of each heart and that for every sacrifice we lay on his altar, He will repay us with an abundant measure of that peace and satisfaction, which the world knows nothing of, and which it can neither give nor take away.

Letter from Switzerland.

PREs NEUFCHATEL, 49 Corcelles.

Sixth Month 20th, 1897.

I have brought my writing tablet up into the forest just above the village in order to write to you. The "bise" or east wind is blowing from across the lake, bringing with it freshness and clear weather as well as the delicious odor of the pines. I have spread a shawl on the green grass under the trees, below are the vineyards interspersed with villages and then comes the lake, both ends lost in the distance with the Alps beyond. No sound reaches me but the singing of the birds—the murmur of the wind among the pine branches and the occasional sound of some workmen in the fields around. Everything that one sees or hears seems the very personification of peace, contentment and prosperity. The lake this morning is a most exquisite light green blue, so restful to the eye, and the mountains that I see off to the right between the tree trunks, are dark and pine covered. The Canton of Neuchâtel belonged formerly to France—after the fall of Napoleon it went over into the hands of the Prussians, and finally the middle of the century they joined the Swiss republic. Even the poorest peasant speaks a correct French—there is no "patois" here as among the peasants of France. The accent of the younger generations, who are all excellently educated, is not very different from that of Paris, though one hears a decided difference among some of the older people. At Geneva the accent is not quite so good as here and elsewhere in Switzerland one hears for the most part a very decided mixture of accent and languages, especially among the common people. Wherever one goes all public announcements are made in the three languages—French, German and Italian, for instance on the postal cards one sees always "Carte postale, Post karte, Carlolina postale," and in the cars the rules are printed in three columns, side by side in the three languages. At Berne all addresses are also given in French, German and Italian.

I find this part of Switzerland especially delightful because it is out of the direct line of travel and being less magnificent, attracts much smaller throngs.

We find prices everywhere very reasonable, much more so than at Geneva, especially when it comes to little articles sold as souvenirs, the wood-carvings, etc. Neuchâtel is quite a little city and has a beautiful old castle, that is the old ramparts completely overgrown with ivy, are fascinating, but the castle itself is now used for "hotel de ville" or city hall. The city has also beautiful promenades along the lake, and no end of charming old streets and towers and fountains that date many centuries back. The other evening we walked over and back; it was too hot to go during the day so we waited until after "gouter" (which is the name for the light evening meal). It is a most beautiful walk of about an hour, with lovely views and quaint old walls along the road on every hand, in fact these walls are quite a feature of the landscape. There are no fences but walls everywhere separating the vineyards and on either side of the roads or paths leading from one place to another. They all seem already to have stood for many centuries, and will certainly last many more. They are built as firmly as the rocks themselves, and being covered with lichens and ferns and little plants of various kinds, are very artistic. There is one narrow path that descends very abruptly from Cormandrecche, the little village joining Corcelles (you must know the villages are scattered over these mountain sides like flowers in a meadow, where one comes to another "clocher" the tower of a church having bells, one knows oneself to be in another town), between high walls that suddenly descend under the immense gateway of an old chateau, and you find yourself on emerging on the other side to be in Auvener, another delightful little village on the border of the lake.

We are quite favored with means of transportation here. The station at Corcelles is on a line that ascends very rapidly, crossing the Jura mountains and coming into France far to the north of the eastern boundary of Switzerland. The station at Auvener is a little farther down the slope and there join the two main lines coming into Neuchâtel, the one direct from Paris and the other from Lausanne and Geneva. Besides this, at the foot of the mountain, running along the boarder of the lake, is another railroad which serves all the little villages on the peninsula that juts out into the lake a little way below us. Then there is a little steamboat that makes the tour of the lake.

Yesterday we visited a most beautiful waterfall, "les chutes de la Doubs" (pronounced doo), a little river forming part of the boundary between France and Switzerland. We left the little station Corcelles at half past eleven in the morning, following the steep grade into "le val de Ruz." The valley of which I spoke once before as having twenty-two villages in it, then plunged into the mountains on the other side of the valley and came out in about fifteen minutes at the Chaux-de-fonds, a little city where the greater part of the watches and clocks sold in Switzerland are made. We had to change cars a little farther on, taking then a narrow gauge road to a village called Berretts, high up on the mountain on the Swiss side of the Doubs. Here we descended a winding road leading to the board of the river, or rather lake; for a distance of several miles there is a deep wide basin enclosed by high rocky walls where the water is placid as in a lake. We had been told we were to take a boat here, but I thought only of course of a conventional steamer; imagine my delight when I found we were to be taken in a quaint old row boat up to the falls. We were five in company and the boat large enough to hold ten or more was most awkwardly made, at least not after the models of those contrived for speed, but no matter, it was all the better for that, and the old woman who rowed us had muscle enough to take us comfortably along. Oh, it was beautiful as a dream! Again and again the walls seemed to close in and we could see no possible way of going farther, but soon the bend would show itself, and there would be another moment of doubt as to where the next turn would open up. There were numerous fine echoes along the river, and at one point our oarswoman rowed us into a little cove, and I tapped with a stick of wood upon the side of the boat, the dull sound of which came back reverberated from the rocky walls like the noise of a cannon. Of course we all tried our voices pitched at various notes, but the dull sound of the wood produced the most startling effect. While we were there the husband of our oarswoman came up with another boat full of voyagers and he repeated with even better results than what we had attempted in our boat. In a little over a half hour our course was at an end, the walls narrowed in and the placid lake became a raging torrent. We landed on the French side, and taking a narrow path were in five minutes standing five hundred feet above and directly in front of the magnificent fall. There is a vast body of water crowded into a narrow space, and the fall is about seventy feet. The spray mounted far above where we stood, falling like a gentle rain about us, or rather a mist. The sun illuminated the whole, forming a rainbow in the gorge. Afterwards we descended to the sides of the stream and sat upon a huge rock projecting over the cataract just before it falls, it is even more impressive from this point of view. Then we returned to our woman who still was waiting to receive us.

Afternoon.—At this point it occurred to me to see what time it was. The morning had slipped so quickly that I was amazed to find it five minutes of twelve. I hastily gathered my things together and started rapidly down the road, for in this mountain air one never wishes to miss the mid-day meal, or in fact a meal of any kind. As soon as this important daily task was finished M. and I started up again, she to take a "sommell" to the murmurs of the pines and I to finish my letter.

The lake has now changed to an intense blue and though there is not a cloud in the sky there is a heavy haze along the horizon that entirely hides the mountains except the tips of the highest peaks that are entirely white and look like bits of clouds motionless in the sky. But I must return to my trip of yesterday. I was going to say our woman rowed us to the Swiss side and there we ordered "un diêr de truites" that is to say of trout. We spent the half hour that would intervene before we could be served, in following the path that leads to the view of the falls from this side. We concluded that this was the finest view of all. We came back with "ne faim de loup," loup means wolf, but that is the equivalent expression, and by the way no more elegant but equally suggestive, for our, "hungry as bears." The trout were delicious and we had an excellent salad and "pommes de terre frides," (fried potatoes) all of which we did justice. It was served for us on the border of the river under a canopy formed by trimming a certain kind of tree so that the branches reach out in all directions forming an excellent shelter.

When we were through we entered our boat and were rowed back to the foot of the mountain which we were forced to climb before reaching the station. As we left the train at Corcelles the moon was illuminating with a golden reflection, the beautiful lake, it was a charming walk up to the house, but the mountain air had made us all very sleepy and glad to "turn in."

I seem to be fated not to finish my letter up to the mountains, as soon as I settled myself to write after dinner and started to take up my pen I discovered that the necessary article had dropped out on my way up—there was no help or it I was forced to descend and borrow one at the house—after writing a little while I succeeded in very adroitly turning over my ink well, so that I concluded the best thing to do would be to follow M's example and "faire un omelet" under the tree.

To-morrow we are going off on a long excursion with a literary society from Corcelles. The train leaves soon after six in the morning. We are anticipating much pleasure from the long day in the mountains, and since we will eat nothing but good French, it will also be very profitable. Nothing interests me so much as coming in contact with the people in whatever place I am. The reason that I feel so perfectly at home here is, that one sees absolutely nothing depressing, no matter where one goes.

There seems to be no real poverty anywhere in this part of Switzerland, and one sees so overworked women carrying heavy burdens on their backs, but though the life is simple the greatest comfort seems to reign. Every one in the village owns their house and some land; the education given at the public schools is excellent, and every child is forced to attend. As a counterpart to this side of the picture there are almost no very wealthy people. We save three or four very charming old chateaux still inhabited by the old nobility in the neighborhood, one of them has a charming park and he family seem to keep themselves a little part, but for the most part there is very slight distinction of classes, less even than in America, because there is no wealthy class. One has all sorts of modern conveniences here in the way of telegraph, telephone, etc. To have water served in the houses is no difficult matter as the mountains form a perpetual reservoir. On all the treats in all the villages there are interesting old fountains with great stone basins where the crystal-clear water runs all the year. Just above our house is a very large one, and every evening all the cattle and horses of the village are driven there to be watered. A little farther down is another fountain with two large stone basins and here one may see women at all hours of the day rinsing their clothes.

In all its aspects I am perfectly charmed with Corcelles and am only sorry that it is not possible to spend the entire summer here.

A LITTLE WHILE.

"Blessed are they who hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled."

Oh, for the peace which floweth as a river,
Making life's desert places bloom and smile.

Oh, for a faith to grasp heaven's bright "forever," Amid the shadows of earth's "little while."

"A little while," for patient vigil keeping,
To face the storm, to wrestle with the strong;
"A little while," to sow the seed of truth sowing,
Then bind the sheaves and sing the harvest song.

A little while to wear the robe of sadness,
To toil with weary step through erring ways;
Then to put forth the fragrant oil of gladness,
And clasp the grille of the robe of praise.

"A little while," amid shadow and illusion,
To strive by faith love's mysteries to spell;
Then read each dark enigma's clear solution,
Then hail Light's verdict, He doeth all things well.

"A little while," the earthen pitcher taking,
To wasside walk, from far-off fountains fed;
Then the parched lip, its thirst forever slaking,
Beside the fullness of the Fountain Head.

"A little while," to keep the oil from failing;
"A little while," faith's flickering lamp to trim.
And then the Bridegroom's coming foot-step halting,
To haste to meet Him with the bridal hymn.

And He who is at once both Gift and Giver,
The future Glory and the present smile,
With the bright promise of the glad "forever,"
Will light the shadows of the "little while."

Footwear in Relation to Catarrh.

"It is the special development of the great toe that enables man to stand erect and balance himself with greater ease. The farther the great toe is spread from the little one the greater pressure is given to the individual, because more leverage is gained. The construction of the pointed-toe shoe is calculated to destroy the leverage of the foot, converging the little and the great toes to a point. In the natural foot the great toe should continue in a straight line from the heel.

"The insane vanity of the wearers of shoes, combined with the ignorance of the shoemaker, have caused to be made a style of shoes that must result in great and lasting damage to our race. The so-called elegant shoes have produced a painful picture of misery, inducing alteration and paralysis of the small muscles of the foot, which has resulted in the loss of the proper elastic step in the walk of many individuals. Compression of the blood-vessels of the foot retards the circulation and prevents the full development of the bones and muscles of the foot, leg, thigh, and pelvis. The stalwart race of yore is being rapidly transformed into a race of spindleshanks since our people have become slaves of fashion.

"Tight and ill-fitting shoes cause depression of spirits, headaches, heartaches, fainting, general fatigue, bad humor, and loss of serenity."

"A radical reform in footwear is necessary to secure well-shaped feet, and the nature of the material of which the shoe is made is of the highest hygienic importance. The proper shoe has a broad, low heel and flexible upper and sole. Unyielding canvas lining in shoes prevents the leather from stretching, and interferes with the suppleness and elasticity of the foot. I am glad to say that dealers have assured me that the pointed-toe shoe is rapidly being displaced by the round, full-toe shoe."

"Sleeplessness from cold feet leads to the use of hot bricks and hot iron to the feet at night, while the cause of the insomnia, viz., compression of the blood-vessels of the feet by tight shoes, had fitting stockings, and tight garters, receives no attention.

"Compression of the feet during cold weather is a prolific source of frost-bites and chilblains. Frost-bites are scarcely seen among Arctic travelers and the Eskimo, because they wear round stockings and seal-skin boots having a layer of dried grass or straw in the bottom.

"Washing the feet frequently does not make them tender, as many people erroneously believe. It really promotes nutrition and the general health, and prevents the formation of corns, ingrowing toe-nails, and callosities. Sir Astley Cooper, the father of surgery, who passed thirty years without contracting a cold, attributed this immunity to the daily habit of bathing his feet and entire body, not with warm but cold water. The best time to bathe the feet is just before going to bed. Water is the cheapest and best deodorant for the feet. Even the most delicate may perform the Dunkard act with benefit and safety by first using warm water, which may be gradually cooled by the addition of cold water. Ointments and lotions so much in vogue for the preservation of the feet need only be mentioned to be condemned. Proper shoes and stockings and rigid cleanliness are the safeguards.

"Unsuitable footwear is a menace to the proper development of our race. It causes chilling of the surface of the body in cold weather, and the excretory function of the skin is stopped. Extra work is thrown upon the mucous membrane of the upper respiratory passages, causing congestion and infiltration of it. No wonder about eighty per cent of our American people are afflicted with catarrh, our national disease!"

"Constant chilling of the feet and the surface of the body facilitates the formation of an excess of uric and lactic acid in the blood, inducing the rheumatic and other diseases. . . . Wet feet have been the initial step in the causation of more sickness and deaths than any other agent known to us. The old adage, "Keep the feet warm and the head cool," is the great safeguard of health. Thorough bathing and brisk rubbing of the skin from one to several times a week are essential for the prevention and cure of catarrh. In many cases under my observation, even after the footwear has been properly reformed, it requires a long course of treatment consisting of local applications, sprays, cauterization, and operative measures to cure catarrh."

Reminiscences.

Jacob Abertson's Reminiscences of a Visit Paid by William Flannan Plymouth.

At our meeting that day, William sat in solemn silence, but evidently under much exercise of mind from eleven o'clock till nearly one, when he arose, with his hat in his hand, saying, "I do not like to preach for nothing, and when I do preach, I expect to be paid for it. I have felt the prevalence in this meeting of a spirit hard to be reached, and I would much rather undertake to cut down one of the loftiest cedars of Lebanon, or one of the sturdiest oaks of Bashan than to contend with this lofty and self-righteous spirit." Then he sat down, soon after which the meeting broke up. I remarked that one of our neighbors, who was not a Friend, put his hand into his pocket, with a frightened look, as if to see whether he had any money with him, when William said he expected to be paid for his preaching, evidently not understanding what was the nature of the pay of which William spoke. William dined that day at my father's, and, as there were quite a number of Friends present, he claimed their sympathy and asked their advice, saying his way appeared to be closed up. To the first many of them freely responded, but none appeared willing to offer any other advice than this, "That it would be safest to lie by till more light was vouchsafed."

William said, "If I must lie by, I would prefer returning to Philadelphia for that purpose." And J. continued Jacob, was directed to bring out the Friends' horses. But when I returned to the house, I found Friends sitting in solemn silence, which William soon broke by asking if there was not a meeting of Friends within ten or twelve miles, in that direction, pointing toward Providence, which was one of the branches of our Monthly Meeting of Gwynedd. He was told there was. "Then," said he, that is the place to which I must now go." John Jacobs and Father Livezey accompanied him.

Some time after I heard the former give an account of that meeting at Providence, in which William was again much shut up for a time, but at length arose, saying, "The friends, there is a spirit among you which has the eye of an eagle, and which strikes with the beak of a hawk, and you are disposed to carry your neighbor's faults in the fore-end of your wallets, while you are very careful to stow away your own in the hinder-end." He then went on in such a powerful testimony on the subject of self-righteousness as to bow the hearts of the people in a very remarkable manner, and John said, "I never shed more tears in any meeting in my life than I did in that one."

At Richland, William found his way again closed up, but, after a time of secret conflict, he pointed in a certain direction, and asked whether there was not a family of Friends living that way, and when he was queried of how far he supposed it to be, he said about five or six miles. One of the Friends said there was a family of members who lived at about that distance, and he supposed it was in that direction, but as they had to make several turns in getting there, he could not be certain of the course if lay from them. This Friend took William to the place, and said afterward that, at every turn of the road, he would ask William which way they should go, and that he invariably chose the right one, to his guide's great admiration.

William was made instrumental here in bringing up the woman Friend of the house out of the very pit of despondency, in which she had been so long immured that she had not been at a meeting for several years. This woman soon after came forth in the ministry, to the satisfaction of Friends, and "I," said Jacob, "remember hearing her in testimony not long after."

This account was given by J. A. — to my father at Yearly Meeting time, 1854.

David Cope's Account of His First Seeing James Simpson.

When David was young he attended Western Quarter on a certain occasion, and sat in the back part of the meeting. At the head of the gallery he saw a very tall man, having a strange appearance, with a black cap on his head, and other peculiarities which arrested David's attention. "Sometime he would put his head between his knees, then straighten up and look keenly all around. After a long time David distinctly heard him say, "Time is passing, and nothing doing" soon after which a woman arose and spoke for a time. "She did not say much," quoth David, "but what she did say was very good." After she sat down, the tall man arose and taught by similes. He spoke of the various parts of a watch. Though all might be rightly put together, except the mainspring, were this wanting, the whole would be useless. He then commented on this. Then the different parts of a ship were brought into view. "More than I knew anything about," said the honest narrator. "If all these were perfect, if there was no compass, the vessel would not arrive at the desired haven, and even had they a compass, and could not see the sun to take an observation, they could not steer rightly." He commented on this. The farmer was then treated of. "He might prepare the ground and sow the seed. It might grow nicely, but, if there were no fence, it would be trodden down. Were there a fence, and the grain ripened and was even threshed, if the chaff was not separated from the wheat the miller would not grind it, and so there would be no bread." This also was commented on. "I wondered," said David, who it could be, for I never heard a Friend preach so before. But I had to conclude, whoever he was, he spoke the truth and it came with authority. I never heard such a sermon."

On one occasion James had been unusually long in one of his low spots, so much so as not to have been at meeting for a long time. Ezra Comfort, visiting him, found him below hope. Ezra spoke very seriously on the occasion. At perhaps the next meeting James was much enlarged in testimony, and told Ezra that, after he had gone, he set to lighting a candle and sweeping his house, till he found the lost piece of silver, and then had to call his friends and his neighbors to come and rejoice with him.

On one occasion, while travelling in Virginia, James, upon entering a town, found his mind drawn to hold a meeting with the people whom he found thronging out from the court-house, and so he inquired of some of them whether they were willing to give him an opportunity, to which they agreed, when some one among them remarked that a man had held a meeting there lately, but that, "as we did not like what he said to us, we dragged him through the mill-race." This announcement greatly alarmed James, who was constitutionally timid. Yet, feeling he must have the meeting, and being desirous to secure himself from harm as much as might be, he asked if they would drag him through the mill-race if they did not like what he should say. "No; you are a gentleman. We won't drag you through the mill-race." But, wishing to provide against all contingencies, he further queried, "If I should have a meeting, and not say anything at all, will you drag me through the mill-race then?" They assured him they would not, and so the meeting was appointed, and, to James' great relief, in a part of the town remote from the dreaded mill-race. James was much favored among them, speaking against slavery and other matters trying to their natural feelings, yet there was no disposition to harm him. On the contrary, they crowded about him, desiring to have more such meetings. Now, although my friend T. H. W. — may judge that such exhibitions of natural weakness as James at times manifested had better fall into oblivion, yet, with all deference to his judgment, they appear to me only the more to exhibit the power of that grace whereby he was what he was.

Filled by his Master, wondrously he shone,
His emptied vessel scarce could stand alone,
When favored most, left in the weakest spot,
Showing his fullness of himself was not.

As to what T. H. W. — says of manifestations that "the treasure is in an earthen vessel," being likely to raise doubts in the minds of hearers concerning other communications, I am reminded of what a Friend, long since deceased, and who was a member of the same meeting as James, told me regarding this very point. She said that a young man, being sent to his home on a matter of business, was so tried by James' behavior that, coming back, he said, "Well, it is no use for James to preach to me any more, detailing what had occurred. But he was forced to confess the next time James spoke, "that it was just as good as ever."

The importance of a suitable connexion in marriage is illustrated in an account given me by an old woman in Ohio concerning her sister. As the family history is interesting, I will begin by saying that her father—an English boy—was apprenticed to a shoemaker, a member, though an unworthy one. He was unmarried and had no housekeeper, and was so penurious as to allow his boys little more than enough food to support life. The lad was so conscientious that, although suffering the continual pangs of hunger, and knowing where there was food within his reach, he never, she said, at any time took anything by stealth. The master also required them to work in a room so cold that drawing the waxed ends caused their hands to crack open, thus causing great pain. Their clothing, doubtless, was scant also, but there being a lime-kiln near by, they used to run down there and get a good warming before they crawled into their beds. After a while the man having obtained the services of a housekeeper she would give the boys something between meals. When he had a family growing up around him, her father came to America, and settled near Nine Partners, N. Y., where lived that great minister, Daniel Haviland, who took much interest in the family, telling them prophetically that way would be made for them to live comfortably. On the evening of their arrival at their new home, my friend said, a boy came driving a cow and carrying a bucket to milk her in, and telling them never to ask any questions as to where they came from.

On their being about to move to Ohio, D. H. — came to visit them, and speaking particularly to a daughter, Jane, told her that she would have many suitors in this new country she was going to, and that, if she was careful to seek her right direction in the matter, she might be joined to one who would not only make her happy in this life, but be a means toward rendering her glorious in that which was to come.

Jane was a talented girl. I have seen a duplicate of a map she drew for E. Robson, when on a religious visit to this country, locating all the meetings within the limits of Ohio Yearly Meeting. It is sorrowful to consider how few there are now, in comparison to the number then. As a specimen of off-hand drawing I have never seen this map equalled. Her sister said that among those who visited Jane was one who they all thought D. H.'s communication pointed to, and who subsequently was Clerk of Ohio Yearly Meeting. But he did not please her fancy. She married one who led her an uncomfortable, wandering life, and was far from being a help toward anything good. As a widow she lived and died with her sister, near my residence, and as I give no name, perhaps it is a breach of charity to say, that on her death there was no apparent sign of religious thoroughness. As our worthy Friend, T. Shillito, used to say,

By other's harms may I be warned.

Our late friend, C. Sheppard, gave me a striking incident occurring in Maine. A ministering Friend had appointed a public meeting, and lodged at the house of a person of much influence in the community, it being at a time when such excitement prevailed in regard to the Northeast boundary question between England and America. Her host said to her, "Madam, I would like you to let me look over the sermon you have prepared for to-morrow, that I may strike out any passages calculated to foster this excitement. She informing him that she had to sermon prepared, "Well, then," said he, "I will take my seat opposite to you, and if I find your remarks tending that way, I will make a sign, and you must immediately change your discourse." As they were about to go to the meeting, he said, "One thing more. We dine at twelve o'clock, and, as I am a very punctual man, you must close in time for us to get home by that hour. He took his seat, as he had proposed, but gave no sign of uneasiness. The meeting also held till long after the hour named, and when some or other made a remark to him about his late dinner, "Oh," he said, "I would not have cared whether I got any dinner at all, if he only would have kept on preaching."

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Canada Yearly Meeting.

Canada Yearly Meeting convened on the twentieth of Sixth Mo. last. The Meeting of Ministers and Elders, and the Representative Meeting, being held the previous day. The former was a favored meeting, being baptized into a spirit of prayer and supplication for continued blessings, and wisdom to know, and strength to follow the guidance of the Shepherd of Israel. We walked together in a union of a travail of spirit, whilst the Interpreter of the Divine will, unfolded some of the mysteries of the Kingdom for our contemplation.

On Sixth-day the general meeting of Friends commenced by a period devoted to worship, when in a silent, solemn assembly, we were permitted as brethren to gather at the Master's table, and partake of the bread that cometh down from heaven. The places of some dear aged pilgrims, who had long been wont to sit with us, we now find vacant, for their Lord whom they so faithfully served, has, we believe, recently called them to sit higher with Him. Their memory yet in fragrance, remains to us, and the echo of their language still resounds in our ears, "follow us, as we follow Christ." We were cheered by the presence of beloved sisters, and a brother from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, and a young Friend from New England. One of the former, acceptably exercised her gift in the ministry on various occasions to our comfort and instruction.

We received epistles from all the other Yearly Meetings in correspondence with us, also one from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, addressed "to Friends in general," with two others from beloved Friends who felt constrained in the love of Christ to address us. These were all read, and proved very acceptable, and to our edification.

John Morland, one of the Assistant Clerks to London Yearly Meeting, kindly acknowledged our last year's epistle to that meeting, in reply to theirs, stating that it had been received and read amongst them, but from other sources we learned, that no further action was taken in the matter. It is devoutly to be hoped that London Yearly Meeting may see for herself in the light of Truth, in what an anomalous position she has placed herself, by her line of action with regard to other Yearly Meetings, and that she may, by obedience to the pointings of Divine grace, receive wisdom to attain to a more honorable position in Israel; for many of us are fully persuaded, did she know, as we do, the inflated character of many of the reports received by her, and the feeble claim which many of her sister meetings have at all to be called "Friends," she would more seriously consider her stepping-stones, and ponder her position. The travail of our soul went forth on her behalf, that He who planted her a choice vine, may yet be pleased to appoint her eyes that she may see her mis-steppings, and turn from those who have led her astray, and that He may call both sons and daughters from among her children, and fill them with the power of his spirit, that they may uphold the banner of Truth in her midst; and may the dew of her youth yet return, and sweet incense be offered on pure altars.

Our meetings for Divine worship held on First-day, were largely attended by the public, and were both held in fitting solemnity. That on First-day evening was unusually large. There was apparent an openness to receive the Truth, and close attention was given to the Word spoken.

In considering the answers to the Queries, among the deficiencies noticed was that of some of our members not attending all our meetings for worship and discipline. It was remarked that "if we are truly members of the church, which is Christ's body, we have the life of the body, which is his spirit, and if we so live we shall have a hunger and thirst after spiritual food and drink, that we may partake and grow in the Truth. Where then could we better come to satisfy our hunger, than where the Lord by his promise, is there, to spread a table of good things, wherever the two or the three are met together in his name. When the poor and needy seek water, and there is none, and their tongue faileth for thirst, I, the Lord, will hear them, I, the God of Israel, will not forsake them. I will open rivers in high places, and fountains in the midst of the valleys. I will make the wilderness a pool of water, and the dry land springs of water." (Is. xli: 17-18.) And truly God was faithful to his promise, and, satisfied our poor with bread, and slaked the thirsty soul. Nor do I ever remember attending a like gathering where all things were conducted in sweeter harmony, or where less was spoken out of the life, abundantly evidencing to us that the Great Head of the Church is still mindful to bless us, and to baptize us into the unity of the Spirit, which is the bond of Christ's people, the seal of brotherhood in Him.

Friends' hearts were opened toward each other, which they proved by their liberality in subscribing privately amongst themselves the greater part of the remaining debt incurred by their consent to liquidate a quiet- deed-claim on the Meeting-house; and this they did, not but that they felt assured their just claim could not be contested in law, but for peace's sake. For in faith and in doctrine we stand where we long had stood, where our fathers stood, and where we believe our early Friends stood and that, with the Truth. For we are not of those whose are given to change. We deeply feel our needs and our nothingness, but by faith we have proved the grace and exceeding bounty of our Lord, toward us, all unworthy as we are, of the least of his many unmerited favors.

And we have been led to believe and by faith we see that it is in this our day, when through worldly prosperity temptations abound, when the world is so intent in the pursuit of pleasures, and a hasting to be rich, and when they frame a religion to suit their carnal inclinations, that it there be found amongst those who are the called of God, individual faithfulness, like to that of Abraham, who, acting in obedience to that call, withdrew from the spirit and manners of the world around him, then would there be an arising of Truth in its power and a gathering together around the standard of Truth, for such must needs be, ere the kingdoms of this world become that of God, and of his Christ, Zion's walls must be rebuilt, not by man acting in his own will, neither by might nor by the power or wisdom of man, but by the power of the spirit of the Lord. And it is only as Zion's children become willing to submit to Christ's yoke on their own will and way, that they will be fitted to become soldiers of the cross, going forth to victory, led by, and in the power of, the Lamb.

Canada Friends concluded this interesting occasion, by a meeting for worship on Thursday, Sixth Month 22nd, known as Jubilee day, in commemoration of the Sixtieth Anniversary of Queen Victoria's Coronation; and the difference was very marked between those who, by idle pomp and folly, demonstrated their joy, and that of Friends quietly adoring Him by whom "Kings reign and Princes decree justice," for obedience to his law, is that righteousness which exalteth a nation, and draws down a blessing on both prince and people. His canopy over us had been from sitting to sitting, one of love, and we separated in the same love, the fruit of Christ's spirit in us, that which is the badge of true discipleship, and the substance of our fellowship.

THE FRIEND.

SEVENTH MONTH 10, 1897.

We have received a pamphlet, written by George D. Dowd-ont, M. D., describing the low state of medical knowledge and practice in many heathen countries, and the unnecessary sufferings of humanity arising from this condition; and urging the need of increasing the number of medical missionaries. It states that in Africa sickness and disease are almost universally attributed by the natives to witchcraft, and this belief necessarily prevents the use of rational means for healing them; and leads to the murder of many innocent persons, accused of bewitching others. A similar superstition prevails among the Indians on the western coast of America.

The pamphlet describes many cases of suffering in various parts of the heathen world, arising from the general ignorance of proper medical and surgical treatment. Its object is to awaken attention to the importance of sending out persons properly trained to act as medical missionaries in the dark parts of the earth.

We have received a circular of the Philadelphia African League, an association organized to promote the welfare of Africa, and especially to endeavor to counteract some of the evils of slavery. Its proposed plan of action is to acquire a body of fertile land, by concessions from European countries, and by purchase from the natives, and establish there Christian set-tements from which slavery and other evils are to be excluded. The company has selected for a field of operations the high table land in the interior of Southern Africa, lying between Benguela and Lake Nyassa. The circular states that the League is fitting out a party which is to start for Africa about the first of Seventh Month. It asks for help from the public, and requests that contributions should be sent to its treasurer, Thomas L. James (ex Postmaster General, at the United Charities Building, Twenty-second Street and Fourth Avenue, New York.)

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The monthly comparative statement of the Government receipts and expenditures which during the sixth Month the receipts from all sources amounted to $365,844,708, and the expenditures, $222,934,604, leaving a surplus for the month of $138,650,014. The monthly statement of the public debt shows that at the close of business, Sixth Month 30th, the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $2,050,476,476. It is noted in addition to the duties which is accounted for by a corresponding increase in the amount of cash on hand.

The retaliatory clause in the Tariff bill adopted by the United States Senate provides that whenever any country bestows an export bounty on any article, then upon the importation of such article into the United States there shall be levied in addition to the duties provided by the act an additional duty equal to the amount of the bounty. The reciprocity clause adopted empowers the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make reciprocity treaties, giving 20 per cent. reduction in duties on de-designated articles, or placing articles on the free list.

The Treasury Department has issued 493 warrants, representing $1,085,156, in payment of the bounty on sugar produced in the United States for the year 1894, for which appropriation was made during the present session of Congress.

According to Post-office Department estimates, this country is now next year of candidates stamps to the value of 167,000, of new issues for the periodical stamp, $42,000, and of postage due stamps, 21,668,000. Of the ordinary stamps two and one-half billions are of the 2-cent denomination and 5,000,000 are of the 10-cent special delivery series.

The Allen Line steamer Siberia, Captain Main, which sailed in New York City on the 4th instant from Glasgow and Liverpool by way of St. John's, N. F., and Halifax, passed twenty big icebergs when she was 180 miles from St. John's. The temperature was very low when the vessel was at the latter place.

Prof. C. H. Hitchcock, of Dartmouth, who will accompany Perry in his coming expedition, will make a thorough study of the geology of Greenland.

A de-patch of Sixth Month 30th, from Columbus, Ohio, says: "The Democratic State Convention here to-day was one of the most memorable political occasions in the history of Ohio. It was a convention of unanimity on principles and of differences on men, especially those who were candidates for places on the State ticket. In the contests for delegates it was also a convention of endurance, as the delegates took no recess, and were in session continuously from 10 A. M. to almost that hour at night. It was a free silver convention throughout. Every candidate whose name was presented was announced as orthodox in silver doctrine as the cardinal principle for his favorable consideration. While there were some differences of opinion about adopting the anti-trust and the Cuban resolutions, there was not a dissenting voice in the convention to the declaration for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without the restriction of a maximum."

Ex-Governor Harrison has written a letter commending the movement to keep liquor out of the resident portion of Indianapolis.

Prosecutions are expected to begin soon under the new Massachusetts law which forbids the wearing of the feathers of a wild and un-mesticated bird. Every offender will be fined $10 and the prosecuting witness will be paid a reward of 25.

Over fourteen thousand crates of strawberries have been shipped from Vineland, N. J., to the New York and New England markets during six weeks, the crop this season being the largest known in this section for years. It is estimated that the fruit will yield the farmer on an average $1 per acre, clear of picking and transportation charges.

The Atlantic City (Reading Railway), is running a 60-minute schedule (50 minutes from Camden), or 55 1/2 miles (exclusive of ferrage), in 50 minutes—said to be the fastest schedule, for the distance, in the world.

The circular Epistle from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held and announced in New England Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Westerly, R. I. A courteous acknowledgment was ordered to be sent to our Yearly Meeting.

Deaths in this city last week were 491, being 63 more than the previous week, and 31 less than the corresponding week of the year 1896. Of the 491, 236 were males and 255 females—146 were under one year of age; 58 died of cholera infantum; 40 of consumption; 39 of pneumonia; 32 of heart disease; 25 of diphtheria; 23 of convulsions; 20 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 20 of marasmus; 18 of old age; 17 of inflammation of the brain; 12 of cancer; 12 of leprosy; 11 of nephritis; 11 of apoplexy; 9 of paralysis; 9 of bronchitis, and 9 from casualties.

Markets, &c.—U. S. 2's, 96 1/4 at 98; 4's, reg., 111 1/2 at 112; coupon, 112 at 112 1/2; new 5's, 125 at 125 1/2; 5's, 114 1/4 at 115; currency 6's, 101 1/4 at 104 1/2.

COTTON was quiet and nominally quoted at 8 1/2c per pound for middling uplands.

FLOUR.—Winter super, $2 75 to $2 90; do., extras, $3 00 to $3 25; Pennsylvania roller, clear, $3 75 to $3 90; do., straight, $3 90 to $4 00; Western winter, clear, $3 75 to $3 90; do., do., straight, $3 95 to $4 10; do., do., do., $4 10 to $4 40; do., do., do., $4 50 to $4 75; do., do., do., $5 80 to $4 90; do., do., do., $4 00 to $4 15; do., favorite brands, higher. City mills, extra, $3 10 to $3 40; do., clear, $4 00 to $4 15; do., straight, $4 15 to $4 25; do., pat., $4 25 to $4 50. RYE FLOUR.—$2 25 to $2 35 per bush, as to quality.

BEEF CATTLE.—Extra, 5 a 5 1/2c; good, 4 1/4 to 4 5/2c; medium, 4 1/2c; common, 4 1/4 to 4 1/2c.

SHEEP AND LAMBS.—Wool, 1 1/2c; good, 3 1/4 to 4c; medium, 3 1/2 to 3 3/4c; common, 2 a 3c; fall lambs, none here; spring lambs, 4 a 6c.

HOGS.—Western, 5 1/2 a 5 3/4c; State, 4 1/2 a 5c.

FOREIGN.—Twenty years ago England had 11,616 male and 14,300 female school teachers. Last year there were 12,200 male and only 29,270 male teachers. At Barcelona, Spain, on the 2d inst. the sea rose and fell a yard every ten minutes for several hours. The same phenomenon occurred at the time of the earthquake which destroyed Krakatoa, a volcanic island in the Straits of Sunda, in 1883.

A despatch to the Standard from Berlin says that a terrible storm of rain, sleet and hail on the 8th and 9th inst., the 1st inst., throughout South Germany. Hailstones as large as hens' eggs fell and everything was beaten to the ground. Crops, vines and trees and whole orchards were destroyed; thousands of hares and partridges, with other game, were killed and great damage was done to property and to roofs. The losses are estimated at many millions of marks.

For the first time in history a general census has been taken of the population of the Russian Empire, which is shown to number 129,211,113, of which total 64,616,280 are males and 64,594,833 females. United States Consul General Karal at St. Petersburg, who presents the figures to our State Department, says that the population of Russia has increased 20 per cent. Russia has doubled, and during the last twelve years it has increased 20 per cent. To take this census the Russian Government employed an army of 150,000 persons, and its completion in three months is regarded as a great achievement in view of the vast expanse of territory to be covered and the illiteracy of the population.

A despatch to the London Daily Mail from Braila, the principal port of Roumania, says that 20,000 inhabitants of Galatz, in Moldavia, on the left bank of the Danube, between the confluences of the Zerth and Pruth with that river, are homeless, as a result of recent floods. Most of these destitute folk are camped in the streets, where they are fed by the military. The Roumanian gubloats are busy rescuing families still in danger. It is estimated that no fewer than 100 persons have been drowned, though the authorities are reticent on the subject, from fear of the consequences to be feared if precautions earlier which might have averted the disaster had been taken.

There was a battle on the 20th inst., between 400 Greek raiders and detachment of Ottoman troops near Motrovo. The Greeks had 120 killed and 80 were taken prisoners.

The Vienna correspondent of the Daily Chronicle says: "Emperor Nicholas has again written to the Sultan urging him to accelerate the peace negotiations by renouncing demands with which it is impossible for Greece to comply. As a result of this letter the Sultan has virtually accepted the terms of the Powers, leaving only details to be settled.

The steamer Aden, from Yokohama for London, in search of which the Indian Government steamer Mayo left Aden a few days ago, was totally lost off the island of Socotra on Sixth Month 9th. The Mayo rescued 95 of the Aden's passenger and 36 of the crew, but 25 passengers and 53 of the crew were drowned or missing.

It is stated that from 600 to 1000 persons were killed during the recent riots in the vicinity of Calcutta. The British flag has been hoisted on Russell, Belona and Stuart Islands, belonging to the Solomon group.

An exchange says that "almost within the Arctic Circle in the north latitude 65 to 70 degrees, Iceland with its population of 70,000, is warmed on the west coast by the Gulf Stream, and can raise fair hay crops and sparse root crops. About 65 per cent. of the population are occupied in rearing sheep and cattle, which are largely consumed at home, the first-wool being sent to the Continent. The Icelandic Sheep are not shorn, but in early summer the fleeces loosen on the animal, and the loose wool is easily detached; most of the surplus goes to England."

NOTICES.

BARCLAY HOME.—The Managers inform that there are now vacant in "The Barclay Home" two large rooms, where Friends desiring either permanent or transient board can be comfortably accommodated at reasonable rates. The house is situated in a pleasant part of the borough and with its commodious porches and ample grounds is a desirable residence.

Those wishing to avail themselves of its privileges will please make early application.

THE BARCLAY HOME, 325 N. Walnut St., West Chester, Pa.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—For convenience of persons coming to Westtown School, the stage will meet trains leaving Philadelphia 7 17 and 8 40 a. m., and 2 53 and 4 32 p. m. Other trains are met when requested. Stage fare on regular trips, fifteen cents, on special trips, twenty-five cents each way. To reach the school by telegraph, wire West Chester Phone 85.

EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Sup't.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.—Applications for the admission of pupils to the school, and letters in regard to instruction and discipline should be addressed to WILLIAM F. WICKERSHAM, Principal.

Payments on account of board and tuition, and communications in regard to business should be forwarded to EDWARD G. SMEDLEY, Superintendent. Address, Westtown P. O., Chester Co., Pa.

PERSONS desiring to assist in the erection of the proposed asylum for the insane in Syria, may send their contributions to ASA S. COGG, 400 Chestnut St., Phila.

FRIENDS SELECT SCHOOL will re-open Ninth Mo. 20th. For printed circular or other information, address J. HENRY BARTELT, Sup't., 340 N. Sixteenth Street.

DEPT. at his residence in Media on the nineteenth of Third Month, 1897, GEORGE R. MCCLURE, in the eighty-sixth year of his age; a member of Media Particular and Chester Monthly Meeting, Pa. He joined the Society of Friends in early manhood from a firm belief in its doctrines and testimonies. He expressed his adherence to its principles by his active and repeating the words, "I am the resurrection and the life."

—, Fifth Month 17th, 1897, at his home near Poplar Ridge, Cayuga County, New York, GILBERT WEAVER, aged seventy-six. This dear Friend was justly esteemed from early life to old age for his faith and his devotion to the principles and interests of our Society. He had a gift in the industry, not in many words, but truly acceptable to his friends. We feel rather to rejoice on his account that he was spared further suffering, believing the language to be applicable, "Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord now henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors; and their works do follow them."

CAMDEN, Third Month 2nd, 1894.

In remarking on an essay submitted to R. E.'s examination, he says, "The writer has left his essay somewhat defective. I think it does not describe the course of religious experience as it is only to be known—which might have been done in half the number of words, and the doctrine of redemption through and by Christ more satisfactorily set forth. In this long essay it does not seem to me to be fully set forth. It is too much as if these great mysteries were to be known intellectually, whereas they are unfolded and opened from time to time, not to the wise and prudent, but to the true born children of our Heavenly Father, who are begotten by Him—for which it is declared the Holy Redeemer himself rejoiced in spirit, and said, 'I thank thee, O, Father, Lord of heaven and earth.' This latter view needs to be insisted upon, more than all the rest of it, if I have any correct views of the need of our times."

"CAMDEN, N. J., Third Month 9th, 1894.

"By recent report from London Grove I learn that our beloved friend—I may say in truth, my beloved friend, Morris Cope, appears to be declining. Didst thou hear that lately Debbie being about to leave the house to attend a funeral, he looked at her and said, 'Give my love to all the Friends and tell them I am here, safe in the arms of Best Wisdom.' It was very much like him in the form of expression, and to my taste was very sweet and precious."

[This letter refers to an editorial prepared in response to some inquiries as to the underlying causes of the separation of 1827.]

"CAMDEN, Tenth Month 29th, 1894.

"It is difficult to imagine how any subject of that kind could be introduced more guardedly and carefully to avoid offence, and I do not think the editorial will hurt any right or fair minded Hicksite. I have thought it might be useful for some of them who may read it to have the cause—the 'underlying cause,' presented to them in that way, to see as in a glass what manner of men they are in a sense."

"CAMDEN, Twelfth Month 21st, 1894.

"I think Yearly Meetings under a proper concern may issue advices, and here their authority ends on such questions.

"I would not give one farthing for any temperance, or any honesty, or any chastity that rested upon such a foundation as the mere fear of being detected. I have gone over this ground till I am tired, again and again, for I cannot bear to see the plainest principles of church government and true Gospel liberty in which I have been trained from my youth, set at nought or ignored."

"PLAINFIELD, Eighth Month 12th, 1892.

"Thy kind letter was read yesterday, and thy expressions of sympathy [in the loss of a son] with us, with the sympathy of thy dear wife and cousin, grateful. We are suffering very much—no mortal tongue can express what we feel—in this sense 'every man shall bear his own burden,' for no one can fully understand another's case—and though it may be said, as some do, that grief is common, 'makes not mine the less,' there is One who can help us and enable us to say, 'Thy will be done.' This state we are also to learn is 'a gift from above,' and not at our command."

"By a letter from D. E. Cope I learn that dear M. Cope left an address to be read in the Quarterly Meeting after his removal. It is intended to be read at the next with the shutters raised. Thou may have heard of this, however, it has been quite interesting to me."

"CAMDEN, Eleventh Month 11th, 1892.

"The meetings of the Committee on the Discipline that I have attended have been agreeably conducted, and leave upon my own mind a quiet satisfaction as I return to Camden. I thought there was a precious feeling to day in the silence before the business began."

This letter refers to a committee on the revision of the discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, appointed in 1892. The changes proposed by the Committee were not very numerous, nor were they in general of a very important or fundamental character. Some provisions that had been adopted to meet difficulties of a temporary nature, were dropped. The Yearly Meeting adopted the report of the Committee.

"CAMDEN, Eleventh Month 16th, 1892.

"I enjoy freedom of intercourse and open exchange of views on matters which concern our 'common cause,' and have been accustomed to it for nearly sixty years. I wish there were more of it among Friends here—the absence of it is often painful to me to a degree not easily expressed. To the lack of it is in large measure to be attributed the 'many shades' of sentiment that are to be painfully observed among us—so much so that it was remarked lately that ten Friends could hardly be brought together and not discover 'snags here and there.' It was not so when I came here, I think, to anything like the extent it is to be felt and observed now. This is very discouraging."

"In the early days of the Society, Meetings for Discipline were more select, and consisted for the most part of concerned Friends. They are now of too popular a character to render them safe bodies to legislate without previous, careful, serious, weighty deliberation."

"CAMDEN, Eleventh Month 21st, 1892.

"I have just received thy kind note and the two cuttings from the Review. I have read them with careful interest. I am glad to know that [the Editor] is become so sensible of the condition of things, but I do not unite with his views as to the causes or remedies. The members of a Yearly Meeting must first get upon the only true foundation, not only believing in the doctrine of Christ, but also become regenerated and baptized by Him into one body and made from living experience to drink of that one Spirit, before a concern is ever likely to be laid upon [them] for the spread of the Redeemer's kingdom. Such a concern for the welfare of others is not a natural but a spiritual thing. Religious activity, although professedly upon Quaker lines, would only bring about the same fruits that we see now in the Society. We must be content to stand still before we can be prepared to see the salvation of God, either as individuals or a church."

"The Society will never be helped by a Bible class nor by First-day schools, with such ideas underneath them, nothing but a spurious Christianity and a spurious ministry can come of them. So on the whole I come to the painful and sorrowful conclusion that Philadelphia Yearly meeting is not likely to be helped by the Review or its editor."

[In THE FRIEND of Eighth Month 19th, 1893, there was published an editorial article expressing uneasiness with the tendency to establish the truth of religious doctrines by intellectual study, and advancing the idea that the effect of such a course on those engaged in it is unfavorable to their advancement in true spiritual Christianity because it withdraws their attention from the only true source of Divine knowledge. A letter from R. E., dated Eighth Month 19th, 1893, thus refers to it:]

"I think thy editorial in THE FRIEND this week, which I have read with much satisfaction, will be a comfort to many. It is a testimony in the right direction. I hope we have still many among us who will heartily respond to it and whose faith may be helped by it. If our Society should slide away from this foundation, we must fail as a people to answer the end for which we have an existence."

"That there is a strong current running in the direction of a substitution of a religion of the head and a round of religious activities and philanthropic efforts, there is no doubt at all. The younger class are caught with it and hold in admiration those who countenance and give it their support. There is our great danger."

"These considerations are very exercising to me. We have now no unlauded Morris Cope to put an army to flight, and few that seem at all qualified and equipped as warriors in the church."

"CAMDEN, Second Month 5th, 1894.

"Our honored friend Thomas Story said once (or wrote) that he had never seen anything so improper or unreasonable but that it would have its advocates, aides, abettors or apologists. So there may be said to be very little that is new. When a man begins the apologetic strain he is virtually gone. If he has nothing to say and adopts the neutral policy to hide himself he is also virtually gone. John Bright once uttered a paradox when he said, 'I do not like a neutral man; he is always on the wrong side.' All these quotations contain sentiments, the fruit of close observation and are very safe rules for judging. I am an octogenarian witness and free subscriber to all of them."

"I said in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, twenty-five years ago, I expect, that a valuable Friend in England said to me, 'A day is approaching when the true principles of our religious Society will have to be contended for over again, not outside in the religious world, but inside, among our own people.' That day is upon us."

Stories of the Light-House Service.

"Gustav Kobbe writes a paper on "Heroism in the Light-house Service," for the Century magazine. He says: "Several of the violent storms that have whirled over Matineus Rock have tried the fortitude of the little band of faithful watchers upon it. One of these watchers, Abby Burgess, has become famous in our light-house annals, not only for long service, but also for bravery displayed on various occasions. Her father was keeper of the rock from 1853 to 1861. In January, 1856, when she was seventeen years old, he left her in charge of the lights while he crossed to Matineus Island. His wife was an invalid, his son was away on a cruise, and his other four children were little girls. The following day it began to 'breeze up;' the wind increased to a gale, and soon developed into a storm almost as furious as that which carried away the tower on Minot's Ledge in 1851. Before long the seas were sweeping over the rock. Down among the boulders was a chicken-coop which Abby feared might be carried away. On a lonely ocean outpost like Matineus Rock a chicken is regarded with affectionate interest, and Abby, solicitous for the safety of the inmates of the little coop, waited her chance, and when the seas fell off a little, rushed knee-deep through the swirling water, and rescued all but one of the chickens. She had hardly closed the door of the dwelling behind her when a sea, breaking over the rock, brought down the old cobble-stone house with a crash. While the storm was at its height the waves threatened the granite dwelling, so that the family had to take refuge in the towers for safety; and here they remained, with no sound to greet them from without but the roaring of the wind around the lanterns, and no sight but the sea sheeting over the rock. Yet through it all the lamps were trimmed and lighted. Even after the storm had abated, the reach between the rock and Matineus Island was so rough that Captain Burgess could not return until four weeks later."

The writer quotes the following letter, written to a friend by — Grant, who lived for many years on White Head, off the Maine Coast: "Sometimes I think the time is not far distant when I shall climb these light-house stairs no more. It has almost seemed to me that the light was part of myself. When we had care of the old lamp-oil lamps on Matineus Rock, they were more difficult to tend than these lamps are and sometimes they would not burn so well when first lighted, especially in cold weather when the oil got cool. Then, some nights, I could not sleep a wink all night, though I knew the keeper himself was watching. And many nights I have watched the lights my part of the night, and then could not sleep the rest of the night, thinking nervously what might happen should the light fail.

"In all these years I always put the lamps in order in the morning, and lit them at sunset. These old lamps—as they were when my father lived on Matineus Rock—are so thoroughly impressed on my memory that even now I often dream of them. There were fourteen lamps and fourteen reflectors. When I dream of them it always seems to me that I have been away a long while, and I am trying to get back in time to light the lamps. Then I am half way between Matineus and White Head, and hurrying toward the rock to light the lamps there before sunset. Sometimes I walk on the water, sometimes I am in a boat, and sometimes I seem going in the air—I must always see the lights burning in both places before I wake. I always go through the same scenes in cleaning the lamps and lighting them, and I feel a great deal more worried in my dreams than when I am awake.

"I wonder if the care of the lighthouse, will follow my soul after it has left this worn-out body! If I ever have a gravestone, I would like it to be in the form of a light-house or beacon."—Friends' Intelligencer.

FOR "THE FRIEND."

Letter from Switzerland.

PRES NEUFCHÂTEL, 49 Corcelles,
Sixth Month, 20th, 1897.

The time is drawing alarmingly near when I shall not be able any more to run up the hill to get the view down into the valley and across to the mountains on the other side of the lake. Oh, they have been beautiful these last few days—it has rained in showers all the time—but the cloud effects have been superb, and even the whole range, entirely exposed, has not the charm of a rent in the rolling cloud-masses and a ray of sun-light piercing through, illuminating a snowy peak, making it seem to shine almost by its own light.

My friends went off the middle of the week on their way to Italy, by way of Interlachen and Lucerne. It was not much of a temptation, though the Alps are so near for me this time, I am too much interested in my studies to care to have any distraction, and we have numberless charming walks around Corcelles, but they keep sending such delightful accounts of what they have seen, and last evening one of our fellow pensionnaires came back, (she had accompanied the others that far) with such glowing descriptions, that I feel quite stirred up, and shall be glad when I am back here, with leisure, to take in the Alps too.

Last evening, a few minutes before supper, my teacher, the one from whom I take extra lessons, came in to ask me if I cared to accompany her on an hour and a half walk to the little city of Bondary. There are two lines of railroad that go there, but as the evening was a charming one, we both preferred the walk. She had some business to attend to with her brother, who lives there. I can give no idea of how delightful a walk it was—all the time between quaint old walls—across village after village, all with their fountains of stone and water always running, and the children singing their "rounds," the same sort of games one finds amongst all children, of all nations and of all ages. I caught this pretty little refrain:

"Sur le pont d'Avignon Tout le monde y passe."

(Over the bridge of Avignon
All the world passes.)

The rest I did not get, but I know it is an old song, dating back to the fourteenth century, at the time when Avignon was the seat of papacy for nearly seven years.

And then the old chateaux, with their walls and towers, old houses of ancient nobility, with the coat of arms carved above the door, and all the while the bracing mountain air, the green meadows, and the dark Juras to the right. We crossed several times the crystal-clear little river l'Areuse, that we followed up its gorge, the other week, where it had eaten its way through the mountains on its way to the lake.

I know of nothing more charming than to put in a quiet industrious day, and then without any other of preparation, start off into the mountains. It is only in this way one gets the best that is to be had from sight-seeing. If one sets out to make a business of "doing everything," one might as well stay at home, for all the pleasure one gets, and far better, if one has passed the stage of finding pleasure in being able to say "oh, yes I've been there."

The whole of yesterday afternoon we spent at Neuchâtel. I had some purchases to make, several books for my teaching, etc. I regretted not being able to find any bouquins along the border of the lake, as I could have, along the Seine, but one can't find modern literature and books like that, even at the bouquinsists at Paris, so I had to content myself and pay regular prices.

One day last week I went on a delightful excursion with nearly fifty men and women of Corcelles and vicinity. I enjoyed it not only for what I saw of the country, but also the coming in contact with so many typical Swiss. I found them delightfully cordial, well bred, and intelligent. We took the train at Avenier, a little after six in the morning, and by eight, had left the train at a little station high up and not far from the French border, among the Juras, the town Moitier, I think it is called, is very old and beautifully situated in the "Val de Travers." Rousseau used to pass a good deal of time there—by the way, speaking of great men—Boudry, where I was last evening, is the birthplace of the terrible Murat, of the French Revolution, but I take much more interest in an old house, and a magnificent avenue of trees on the Tourne, the mountain that we climbed several weeks ago, where lived a friend of Agassiz, and where that great man was wont to spend days at a time, and loved particularly to walk up and down the avenue.

To return to our trip, after crossing the valley and ascending for some time, we came to the edge of the forest, turning a little to one side to visit the ruins of an old convent, and then continuing up and around, coming finally into a deep cool gorge, called in the "patois" of the country, Porieta Raisse, where the rocks were covered with moss, lichens and ferns, and dripping with water on every side, while a small, but tremendously active little stream came tumbling down between. The ascent is very steep and most of the way steps are hewn out of the rock or else a framework of logs made fast to the side and suspended over the chasm, enables one to pass from one ledge to another. At one part of the gorge there was a widening out, a regular place for camping out, here a halt was made for "dèjeuner." We had brought along with us enough to last until the afternoon, as we would pass no place where we could get lunch. If the Jura mountains were in Germany the case would be different, for a German must drink at least once every hour, and as he never comes to realize that water was intended to quench thirst, he must have coffee or tea, or syrup, or lemonade, if he does not drink beer, which he usually does of course, and, as he is generally too heavy himself to carry much along, he sees to it that all these things are provided, along all possible courses that he may happen to take, and there is no one on the face of the earth that enjoys so much going off for a day's or a half-day's outing as he.

Well, this is a digression, as soon as we had lunched sufficiently, we started on up the gorge. It was delightful to watch the crowd coming up—the path was so narrow only one could pass at a time—winding in and out among the rocks, but more than that, to hear them, for they were all in a singing mood, singing their beautiful Swiss melodies. At last we emerged into sunlight again, finding ourselves on a high plateau of simply rolling pasture land, and for about five hours we continued to wander over them—I say wander—for there was no definite path, and we were constantly going to one side for flowers. It was a perfect carpet of flowers, of every hue and kind, great fields of narcissus and "boutons d'or" (bottons of gold), the latter a kind of ranunculus, very large, of which, the rich golden petals overlap, forming a ball. Numberless varieties of orchids and exquisite gentians, of a blue most intense, beside countless others. About one o'clock we stopped at a chalet, hoping to be able to get some coffee or milk, but there was only an old man and a small boy there, simply to tend the herds of cattle that graze in the mountains, and could do nothing for us, so we had to content ourselves with water for beverage, and we ate the remainder of our lunch under some trees near the chalet, after which we continued our march. At last we began again to ascend, always simply the smooth mountain slopes covered with flowers and grass. The view grew more and more beautiful as we ascended, all around us the Juras and to the right, far off in the distance the lake of Neuchâtel, and the Alps beyond that looked vastly higher now, that we were ourselves so high. At last our further progress was prevented by a sudden dropping away of the mountain, which formed an enormous amphitheater, with walls as precipitous as those of any cañon I ever saw, and about 2000 feet in height. This mountain is known by the name of "Creux du van," creux meaning hole, and van is a sort of semi-circular basket with one side a sieve, which is used in separating the chaff from the grain. From the top of this Creux du van, one looks down into the valley of l'Areuse, which forms the commencement of the gorge of which I have spoken in the former letter. After regarding as long as we wished down into the chasm, we continued our way to a chalet, at some distance to one side, one of the men of the party, who had stationed himself to help the women over a high stone wall, said laughingly, as he realized he had not the time to aid me: "Mais les Anglaises sont terribles, elles vont partout!" (but the English ladies are terrible, they go over everything!) to which I promptly responded, "C'est vrai, et les Américaines sont encore pire!" (that is true, and the Americans are still worse). I resent on all occasions being taken for an English person.

I was extremely curious to enter one of the chalets and find out how the inmates lived, the one to which we now came, offered an excellent opportunity. These chalets are large constructions, with room for cattle, hay and people all under one roof. The people who inhabit them are generally, simply those who have charge of the flocks and herds, and seldom their owners. In the winter they live in the valleys, but as the spring comes they advance up the mountains, following from one level to another, as the pastures become green.

We saw only one chalet with a straw roof, that was quite low down on the mountain side, where straw is easier to procure than wood, but the law now, no longer permits the use of straw, on account of fires, so that this artistic feature is disappearing from the Swiss mountains. The windows to the buildings are very small and few in number—the most of the light entering by the large door in front. The first thing one sees after passing the threshold, and getting somewhat used to the semi-darkness, is an immense black chimney place, with an enormous brass pot, bright and shining, suspended on a chain. This is where the cheese is made, the delicious Swiss cheese, which is, by the way, much better here than it is when brought over, at least I have never tasted any like it. The milk is turned fresh into the boiler, heated, and the necessary ingredients added; then the whey separates, and the rest is turned into the forns. The peculiar taste of the Swiss cheese is due to the taste given to the milk, by the plants the cows graze on—the different cantons produce the same kind of cheese—that is, prepared in the same way, but with quite a different aroma.

Through the open door at the back of the entry-way, one looked into the stable, and several gentle faced cows were gazing mildly down upon us. There were some fifty there under cover, and several horses. There was a ladder leading up into the hay lofts, which were open, so that one threw the hay down upon the entry floor and carried it then into the stables. I climbed up, of course, to see around better, and discovered two or three rooms partitioned off, where the family sleeps.

Hanging along the rafters just over one's head, on entering, were the immense bells, which are put upon the leaders of the herds, as they journey from one pasturing ground to another. Some of them were of iron, beaten thin, and fully a foot long and as much in diameter, though they were not round but flat. Others were of bell metal. At my request, a small boy went up and set them all ringing for my amusement. Each has a different tone, so that one can recognize each cow, and some are very musical. To the right, seemed to be the living room of the family, and to the left, the dairy, which was by the way, scrupulously clean.

After reposing awhile and refreshing ourselves, it was proposed to have some sports upon the green, of course I was very happy to join, as I am a fairly good runner. Towards evening, that is, about six o'clock, we started down the mountain, following for the most part, a zigzag path that winds along the steep slopes of the eastern side of the Creux du van, I found, however, a slide, used for timber, that was much more interesting, and I brought me down in about a sixth the time it would have taken to follow the path.

At the foot of the mountain, dinner had been already ordered in a little hotel, very pleasantly situated. We were all quite ready for a warm meal. After it was over, we betook ourselves to the station, at some little distance farther up the valley. It was nearly midnight, when a large crowd, half drunken with sleep, got out of the cars at Auvenerin. I don't remember how I managed to scramble up the steep slope from the station to the house, but it was not fatiguing, only sleepiness that made the way difficult, for in this delightful mountain air, one can walk indefinitely without getting tired.

SOME ACCOUNT OF THE LAST SICKNESS AND DEATH OF DOUGLAS P. BROWNING, DAUGHTER OF OTHINEL AND ENICE FOSTER, OF SOUTH-KINGSTON MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS, OF WHICH SHE WAS A MEMBER.

She was taken severely ill with diphtheria on the twelfth of Eighth Month, 1862; the disease eventually taking the form of croup; and she expired at a quarter to eight o'clock, P. M., of the eighteenth of the same month, in the thirty-fifth year of her age.

On the sixteenth, the disease having extended to the distant parts of the throat, her physician so informed her, to which she replied, "Then she supposed there was no help for it," but he assured her that it was not necessarily hopeless if it did not continue to extend, etc. Other physicians were now called, but before their arrival she spoke as she had done on several previous occasions, of her apprehensions that "her time was short," but she said "she had no desire to live on her own account," etc. But the hope was earnestly expressed by the family that she would be willing to live for the good of others, as also to be fully prepared and ready for the awful change herself, etc. "I am willing," she said, but after remaining quiet awhile, raised herself up in a sitting posture and exclaimed in her clear, natural, distinct voice, though she had been unable to speak much above a whisper most of the time, and part of it had used a slate: "My views," she said, "will be realized, and I have but a little time longer to stay with you." Many expressions of sorrow being made by the family at this sudden and painful prospect of parting with one to whom they were all so strongly attached, and looking to for comfort and support in their now declining years, "I know it all very well," she said, "and have had a hard struggle to give you all up, even all of my friends, who were so near and dear to me," and spoke especially to her father, of her strong love and attachment to him, with the hope that he might never be allowed to want for anything that would add to his comfort; and "May thee, dear father," she said, "soon, soon meet me in that realm of rest where parting and sorrow are unknown, and where I believe there is a mansion prepared for thee." And then turning to her husband, said, "But this, oh, this is the trial to part from thee: I know this will be a blow to you all, and I have prayed, oh, how fervently, that you may be supported." And then broke forth in the most earnest expressions of prayer to God in her suis misert, through his adorable mercy, be blotted out, even though they were like mountains before her; and though she had fallen so far short of what she ought to have been, and had never done any good, yet she craved that in great mercy, just an entrance within the gates, and only the lowest seat, and that in the passage through the dark valley: oh, that his presence might be with her, so that its dark waters might not overwhelm her head." She also mentioned later every member of the family, and of their families also; adding, "How glad I should have been to have seen them all again, and tell them all, all to meet me in heaven, all of our large family gathered there; what a glorious, glorious meeting that will be. Give my love to them all, and kiss them all for me," and again, "To remember her love to all her dear nephews and nieces; give my love to them all and tell them they were always dear to me, but never half so dear as now. Tell sister Lydia, how much I counted on a visit from her; and say to dear brother Stephen how much pleasure I had anticipated from his expected visit, and how I have indulged the vain hope of sometime visiting him in his own home, and how much I feel for him, far separated from all his friends and the Society of which he is a member. "But tell, Oh, tell him to remember the God of his fathers, and not to allow his mind to be too much absorbed by worldly things as I have done, and put off the preparation for a time like this; and to bring up his children in the fear of the Lord," etc., and quoted a passage of Scripture which had impressed her mind as applicable to him, but which was not retained. There were two passages however which had been much on her mind of late and a great comfort to her, viz:

"Stand still and see the salvation of the Lord," and the other, "They that trust in the Lord shall not be confounded." She said she regretted not having read the Scriptures more, and if we would read them more how much more comfort they would be to us, and if her life was spared it would be to live a very different one," "You all know," she said, "or if you do not know it was, that the cross of the plain dress, and plain language, was almost more than I could bear, but the cross must be taken up and borne whatever is required, or however trifling to others it may appear to be." "I am aware that much of my life must have appeared light and trifling to others, and it was a great deal too much so, but there have been times when my whole heart was given to the work." "Oh, that my head were waters and mine eyes fountains of tears," said the Lord's prophet, "That I might weep day and night for the slain of the daughters of my people." "I have ever been a firm believer in immediate Divine revelation, but never more so than now, and this is not my own strength, nor are these my own words." "No, dear father, thou can bear me witness that my natural tongue could never have uttered these things, No, no, but I called upon the Lord, and He hath strengthened me out of Zion; without this strength I should have been bound here with you in sorrow and pain but He hath wafted my soul above the earth and earthly things."

"Give my love to all my friends everywhere." "Oh, I feel such love that I could embrace the whole world. But perhaps this dispensation is for your good. Oh! may it prove so," and then after a little time, said, "Oh! pray for me; I feel that I stand in need of all your prayers." On something being done for her, she said, "I have no pain and am perfectly quiet," but soon after said, "I do not feel that full assurance of acceptance which I should wish; Oh! may it be granted before all is over," and soon after said, "Oh! it is possible that I can be forgiven, and if it is so may not some sign be given that it is so," and then after a little quiet, she said, "Yes, I believe it will be so, and you will have to raise your hands and say, It is enough." She then gave some messages to absent friends, and also some counsel and advice to some present, and to her dear husband, to go to no unnecessary expense on account of her funeral, but to let all be in a plain way as Friends would wish, and said she was thankful in having none to leave without a mother's care. She gave away all her personal effects sufficiently plain to be understood, though saying she would have been glad to particularize more, but that "Time is too precious now." On several of the neighboring women coming in who had friends enlisted for the war, she said, on looking around upon them, "Oh! my friends; how my mind has been with you in your affliction, those of you who have had to part with near and dear friends, who have gone perhaps to a death on the battle field or even something worse, Oh! put your trust and confidence in God, and may He sustain you." At this time she was apprehensive of being near the close, but afterwards revived up again and said that when all was quiet and she waiting for the change, she seemed to hear it said to her, that the time might be lengthened out, if she would be faithful; not on her own account, but for the good of others, and said that at first she thought it to be a buffeting of the enemy, but it remained with her until night; yet she did not dare trust herself to go back to the world and its temptations, after what she had experienced." She now had many sinking spells, and suffered much, though without complaint or murmuring; saying at one time it seemed as though she had suffered many deaths, but the Lord had helped her through all." And at another time of distress, said to her husband: "Can thee hold me to suffer so?" And then inquired of her father and the particular friend, P. F., whom she had sent for to be with her in her last moments, if they thought there was a possibility of her acceptance. On the latter's assurance that she felt nothing in her way, replied, "Neither do I anything at all." But a little time previously she had exclaimed, "Oh! that book, where each word and thought of mine have been recorded; how shall I answer that?"

On the last day she was delicious, at times, and near the close appeared to have a hard struggle with death, though the great calmness with which she had been so much favored, continued measurably with her, and we feel abundantly warranted in the precious belief that through great mercy she was enabled to triumph at last. After a few words of exhortation from the friend alluded to, but not directed to her particularly, some inquiry was made after her full and free acceptance of the Divine Will in her case, she said, "If we can say 'it is an ordinance of Almighty God, and we are satisfied, is not that enough?'"

To her husband she said, "Thou knows to go to the fountain head, but what does it avail to go there, if we do not stay there?" And soon after said, "I am nearing a happy realm;" and on inquiry if all was now bright and pleasant before her, said, "Yes, Yes, Yes!" Her father asked if she was going to meet a little sister whom she had never seen; and replied, "Oh, yes; and my long distressed and suffering mother, who has long been waiting to sing with me the songs of salvation on the banks of deliverance. What a glorious meeting that will be!" and then most earnestly entreated her husband to "Come with me! There can come if thee will, and why will thee not come?"

She lay very low, in a suffering condition for eighteen days with pneumonia.

But if thee goes off to that dreadful war, thee will have to be in one place and I in another. How can we bear that? Oh, come then, where I am, and meet me there!" After this, a few words of supplication, not remembered, and she breathed shorter and shorter, to the last; and thus passed quietly away on the eighteenth of the Eighth Month, 1862, in the thirty-fifth year of her age.

"Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the foundation of the world."

"Blessed indeed are they whose transgressions have been forgiven, and whose sins are blotted out."

FOR "THE FRIEND."
RELIGION.

Religion leads to do and say
The kindest thing the kindest way,
To follow truth, whate'er it be,
Be nothing but sincerity;

Deal with the whole world truthfully,
Extend to mankind charity
For all temptations he hath had,
And weigh the good against the bad.

A Christian always should forgive
A sinner who would rightly live,
When he forgiveth doth implore;
Should say, as Christ, "Go sin no more,

"For of thy sins thou dost repent,
Thy life for good may now be spent.
God will forgive and so will I,
As to do better, thou wilt try."

Religion is the golden rule,
Which we should practice in life's school
"Be not all doctrine or all creed,
Eat giving love to those who need,

A kind and sympathetic heart;
In joy and sorrow to take part.
If each obey his inward light,
And do as conscience says is right,

The world will then not go far wrong,
For God will guide us all day long;
He'll tell each soul its duty here;
We need but disobeying fear.

Were we religious we should know
One path were not for all to go,
Each has his individual light,
To show what work for him is right.

Then let us trust the Father knows
Just how that each one's pathway goes,
Let us not rashly interere,
Commending those who do not hear

Or see their way as we would guide—
Their inward voice we have not tried,
And our deity duty cannot see—
Each soul and God can judge be.

Oh, let us not self-righteous be,
Believing all should see as we;
The human race God understand,
Gave each the right to do most good.

The best thing with which to make a noise is a vessel full of emptiness. Fill a barrel with flour and you destroy its sounding properties. Fill a drum with sand and you can pound as much as you please without disturbing the neighbors. The noisiest Christians often are the least grace in them. The noisiest preachers are often empty of real truth. The most godly preacher that ever walked the earth was a quiet speaker. His voice was not heard in the streets among the noisy crowds. Some times people made a noise around him. Only on one occasion do we remember his lifting up his voice. He stood and cried: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink."—Selected.

Some Rarely Observed Bird Visitors and Bird Habits in Burlington County, N. J.

This bird, the Migratory Quail (Coturnix Coturnix), perhaps the rarest of Burlington County's bird visitors, was wing-tipped and secured by a neighbor in one of our grass fields in June, 1877, and presented to us. For several weeks its peculiar cry was heard. I copy from notes made at the time, "Jersey habitat in grass fields; cry frequent, three quick notes faintly united, that did not seem loud when near by, yet to be heard distinctly two hundred yards away—sound difficult to follow because seeming to come from various directions. Its cry was so peculiar that it attracted much attention among persons in its vicinity during the day and also at night, occasionally. There was something of anxiety in its tone, as if seeking or expecting a reply. Its stopping place was in a grass field of ours, and an adjoining one of a neighbor's, without clover, and timothy about blossoming. Its strange voice and stranger habits, excited the curiosity of those near by. It was difficult to flush—made a direct, rapid, short flight, only a few feet from the ground. If we went to the place of alighting, or to where we heard its voice, we could not find it there, indicating a running habit, or ventriquoist powers. Finally, one of our neighbors wing-tipped it, and presented it to us. We kept it caged perhaps two years, and at its death one of our family mounted it. It was a long while before I could identify it, as I examined only lists of American birds, and consulted only American ornithology. It was always an interesting object to our friends, and many were the conjectures and decisions in regard to its personality. The majority decided that it was a sport from American quail—many that it was cross-bred. Baffled so long in my search among books and country friends, I at last set apart a rainy day when I could not farm, and devoted it to a search among the great collection of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, where I at length found the representatives of his family, marked Pedix Coturnix. With this family name I sought in works of American ornithology to learn something of his family history, but in vain.

At length we chanced to see his portrait in a German illustrated work, with an appended history. Thus guided, I found its person and habits described by many of the English ornithologists as being a migratory visitor, spending the summer in Europe, the winter, south of the Mediterranean, in Asia and Africa. Why was our specimen in Burlington Co., N. J.? I searched diligently more than a year for a reply. Then it chanced that a visiting relative brought for our children's pleasure an illustrated paper, in which was this item—that an importation of migratory quail had been made by some gentlemen in Vermont, who were connected with Rutland County Bank, Vt. I wrote a letter of inquiry to the President of that institution, and received a reply. I subsequently read in a public journal of such quail having been seen in North Carolina, and after, that a number of them had alighted on a vessel far out to sea.

In changing from their European summer home to their African winter one, they must cross the Mediterranean Sea. In their passage they take advantage of the projecting peninsulas of Italy and Greece, and the intervening islands, yet great numbers are drowned and washed ashore. Our Vermont birds, making their characteristic longward migratory movement, would reach Long Island Sound, the Atlantic front and the Gulf of Mexico. If in imitation of the ancestral crossing of the Mediterranean Sea they should essay to cross the above named waters, their fate would be like that of Landul's stately ship:

"We only know from England she sailed ar'er the ocean,
We only know to England she ne'er returned again."

I found in the London edition, 1822-84, of Garret's "British Birds," vol. three, page one hundred and twenty-five, this reference to the above effort of the gentlemen of Vermont to introduce the Migratory Quail into the United States, "Large numbers have been turned out in America, especially in the State of Vermont, where, in 1877, a flourishing stock of six thousand birds had been secured."

The specimen before us during its caged life in our family was exceedingly shy and sensitive, as was to be expected of a bird so anxious for concealment in a state of nature. But after sharing our home for a few months, it showed for the members of the family this much of the recognition and partiality of friendship. When a stranger entered the room and approached, it appeared restless and irritated, and if he stood close to its cage it would show what seemed like anger, by erecting all its feathers, during which erection the peculiarity of their pencilling gave them a rounded appearance, like the quills of the porcupine. One member of the family, when she came down to the room in the mornings, would go to the cage and talk to the bird in confiding tones, as if assured there was a reciprocation of good feeling. It soon seemed to enjoy this, standing very quietly, with head bent to one side as if intent and soothed, and its manner always showed that this member of the family was its favorite. During mating season it was very excitable, and had three sharp loud notes, as startling as the crack of a whip, followed by a deep bass note like the guttural voice of the largest frog. They abound in Asia from India to Siberia. In China the natives carry them about in winter to keep their hands warm.

It is a far cry from Burlington Co., N. J., year 1897 A. D. to the peninsula of Arabia, year 1490 B. C., nearly 3,400 years of time, and more than that miles of land and ocean intervening.

When the Jews were removing from Egypt to Palestine, at a time and in a district without adequate food supplies, at an encampment in the peninsula of Arabia, not far from the Red Sea, this incident is narrated: "And there went forth a wind from the Lord and brought quail from the sea, and let them fall by the camp as it were a day's journey on this side, and as it were a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, as if were two cubits high upon the face of the earth, and it came to pass at even the quails came up and covered the camp."

Can we identify the bird that was so considerable and opportune a factor in this incident of nearly three thousand four hundred years? Some authors name the Sand Grouse (Pterocles alchata). This bird, though abundant in the East, does not make long flights, though it has powerful wings, never is seen fatigued by migration, and is at all times a tenant of the wilderness, far from water. The claim of others is not satisfying. Does the family of our rare Burlington County visitor furnish proofs of claim to the position—sea-crossing ability, almost inconceivable numbers, availability for "spreading abroad" or drying, with other circumstantial proof, giving fair evidence that in this particular instance no noticeable change in habits has taken place during more than three thousand years?

First—Our bird still frequents the district the incident occurred in, and there the traditional etymology of the Arabs makes its name "Saliva" (to be fat—round form); the Hebrew makes it "Selav"—most suggestively similar. The narrative says, "Two cubits high upon the face of the earth." Once it was thought "two cubits" applied to depth of deposits. Now to altitude of arrival, the flight of our bird is always low, swift and direct, is two cubits still. But most vital to a decision is adequate sea-crossing ability, numbers, arrival at even, and adaptation to "spreading abroad" or drying for human food.

Pliny, the Roman naturalist, who wrote in the first century of the Christian era has: "Quails always arrive before the cranes. They are small birds, and when they come to us are terrestrial in their habits, rather than birds of flight. Their appearance is not unattended with danger to sailors when they draw near to land, for they often alight on the sails, invariably by night, and swamp the vessels."

Says a French naturalist, "This species is probably the most productive of all winged creatures, and it could not well be otherwise, or it would be unable to withstand the war of extermination declared by human beings and birds of prey." A prodigious number of victims the simple crossing of the Mediterranean cost the species." In certain islands of the archipelago men and women have no other occupation for two months than collecting the quails showered on them from heaven, picking, cleaning, salting and packing them away in casks for transportation to principal markets of the Levant. The catchers, two weeks in advance, select and number their ground to avoid disputes." Another French author, Pellouët: "I wait when it arrives at shore of sea, flies only at night. It leaves the lands where it has passed the day about the dusk of evening and settles again at the dawn of morning. In transit they often weary, and alight on vessels or fall into the sea. I saw bouts come in with ten or twelve sharks. They were opened before me, and there was not one which had not eight to twelve quails in its body. The birds starting from the Crimea about seven P. M., with a northerly wind, before dawn accomplish a passage of about sixty leagues and alight on the southern shore to feed and repose. In the vernal season, the direction of flight is reversed, and they arrive in similar condition on the Russian coast." The route of these would be through Turkey in Asia and through Arabia, the scene of our narrative, Hewick in "British Birds"—"On the Western coast of Naples such prodigious numbers have appeared that one hundred thousand have been taken in a day, within a space of four or five miles." Mention is made of such numbers of drowned birds, victims of adverse winds, being washed ashore, that their decaying bodies bred disease. Tristram in his Natural History, pages two hundred and thirty—two hundred and thirty-three—"In Algeria, in April, found the ground covered with quail for an extent of many acres, at daybreak, where on the preceding afternoon there had not been one, and they scarcely moved until almost trodden upon. "Spreading abroad," or drying them for human food is spoken of as a continuous usage. In Palestine he caught several with his hands. "The usual migration is from Africa in April, when according with their well known instinct they would follow up the coast to the Red Sea, crossing with a favoring wind, rest before proceeding."

The above are very brief extracts, a small part of a great deal of evidence, all of which seemed to testify that the emergency food supply requirements of the narrated incident of three thousand three hundred years ago, are fully met by the nature, habits and numbers of the family of our rare Burlington County bird visitor.

The Iowa Lake Region.

The State of Iowa has few if any lakes although bountifully supplied with water from rivers, natural springs and from wells where water can generally be found at a depth of from twenty-five to thirty feet. On account of this scarcity of lakes the so-called lake region in Dickenson County in the northwestern corner of the State is much sought for, especially during the hot seasons of the year when the shady banks and placid waters are thronged with visitors who come from the busy cities to enjoy with their families a few weeks of country air, cool and invigorating.

To one interested in the study of nature this region has much of value; for the student of geology, botany and history, can each in turn find much of interest.

Lakes are of two varieties, drift and alluvial; the drift lakes have had their origin in the depressions left in the surface of the drift at the close of the Glacial epoch, and ever since have rested on the drift deposit then found. The alluvial lakes have no doubt had their origin by the action of the rivers cutting out their own water courses and afterwards changing their courses leaving the so-called dug-outs, these lakes rest on the alluvium as the others rest on the drift; the latter are not attractive, being low, marshy and the water stagnant; the drift lakes on the other hand being delightful spots containing clear water, gravelly borders and always on higher ground and in healthier locations. The drift lakes are always at the head of the rivers on some watershed hence all the drift lakes in the State are found at the head of the Cedar, the Des Moines and the Little Sioux rivers. The largest lake in the State is Minnewaukon or Spirit Lake having a surface of twenty square miles; it drains into east Okoboji which lies six feet lower than Spirit Lake, which is the highest point in the State being seventeen hundred feet above sea level. East Okoboji is connected with West Okoboji the two lakes forming nearly a horse shoe around Spirit Lake. West Okoboji has a depth of one hundred and twenty-five feet and a beautiful wooded shore with clear water and a gravelly shore and bottom. The Sioux gave to this lake the name of Minne Tonka (Great Water). The outlet of these lakes being fifteen miles long and from a few rods to two miles wide is the Little Sioux which has its source here emptying into the Missouri River to the southwest.

Geologists tell us that this region has undergone less change by erosion since the glacial period than almost any locality within our borders. No exposure of stratified or other rock is found, but on the shores of the lakes there being more than a dozen in all a large collection of drift boulders are found designated by the farmers Nigger heads. These have been thrown up from the bottom and carried no doubt from parts of northern Minnesota during the ice age. There are various varieties those of granite being the most numerous. The quartzite boulders are derived from formations to which the Sioux Quartzite is classed; the magnesian limestone boulders are supposed to be from the lower magnesian formations, the strata of which is exposed in Minnesota. The farmers in the early days of the settlement collected and burned large numbers of these for lime.

In this region can also be found within a radius of a few miles specimens of nearly the entire flora of the State, and hence, is a spot much sought by botanists. On account of the scarcity of trees the State is not bountifully supplied with birds which are only found in any numbers along the streams; however of several hundred varieties which are found in the State most of these spend part of the year at this place, especially is it rich in ducks during the spring and fall of the year congregating here finding protection in the marshes and timber from the northwester which sweeps down with tremendous force during the equinoxes.

The region is also noted for its Indian history, containing many legends; it was on these hills overlooking the lakes, that the Sioux and the Dakotas worshipped the Great Spirit, it was here their treaties were made with each other after many a cruel war, it was to this friendly region they always returned after roving about the country in search of game during the summer, for here could always be found plenty of fuel, fish, shelter and game.

It is thought that the first white person who visited this region was Louis Hennepin (1640-1706) the Franciscan monk and explorer when captured and brought here as a prisoner about 1680, but this is not certain. In the narrative of the Lewis and Clark expedition it is stated that the Indian guide told them of the large lakes which supplied the Little Sioux with its bountiful supply of water. In 1837-38 Nicollet was directed by the war department to visit this section of the country and make observations which report is on file at Washington. From this time on several treaties had been made with the Indians by which they had realized all their rights and title to this region but after a short absence they would return. During the summer of 1856 the first settlement was made by the Gardner and Luce families, and during the fall a few trappers and hunters joined the infant colony. The winter of 1856-57 was very severe the snow being five feet on the level, and it was not uncommon to find drifts more than twenty feet high. The settlers were hopeful and expected to begin work in the spring in earnest. The Indians on account of the severity of the weather had not fared any better than the whites, and hence perhaps their cruelty can in some measure be accounted for. In 1851 the Sioux had executed the treaty by which a large portion of Minnesota was ceded to the government but the Wapekpeti band of Sioux were not included, as their lawless character even according to the Indian code had made them unpopular, and they were obliged to withdraw and make their home on the Vermillion River in the present State of South Dakota, but cold and hunger coming on they came into Iowa begging, stealing and otherwise molesting the settlers, and in the early part of Third Month came upon the settlers of the Spirit Lake region whom they killed in cold blood, including women and children, with the exception of a few who were captured. The log cabin built by the first settler still stands, and the sole survivor of the sad tragedy, then a little girl who was captured, lives on the homestead staked out by her father on the southern borders of the West Oko-boji Lake, forty-one years ago, where a tall granite monument has been erected by the State in memory of the massacre.

To the west of Spirit Lake near Sunken Lake, is found a circle of mounds left by an unknown race, of an unknown period, showing that way back during the age of the Mound builders, if there were any in this region, the land has been occupied and contended for since man first set foot on Iowa soil. These mounds have been opened, and skeletons of large size have been found. A little ways north from this place, is a beautiful beach of the lake, called Old Quakers' Camp, for the reason that during the early days many of the Friends visiting in Iowa and Minnesota, travelling by team, always camped here, and the old settlers remember that oftentimes meetings were held in some of the neighboring cabins.

Such in short is the Iowa Lake region, an interesting spot to scientists as well as to relic hunters. For ages it has been to the Red Man a spot regarded as of superstitious interest and of peculiar charm. It has an enchanting scenery; the picturesque bluffs breaking the monotony of the boundless prairies on either side; the many bays, the shaded woodlands, and winding capes could not help but appeal to the Indians' imagination as it has later to his white brother; it was here that he had smoked in happy idleness after the long chase, and to be forbidden to return and to give up his dearest spot to those bringing another civilization, that he could not comprehend; this was too much, and hence the bloody deeds which history has chronicled by the monument which overlooks the placid water of the region.

To our Sisters of the Seneca Nation of Indians.

[The following is an address to the Seneca women recently sent by the Indian Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.]

We have often thought of you since we visited the School at Tunesassa, where many of your children are being so kindly cared for, and are learning lessons to be of use to them in the coming days. We are glad you are pleased and willing to send them to the Quakers, who have always been the friends of the Indian, and will teach them only what will do them good.

We feel a great and strong interest in you and your children, and as we cannot come and bring our message, we send it in writing. We desire for you much happiness and comfort knowing they are the sweet blessings, which come from our Heavenly Father, or the Great Spirit's good hand, and are part of the reward of well doing. We want you to know the dear Lord Jesus, for yourselves—and to believe in Him as your Redeemer, and the only one who can forgive your sins, and keep you from sinning; and we want you to know of the pure teachings of his great and holy Spirit in your hearts. It comes to all of us. A tender loving voice is that of the Good Shepherd, who says, "My sheep hear my voice and I know them and they follow me." This means they will hear and understand what He says, and do as He tells them. He shows them what is right and just and good, and says do these things, and then He shows them what is wrong and bad, and says do not do such wicked things.

If we do what is pleasing to our Heavenly Father, He will give us quiet spirits, and help us to bear the trials, the trouble and sorrow, w-may have in this life, and He intends these should bring us nearer Him, that He may help us and do us good, so we feel we cannot do without Him. And then He tells both white people and Indians that He has a beautiful home in Heaven, where his good people can live always; here is no sickness, nor sorrow, nor suffering; and no sin. But we must repent, be sorry for our sins and know of his forgiveness, and then He will take the weary and tired ones to this sweet rest. We are sure you will want to go here, when these poor bodies die and are buried in the earth; you will want your spirits to be happy in the beautiful home, prepared for all who love the dear Saviour. But if we do not listen to his voice and obey it, but give way to wicked thoughts and feelings in our hearts, so that our deeds are evil, the great and Good Spirit, will be grieved with us, and unless we repent before we die, we will have to go to a place where there is no happiness and all is darkness.

We tell you of these things because we want you to be happy and be saved from sin, and hoping you will choose the way the loving Father in Heaven would lead you in. We do not want you to follow the wicked spirit, the evil one that makes people bad and unhappy. We want you to be good, noble-hearted women, who can help your fathers, your husbands, brothers and friends to be true Christians and to cease from all evil.

We very much regret that the habit of taking strong drink is one of the temptations among our people, and we feel to warn you against his sin; it is an enemy to your happiness and prosperity. Even cider, of which you have so much, when taken to excess, hardens the heart and takes kind thoughts and feelings away from it. Now when this desire for drink presses on people they ought to resist it, and having no strength of their own, they should ask the Great Spirit to help them to overcome at the same time they must do all they can to help themselves. We now women have a great deal of influence, and we so much desire our Indian sisters may be strong in good works, so they can help the rothers.

We also want you to be very watchful over our conduct, that your lives may show the purity of your thoughts; and your words and deeds prove that the Lord is guiding you. Let the marriage covenant be a holy one, a sacred one between two hearts, that only death can part. A husband should only have one wife, and a wife one husband; these must be true and faithful to each other, and love each other, if they will be happy, and know of the blessing of the Good Spirit in their homes. Should little children be given you, take them as a gift from your Heavenly Father, who intends you to care for them tenderly and lovingly, and having known the meaning of the beautiful way to peace and happiness yourselves, you can teach and guide them the way to a better country, that is an heavenly.

The Good Book, the Scriptures of Truth, tells us how the Lord sent his only Son, a long long time ago, into the world, who was to lead and guide all who would follow, into paths of peace, and though He has gone back to Heaven He lives us all, and wants us to be good and happy. We know there are many of you who have heard of Him and are wanting and trying to become his children, and He sees and knows you just as you are; we want you to have strong faith in Him to help you. We are glad to feel this of you, and having found the true treasure, we want you to tell the good tidings to others, whom you meet, that the Lord is indeed good, his ways are ways of pleasantness and all his paths are peace; and because of his power to bless or blight, He is also to be feared.

We do not want to tire our sisters, but there is one thing more to speak of, it is to encourage you in the love and care of your homes, to have them neat and clean, so your husbands (whose work is to improve the farms) will be glad to come in and find comfort and cheer, and will not want to go to places they should not, because home is so nice and so happy, where kind words, bright faces and good hearts are awaiting them.

And now dear sisters, in saying farewell, we leave you in the care and keeping of our Father in Heaven, hoping He will bless this offering to you, as a help to all that is good, so that through your obedience to Him, He will be honored and glorified, while your happy portion will be peace and joy in this life and in the life to come.

With loving interest we are your sisters,

PHILADELPHIA, Sixth Month 15th, 1897.

DR. DOUTHWAITE of the China Indian Mission, as reported in the Christian Herald says:

"When I was in the city of Wunchau, with two other families of our missionaries, we were a long time without a supply of funds. We had run very short of money, and, as it drew towards Christmas time, we began to expect some from England, which was our usual source of supply. All the money was used up, but we said, 'The steamer will be in at Christmas, and then we shall surely get some more.' Christmas evening came and with it the steamer, but no money for us, nothing to encourage us at all. Our hopes seemed dashed to the ground. We knew that we could get no more money from our usual source for probably fifteen days. We went, as usual, and told the Lord all about it, for we went out to China knowing that we had only God to depend upon; and we were quite satisfied that that was enough for us, and we told our wants to Him.

"Now you will see how, that day, the Lord having shut up one source to try our faith, opened others. Before dinner-time a Chinaman came along with a large piece of beef, and said,

"I want you to accept this as a present. I have received a great deal of medicine from you. You have done me good, and you would not take any money. Will you please take this?"

"I took it and thanked God for it. Soon afterwards in came another Chinaman, a gentleman, with a coolie walking behind him with a large bamboo over his shoulder, and a basket hanging from each end. The man put the things down in the reception-room, and I was asked to come down. I went down and opened the basket, and found in it four hams and some little things besides. He said:

"I want you to accept this as a present."

"I did so, and thanked God for it. In came another Chinaman with a fat pheasant and some chickens and a basket of eggs, and he asked me to accept these; I did accept them and thanked God for them. But that was not all. Before evening a European, connected with the consular service, came along, bringing with him a coolie carrying a huge turkey. He said:

"See, I have been feeding this turkey for you six months. Will you accept it?"

"Thus the Lord provided for us, and we had an abundance of food for the whole of us, although our usual supply was cut off.

"Toward the evening I received a letter from the Custom-house officers, saying that, as I had gratuitously attended to them in cases of sickness, they had subscribed to purchase a case of instruments for me, but not knowing what I wanted, would I kindly accept the money? Of course I kindly did. They sent with the letter a roll of seventy dollars. Our hearts were full of joy. We gave God thanks for all he had done for us; and it is always a joy to me to look back upon that occasion and other similar ones, and remember what God has done."

"In some way or other

The Lord will provide;

It may not be my way, it may not be thy way,

But yet in his own way

The Lord will provide."

THE type of vicious journalism, recently condemned by the resolutions of the Protestant Ministers of New York is daily in evidence. A paper of too good reputation to be classed among those which pander to low tastes, recently gave a double page illustration of some of the "indecencies" which have shocked New York and Brooklyn. The pictures were not as gross and loud as those of Pictorial Gazette, but were of most disreputable personages, and were not given such prominence by way of censorship. How vicious journalism directly contributes to crime is most forcibly illustrated by an incident given by President Gerry, of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. Some boys were arrested for burglary, and taken to the office of the Society. Says — Gerry:

"The next day a sensational paper came out with a very sensational picture, illustrating the young criminals in their crime. That very day, two little boys came in with this sheet, and, placing it on the desk in front of the officer in charge of the Society's General Office, remarked, 'We're members of dat gang. Put us under arrest, too.' They were told that the Society had no authority to arrest them, but that they should surrender themselves to a police officer. This they did, and he marched them into court. The next day they were sent to the Society's reception rooms to await examination; but they were very much disappointed when their pictures did not appear in the paper. Our officers constantly report that very young girls, who have committed gross immoralities, frankly give, as a reason for so doing, the love of notoriety and a desire to see themselves illustrated in the newspapers."

— Gerry believes that the poison which such papers daily pour into uneducated and immature minds is one of the chief causes of the increase of crime among children. Nor does the evil stop there. These vile journals attack the societies and institutions which endeavor to rescue and protect child life from immoral and criminal influences and represent them as tearing the children ruthlessly away from their natural protectors. This pleases vicious parents and leads them to encourage their children in bad ways. Far worse are the publications than the dime novels which need to have a bad pre-eminence.—The Independent.

[The course of The British Friend of latter time seems to be directed towards an acknowledgment of unity and fellowship with those meetings in America which belong to what are termed "Hicksite" bodies. The departure from our primitive principles in many of the progressive meetings, which, notwithstanding, are owned and fellowshipped by London Yearly Meeting, it uses as an argument why a similar recognition should be extended to those who separated in 1827; and who, it asserts, maintain in a large degree some of the fundamental principles of Friends.

It seems to us that the proper effect of such a line of argument should be to induce London Yearly Meeting to bear an open and clear testimony against all that contravenes our fundamental doctrines, and not to lead it to sanction departures on one hand because it has drifted into compromises with error on the other hand, &c.

Included among a waiting worship and a waiting ministry are gone, there is nothing left of Quakerism. "Rev. Thomas C. Brown" advertises on a circular before us, as "Pastor of the Friends' Church" at Indianapolis, that there will be "Preaching" at 10.30 and 7.45 every Sunday; and that on the evening of Easter Sunday there will be an "Easter Song Service" with anthems, quartettes and solos bearing on the Resurrection, whose programme is given, with names of performers and composers; and only differing from a concert programme in that a collection, a prayer, a Scripture lesson, an "Address by the Pastor," and a "Benediction" occur. This is the Quakerism Devonshire House elects to support. That might be tolerable, or at any rate a lesser evil of two, but to support it against two other types of Quakerism which are bearing a testimony to the light of Christ within in much of its ancient purity and modern fidelity is hardly likely to be a permanently comfortable position for us.—The British Friend.

SUMMARY OF EVENTS.

UNITED STATES.—The Tariff bill was passed by the United States Senate on the 7th inst., by the decisive vote of 58 to 28. The affirmative vote was cast by thirty-five Republicans, two Silver Republicans, James S. Nevada, and Mauls, and one Democrat, McEnery. The negative vote was cast by twenty-five Democrats, two Populists, Harris of Kansas, and Turner, and one Silver Republican, Cannon. Eight Republicans were paired for the bill, and eight Democrats against it. The Senators present and not voting were Populists, viz., Allen, Butler, Heitfeld, Kyle and Stewart. Silver Republicans, 2, viz.: Teller and Pettigrew.

Two scientists of this city, C. D. White and Charles Schuchert, acting under orders from the National Museum, left on the fourteenth inst. for Boston, where they joined the Peary expedition which started for the regions of the North Pole. The two expeditions will disembark at Disco Island, off the western coast of Greenland, at about the seventieth parallel. Recent discoveries in this region have brought to light fossils which, it is said, tend to prove that Greenland was once a country of tropical climate. Disco Island is a volcanic mountain, and is especially rich in interesting fossils and formations.

The latter part of Ninth Mo. the two men will pursue their investigations, when they will look for the return of the Peary ship.

Judge Sumner, in the United States Circuit Court at Charleston, S. C., handed down a decision which makes perpetual injunction recently granted prohibiting State Dispensary constables from interfering with the original package stores.

Of the hundred replies received by the Commissioner of Labor of Nebraska from representative farmers to the question, "Does farming pay?" Seventy-one gave as their opinion that farming does not pay, twenty-one say it does, four that it says as well as anything else and four gave no reply.

United States Senator Isham G. Harris, of Tennessee, died in Washington, D. C., on the 8th inst., in his twenty-ninth year. He had been a member of the U. S. Senate twenty years. During the Civil War he served as Governor (Confederate) of Tennessee.

A train on the Kansas Pacific Railroad was detained at Arroyo, Colo., for eight hours, owing to the millions of sheep which congregated along the rails, and prevented the train from running.

Fourteen people are now known to have been killed in the tornadoes and cloud bursts in the northeastern section of Minnesota on the 6th and 7th of this month.

Two thousand Illinois miners are on strike. Under the present scale they say they can make only 90 cents a day.

News has reached Tacoma that the volcano on Douglas Island, opposite Juneau, Alaska, is in a state of eruption.

Deaths in this city last week were 506, being 14 more than the previous week, and 26 less than the corresponding week of last year. Of the foregoing, 259 were females and 251 males.—171 were under one year of age; 81 died of cholera infantum; 40 of consumption; 26 of heart disease; 30 of marasmus; 27 of pneumonia; 20 of old age; 23 of inflammation of the stomach and bowels; 21 of diphtheria; 15 of inflammation of the brain; 14 of convulsions; 13 of scarlet fever; 12 of cholera; 11 of infantile; 11 of apoplexy; 11 were drowned; and 9 of U. S. British's disease.

HOGS.—Best Western, 5 a 5½c; other kind, 5 a 5½c;

State, 4½ a 5c.

Circumstances.—Lord Salisbury, on the 8th inst., stated in the House of Lords, that the delay in the settlement of the peace terms between Turkey and Greece was entirely the fault of the former Power. Having alluded to the situation in 1878, pointing out that then a Russian army was at the gates of Constantinople, Lord Salisbury remarked that, as proportioned to the circumstances, the year 1878 was a more anxious one for us than 1878, so his hopes of a satisfactory result increase.

In an interview in London last week, John W. Foster, the United States Seal Commissioner, in speaking of Hawaii, said: "We learned the sentiments of Russia and France while our visit to St. Petersburg and Paris. They were not only anxious and ready to act as natural and inevitable. I do not believe Great Britain will object. The European Governments may not like it, but they are reconciled to it."

The Marine Journal says of the newly discovered rock in the Atlantic Ocean, that early in Fifth Month, it was first sighted by the British steamer Compton, found it at 47 degrees north and 37 degrees 20 minutes west. It is about 60 feet long, from 8 to 10 feet wide, and awash, with the exception of a piece in the centre, which stands about 8 feet high.

A circular note has been sent to the Powers by Berlin, suggesting the steps to be taken to expedite the conclusion of the treaty between Greece and Turkey.

Emperor Francis Joseph has advised the Sultan, in response to his request, to conclude peace with Greece on the basis of the conditions the Ambassadors have formulated, which are the maximum concessions recognized by the concert.

A circular note from the Powers was presented to the Turkish Government, demanding a cessation of the construction of the peace negotiations. The demands of the Ambassadors of the Powers relative to the Greco-Turkish frontier, have been rejected by the Turkish Council of Ministers.

The reply virtually implies a rupture of the negotiations and that the Powers must make a concession or adopt measures to enforce their decision. It is thought probable the Ambassadors at Constantinople will recommend their governments to recall them and organize a naval demonstration to compel Turkey to yield.

The Spanish Queen Regent has pardoned 103 Cubans who had been deported to the penal settlements at Cauta, Fernan and the Gueffarine Islands. The men pardoned will be permitted to return to Cuba.

Advices from the South of France show that the destruction by the floods there was greater even than earlier reports indicated. The losses are estimated at 200,000,000 francs in the Godeven (Pololita) which village has escaped damage, and the number of persons drowned is quite 300.

The London Daily Mail's correspondent at St. Petersburg says: "The harvest prospects in Central and South Russia are growing worse an worse. Continuous rains are destroying the hay crops, while the exceptionally poor beet crop in Edoleten (Pololita) has practically ruined the sugar industry."

The crops in some of the Baltic provinces also suffered heavily from rains, and a significant sign of the gravity of the situation is the fact that an unusually severe censorship is exercised over news concerning it. There is every likelihood that the present will be one of the driest years in Russian history.

Forty persons were killed and eighty-four others seriously injured in a railway collision at Gzenteft, Denmark, on the 12th inst.

A cablegram from Calcutta says it is rumored that all the mail hands up the Hoogly have struck work, and that they are preparing to march 3000 strong to reinforce the rioters. The Government has ordered the military to intercept them.

DIED, Fifth Month 20th, 1897, SARAH E. CHAMBERS, in the eighty-sixth year of her age. She was a member and Officer of New Green Assembly Meeting of Friends, in Chester County, Pennsylvania. During the months of suffering, which preceded her death, she showed a remarkable fortitude and acquiescence in the Divine will. Her "chamber of sickness" was often a place of prayer and praise, and so softly murmured passages of Scripture, and lines and hymns, that her presence was a comfort and a balm to the hearts of those gathered around her, and her love and hope and trust which overcame all fear. All her life-long an advocate and promoter of "love and unity," the promise applies to her: "Blessed are the peacemakers for they shall be called the children of God."
